A BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

IBARRA, JOACHIM, a celebrated Spanish printer, born at Saragossa 1726; died at Madrid 23 Nov. 1795.

IBBETSON, JULIUS CÆSAR, a celebrated landscape painter, termed 'the Berghem of England,' was born at Scarborough, and died 1817.

IBBOT, BENJAMIN, D.D., was born at Beachamwell, Norfolk, 1680, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, from whence, in 1700, he removed to Corpus Christi College, where he obtained a fellowship in 1706; but resigned it the following year, on becoming librarian and chaplain to Archbishop Tenison, who appointed him treasurer of the cathedral of Wells, and gave him the united livings of St. Vedast, Foster Lane, and St. Michael le Querne. George I. made him one of his chaplains; and when that monarch visited Cambridge, Mr. Ibbot was created D.D. by mandamus. In 1713 and 1714 he preached the Boyle's lecture. In 1724 he was installed prebendary of Westminster, but died on 5th April the year following. His sermons at Boyle's lecture were published in 1727; and his posthumous discourses, by Dr. Clarke, for the benefit of his widow, in 2 vols.; of which an enlarged edition appeared 1775. Dr. Ibbot published a translation of Puffendorff, 'De habitu religionis Christianæ ad vitam civilem;' and there are some of his poems in Dodsley's collection.

IBRAHIM EFFENDI, a native of Poland, who was raised by his courage and talents to the first dignities in the Ottoman empire. He established the first printing-press in Turkey in 1728. The count de Bonneval furnished him with the characters. The first work which he produced was on the military art; he afterwards published the Account of an Expedition against the Afghans; a Turkish Grammar; and a History of Turkey.

IBRAHIM PASHA, viceroy of Egypt, died at Cairo 10 Nov., 1848, aged 59.

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, flourished about 540 B.C.

IFFLAND, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, a German actor and dramatist, born at Hanover 19 April, 1759; died at Berlin 20 Sept., 1814.

IGNARRA, NICHOLAS, a learned ecclesiastic and antiquary of Naples; born 21 Sept., 1728; died 6 August, 1808.

IGNATIUS (ST.), a martyr, bishop of Antioch, surnamed Theophorus, who succeeded Evodius about A.D. 68, was St. John's disciple, and maintained the faith in presence of the Emperor Trajan, during the third persecution. He suffered martyrdom at Rome 10 Dec., 107. There are extant seven Epistles written by him while he was going in chains to Rome. They have been translated into English by Dr. Wake. The other letters ascribed to this martyr are spurious.

IGNATIUS (ST.), patriarch of Constantinople, son of the Emperor Michael Curopalates, and of Procopia, daughter of the Emperor Nicephorus. He succeeded Methodius 846, and having been banished in 857, by the intrigues of Bardas, whose sins he had reproved, the celebrated Photius was put in his place. St. Ignatius was afterwards deposed, in a bye council held at Constantinople 858, from which he appealed to the Pope, who declared both this deposition, and the ordination of Photius, null and void. He was not, however, restored to his see till the reign of Basilius the Macedonian, who, being left sole emperor 867, confined Photius in the monastery of Scepsis. This restoration of St. Ignatius occasioned the fourth general council of Constantinople to be held. After St. Ignatius's death, which occurred 23 Oct., 877, aged 78, Photius again took possession of the see of Constantinople.

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (ST.), founder of the Society of Jesus, was born in the province of Guipuscoa, in Spain, 1491, of a noble family. He entered into the army when young, and in 1521 had his leg broken at the siege of Pampeluna. During his confinement he made a vow to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and accordingly, on his recovery, he hung up his arms in the church of Montserrat, and dedicated himself to the Blessed Virgin. Having first paid his repects to the Pope, and obtained his benediction, he embarked at Venice (1523), and proceeded to Jerusalem, where he continued some months. On his return to Spain he applied himself to the study of Latin, and in 1526 entered himself a student of the university of Alcala. He began also to preach and gather disciples, for which he was thrown into prison, but obtained his release on promising to refrain from those practices. This condition, however, he soon violated, and was again placed under confinement at Salamanca, but recovered his liberty, on making a similar promise. He now went to Paris, where he made some proselytes, who bound themselves by a vow to observe the rule of their leader. After visiting England, Ignatius returned to Spain, and his preaching drew crowds of hearers. From thence he proceeded to Venice, with several followers, who assumed the name of 'The Society of Jesus.' After encountering some opposition, Ignatius procured, in 1546, the papal sanction to his order, of which he was created the first general; and in 1550 Pope Julius III. confirmed the society by a new and enlarged decree. The founder died at Rome 31 July, 1556; and in 1622 he was canonized. The Society of Jesus was suppressed by Clement IV. 1773, and solemnly re-established by Pius VII. 1814.

IHRE, JOHN, a learned antiquary of Upsal, in Sweden, born at Lund 1707; died 26 Nov. 1780. The 'Glossarium Sueco-Gothicum' is his best work.

ILDEFONSUS (ST.), a disciple of St. Isidore of Seville, afterwards abbat of Angeli, and archbishop of Toledo 658. He died 23 Feb. 667, aged 62, leaving a treatise 'On the spotless and perpetual Virginity of the Holy and Glorious Mary, Mother of God;' and other works printed in the Library of the Fathers.

ILIVE, JACOB, a printer and letter-founder, who, in 1751, published 'The Book of Jasher.' He was also the author of a discourse, in which he maintained that this earth is hell, and that the souls of men are apostate spirits in a state of punishment. He set up a meeting for the promulgation of deism; but at last was taken up and confined in Clerkenwell prison. Died 1763.

ILLESCAS, GONSALVO, a Spanish ecclesiastic, died 1580. He wrote the lives of the Popes, 2 vols., 1570.

IMBERT, BARTHÉLEMI, a French poet, born at Nimes 1747; died at Paris 2 Aug. 1790. His poem on 'The Judgment of Paris' is much admired.

IMBERT, JOSEPH GABRIEL, a French Carthusian monk, celebrated as a painter, was born at Marseilles 1654; died 1740.

IMHOFF, JAMES WILLIAM, a lawyer and genealogist, born 1651 at Nuremberg, where he died 20 Dec. 1728.

IMISON, JOHN, an ingenious English mechanic, author of a celebrated work entitled 'The School of Arts,' died 16 Aug., 1788.

IMOLA, INNOCENT DA. See FRANCUCCI.

IMPERIALI, JOHN BAPTIST, a physician, born at Vincenza 1568; became professor of philosophy and physic at Padua; and died 26 May, 1623. He wrote Latin poems; 'Exotericarum Exercitationum, lib. ii.;' and a Defence of Alexander Massaria. His son, John Imperiali, born 1602, was also a physician, and died at Padua about 1670, leaving 'Musæum Historicum et Physicum,' and other works.

IMPERIALI, JOSEPH RÉNÉ, a cardinal, who in 1730 lost the election to the pontificate by only one vote. He was born at Genoa 1651, and died 15 Jan., 1737, leaving his library for public use.

INCHBALD, Mrs. ELIZABETH, was born at Stanningfield, Suffolk, 15 Oct., 1753, being the daughter of a farmer named Simpson. At the age of sixteen she came to London, and soon afterwards made her début on the stage at Edinburgh. Young, beautiful, and inexperienced, she had the good fortune to find a protector in Mr. Inchbald, an actor, who by marrying her delivered her from the dangers to which she was exposed. She subsequently appeared on the boards at Dublin and London; but some successful attempts at dramatic composition ultimately led her to abandon the stage, on which she did not figure after 1789. From that period she devoted herself entirely to literary pursuits, and died at Kensington 1 Aug., 1821. Mrs. Inchbald wrote 'Such Things Are;' 'Lovers' Vows;' 'To Marry or Not to Marry,' and other comedies, all of which met with considerable applause. She also published two admirable novels, 'A Simple Story' (1791), and 'Nature and Art' (1796), and a collection of plays in 42 vols. Her Memoirs and Familiar Correspondence were published by James Boaden, in 2 vols., 1833.

INCHOFER, MELCHIOR, a Jesuit, born at Vienna 1584, became professor of philosophy, mathematics, and divinity at Messina, and died at Milan 28 Sept., 1648. He published 'The B. V. Mary's Letter to the People of Messina proved to be genuine,' 1629; 'Ecclesiastical Annals of the Kingdom of Hungary,' &c. A satire against the Jesuits, entitled 'Monarchia Solipsorum,' has been ascribed to him, but was probably written by Julius Clement Scotti, an ex-Jesuit.

INCLEDON, BENJAMIN CHARLES, a popular vocalist, born at Keverne, Conwall, about 1764. At eight years of age he was placed in the choir of Exeter Cathedral, under the celebrated Jackson; but at fifteen he ran away and served in the navy as a common sailor for about five years. On his return he obtained a considerable reputation as a singer in the provinces. He was engaged at Covent Garden, 1790, from which time he was a great favourite with the public. Died at Worcester 11 Feb., 1826.

INGE, HUGH, D.D., an Englishman; bishop of Meath 1512; archbishop of Dublin 1521; died 3 Aug., 1528.

INGELO, NATHANIEL, D.D., was at first a fellow of Emmanuel College, and afterwards of Queen's College, Cambridge. He also had a fellowship at Eton, and died there in Aug., 1683. He wrote a religious romance, called 'Bentivolio and Urania.' His correspondence with Dr. Hammond was published 1739.

INGENHOUSZ, JOHN, F.R.S., an eminent physician and chemist, born at Breda 1730. He learned in England the Suttonian method of inoculation, and then went to Vienna, where he inoculated some of the imperial family. Eventually he returned to this country, and died near London 7 Sept., 1799. Besides some valuable communications in the Transactions of the Royal Society he published 'Experiments on Vegetables,' and a Latin translation of Hulme's Treatise on the Gout.

INGHIRAMI, FRANCESCO, an Italian antiquary, born at Volterra 1772; died 17 May, 1846. His principal work is entitled 'Monumenti Etruschi,' 10 vols., 1820-27.

INGHIRAMI, TOMASO FEDRA, a Latin poet and orator, born at Volterra, in Tuscany, 1470. Going to Rome he was overwhelmed with honours by several of the Popes; and Julius II. appointed him keeper of the Vatican library, and of the secret archives in the Castle of St. Angelo. Doubtless he would have been promoted still further had he not been prematurely cut off by death 6 Sept., 1516. Erasmus and Sadolet speak of him in terms of great laudation. He wrote a Defence of Cicero; a commentary on the Ars Poetica of Horace; a History of Rome: and Remarks on Plautus; with additions to that author's Aulularia.

INGLIS, HENRY DAVID, a writer of travels and works of fiction, was born at Edinburgh 1795, and died in London 20 March, 1835. His principal works, some of which were published under the pseudonym of Derwent Conway, are 'Tales of Ardennes;' 'Solitary Walks through many Lands;' 'Travels in Norway and Sweden;' 'Switzerland and the Pyrenees;' 'Spain in 1830;' 'Travels in the Tyrol;' 'Ireland in 1834;' 'The Channel Islands;' and 'The New Gil Blas.'

INGLIS, HESTER, a lady eminent for her penmanship in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. One of her performances, in the possession of the Harcourt family, is entitled 'Historiæ memorabiles Genesis per Esterum Inglis Galliam, ann. 1600.' From this it appears that she was a native of France, and that she resided at Edinburgh. She married Bartholomew Kello, a Scotchman, by whom she had a son, who became a clergyman, and was minister of Speckshall, in Suffolk. Mrs. Inglis was very intimate with Bishop Hall of Norwich; and her grandson was sword-bearer of that city. She died July, 1625. There are several specimens of her exquisite penmanship in the British Museum. (MSS. Addit. 987; 27,927, &c.)

INGLIS, JAMES, abbat of Culross, in Scotland, was murdered 1 March, 1530. He was much esteemed as a poet and scholar, and is supposed to be the author of 'The Complaynt of Scotland,' first published at St. Andrew's, 1548.

INGLIS, JOHN, D.D., a Scotch divine, was a native of Perthshire. He was appointed one of the ministers of the Greyfriars church, Edinburgh, 1796; moderator of the general assembly 1804; and died 2 Jan., 1834, aged 71, leaving a work on the evidences of Christianity and a treatise in defence of Ecclesiastical Establishments.

INGRAM, ROBERT, an English divine, born at Beverley, Yorkshire, 9 March, 1726-7. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his degrees in arts. His first preferment was the perpetual curacy of Bridhurst, in Kent; next the living of Orston, in Nottinghamshire; and afterwards the vicarages of Wormington and Boxted, in Essex. He died 3 Aug., 1804. Mr. Ingram wrote 'A View of the Great Events of the Seventh Plague, or Period when the mystery of God shall be finished;' 'Accounts of the Ten Tribes of Israel being in America, originally published by Manasseh Ben Israel;' 'A Complete and Uniform Explanation of the Prophecy of the Seven Vials of Wrath.'

INGRASSIAS, JOHN PHILIP, a physician and anatomist of Palermo, born 1510 died 6 Nov., 1580.

INGUIMBERTI, DOMINIC JOSEPH MARIA D', bishop of Carpentras, was born in that city 24 Aug., 1683, and died 6 Sept., 1757. To this worthy prelate, who published some religious pieces, the city of Carpentras owes its public library, museum, and hospital.

INGULPHUS, abbat of Croyland, of which abbey he wrote the history, was born in London about 1030. His father belonged to the court of Edward the Confessor, whose queen took great pleasure in the conversation of Ingulphus. He was educated at Westminster and Oxford; after which he became secretary to William the Conqueror, duke of Normandy, when that prince visited England. He next went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and on his return turned monk in Normandy; but after the conquest he was made abbat of Croyland, where he died 17 Dec., 1109. His work was printed by Sir Henry Savile 1596; and by Gale in his 'Scriptores.' There was also another edition at Oxford in 1684. An English translation by H. T. Riley forms one of the volumes of 'Bohn's Antiquarian Library.'

INMAN, JAMES, D.D., some time fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, and for many years professor of mathematics at the Royal Naval College, and the School of Naval Architecture, Portsmouth, died 7 Feb., 1859, aged 83. He was regarded with high esteem in naval circles for his application of science to navigation and shipbuilding. His translation of 'Chapman,' with his valuable annotations, is the text-book on which all subsequent writers on naval architecture have proceeded.

INNES, LOUIS, a Catholic divine, who was principal of the Scotch college at Paris when James II. sought an asylum in France. He was appointed almoner to the queen, and secretary of state to the expatriated monarch. To him is ascribed the compilation of 'The Memoirs of James II.,' an abstract of which was published by Dr. Clarke 1806. He was succeeded as principal of the Scotch college by his brother, Thomas Innes, who died 9 Feb., 1744. The latter was an accomplished antiquary, and published 'A Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of the Northern Parts of Britain,' 2 vols., 1729.—Anderson.

INNOCENT I., Pope, succeeded Anastasius 401; died 14 Feb., 417.

INNOCENT II., a Roman, was elected Pope after Honorius II., 1130, by part of the cardinals; the rest elected cardinal Peter de Leo and named him Anacletus II., which caused a schism in the Church. Anacletus dying 1138, the schismatics elected in his place Gregory, who took the name of Victor IV., but who abdicated soon afterwards, when peace was restored, and Innocent II. acknowledged as legitimate Pope by the whole Church. Innocent died 24 Sept., 1143.

INNOCENT III., Lothario Conti, succeeded Celestine III. 1198, at the age of 37; and died 20 July, 1216.

INNOCENT IV., Sinibaldo de' Fieschi, was elected Pope 1234; and died 13 Dec., 1254.

INNOCENT V., Peter de Tarantaise, born 1245, was elected Pope 21 Jan., 1276; and died 22 June the same year.

INNOCENT VI., Stephen Albert, succeeded Clement VI. 1352; died 12 Sept., 1362.

INNOCENT VII., Cosmo de' Migliorati, was elected Pope 1404; died 6 Nov., 1406.

INNOCENT VIII., John Baptist Cibo, succeeded Sixtus IV 1484; died 25 July, 1492.

INNOCENT IX., John Anthony Facchinetti, was elected Pope 30 Oct., 1591, and died two months later, Dec. 31.

INNOCENT X., John Baptist Panfili, succeeded Urban VIII. 1644; died 7 Jan., 1655, aged 81.

INNOCENT XI., Benedict Odescalchi, succeeded Clement X. 1676; died 12 Aug., 1689.

INNOCENT XII., Antonio Pignatelli, was elected Pope 1691, and died 27 Sept., 1700.

INNOCENT XIII., Michael Angelo Conti, elected Pope 1721; died 7 March, 1724.

INTERIAN DE AYALA, JOHN, a Spanish monk, who died at Madrid 20 Oct., 1730, aged 74. He published a work on the errors of painters in representing religious subjects, entitled 'Pictor Christianus eruditus,' 1720; and some poems.

INVEGES, AUGUSTINE, a Jesuit, born at Siacca, in Sicily, 1595; died at Palermo April, 1677. He wrote The History of Palermo; Historia Paradisi terrestris; La Cartagine Siciliana; History of Camo in Sicily.

IOLO GOCH, a Welsh bard who died about 1402.

IRELAND, JOHN, was born near Wem, Shropshire, and brought up to the business of watchmaking, which he carried on for some years in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden. He also dealt in pictures and prints, for which he had a good taste. He died near Birmingham Nov., 1808. He published the 'Memoirs of John Henderson,' and 'Illustrations of Hogarth,' 3 vols.

IRELAND, JOHN, D.D., was born at Ashburton, Devonshire, 8 Sept., 1761, and educated at Oxford. He became vicar of Croydon (1793-1816); prebendary of Westminster (1802); sub-dean (1806); dean (1816-42); rector of Islip, Oxfordshire (1816-35): died 1 Sept., 1842. Dean Ireland was very intimate with Mr. Giffard, whom he assisted in the editorship of the 'Quarterly Review.' Among his separate publications are 'Five Discourses, containing certain arguments for and against the reception of Christianity by the ancient Jews and Greeks;' 'Vindiciæ Regiæ, a defence of the Kingly Office;' 'Paganism and Christianity compared.' By his will he left 10,000*l.* to the university of Oxford for the endowment of a Professorship of the Exegesis of the Holy Scripture.

IRELAND, SAMUEL, a weaver in Spitalfields, who, having some turn for the arts, emerged from his obscurity to become a dealer in scarce books and pictures. He also published several works, which for their embellishments were at one time in request. These were, 'A Picturesque Tour through Holland, Brabant, and France,' 2 vols.; 'Picturesque Views on the Thames,' 2 vols.; 'Picturesque Views on the Medway.' In 1794 he published 'Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth;' and two years afterwards he made himself notorious by a pretended discovery of manuscripts in the handwriting of Shakespeare; a fac-simile copy of which was printed by subscription, at the moderate price of four guineas. The imposture, however, was soon detected. The other productions of Mr. Ireland were, 'Picturesque Views of the Severn and Warwickshire Avon;' and a 'History of the Inns of Court.' Died July, 1800.

IRELAND, Samuel William Henry, son of the preceding, was born in London 1777. He was educated in France, and at the age of 16 was apprenticed to a conveyancer in his native city. Having accompanied his father to Stratford-upon-Avon, and noticing his enthusiasm for Shaksperean relics, he forged a deed containing a pretended autograph of the poet, which he stated he had found among some old law papers. The eagerness with which his father believed this tale induced him to manufacture other documents of the same description; and he finally produced a play called 'Vortigern' purporting to be by Shakspere. It at first deceived many men of letters, and Sheridan purchased it for Drury Lane Theatre, where it was produced with John Kemble in the leading part; but the total failure of the play, joined with the attacks of Malone and others, soon led to a general conviction of young Ireland's dishonesty. 'Vortigern' and 'Henry II.,' a similar production, were printed in 1789, and the former was republished in 1832 with a fac-simile of the original forgery. Being required to show the source from which he had derived the MSS., he at last confessed his deception, left his father's house, and abandoned his profession. He passed the rest of his life in literary pursuits, publishing several novels which never had much popularity, 'Neglected Genius,' a poem (1812), &c. His 'Confessions' (1805) contains a full account of his literary forgeries.

IRENÆUS (St.), bishop of Lyons, was a native of Greece, and the disciple of Polycarp, by whom it is supposed he was sent into Gaul. He was at first a priest in the church of Lyons, and on the martyrdom of Pothinus, in 174, succeeded him in that bishopric. He had a disputation with Valentinus at Rome, and held a council at Lyons in which the Gnostic heresy was condemned. Irenæus was a great lover of peace, and laboured to allay the controversy respecting the time of celebrating Easter. He was beheaded at Lyons in the persecution under Severus, about A.D. 202. His works were edited by Grabe, at Oxford, 1702, and by Massuet, at Paris, 1710.

IRETON, Henry, son of German Ireton, Esq., of Attenton, Notts, was born there 1610. He became a commoner of Trinity College, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple; but when the Rebellion broke out, he joined the Parliament, and was at the battle of Naseby. Having married a daughter of Oliver Cromwell, he soon rose to preferments, and became commissary-general. He sat in judgment upon the king, and the next year went as commander of the army in Ireland, where he died 26 Nov., 1651. His body was brought to England, and buried in Westminster Abbey, till the Restoration, when it was taken up, suspended at the gallows, and there thrown into a pit with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw.

IRNERIUS, or WERNERIUS, a civilian of Bologna, who is supposed to have died between 1126 and 1138.

IRVING, Edward, a popular preacher, was born at Annan, Scotland, 15 Aug., 1792, and educated at Edinburgh, where he proceeded to the degree of M.A. After becoming a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, he acted as assistant to Dr. Chalmers at Glasgow; but in 1822 he removed to the Presbyterian meeting-house at the Caledonian Asylum, Cross Street, Hatton Garden, London, where the novelty of his style, and the force and eloquence of his discourses, soon rendered him the most popular preacher of his time, and the singularity of his appearance and gesticulations attracted very large congregations. He also published several religious works, which had an extensive sale. In 1829 he removed to a larger chapel in Regent Square. Previously to this, however, he had departed from the doctrinal standards of the Church of Scotland, and had developed his new opinions in his 'Sermons, Lectures, and Occasional Discourses' (1828). He was charged with holding Christ subject to original and actual sin, and with denying the doctrines of atonement, satisfaction, imputation, and substitution. The exhibition of the 'unknown tongues' uttered by some designing or deluded persons of his congregation, and pronounced by Mr. Irving to be 'manifestations of the Holy Ghost,' next occupied public attention; the result of all being that he was deprived of his charge in Regent Square (1832), and deposed from the ministry of the Church of Scotland (1833). Mr. Irving afterwards preached in a chapel in Newman Street, and became the founder of a sect, calling themselves the 'Catholic and Apostolic Church,' but generally known as 'Irvingites.' Died at Glasgow 6 Dec., 1834. All his writings are on religious subjects.—Anderson.

IRVING, George Vere, a topographer, fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, was born at Newton, Lanarkshire, 1815, being the only son of Alexander Irving, Esq. (Lord Newton). Mr. Irving was a very frequent contributor to 'Notes and Queries,' and the author in collaboration with Mr. Alexander Murray of a large work on the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, published in 1864. He died in London 29 Oct., 1869.

IRVING, Washington, the son of a merchant of New York, was born there 3 April, 1783. He was intended for the legal profession, and studied for the bar, but before he was 21 he commenced his career as a writer, and in 1809 published the amusing 'History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker.' Abandoning the idea of following the legal profession, he went (1810) into mercantile business with his brother, but the house failed in 1817. Mr. Irving was at that time resident at Liverpool, manager of the European branch of the firm, and the event threw him upon his own resources. He resolved to devote his life to literature, and as a result of this determination the 'Sketch Book' appeared in 1819. It was recognised as the product of taste and genius; and even English criticism, until then always scornful of American books, paid homage to its merits. Other well-known works followed, viz., 'Bracebridge Hall,' 1822; 'Tales of a Traveller,' 1824; 'Life of Columbus,' 1828; 'Conquest of Granada,' 1829; and 'The Alhambra,' 1831. Meantime Mr. Irving, in 1829, 1830, and 1831, had been appointed secretary to the American embassy in London; and during his residence abroad he had spent much time in Spain and in various other parts of Europe, acquiring the friendship and esteem of the most distinguished men of the day. In 1832 he returned to his native country, where he continued his literary labours. The result of a visit to the Indian tribes was the publication of the elegant 'Tour on the Prairies.' Then followed 'Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey;' 'Legends of the Conquest of Spain,' 1836; 'Astoria,' 1836; and 'The Adventures of Captain Bonneville,' 1837. In 1842 he was honoured with the appointment of Minister to Spain, and at the end of his official term in 1846 he returned to the United States. In 1848-50 he superintended a revised edition of his works; in 1849 published 'Oliver Goldsmith;' in 1850 'Mahomet and his Successors;' then 'Wolfert's Roost;' and the 'Life of Washington,' 5 vols., 1855-59. He died at his residence, Sunnyside, near Tarrytown, New York, 28 Nov., 1859.

IRWIN, EYLES, was born at Calcutta, of Irish parents, 1748. He received his education under Dr. Rose at Chiswick; and in 1767 returned to the east in a civil capacity; but was suspended (1777) for his attachment to Lord Pigot; on which he came to Europe overland to seek redress; which he obtained, and he was restored to his former station at Madras, whither he repaired again by the same route. In 1785 he returned again to England; but in 1792 he went to China to superintend the company's affairs; after which he revisited England, where he died 14 Oct., 1817. His works are—St. Thomas's Mount, a poem; Bedakah, an Indian pastoral; Adventures during a Voyage up the Red Sea, and a Journey across the Desert; Eastern Eclogues; Epistle to Mr. Hayley; Ode on the Death of Hyder Ally; Triumph of Innocence, an ode on the acquittal of Mr. Hastings; Inquiry into the feasibility of Buonaparte's Expedition to the East; Buonaparte in Egypt; Nilus, an Elegy on the Victory of Admiral Nelson; the Failure of the French Crusade; The Bedouins; Ode to Iberia; Elegy on the fall of Saragossa; Napoleon, or the Vanity of Human Wishes.

ISAAC I., Comnenus, Emperor of the East, was crowned 1057, after the defeat of Michael Stratioticus. He resigned the throne to Constantine Ducas 1059, and died 1061.

He published an excellent Commentary on the Pentateuch, in folio; and, in 1743, a Medical Dictionary, 3 vols. folio. His other works were a translation of 'Ramazzani de morbis Artificum;' the Practice of Physic, 2 vols. 8vo.; a Treatise on Canine Madness; and a Dispensatory. In 1755 he was honoured with the degree of doctor of physic at Cambridge, by mandamus. He now distinguished himself by his famous fever remedy (James's powder), which, though at first attacked by the faculty, kept its ground, and made the fortune of the inventor and his family. Dr. James died 23 March, 1776. Dr. Johnson was the early friend of this ingenious man, and has paid him a fine compliment in his Lives of the Poets.

JAMES, THOMAS, D.D., was born about 1571, at Newport, Isle of Wight. He was educated at Winchester School, and New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1599 he published the 'Philobiblion' of Richard of Durham, for which he was made keeper of the Bodleian library. In 1614 he took his doctor's degree, was promoted to the sub-deanery of Wells, and the rectory of Mongeham, Kent. Dr. James next undertook to collate the manuscripts of the fathers and ecclesiastical writers; but the design failed for want of encouragement. He died at Oxford Aug., 1629. His principal publications are—Catalogus Librorum in Bibl. Bodleiana; Concordantiæ S. S. Patrum; Apology for John Wickliffe; A Treatise on the Corruption of the Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers; The Jesuits' Downfall; Index librorum prohibitorum à pontificiis, &c.

JAMES, THOMAS, D.D., was born at St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, and educated at Eton; from whence he removed to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1776 he became master of Rugby School, which he resigned in 1793, and was presented to the rectory of Harrington, and a prebend in Worcester Cathedral. Dr. James published a Compendium of Geography, and an Algebraic Explanation of the fifth Book of Euclid. Died 24 Sept., 1804. His son, John Thomas James, D.D., became bishop of Calcutta on the death of Bishop Heber 1827; and died 22 Aug., 1828.

JAMES, WILLIAM, a prelate, was a native of Sandbach, Cheshire. He became master of University College, Oxford, 1572; archdeacon of Coventry 1577; dean of Christ Church 1584; dean of Durham 1596; bishop of Durham 1606. Died 12 May, 1617. Two single sermons of his are in print.

JAMES, William, author of the 'Naval History of Great Britain,' died in London 28 May, 1827.

JAMESON, Mrs. Anna, a miscellaneous writer and art-critic, born in Dublin 1796, being the daughter of Mr. Murphy, painter in ordinary to the Princess Charlotte. She was married in 1823 to Mr. Robert Jameson, subsequently vice-chancellor of Canada, but the union was not a happy one, and was practically, though not legally, dissolved soon after its celebration. Mrs. Jameson died at Ealing 17 March, 1860. Subjoined is a list of her writings: 'Visits and Sketches at home and abroad;' 'Tales and Miscellanies;' 'Loves of the Poets;' 'Lives of celebrated Female Sovereigns;' 'Characteristics of Women,' being criticisms on Shakspere's female characters; 'Beauties of the Court of Charles II.;' 'Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada;' 'Pictures of the Social Life of Germany, as represented in the Dramas of the Princess Amelia of Saxony;' 'Handbook to the Public Galleries of Art in and near London;' 'Companion to the Private Galleries of Art in London;' 'Memoirs of the early Italian Painters;' 'Memoirs and Essays on Art, Literature, and Social Morals;' 'Sacred and Legendary Art;' 'Legends of the Monastic Orders;' 'Legends of the Madonna;' 'Commonplace Book of Thoughts, Memories, and Fancies;' 'Sisters of Charity; 'The Communion of Labour,' a lecture on the social employment of women.

JAMESON, Robert, a naturalist, born at Leith, in Scotland, 11 July, 1774, and educated at Edinburgh. For a time he acted as assistant to a surgeon in his native town, but soon abandoned the medical profession in order to devote his undivided attention to the study of natural history, especially geology. After making several geological tours in his native country, he visited Germany (1800), and for two years studied mineralogy and geology at Freyberg under the celebrated Werner. On his return he was appointed to the chair of natural history at Edinburgh (1804), and held it till his death on 19 April, 1854. Professor Jameson, who was a member of various learned societies, published: 'Outline of the Mineralogy of the Shetland Islands, and of the Isle of Arran,' 1798; 'Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles, with mineralogical observations made in a Tour through the Hebrides, Orkney, Shetland, and different parts of the Mainland of Scotland, with Dissertations upon Peat and Kelp,' 2 vols., 1800; 'System of Mineralogy,' 3 vols., 1804-8, 3rd edit., 1820; 'Mineralogical Description of the County of Dumfries,' 1805; 'Treatise on the External Character of Minerals,' 1805; 'Elements of Geognosy,' 1809; 'Manual of Minerals and Mountain Rocks,' 1831; 'Mineralogy according to the Natural History Method,' 1837. He also contributed largely to scientific periodicals, and was editor of the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal.

JAMESONE, George, a painter, born at Aberdeen 1586; died at Edinburgh 1644. He studied under Rubens, and, in 1628, returned to his native country, where he practised in history and landscape, though he excelled in portraits. Charles I. sat to him for his picture, gave him a diamond ring, and allowed him to appear covered in his presence, on account of a weakness in his eyes.

JAMET, Pierre Charles, a Frenchman, author of 'Metaphysical Essays' and other works, published anonymously, was born at Louvières 1701, and died about 1770.

JAMIESON, John, D.D., an antiquary and philologist, was born at Glasgow 5 March, 1759, and brought up in the university there. Entering the ministry, he officiated to the Secession congregation at Forfar for sixteen years, at the expiration of which time he was nominated pastor of the Antiburgher congregation in Nicholson Street, Edinburgh, where he died 12 July, 1838. His great work, 'The Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language,' appeared in 2 vols. 4to., 1809-10, and two supplementary vols. came out in 1825.

JAMYN, Amadis, a French poet, born about 1538; died about 1585.

JANE I., Queen of Naples, daughter of Charles king of Sicily, was born 1327; assumed the government 1343; and was put to death 1382.

JANE II., Queen of Naples, born 1370; succeeded her brother Ladislaus 1414; died 1435.

JANE D'ALBRET. See Dalbret.

JANE FRANCES OF CHANTAL, St., was born at Dijon, in France, 13 Jan., 1572, and became the wife of Christopher de Rabutin, baron of Chantal, to whom she bore six children. After his death Madame de Chantal put herself under the direction of St. Francis de Sales, who at that time preached at Dijon. She was zealous and exemplary in the practice of every Christian virtue, and took the nun's habit 1610 at Annecy, where she founded the Order of the Visitation. She governed this Order with the utmost wisdom and prudence, and died, in great reputation for sanctity, at Moulins 13 Dec., 1641. She was canonized by Clement XIII.

JANEWAY, James, a divine, born 1636, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a studentship; but being deprived of it in 1662, he set up a dissenting congregation at Rotherhithe. Died 16 March, 1674. He published, The Life of his Brother, John Janeway, a pious nonconformist; A Token for Children Legacy to his Friends.

JANICON, François Michel, a political writer and journalist, born at Paris 24 Dec., 1674; died at the Hague 19 Aug., 1730.

JANOZKI, or JANISCH, John Daniel, a Polish ecclesiastic and writer on the literary history of his country, was born 1720, and died 1786.

JANSENIUS, Cornelius, a learned prelate, born at Hulst, in Flanders, 1513. Philip II. of Spain sent him to the Council of Trent, and on his return he was made the first bishop of Ghent, where he died 10 April, 1576, leaving a Harmony of the Gospels, and other works.

JANSENIUS, or JANSSEN, Cornelius, was born 1585, near Leerdam, in Holland. He studied at Louvain, from whence he removed to Paris, and next to Bayonne, where he became master of the college. After residing there some years he returned to Louvain, and was chosen principal of the college of St. Pulcheria. In 1624 he was sent on a mission to the king of Spain, who employed him to write a book against France, for which Jansenius was rewarded, in 1635, with the bishopric of Ypres; but he did not long enjoy that dignity, being carried off by the plague 6 May, 1638. He wrote a considerable number of books, the principal of which, entitled 'Augustinus,' he left complete for the press, and submitted it, by his last will, to the judgment of the apostolic see. Its publication in 1640 raised great commotions in the university of Louvain; to appease which Urban VIII. prohibited the book in 1642, as reviving propositions which had been condemned by his predecessors. The same troubles arising in France, Pope Innocent X. condemned, in 1653, the five famous propositions extracted from the book of Jansenius, viz.:—1. That there are divine precepts which even good men cannot obey without the assistance of God. 2. That no man can resist the influence of divine grace on his mind. 3. That to render human actions meritorious, it is not necessary for them to be free from necessity but constraint. 4. That the doctrine of free will is a gross error. 5. That Jesus Christ died not for all men, but only for the elect. Pope Alexander VII. declared in his bull, dated 16th Oct., 1656, 'that these five propositions are taken from the book of Jansenius, and have been condemned in the sense of that author.' This decision he confirmed by another bull, prescribing a new 'Formulary,' which all were required to sign on their admission into orders, or to benefices. The Jesuits were the uncompromising opponents of the Jansenist doctrines. As late as 1713 Clement XI. issued the celebrated bull 'Unigenitus,' in which he condemned 101 propositions of a book by Father Quesnel, for its revival of the heresy of Jansenius.

JANSSENS, Abraham, a painter of Antwerp, born 1569; died 1631.

JANSSENS, or JOHNSON, Cornelius, a portrait painter, was a native of Amsterdam. He came to England in the reign of James I.; but, on the breaking out of the civil wars, he returned to Amsterdam, where he died 1665.

JANSSENS, Honorius Victor, a painter, born at Brussels 1664; died 1739.

JANUARIUS (St.), bishop of Benevento, was beheaded at Puzzuoli, in the persecution under Diocletian. His body was removed to Naples, where there is a beautiful chapel erected to his memory in the cathedral. What renders his name remarkable is the miracle of the liquefaction of his blood exhibited on three occasions in every year.

JANUENSIS, Joannes.—See Balbi.

JARCHI, Solomon Ben Isaac, a celebrated rabbi, was born at Troyes, in France, in 1104, and died there 1180. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, Mischna, Gemara, and Pirke Avoth, 4 vols., which are highly esteemed.

JARDINE, George, M.A., was born at Wandal, Lanarkshire, 1742; held the professorship of logic at Glasgow from 1787 till 1824; and died 27 January, 1827. He published 'Outlines of Philosophical Education.'

JARDYN, Karel du, a painter of landscapes and animals, born at Amsterdam 1640; died at Venice 20 Nov., 1678.

JARLATH (St.), succeeded St. Benignus in the see of Armagh 465; died 482. Another St. Jarlath was the founder and first bishop of the church of Tuam. He flourished at the beginning of the 6th century.

JARRY, Laurent Juilhard du, a French divine and poet, born about 1658, became prior of Notre Dame du Jarry, near Saintes, where he died 1730.

JARRY, Nicholas, a celebrated calligrapher, born at Paris about 1620; died before 1674.

JARS, Gabriel, a French mineralogist, born at Lyons 29 Jan., 1732; died at Clermont 20 Aug., 1769. His 'Voyages Métallurgiques' were published in 3 vols., 1774-81.

JARVIS, John, a painter on glass, born in Dublin about 1749; died 1804.

JAUCOURT, Louis de, was born at Paris 26 Sept., 1704, and studied at Geneva, Cambridge, and Leyden. He had a concern in the French Encyclopædia; and also conducted the Bibliothèque Raisonnée. In conjunction with Gaubius, Musschenbroek, and Massuet, he published the 'Musæum Sebæanum,' which is a work of great price. He died at Compiègne 3 Feb., 1779.

JAULT, Augustin François, a French orientalist, born at Orgelet (Franche-Comté), 1 Oct., 1700; died at Paris 25 May, 1757.

JAURREGUI Y AGUILAR, John de, a Spanish poet and painter, born at Toledo 1566; died at Madrid 1650.

JAY, Le.—See Le Jay.

JAY, John, chief justice of the United States, died 17 May, 1829, aged 84.

JAY, William, a dissenting minister of considerable note, was born at Tisbury, Wilts, 8 May, 1769; officiated to the congregation of Argyle chapel, Bath, from 1791 till 1853; and died 27 December, 1853. His literary productions consist of sermons, an Essay on Marriage, Memoirs of the Rev. Cornelius Winter and the Rev. John Clark, Lectures on Female Scriptural Characters, &c.

JEACOCKE, Caleb, author of the Vindication of the Moral Character of the Apostle Paul, against the charges of hypocrisy, and insincerity, brought by Lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Middleton, and others, 8vo., 1765, was a baker in High Street, St. Giles's, London, who by his great merit became director of the Hand-in-Hand fire office. He was a frequent attendant at the Robin Hood debating society, Butcher Row, Temple Bar, where, it is said, his oratory proved often more powerful and convincing than that of Edmund Burke and others, who afterwards acquired celebrity in the House of Commons. Died 1786.

JEANES, Henry, was born at Allensay, Somersetshire, 1611. He was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.D., and then obtained preferment in his native county, where he turned Presbyterian in the civil wars, and had the living of Chedzoy, where he died Aug., 1662. Among other works he defended Charles I. in a treatise called 'The Image unbroken. A Perspective of the Impudence, Falsehood, and Prophaneness published in a libel entitled, Iconoclastes,' 1651. This was an answer to Milton, whom he treats with keen severity.

JEANNIN, Pierre, a French statesman, born at Autun 1540. He became president of the parliament of Dijon, where he opposed the execution of the orders for the massacre of Saint Bartholomew. Henry IV. called him to his council, and did nothing without his advice. Died 31 Oct., 1622. He was the author of a collection of negotiations and memoirs.

JEAURAT, Edme François, a French astronomer, born at Paris 1724; died March, 1803.

JEBB, John, M.D., was the son of Dr. John Jebb, dean of Cashel, and born in London 1736. He was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degrees, obtained a fellowship, and entered into orders; but after serving the parish of St. Andrew's, in that town, some time, he relinquished the church, turned Socinian, and having procured a doctor's degree from the university of St. Andrew's, practised physic. He was likewise a great political zealot, and died March, 1786. His works were printed in 3 vols. 8vo., 1787.

JEBB, JOHN, an Irish prelate, born at Drogheda 27 Sept., 1775, and educated at Dublin. He was made bishop of Limerick 1823, and died 9 Dec., 1833. He wrote an Essay on Sacred Literature; Practical Theology; and Sermons.

JEBB, Sir RICHARD, son of Samuel Jebb, M.D., was born 1729, at Stratford, Essex. He was educated at Cambridge, but took his doctor's degree at Leyden. In 1768 he was elected a fellow of the College of Physicians, London. As a practitioner he possessed high and merited celebrity. When the duke of Gloucester was ill in Italy Dr. Jebb was sent out to attend him twice, which gave such satisfaction that he was created a baronet, and made physician to the king and prince of Wales. He died while attending two of the princesses 4 July, 1787.

JEBB, SAMUEL, M.D., uncle of John Jebb, M.D., mentioned above, was born at Nottingham. He also was of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and a nonjuror. On leaving the university he married a relation of Mr. Dillingham, the apothecary, from whom he derived some instruction in medicine; and then, on taking his doctor's degree, he practised at Stratford, Essex. He died in Derbyshire 9 March, 1772. Dr. Jebb published 'S. Justini Martyris cum Tryphone Dialogus;' Bibliotheca Literaria; 'De Vita et Rebus gestis Mariæ Scotorum Reginæ;' and the same work in English; an edition of Aristides, 2 vols.; Joan. Caii Britanni de Canibus Britannicis; an edition of Bacon's Opus Majus; Hump. Hodii de Græcis illustribus Linguæ Græcæ Literarumque humaniorum instauratoribus.

JEFFERSON, THOMAS, president of the United States, died 4 July, 1826, aged 83. He held the office from 1801 till 1809.

JEFFERY, JOHN, was born at Ipswich 20 Dec., 1647. He was educated at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and, on entering into orders, obtained the curacy of Dennington, in Suffolk. In 1678 he was elected minister of St. Peter Mancroft, Norwich. In 1694 he was made archdeacon of Norwich; besides which he held the livings of Kirton and Falkenham, Suffolk. Died 1720. Dr. Jeffery published Sir Thomas Brown's 'Christian Morals;' Aphorisms, selected from the papers of Dr. Whichcote; and three volumes of sermons by the same author. His own discourses were printed after his death, in 2 vols.

JEFFERY, THOMAS, a dissenting minister, born about 1700 at Exeter. He received his education under Mr. Hallet, to whom he became assistant; and in 1726 he was called to a congregation at Little Baddon, in Essex. In 1728 he returned to his native city, where he died in July, 1729. His works are, 'Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, in answer to Collins;' 'Christianity proved from Holy Scripture;' 'A Review of the Controversy between the Author of a Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, and his Adversaries;' 'Christianity the Perfection of Religion.'

JEFFREY, FRANCIS, a celebrated critic, politician, and judge, was born at Edinburgh 23 Oct., 1773, and educated in the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Oxford. On returning to his native city he became a member of the Speculative Society, the most famous of the literary associations in connection with the university; and in 1794 he was admitted an advocate, though his known attachment to liberal principles impeded for some time his success at the bar. The year 1802 was rendered remarkable by the appearance of the 'Edinburgh Review,' which originated with Jeffrey, Brougham, Horner, Sidney Smith, and a few others. Sidney Smith edited it during the first year of its existence; but in 1803 Jeffrey became the editor, and during more than a quarter of a century that he conducted it, he acquired a literary reputation unique of its kind, besides exercising an extraordinary influence on contemporary literature and on public opinion that was productive of results never dreamed of at the beginning of the century. He came, in fact, to be acknowledged as the great master of criticism of his time, and the arbiter of the destinies of all the young authors of the day. To the pages of the Review he was always a large contributor, and among the articles furnished by him are profound and original disquisitions on many of the most difficult subjects, including metaphysics, poetry, politics, biography, morals, travels, political economy, physical science, and history. His writings are remarkable for their variety, acute analysis, and sparkling style. On the introduction of juries for the trial of facts in civil causes in Scotland (1816), Jeffrey's legal practice increased to an enormous extent. In 1820 he was chosen rector of the university of Glasgow, being re-elected in the following year. On being appointed dean of the faculty of advocates, in 1829, he relinquished the editorship of the Review. In Dec., 1830, on the Whig party coming into power, Jeffrey was appointed lord-advocate, and he subsequently represented the Forfarshire Burghs, Malton, and his native city in the House of Commons. He was nominated a lord of session May, 1834, when he took the title of Lord Jeffrey. His death occurred at Edinburgh 26 Jan., 1850. A selection from his Essays in the Edinburgh Review appeared in 4 vols. 8vo., 1843; and his Life, by Lord Cockburn, with a selection from his Correspondence, was published in 2 vols. 8vo., 1852—Anderson.

JEFFREYS, GEORGE, a poet, born 1678, at Weldron, Northamptonshire, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After this he studied the law, and was called to the bar, but never followed that profession. He died 1755. Mr. Jeffreys published a volume of miscellanies, containing, among other pieces, two tragedies entitled 'Edwin,' and 'Merope.'

JEFFRIES, GEORGE, Lord Jeffries, was born at Acton, Denbighshire, about 1640, and educated at Shrewsbury School, from whence he was removed to Westminster, and next to the Inner Temple. He was not regularly called to the bar, but being at Kingston assizes in the plague year, 1666, when there were scarcely any counsellors present, he was induced to plead, and from that time continued to do so, without having his title questioned. Not long after this he was chosen Recorder of London, next a Welsh judge, and, in 1680, chief-justice of Chester. The year following he was created a baronet, and in 1683 made chief-justice of the King's Bench. At the accession of James II. he was created Baron Jeffries of Wem, in the county of Salop; and, on the suppression of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, he was sent to try the prisoners in the west, where he committed shocking cruelties under the pretence of law, for which, at his return, he was constituted Lord Chancellor of England. When the Prince of Orange arrived, Jeffries, knowing how unpopular he was, endeavoured to escape in the disguise of a seaman, but was detected in Wapping, carried before the council, and committed to the Tower, where he died 18 April, 1689.

JEJEEBHOY, Sir JAMSETJEE, Bart., a wealthy Parsee merchant of Bombay, and benefactor to that city, was born 15 July, 1783, and died 15 April, 1859.

JEKYLL, Sir JOSEPH, a lawyer, was the son of a clergyman in Northamptonshire, and born 1663. He rose to eminence in his profession, and was one of the managers at Sacheverel's trial. At the accession of George I. he was knighted, and made master of the rolls. Died 1738. Sir Joseph had a contest about the jurisdiction of his court with Chancellor King, on which dispute he wrote a pamphlet. His brother, Dr. Thomas Jekyll, died minister of St. Margaret's Chapel, Westminster. He published some sermons.

JENISON, ROBERT, a Jesuit, was born in the county of Durham, in or about 1565; joined the Society 1590; and died in England 10 Oct., 1656. He wrote 'The Overthrow of Protestant Pulpit Babels, being a Confutation of Mr. W. Crashaw's Sermon,' 8vo., 1612; 'Purgatory's Triumph over Hell; against Sir Edward Holby's Counter-Snarle,' 4to., 1613; 'A Paire of Spectacles for Sir Humphrey Linde, to see his way withall; or an Answeare to his book called "Via Tuta," a safe way, wherein the booke is shewed to be a Labyrinthe of Error, and the Author a blind Guide. By J. R.,' 8vo., Rouen, 1631.

JENKES, HENRY, M.A., F.R.S., descended from a Prussian family, was born in England, and educated at Aberdeen and Caius College, Cambridge, where he gained a fellowship. He was professor of rhetoric in Gresham College, London, 1670-76, and died at Cambridge, Aug., 1697. He published 'The Christian Tutor, or a free and rational discourse of the sovereign good and happiness of man,' 1683; 'Stephani Curcellæi Synopsis Ethices,' to which Jenkes contributed 'Præfatio de natura et constitutione ethicæ, præsertim, Christianæ, ejusque usu et studio;' 'The Christian Dial.'

JENKIN, ROBERT, a divine, born at Minster, in the Isle of Thanet, Jan., 1656, and educated at the King's School, Canterbury; from whence he removed, as sizar, to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which society he became fellow 1680, and master 1711. He was also Lady Margaret's professor of divinity, and, for some time, precentor of Chichester, which preferment he resigned at the Revolution. Died 7 April, 1727. His chief works are: Examination of the Authority of General Councils; Defensio S. Augustini; The Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, 2 vols.

JENKIN, WILLIAM, a nonconformist divine, born at Sudbury, 1612. After taking his degrees in arts at Cambridge, he was ordained, and in 1641 became minister of Christ Church, Newgate Street, and lecturer at Blackfriars, but was suspended and imprisoned for a supposed share in Love's plot. At the Restoration he was silenced, and, in 1684, committed to Newgate for holding a conventicle. He died in prison 19 Jan., 1685. He wrote an Exposition of the Epistle of Jude.

JENKINS, DAVID, a loyal judge, born at Hensol, Glamorganshire, about 1586. After studying at Oxford, he was called to the bar, and made a Welsh judge. When the Rebellion broke out he was taken up and sent to the Tower, from whence he was removed to Newgate, impeached of treason, and brought to the bar of the House of Commons, where he refused to kneel, and called the place "a den of thieves." The assembly, in a fit of rage, were about to sentence him to be hanged, upon which he said that he would suffer with Magna Charta under one arm, and the Bible under the other. At last he was sent back to prison, where he remained till 1656. He died at Cowbridge, Glamorganshire, 6 Dec., 1667. His works were printed in a small volume in 1648; besides which he wrote 'Reports adjudged in the Exchequer Chamber,' 1661; and again 1777.

JENKINS, Sir LEOLINE, LL.D., a statesman, born at Llantrissant, Glamorganshire, about 1623. He was educated at Jesus College, Oxford, till the Rebellion forced him from thence, on which he became a travelling tutor. At the Restoration he returned to college, was created doctor of laws, and elected principal. He then removed to Doctors' Commons, was admitted an advocate, and in 1665 appointed judge of the court of Admiralty. In 1672 he was sent as ambassador to treat of a peace with the Dutch, but without success. He was afterwards at the treaty of Nimeguen, in conjunction with Sir William Temple, whom he succeeded as ambassador at the Hague. After his return to England he was sworn a privy-councillor, and made secretary of state, which office he resigned in 1684, and died 1 Sept., 1685. His letters and papers were published in 2 vols. fol., 1724.

JENKINS, PETER, a Jesuit, born at Sutton, near Guildford, 21 Sept., 1735. During his long missionary life he was stationed successively at Waterperry, Holt, Irnham, Coldham, Bury St. Edmunds, and Saxis. He died at Bury St. Edmunds 14 July, 1818, leaving to posterity the following treatises: 'Sunday Evening Entertainments,' 1779; 'The Doctrine of Auricular Confession,' 1783; 'A Commentary on the 41st and 42nd Psalms,' 1799; 'Cursory Observations on the Divine Authority of the Catholic Church, and the assumed authority of Sectaries in interpreting the Bible, addressed to a country congregation,' 1804.—Oliver.

JENKINSON, Earls of Liverpool. See LIVERPOOL.

JENKS, BENJAMIN, was born in Shropshire, 1646. He became rector of Harley, in his native county, where he resided fifty-six years, and died 10 May, 1724. He published—Prayers and Offices of Devotion for Families; Meditations on various important Subjects, 2 vols.

JENKS, SYLVESTER, a native of Shropshire, was educated in the English College at Douay, where he took the name of Metcalf. He was ordained priest 1684, and stationed at Harvington, Worcestershire. James II. called him up to London, and made him one of his preachers. His death occurred in London, 1715. Mr. Jenks was author of Sermons, 1688; A Letter or Treatise concerning the Council of Trent; The blind obedience of an humble penitent the best cure for scruples, 1699; The security of an humble penitent, in a letter to H. S., 1700; 'A Contrite and Humble Heart; with motives and considerations to prepare it,' 1698; The whole Duty of a Christian, in three parts, &c., being a faithful abstract of the Trent Catechism, 1707; Essay upon the Art of Love; A Short Review of the Book of Jansenius, 1710.

JENNENS, CHARLES, a literary gentleman of fortune at Gopsal, in Leicestershire, and a non-juror. On account of the splendour of his house and equipage, he was called 'Solyman the Magnificent.' He selected the words for Handel's oratorios, and particularly those of the Messiah; but he rendered himself ridiculous by publishing an edition of some of Shakspere's plays on a new plan. Died 20 Nov., 1773.

JENNER, CHARLES, a miscellaneous writer, born in Gloucestershire, 1737, and educated at Cambridge. He became rector of Cramford St. John, Northamptonshire, and vicar of Claybrook, Leicestershire, where he died 11 May, 1774. He wrote several plays and poems, but none of any reputation.

JENNER, EDWARD, M.D., was the son of the Rev. Stephen Jenner, vicar of Berkeley, Gloucestershire, and born there 17 May, 1749. Being a younger son, he was bred to the medical profession, and bound apprentice to Mr. Ludlow, a surgeon at Cirencester, on leaving whom he became a pupil of John Hunter, at St. George's Hospital, and while there received two offers; one to go out with Captain Cook; in his first voyage, and the other to accompany Warren Hastings to Bengal. These flattering proposals were declined, and Mr. Jenner chose to settle at Berkeley, where at his leisure hours he studied natural history, with what success appeared in a paper on the habits of the cuckoo, which, being communicated to the Royal Society, was inserted in their Transactions for 1788. Long prior to this he had begun to investigate the nature of the cow-pox, from first observing that among the milkers and dairy people the constitutions of many resisted variolus inoculation. On further inquiry he found that the cause of this insusceptibility lay in the patients having been infected with another cutaneous disease contracted from the cattle. Mr. Jenner did not, however, hastily form a conclusion on this important hint, or prematurely make his observations public, but went on in a course of experiment, to ascertain whether the transmitted matter of the cow-pock to the human subject, and again from one inoculated person to another, would prove a preventive of the small-pox. The result was favourable to his hopes, and in 1798, having previously taken his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, he published 'An Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Cow-pox,' which was followed the next year by 'Further Observations on the Variolæ Vaccinæ, or Cow-pox.' The subject now became one of general interest, and though much opposition was made to the new discovery, it triumphed over sceptical bigotry, both at home and abroad. Honours and rewards were conferred on the author; the university of Oxford presented him with his medical degree by diploma; he was chosen a fellow of the Royal and other societies; his natal day was observed in several places; and he received a grant of £20,000 from Parliament. Died 25 Jan., 1823. Besides the two pieces already noticed, Dr. Jenner published some others on the cow-pox.

JENNINGS, DAVID, D.D., a dissenting minister, born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, 1691. He became pastor of a congregation in Old Gravel Lane 1718, and officiated there forty-four years: besides which he was one of the trustees for the management of Coward's charities, and a tutor in the academy founded by that gentleman. In 1749 he obtained the degree of D.D. from St. Andrew's, and died Sept., 1762. His works are, The Beauty and Benefit of early Piety; Introduction to the Use of the Globes; Appeal to Reason for the Holy Scriptures; A Treatise on Original Sin; Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, 2 vols.; An Essay on Medals.

JENSON, or JANSONIUS, NICHOLAS, a printer of Venice, was a native of France in the fifteenth century. He cast the letters, and first fixed the proportion of the present Roman character. His two first books were 'Decor Puellarum,' and 'Gloria Mulierum;' both printed 1471. He died a few years afterwards.

JENYNS, SOAME, was born in London, on New Year's-day, 1704. After a private education he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, which he left without a degree, and married; but his marriage was unhappy, and his wife eloped from him. In 1730 he published a poem on the 'Art of Dancing,' which was followed by other pieces in Dodsley's collection. In 1742 he was elected into Parliament for the county of Cambridge; but in 1754 he was returned for Dunwich. The next year he was made one of the commissioners of the board of trade, where he sat till its dissolution. In 1757 he published his 'Inquiry into the Origin of Evil,' which was successfully refuted by Johnson; but in 1761 he reprinted it with his poems. In 1767 he published a pamphlet on the high price of provisions; and in 1776 appeared his 'View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion;' which some considered as an insidious attack upon that system while others regarded it as an elegant apology for established faith. In 1782 came out some paradoxes, under the title of 'Disquisitions on several Subjects;' which produced also some replies, especially on the subject of government. The author died 18 Dec., 1787, leaving a widow, to whom he had been married thirty-four years after the death of his first wife. His works were collected into 4 vols., 1790.

JEPHSON, ROBERT, a dramatic writer, born in Ireland 1736. He was a captain in the army, and master of the horse to the lord-lieutenant, during twelve administrations. Died 31 May, 1803. Mr. Jephson wrote—Braganza; The Count of Narbonne; The Law of Lombardy; Julia; The Conspiracy, tragedies; and some minor pieces. But he acquired more credit by his 'Roman Portraits,' a volume of poems. He also published a satire on the French Revolution, under the title of 'The Confessions of J. B. Couteau.'

JERDAN, WILLIAM, F.S.A., was born at Kelso, Roxburghshire, 1782. Being intended for the legal profession, he was placed for some time in the office of a writer to the signet. His inclination for literary pursuits, however, led him to abandon the law, and in 1806 he settled in London. After accepting an engagement as a reporter on the 'Aurora,' a short-lived morning paper, he afterwards joined the 'Pilot,' evening newspaper, established in January, 1807. He was on the staff of the 'Morning Post,' reported during three sessions for the 'British Press,' and was a contributor to the 'Satirist, or Monthly Meteor,' the copyright of which he purchased. He was instrumental in seizing Bellingham, the murderer of Spencer Perceval, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the lobby of the House of Commons, and has given a detailed account of that event in his Autobiography. In 1813 he became editor of the 'Sun,' then a Tory organ; in 1816 sold his share in that newspaper, and in 1817 became editor and part proprietor of the 'Literary Gazette,' with which his name was associated for thirty-four years. In 1821 he assisted in founding the Royal Society of Literature, and he took a prominent part for some time in the administration of the Literary Fund. In 1852 a pension of 100*l.* per annum was conferred upon him. He died at Bushey Heath, Herts, 11 July, 1869. Mr. Jerdan wrote four volumes of the Memoirs for 'Fisher's National Portrait Gallery of Eminent Personages of the Nineteenth Century;' 'The Paris Spectator,' 1814; 'Voyage to the Isle of Elba;' edited the 'Rutland Papers' and the 'Perth Correspondence' for the Camden Society; and contributed to many periodical publications. His 'Autobiography,' a record of his literary, political, and social reminiscences and correspondence to 1830, was published in 4 vols., 1852-53; and his reminiscences of distinguished characters, under the title of 'Men I have known,' in 1866.

JEREMIAH, patriarch of Constantinople in 1572. He introduced the reformed calendar of Gregory XIII., for which, and his correspondence with the Pope, he was banished; but recovered his seat after being two years in exile. The Lutherans endeavoured to gain his sanction to the Augsburg confession; and his letters on that subject were printed in Greek and Latin, in 1584, folio.

JERNINGHAM, Edward, a poet, dramatist, and essayist, born in Norfolk 1727; died 17 Nov., 1812.

JEROME, or HIERONYMUS (St.), the most learned of the Latin Fathers of the Church, was born about 340 at Strido, a city of Pannonia. He studied at Rome under the celebrated grammarian Donatus, and after being baptized, visited Gaul, Thrace, Pontus, Bithynia, Gallatia, and Cappadocia. About 372 he retired to the desert of Syria, and subsequently he studied Hebrew at Rome in order that he might acquire a more perfect knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. At this period also he was ordained priest. In 381 he went to Constantinople to hear St. Gregory of Nazianzen, and returning to Rome the year following, he was appointed secretary to Pope Damasus. Ultimately he took up his abode in a monastery at Bethlehem, where it is believed he died 30 Sept., 420. The best edition of his works is that by Martianay 5 vols. folio, Paris, 1693-1706. They consist of a Latin version of the Holy Scriptures, which (with the exception of the book of Psalms) has been adopted by the church, and is known as the Vulgate; commentaries on several books of the Old and New Testament; polemical treatises; letters; and a catalogue of ecclesiastical authors.

JEROME OF PRAGUE, so called from the place of his birth, which took place about 1378. He was among the disciples of John Huss, whose doctrines he zealously taught, for which he was imprisoned at the Council of Constance, where he abjured his errors (1415), but afterwards fled, and continued to teach them. Being retaken, and carried to Constance, he was burnt as a person relapsed, 30 May, 1416.

JERROLD, Douglas, wit, dramatist, and novelist, was born in London 3 Jan., 1803, but his early home was Sheerness, where his father was manager of the theatre. He became a midshipman in the royal navy, but when the peace came he had to choose another calling, and accordingly he was apprenticed to a printer in London. While working as a compositor on a newspaper he thought he could write something as good as the criticisms which there appeared. He therefore dropped into the editor's box an anonymous essay on the opera of 'Der Freischutz,' the performance of which he had witnessed with wonder and delight. His own 'copy' was handed over to him to put in type, while an earnest editorial notice soliciting other contributions from the unknown correspondent, determined the vocation of the youthful writer. Before he was twenty he had written numerous pieces for the theatre. 'Black-eyed Susan,' the most successful of his naval plays, was written when he was scarcely twenty years of age—a piece which made the fortune of the Surrey Theatre, restored Elliston from a long course of disastrous management, and gave honour and independence to T. P. Cooke. Jerrold, however, only netted about 70*l.* out of the many thousands which the play realised for the management. The best part of many years of his life was given up to dramatic composition, the best of his productions in this line being 'The Rent Day;' 'The Prisoner of War;' 'Bubbles of a Day;' 'Time Works Wonders;' 'The Catspaw;' 'St. Cupid;' and 'The Heart of Gold.' He also wrote the following brilliant novels, all of which, with a single exception, originally appeared in the columns of periodical publications:—'A Man Made of Money;' 'Men of Character;' 'Chronicles of Clavernook;' 'St. Giles and St. James;' 'The Story of a Feather;' 'Punch's Letters to his Son;' 'The Caudle Lectures.' During the latter years of his life he was the editor of Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper. Died 8 June, 1857.

JERVAS, Charles, a painter, who studied under Kneller. He was a native of Ireland, and acquired a reputation which he did not merit, through his intimacy with Pope, who flattered him egregiously. He published a translation of Don Quixote, to which Warburton contributed an Essay on the Origin of Romance and Chivalry. Born about 1675; died 2 Nov., 1739.

JERVIS, John, earl of St. Vincent. See St. Vincent.

JESSE, Edward, a naturalist, was born 14 Feb., 1780, at Hutton Cranswick, Yorkshire, of which parish his father was incumbent. In 1798 he was appointed to a clerkship in the San Domingo office, and he afterwards became secretary to Lord Dartmouth during that nobleman's tenure of the presidency of the Board of Controul. Having held for some time a commission as lieutenant-colonel of the Birmingham volunteers, and subsequently that of captain in the Leicestershire militia, he was appointed Deputy Surveyor of the Royal Parks and Palaces. Under George III. and George IV. he held the honorary post of Gentleman of the Ewry at Windsor Castle, and Lord Liverpool during his premiership bestowed upon him a Commissionership of Hackney Coaches. This he retained until the abolition of the office, when he retired on a pension. Mr. Jesse spent the greater part of his life in the neighbourhood of Windsor, Hampton Court, and Richmond, but in 1862 he removed, to Brighton, where he died 28 March, 1868. Mr. Jesse by observation and experiment added considerably to our knowledge of the animal creation. His works are—'Gleanings in Natural History,' 3 vols., 1832-5; 'An Angler's Rambles,' 1836; 'A Summer's Day at Hampton Court,' 1839; 'Handbook to Hampton Court,' 1841; 'A Summer's Day at Windsor, and a Visit to Eton,' 1841; 'Scenes and Tales of Country Life,' 1844; 'Anecdotes of Dogs,' 1846; 'Favourite Haunts and Rural Studies, including visits to spots of interest in the vicinity of Windsor and Eton,' 1847; 'Windsor Castle and its Environs,' 1848. He also published editions of Hofland's 'British Angler's Manual;' Walton's Angler; and White's Selborne.

JESSEY, HENRY, a nonconformist divine, born at West Rowton, Yorkshire, 1627, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He attached himself early to the Independents, for which he was imprisoned 1641, but was released by the parliament. In the Rebellion he officiated at St. George's, Southwark, but was ejected at the Restoration, and twice sent to prison. Died 4 September, 1663. His works are—The Glory and Salvation of Judah and Israel; a Description of Jerusalem; A Narrative of Mrs. Sarah Wright; A Looking-glass for Children; 'Miscellanea Sacra;' 'An English-Greek Lexicon, containing the Derivations and various Significations of all the Words in the New Testament.'

JEUNE, FRANCIS, an English prelate, was a native of Jersey, and received his early education in France. Afterwards he became a scholar of Pembroke College, Oxford, and in 1834 was appointed head master of Birmingham School, where he remained until he was appointed dean of Jersey. In 1843 he returned to Oxford, having been elected master of his college; in 1864 he was appointed dean of Lincoln; and a few months afterwards bishop of Peterborough. He died 21 August, 1868. Dr. Jeune possessed an extraordinary aptitude for business. Wherever he went he left his mark as an efficient business man behind him. At Birmingham he successfully introduced many important changes; in Jersey, Victoria College stands a monument of his energy; at Oxford he was conspicuous as a most active reformer, and, indeed, probably owed his seat in the House of Lords to the zeal and energy he displayed as a member of the University Commission; while at Gloucester, of which cathedral he was at one time a canon, his management of the chapter property was so skilful that sufficient funds were procured to restore the cathedral, and to increase the salaries of those connected with it. As a divine, Dr. Jeune was not remarkable; nor was he particularly successful as a head of a college.

JEWEL, JOHN, a learned prelate, born at Buden, in the parish of Berry Narber, Devonshire, 24 May, 1522. He was educated at Barnstaple, from whence he removed to Merton College, Oxford; but afterwards he became a scholar of Corpus Christi, where he took his degrees, and was chosen lecturer in rhetoric. In the reign of Edward VI. he made a public profession of the reformed religion, and contracted a friendship with Peter Martyr. In 1551 he took his degree of B.D., and obtained the rectory of Sunningwell, Berks; but at the accession of Mary he was obliged to secrete himself till he could get out of the kingdom. He arrived at Frankfort 1554, and soon afterwards went to Strasburg, where Peter Martyr had formed a kind of college, of which Jewel was chosen vice-master. After remaining four years in exile, he returned home at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth, who made him bishop of Salisbury in 1559. He now distinguished himself by preaching a sermon at Paul's Cross; in which he challenged all the Catholics in the world to produce one clear witness, within six hundred years after Christ, who maintained the doctrines of the Roman Church. This produced a controversy, and our author's 'Apology for the Church of England,' which was translated into several languages. Bishop Jewel died at Monkton Farley, Wilts, 21 Sept., 1571. His works were printed by the Parker Society, under the editorship of the Rev. John Ayre, 4 vols. 8vo., 1845-50.

JOACHIM, GEORGE, surnamed Rheticus, an astronomer and mathematician, born at Feldkirk (Tyrol) 16 Feb., 1514. He studied at Wittemberg, and became professor of philosophy there (1537), but quitted that situation to profit by the instructions of Copernicus, whose work, 'De Revolutionibus,' he published, in 1543, at Nuremberg, where also he began his elaborate canon of Sines, Tangents, and Secants. He died at Cassovia, in Hungary, 4 Dec., 1576.

JOAN, POPE, a fictitious personage of the female sex, who was stated by some writers to have succeeded Leo IV. in the papal chair 855, and to have occupied it over two years. Modern research and criticism have shown that the story is a ridiculous fabrication.

JOAN OF ARC, surnamed the Maid of Orleans, was born at Domremy, in Lorraine, 1410. Her parents were peasants and she herself tended sheep till she was eighteen years of age. Being moved with pity at the sight of the misfortunes of her country, she believed herself called upon by heaven to deliver France from the English. Accordingly she sought an interview with Charles VII., and with great difficulty obtained from him the command of some soldiers, with whom she shut herself in Orleans, which was besieged by the English army. She obliged the English to raise the siege of that city, vanquished Talbot at Patay, and conducted the king to Rheims, where she caused him to be crowned. She now considered that her mission was at an end, and wished to withdraw into retirement, but being compelled to continue the war against the English, she was taken prisoner at Compiègne 1430. She was ultimately conducted to Rouen, where, after a most unfair and disgraceful trial, she was condemned to death as a sorceress, and burnt alive 31 May, 1431.

JOANNES SECUNDUS. See EVERARD.

JOBERT, AMBROISE CLAUDE GABRIEL, a native of France, who resided for several years at Manchester, published several works on the French language, a 'System of Philosophy,' and 'The Philosophy of Geology' (the latter both in English and French). He died at St. Foy in the south of France 1855, aged 57.

JOBERT, LOUIS, a Jesuit, author of 'La Science des Médailles,' and some religious works, was born 27 April, 1647, at Paris, where he died 30 Oct., 1719.

JOCELIN DE BRAKELONDE was born at Bury St. Edmunds, in Suffolk, and in 1173 assumed the Benedictine habit in the celebrated monastery of his native town. According to Bale he studied at Cambridge. He became chaplain to the abbat of his monastery, and for some time filled the office of guest-master. Besides a treatise on the miracles of St. Robert, the boy martyred by the Jews at Bury St. Edmunds, he wrote a Chronicle, comprising the annals of his monastery from 1173 to 1202. The merit of this Chronicle lies chiefly in the variety of ordinary incidents detailed, from which, often, something is to be learnt touching our language, manners and customs, or our system civil and religious, particularly the monastic polity. It was published by the Camden Society under the editorship of John Gage Rokewode, with the following title: 'Chronica Jocelini de Brakelonda, de Rebus Gestis Samsonis Abbatis Monasterii Sancti Edmundi. Nunc primum typis mandata curante Johanne Gage Rokewode,' 4to., Lond., 1840. Mr. Thomas Carlyle has made the general public familiar with the work of this honest old Benedictine chronicler.

JOCUNDUS. See GIOCONDO.

JODE, PETER DE, an engraver of Antwerp, born 1570; died 1634. His son, Peter (born at Antwerp 1602); and his grandson Arnold (born about 1636), also acquired fame as engravers.

JODELLE, ÉTIENNE, sieur du Lymodin, a French dramatist and poet, born at Paris 1532; died July, 1573. He was the first to compose French tragedies in imitation of those of the Greeks, that is to say, with prologues and choruses.

JOECHER, CHRISTIAN THEOPHILUS, a biographer, born at Leipsic 1694. He first studied medicine, but afterwards applied himself to divinity; gave private lectures on rhetoric 1715-30; directed the publication of the 'Acta Eruditorum,' 1721-39; obtained in 1730 the chair of philosophy, and in 1732 that of history at Leipsic; and became in 1742 librarian of that town. His principal work is the 'Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon,' or 'Universal Dictionary of Learned Men,' containing about 76,000 articles. This useful work has been continued, and supplemented by Adelung and Rotermund. Its author died 10 May, 1758.

JOHANNOT, CHARLES HENRY ALFRED, an engraver, designer, and painter, was born of French parents at Offenbach, in the grand duchy of Hesse, 1800; and died in Paris 7 Dec., 1837.

JOHANNOT, TONY, an artist, brother of the preceding, was born at Offenbach 1803, and died at Paris 4 Aug., 1852. He was a less successful painter than his brother, but in making designs for vignettes he displayed much facility and liveliness of invention.

JOHN I., a Tuscan, was elected Pope 523, and died 18 May, 526.

JOHN II., a native of Rome, surnamed Mercurius, was elected Pope 533, and died 27 May, 535.

JOHN III., a Roman, succeeded Pope Pelagius I. 560, and died 13 July, 573.

JOHN IV., a native of Salona, in Dalmatia, was elected Pope 640, and died 11 Oct., 642.

JOHN V., originally of Antioch, was elected Pope 685, and died 1 Aug., 686.

JOHN VI., a Greek, succeeded Pope Sergius 701; died 11 Jan., 705.

JOHN VII., a Greek, was elected Pope 705, and died 17 Oct., 707.

JOHN VIII., a Roman, elected Pope 872, died 15 Dec., 882.

JOHN IX., a native of Tivoli, succeeded Pope Theodore II. 898; and died 26 March, 900.

JOHN X., was elected Pope 914, and died 928.

JOHN XI., son of Alberic, duke of Spoleto, was placed in the pontifical chair at the age of 25, in the year 931. Died 936.

JOHN XII., Octavian, a Roman, became Pope 956, and died 964, after having scandalized the church by his crimes.

JOHN XIII., a Roman, made Pope after the death of Benedict V. 965; died 6 Sept., 972.

JOHN XIV., succeeded Benedict VII. 984, and died June, 985.

JOHN XV., son of Robert, was elected Pope on the death of John XIV., but either because he died before his consecration, or for other reasons, he is only reckoned among the popes to make up the number. He died before July, 985.

JOHN XVI., a Roman, elected Pope 985; died 30 April, 996.

JOHN XVII., before called Philagathus, was elected Pope by the intrigues of Crescentius, in opposition to Gregory V.; but the emperor Otho III. having taken Crescentius in his fort, ordered this anti-pope's hands and ears to be cut off, and his eyes pulled out, 998.

JOHN XVII. (or XVIII.), was elected Pope on the death of Sylvester II. 6 June, 1003, and died 31 Oct. the same year.

JOHN XVIII. or XIX. according to his own diplomas), a Roman, who succeeded Pope John XVII. 1004; and died 1009.

JOHN XIX. (or XX.), brother of Pope Benedict VIII., whom he succeeded 1024. Died 6 Nov., 1033.

JOHN XXI., a Portuguese, cardinal and bishop of Tusculum, succeeded Pope Adrian V. 1276; died 16 May, 1277.

JOHN XXII., Jacques d'Euse, a native of Cahors, succeeded Clement V. 1316; died 5 Dec. 1334, aged above 90.

JOHN XXIII., Balthasar Cossa, a Neapolitan, elected Pope 1410 died 22 Nov., 1419.

JOHN I., surnamed Zimisces, seized the throne of Constantinople, by assassinating Nicephorus Phocas 969. He displayed great valour against the Saracens; and was poisoned 10 Jan., 976.

JOHN II., Comnenus, succeeded to the throne of Constantinople 1118. He closed a glorious reign 1143.

JOHN III., Ducas, was emperor of Nice, while the Latins were masters of Constantinople. He died 1255.

JOHN IV., Lascaris, succeeded to the throne of Constantinople 1259. His sceptre was seized by Michael Palæologus, who put him in prison, where he died 1284.

JOHN V. See CANTACUZENUS.

JOHN VI., Palæologus, succeeded to the throne of Constantinople 1341. This weak and unfortunate monarch died 1391.

JOHN VII., Palæologus, succeeded his father as emperor 1425; died 1448.

JOHN, king of England, was born 1166, being the son of Henry IV.; crowned 1199; died 19 Oct., 1216. This monarch, being compelled by the barons, signed Magna Charta, the basis of British freedom.

JOHN, king of France, surnamed the Good, succeeded to the throne 1350; died 1364.

JOHN I., king of Portugal, was raised to the throne 1384, and died 1433. During his reign the Portuguese began their famous discoveries.

JOHN II., king of Portugal, surnamed the Great, succeeded to the throne 1481, and died 1495.

JOHN III., king of Portugal, ascended the throne 1521, and died 1557.

JOHN IV., surnamed the Fortunate, was son of the duke of Braganza. With the assistance of his brave countrymen he shook off the Spanish yoke, and was proclaimed king 1640; died 1656.

JOHN V., succeeded to the throne of Portugal 1707, and died 1750.

JOHN VI., king of Portugal, succeeded to the throne 1816, and died 1826.

JOHN, son of the Emperor Henry VII., was elected to the kingdom of Bohemia 1309, and, after conquering Silesia, declared himself king of Poland. He was mortally wounded in the battle of Crecy 1346.

JOHN III., king of Sweden, son of Gustavus Vasa, ascended the throne 1568, and died 1592. He attempted, but without success, to restore the Catholic religion.

JOHN OF AUSTRIA, Don, was the natural son of the Emperor Charles V., and a celebrated warrior. Born 1545; died 1 Oct., 1578.

JOHN OF BEVERLEY (St.) was a native of Harpham, in Northumbria. An earnest desire to qualify himself for the service of God led him into Kent, where he made great progress in learning and piety. Afterwards he resided in the monastery at Whitby, Yorkshire, till, in the beginning of the reign of king Alfred, he was made bishop of Hagulstad, the modern Hexham. When St. Wilfrid returned from banishment St. John yielded up to him the see of Hexham, but some time afterwards he was placed in the archiepiscopal chair of York. Venerable Bede, who received holy orders at his hands, gives ample testimony as to his sanctity, and describes several miracles performed by him. St. John delighted in frequent retirement, and chose for his retreat a monastery which he had built at Beverley. In 717, being much broken with age and fatigues, he resigned his see to his chaplain, St. Wilfrid the younger, and retired to Beverley, where he spent the four remaining years of his life in the performance of monastic duties. He died there 7 May, 721.

JOHN DE BRIDLINGTON (St.). See Bridlington.

JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (St.), the most eloquent Father of the Church, and bishop of Constantinople; born at Antioch about 347. He maintained church discipline with great rigour, and was deposed in a most arbitrary manner by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, in 403, and banished to Bithynia; which occasioned such a commotion in Constantinople that he was recalled. He was once more sent into exile, and died at Comanis, in Armenia, 14 Sept., 407. The best editions of his works are by Sir Henry Savile, 8 vols. folio, Eton, 1613; and by Montfaucon, 13 vols., 1718, Paris.

JOHN COLOMBINI (St.), was descended from a noble family at Sienna. In conjunction with Francis Dimino Vincenti, he founded the order of 'Apostolical Clerks,' called afterwards the 'Jesuati of St. Jerome,' because Colombini ordered that they should have the name of Jesus always in their mouths, and a particular devotion to St. Jerome. His order was approved by Urban V., 1367, and he died the same year at Sienna July 31. The order was suppressed 1668.

JOHN OF THE CROSS (St.), was born at Ontiveros, in Old Castile, 1542. Having taken the monastic habit in the convent of Medina-del-Campo, he formed a strict friendship with St. Teresa, and assisted in reforming the Carmelite order. He established several houses of Discalced, or Barefooted, Carmelites; and died 14 Dec., 1591, leaving several devotional works in Spanish. He was canonized by Benedict XIII. 1726.

JOHN DAMASCENUS (St.), a learned monk, born at Damascus about 676. He succeeded his father as councillor of state to the caliph, but at the close of life he entered the monastery of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem, where he died about 760. He left an excellent treatise 'On the Orthodox Faith,' and several other works, published in Greek and Latin at Paris, 2 vols. folio, 1712.

JOHN OF GAUNT, or GHENT, duke of Lancaster, and son of Edward III., was a prince of distinguished valour and prudence, and a patron of the poet Chaucer. Born 1340; died 1399.

JOHN OF GOD (St.), was born of obscure parents at Montemor-O-Novo, in Portugal, 8 March, 1495. Part of his youth was spent in keeping a rich man's flocks in Spain, and he then went into the army, after which he got his living by selling images and little books. At length he quitted the world in order to devote himself entirely to God in the care of the sick. With this pious design, he retired to the hospital at Grenada, there founded the Order of Charity, and died there 8 March, 1550. Pius V. approved his Order 1472. The religious of this Order are called by the Italians 'Fate ben Fratelli,' because their founder was continually saying 'Do good, my brethren.' St. John was beatified by Urban VIII. 1630, and canonized by Alexander VIII. 1690.

JOHN OF HEXHAM, an Augustinian canon, prior of the house of his order at Hexham, flourished about 1160. His continuation of Simeon of Durham's History from 1130 to 1144 is printed in Twysden's 'Decem Scriptores.'

JOHN OF LEYDEN, a fanatic tailor, whose real name was John Boccold. In company with John Matthias, a baker of Haerlem, at the head of his followers, he seized Munster, assumed the offices of king and prophet, and began to reform the laws and remodel the government. At last he was taken and put to death, in the 28th year of his age, 13 Feb., 1536.

JOHN OF PARIS, a famous Dominican, doctor and professor of divinity at Paris, died 1304. He wrote a treatise 'De Regia Potestate et Papali,' &c.

JOHN OF SALISBURY, a learned Englishman, born 1110, was chosen bishop of Chartres in France 1177, and died 25 Oct., 1180. He wrote the Life of St. Thomas of Canterbury and other works, all of which were published at Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo., 1848.

JOHN OF UDINO, an Italian painter, one of Raffaelle's pupils, died at Rome 1564.

JOHNES, Thomas, was born at Ludlow, Shropshire, 1748, and educated at Oxford (M.A. 1783). He was elected M.P. for the borough of Cardigan; and appointed auditor for the principality of Wales, and colonel of the Caermarthenshire militia. In 1795 he was returned to parliament for Radnorshire. He built an elegant mansion at Hafod, Cardiganshire, which was destroyed by fire 1807. Mr. Johnes died 24 April, 1816. His publications are—A Cardiganshire Landlord's Advice to his Tenants; Palaye's Memoirs of Froissart, translated from the French; The Chronicles of Sir John Froissart; translation of De Joinville's Memoirs of St. Louis; Travels of Bertrandon de la Brocquiere in Palestine; The Chronicles of Monstrelet, with notes.

JOHNSON, CHARLES, an English dramatist, born 1679; died 11 March, 1748.

JOHNSON, JOHN, a nonjuring divine, born at Frindsbury, Kent, 30 Dec., 1662. He went from King's School, Canterbury, to Magdalene College, Cambridge; but afterwards removed to a scholarship in Corpus Christi College (M.A. 1685). In 1687 he was collated to the vicarage of Boughton, in his native county, with which he held that of Hern Hill by sequestration. In 1697 he obtained the living of St. John, in the Isle of Thanet, to which the town of Margate belongs, and soon afterwards was presented to that of Appledore. In 1707 he was inducted to the vicarage of Cranbrook, where he died 15 Dec., 1725. His works are—Holy David and his old English Translations cleared, in a Paraphrase on the Psalter; The Clergyman's Vade Mecum, 2 vols.; The Propitiatory Oblation in the Eucharist; The Unbloody Sacrifice, 2 vols.; A collection of Ecclesiastical Laws, 2 vols.; Miscellaneous discourses and sermons, 2 vols.

JOHNSON, JOHN, LL.D., was educated at Caius College, Cambridge (LL.B. 1794; LL.D., 1803). He was presented in 1800 to the rectory of Yaxham, with Welborne, Norfolk, which he held till his death, 29 Sept., 1833. Dr. Johnson was a kinsman of the poet Cowper, the second edition of whose 'Homer' he published in 1802. He likewise published the 'Private Correspondence of William Cowper, with several of his most intimate friends,' 2 vols. 8vo., 1824.

JOHNSON, MAURICE, F.S.A., an antiquary, born at Spalding, Lincolnshire, and bred to the law in the Inner Temple; after which he settled at his native place, where he formed, in 1717, a literary society, whose object was to cultivate the knowledge of English antiquities. Died 6 Feb., 1755. He collected large memoirs for a History of Carausius; and some of his communications are in the collection of the Antiquarian Society.

JOHNSON, RICHARD, a classical critic, probably received his education at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was head master of the grammar-school at Nottingham from 1707 till Oct., 1721, when he drowned himself in the meadows near that town. His works are—'A Treatise of the Genders of Latin Nouns,' 1703; 'Grammatical Commentaries, being an Apparatus to a new National Grammar,' 1706; Defence of the preceding work, 1707: 'Cursus Equestris Nottinghamiensis, Carmen,' 1709, 'Additions and Emendations to the Grammatical Commentaries,' 1718; Noctes Nottinghamicæ, or Cursory Objections against the Syntax of the common Grammar,' 1718; 'Aristarchus Anti-Bentleianus. Quadraginta sex Bentleii Errores super Horatii Odarum, Lib. i. ostendens,' 1719.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a divine, was born in Warwickshire 1649. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and next at Trinity College, Cambridge, which he left without a degree. The only ecclesiastical preferment he ever obtained was the small rectory of Corringham, in Essex, where he did not reside, but settled in London, as a place more suited to his disposition for politics, which brought him acquainted with Lord William Russell, who made him his chaplain. In 1682 he printed a book, entitled 'Julian, the Apostate;' for which he was prosecuted in the King's Bench, and fined five hundred marks. After this he went on printing tracts against 'popery' and arbitrary power; especially in the reign of James II., for one of which, 'An Address to the Army,' he was degraded, condemned to the pillory, to pay a fine, and to be publicly whipped. After the Revolution his sentence was reversed by Parliament, and he was offered the deanery of Durham, which he refused, as an unequal reward for his services. He wanted a bishopric, for which he was ill-qualified; and therefore a pension was granted him instead of it, and another for his son. Died May, 1703. His works were published in 1710, folio.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, an actor and dramatist, was born in Cheshire about 1705; died 1773. His best known piece is 'Hurlothrumbo, or the Supernatural, a Comedy.'

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, LL.D., an illustrious writer, born 18 Sept., 1709, at Lichfield, where his father, Michael Johnson, was a bookseller. He received his education at the grammar-school of his native city, and next at Stourbridge, from whence he was sent to Pembroke College, Oxford, which he left (1731) without a degree. After being an usher in the school at Market Bosworth, he removed to Birmingham, where he translated 'Lobo's Voyage to Abyssinia;' but soon returned to Lichfield, and married a widow lady named Porter. He now opened a school at Edial, but dropped it for want of encouragement; and in 1737 visited London, where he formed an acquaintance with Cave, the publisher of the Gentleman's Magazine. In 1738 appeared his poem of 'London,' which, though published without the name of the author, had a rapid sale, and gained the approbation of Pope. In 1740 he began the parliamentary debates in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' and continued them for two or three years. The next important publication of Johnson's was the 'Life of Richard Savage,' with whom he had lived on terms of intimacy. In 1745 came out 'Observations on Macbeth;' at the close of which he announced a new edition of Shakspeare. From this design he was for the present called off to the greater undertaking of an English Dictionary, which he began in 1747 and ended in 1755. While this work was in progress, he published his 'Rambler,' which alone would have eternized his name. In 1751 he was imposed upon by the fraud of Lauder; but when the cheat was discovered, Johnson was one of the first to expose it. The year following he was deeply affected by the loss of his wife, to whose memory he paid a feeling tribute of respect, in a discourse which he composed on her death. Previous to the publication of his Dictionary, the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of master of arts by diploma. In 1758 he wrote 'The Idler,' in a newspaper called The Universal Chronicle;' and the next year his 'Rasselas,' which he published to defray the funeral and debts of his mother. Soon after the accession of George III., a pension was bestowed upon our author of three hundred a-year; and in 1765 the university of Dublin sent him the honorary degree of doctor of laws. The same year he published his edition of Shakspeare. In 1767 Dr. Johnson had an interesting conversation with his royal patron at the queen's palace, when the king was pleased to pay him a very handsome compliment on the excellence of his works. In 1770 he printed a pamphlet called 'False Alarm,' occasioned by the affair of Wilkes; but he gained greater credit by his political tract, entitled 'Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland's Islands.' In 1773 he made a tour into the Western Isles of Scotland, of which he published a beautiful narrative, though some were indignant at his observations on Ossian. This was followed by his 'Taxation no Tyranny,' written against the American insurgents. Shortly after this last publication, the author was honoured with his doctor's degree by the university of Oxford. He next undertook to write biographical prefaces for an edition of the poets; and in 1781 these lives were collected, and printed in a separate form. This was his last publication, and it was the setting of the sun in full splendour. The great author died 13 Dec., 1784, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. A statue was erected to his memory, by the subscription of his friends, in St. Paul's cathedral. His works have been several times published in a collected form.

JOHNSON, THOMAS, M.D., a botanical writer, was born at Selby in Yorkshire. He was bred an apothecary in London; but in the Rebellion he took up arms for the king; and when at Oxford was created doctor of medicine. In the army he held the rank of colonel, and was killed in a skirmish Sept., 1644. His works are: Iter in Agrum Cantianum; Ericetum Hamstedianum; an enlarged edition of Gerard's Herbal; Mercurius Botanicus; De Thermis Bathonicis.

JOHNSON, THOMAS, a classical scholar, born at Stadhampton, Oxfordshire, and educated at Eton, from whence he removed to King's College, Cambridge; but afterwards he obtained a fellowship in Magdalene College. He also became fellow of Eton, and died about 1750. His publications are: Sophocles, 3 vols.; Gratius de Venatione cum notis; Cebetis Tabula; Novum Græcorum Epigrammatum delectus; Quæstiones Philosophicæ; An Essay on Moral Obligation. He was also one of the editors of 'Stephens's Thesaurus Linguæ Latinæ.'

JOHNSON, WILLIAM, an English Catholic priest, who had a controversy with the celebrated Richard Baxter upon certain points of religion. He published it in a book entitled 'Novelty repress'd: in a reply to Mr. Baxter's answer to William Johnson,' 8vo., Paris, 1661. A rejoinder to this was published by Sherman, 1664.

JOHNSTON, ARTHUR, M.D., was born 1587, at Caskieben, Aberdeenshire, and educated at Aberdeen and Padua. After an absence of twenty-four years, he returned to Aberdeen, of which university he became principal, till archbishop Laud invited him to London. He died at Oxford, 1641. Dr. Johnston was an excellent Latin poet, as appears from his 'Epigrams;' version of the Psalms; and the 'Deliciæ Poetarum Scoticorum,' of which he was the editor.

JOHNSTON, CHARLES, a novelist, was born in Ireland, and bred to the bar; but being excessively deaf he was compelled to relinquish that profession. In 1760 he published 'Chrysal, or the adventures of a Guinea;' a political romance, in which all the characters and scenes were drawn from real life. This was followed by some others of a similar description, as 'The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools;' 'The History of Arbaces, Prince of Betlis;' the Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life; and the 'History of John Juniper, Esq., alias Juniper Jack.' In 1782 the author went to India, and died there about 1800.

JOHNSTON, JAMES FINLAY WEIR, a native of Paisley, studied in the university of Glasgow, and in 1825 opened a school at Durham. Five years later he married a lady of fortune, and being thus possessed of a competent income, he resolved to gratify his taste for chemistry. For this purpose he chose Berzelius as his preceptor, and visited Sweden to study under that celebrated man. On the foundation of the university of Durham (1833), the readership in chemistry and mineralogy was bestowed on Mr. Johnston, who held it till his death on 18 Sept., 1855, aged 58. His writings relate for the most part to the chemistry of agriculture, but the most attractive of his compositions is 'The Chemistry of Common Life,' 2 vols., 1854-5.

JOHNSTON, JOHN, M.D., a naturalist, born at Sambter, in Poland, 1603. He came to England in 1622, and next went to Scotland, where he studied at St. Andrew's. From thence he removed to Leyden, and while there took his doctor's degree, which honour was also conferred on him by the university of Cambridge. Died June, 1675. His works are: Thaumatographia naturalis in classes decem divisa; Hist. de Piscibus et Cetis; Hist. Naturalis de Quadrupedibus; Hist. Nat. de Insectibus; Hist. Nat. de Avibus; Syntagma Dendrologicum; Dendrographia.

JOHNSTON, JOHN, M.D., a surgeon and naturalist of Berwick-on-Tweed, died 30 July, 1855, aged 57. Besides numerous papers in the transactions of learned societies, he wrote A History of British Zoophytes (1838); A History of British Sponges and Lithophytes, 1842; an Introduction to Conchology, 1850; and The Botany of the Eastern Borders.

JOHNSTON, WILLIAM, a Scotch Jesuit, born in or about 1572. He entered the Society 1588, became an eminent professor of philosophy and divinity, and died 19 Sept., 1609. He was author of 'Historia Sleidani ab Heresi extersa;' and a commentary on Isaiah. MS.

JOHNSTONE, BRYCE, D.D., a Scotch divine and theological writer, born at Annan, 1747, and died 1805.

JOHNSTONE, the CHEVALIER DE, an adherent of the Stuart family, was born at Edinburgh 1720. He took an active part in the Rebellion of 1745, and afterwards retired to France, where he died about 1800. His 'History of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746, translated from a French MS., originally deposited in the Scots College at Paris,' was published at London 1820.

JOHNSTONE, GEORGE, one of the commissioners sent with Lord Carlisle and Mr. Eden to treat with the Americans during the war, was the son of a Scotch baronet. He was brought up to the sea service, and in 1763, appointed governor of West Florida. He, after his return to England, sat in Parliament for Cockermouth and Appleby, and fought a duel with Lord George Germaine, in consequence of some reflections made in Parliament on his conduct. He also distinguished himself by his zeal in the affairs of the East India Company, and for his attacks on Lord Clive. He was author of 'Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies, particularly in Bengal.' Died 24 May, 1787.

JOHNSTONE, JAMES, M.D., was born at Annan in 1730. He studied at Edinburgh and Paris, after which he settled at Kidderminster, where he became known by his treatment of a malignant fever that raged there some years, and of which he published an account. In this he first made known the power of mineral acid vapour to destroy febrile contagion. From Kidderminster he removed to Worcester, where he died 28 April, 1802. Dr. Johnstone, in some papers communicated to the Royal Society, stated a peculiar doctrine concerning the ganglions of the nerves.

JOHNSTONE, JOHN, M.D., F.R.S., was the fourth son of the preceding, and received his education at Merton College, Oxford. For upwards of forty years he practised as a physician at Birmingham, where he died 28 Dec., 1836, aged 68. He published some treatises on subjects connected with his profession, but his principal literary undertaking is 'The Works of Samuel Parr, LL.D., with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, and a selection from his Correspondence,' 8 vols. 8vo., 1828.

JOHNSTONE, JOHN HENRY, a comic actor and vocalist, born in Tipperary 1750. After acquiring a reputation in Ireland he came in 1783 to London, where he represented Irish characters with great success. Died 26 Dec., 1828.

JOINVILLE, JEAN, Sieur DE, a French statesman, seneschal of Champagne, and one of the lords of the court of Louis IX., died about 1318, aged 90. His 'History of St. Louis' has been translated into English by Johnes.

JOLY, CLAUDE, was born at Paris 2 Feb., 1607. He was canon and precentor of the cathedral of his native city, and died there 15 Jan., 1700. He wrote 'A Collection of Maxims for the Education of a Prince,' which gave great offence, and was burnt by the hangman. The author, however, republished it with an addition, called 'Codicil D'Or, or the Golden Codicil.' He is not to be confounded with his nephew, Guy Joly, king's councillor at the Chatelet, and secretary to Cardinal de Retz. He left memoirs from 1648 to 1665, and other works.

JOMARD, EDME FRANÇOIS, a French geographer, archæologist, and orientalist, born at Versailles 20 Nov., 1777; died 28 Sept., 1862.

JOMELLI, NICHOLAS, an Italian musical composer, who was for some time in the service of the duke of Wurtemberg. He was born at Avellino, near Naples, 1714, and died 28 Aug., 1774.

JONÆ, ARNGRIM, a native of Iceland, eminent as an astronomer and antiquary, was born at Widesal 1568; and died 1648.

JONAS, JUSTUS, one of the reformers, was born at Northausen, in Thuringia, 5 June, 1493, and after promoting the cause of the reformation at Wittemberg and Halle, died pastor of Eisfeld 9 Oct., 1555. Jonas was very intimate with Luther, who expired in his arms. He wrote against clerical celibacy, private masses, &c.

JONES, EDWARD, an eminent Welsh harpist, born in Merionethshire 1752; died in London 18 April, 1824. He was author of 'Musical and Poetical Relics of the Welsh Bards,' 1784, and again 1794; 'Bardic Museum of Primitive British Literature,' 1802.

JONES, ERNEST, an English politician, poet, and journalist, was born 25 Jan., 1819, at Berlin, being the son of Major Charles Jones, equerry to the Duke of Cumberland, who became King of Hanover, under the title of Ernest I. Major Jones bought an estate in Holstein, and remained there with his family till 1838. His son Ernest, when very young, composed a number of poems, which were afterwards published at Hamburg. At eleven years of age he disappeared from home, and was found with a bundle under his arm trudging across Lauenberg, to 'help the Poles,' who were then in insurrection. Later he achieved some distinction at the College of St. Michael, Luneberg. In 1838 Major Jones removed to England, and in 1841 young Ernest was presented to the Queen by the Duke of Beaufort. In this year appeared the first of his larger works, a romance, entitled "The Wood Spirit,' published anonymously. Some songs and poems followed; and he was also a contributor to the 'Metropolitan,' and other magazines. In 1844 he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, and commenced what promised to be a successful professional career on the Northern Circuit, but in an evil hour for his position and prospects as a barrister, he joined the Chartists (1845), and rapidly became their leader. To advocate their cause, he not only gave up what promised to be a good and increasing practice at the bar, but refused to accept any emolument for his services, and spent large sums in supporting what he believed to be the interests of the people. He even voluntarily surrendered a fortune of nearly £2,000 a year, which was left to him on condition that he would abandon the Chartist cause. Both on the platform and in the press he was indefatigable in urging the claims of the political section to which he belonged. From time to time he issued the 'Labourer,' 'Notes of the People,' and other periodicals; and he established also the 'People's Paper,' which remained the organ of the Chartists for eight years. In 1847 he unsuccessfully contested Halifax, and in the following year the alarm produced by his seditious harangues at Manchester led to his apprehension. He was convicted, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. For nineteen months he was deprived of the use of pens, ink, and paper; still, though his sufferings were very severe, he refused to petition for a commutation of the sentence. His own published account of the needless severity of his treatment provoked a good deal of indignation. While in prison he composed an epic, published after his release in 1851, entitled 'The Revolt of Hindostan,' written with his blood on the leaves of the prison prayer-books. In 1853 Mr. Jones unsuccessfully contested Nottingham, and in 1857 again tried his fortunes in that borough, but without avail. Meanwhile his name had come before the public as the author of several poems, and amongst these were 'The Battle Day,' 'The Painter of Florence,' 'The Emperor's Vigil,' 'Beldagon Church,' and 'Corayda.' After the extinction of Chartism he returned to his practice on the Northern Circuit. At the general election of 1868 he stood as the third Liberal candidate for Manchester, but, although he received 10,746 votes, he was not elected. On the 22nd and 23rd Jan., 1869, in the novel experiment of the test ballot in that city, Mr. Jones received 7,282 votes, against 4,133 recorded for Mr. Milner Gibson, as the candidate for the Liberal party, should Mr. Birley, the Conservative member, be unseated on petition. Only three days later, however, Mr. Jones died at his residence in Wellington Street, Higher Broughton, Manchester, 26 Jan., 1869.

JONES, GEORGE, an English painter, born 1786, being the son of John Jones, a mezzotinto engraver of repute. Admitted a student of the Royal Academy 1801, he continued to devote himself to painting till the Peninsular war broke out, when he obtained a commission in a militia regiment, and having attained the rank of captain, volunteered with his company to join the troops then in Spain. He served under Wellington, and formed part of the army of occupation in Paris, 1815. On the termination of the war Mr. Jones resumed practice as a painter; was elected an associate of the Academy 1822, and became R.A. 1824. William IV. appointed him librarian to the Academy, a post which he held from 1834 till 1840, resigning it to accept the office of keeper, which he relinquished in 1850. At the commencement of his career as an artist his pictures consisted chiefly of views of English and continental towns, but afterwards he chose battle-scenes, and later in life representations of Old Testament narrative. The last are principally drawings done in sepia. Among his best pictures are 'The Battle of Waterloo,' which he painted several times; 'The Battle of Vittoria;' 'The Battle of Borodino;' 'The Passing of the Catholic Relief Bill;' 'The Opening of New London Bridge.' Mr. Jones was also the author of a Life of Chantrey. He died in London 19 Sept., 1869.

JONES, Griffith, rector of Llandowror, in Wales, and the first projector of the Welsh Circulating Schools, was born at Cilrhedin, Caermarthenshire 1683, and died 8 April, 1761, leaving several religious works in English and Welsh.

JONES, Henry, was born at Drogheda, in Ireland, about 1720, and bred a bricklayer. Having a turn for poetry, he wrote some pieces, which procured him the patronage of the Earl of Chesterfield, when that nobleman was Lord-Lieutenant, 1745. Jones, thus supported, came to England, and published a volume of poems, which was encouraged by a large list of subscribers. He also had interest enough to bring out his tragedy of the 'Earl of Essex;' but want of prudence kept him poor, and he died in a garret April, 1770. His last publication was entitled 'Vectis, or the Isle of Wight,' a poem. He also left an unfinished tragedy called 'The Cave of Idra,' which Hiffernan published as his own, under another title.

JONES, Inigo, a celebrated architect, born in London about 1572. He served his time to a joiner, but having a genius for painting, he was sent to Italy by a nobleman, and while there became known to the king of Denmark, who took him to Copenhagen. When that monarch visited his sister Anne, wife of James I., he brought Jones with him; and thus he obtained the situation of surveyor of the Board of Works, and that of a commissioner for repairing St. Paul's Cathedral. In the following reign he was much employed in preparing masques for the entertainment of the court, and in building the banqueting-house at Whitehall. But while thus engaged he fell under the displeasure of Ben Jonson, who exposed him on the stage, and wrote some bitter satires against him. Jones, however, acquired a good fortune, which was considerably lessened in the civil wars. He built the front of Wilton House, and several other structures, which do honour to his taste and genius. Died 21 July, 1652. At the command of James I. he made a survey of Stonehenge, which he pronounced to be a Roman temple, dedicated to Cœlus. This discourse was printed in 1655, fol. Several of his designs have been published by Kent, Ware, and Leoni. A facsimile of his sketch book has also been published, and a Life of him by Peter Cunningham, with remarks by Mr. Planche on some of his sketches for masques and dramas, will be found in the 39th volume of the Shakespeare Society publications.

JONES, Jeremiah, a nonconformist divine, born 1693. He received his education under his uncle, Mr. Samuel Jones, a dissenting minister at Tewkesbury, and the tutor of Bishops Butler, Horte, and Secker. Mr. Jeremiah Jones became minister of a congregation at Avening, in Gloucestershire, but his residence was at Nailsworth, where also he kept an academy. Though a deep scholar he was of facetious manners, and regularly attended a bowling party in his neighbourhood. He died in 1724. His works are: A Vindication of the former Part of St. Matthew's Gospel against Whiston; A new and full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, 3 vols. These have been reprinted at the Clarendon Press.

JONES, John, M.D., a Welshman, is said to have studied at both our universities, and to have taken his doctor's degree at Cambridge. He was residing at Asple Hall, near Nottingham, 1572, and in Jan., 1572-3, at Kingsmead, near Derby. He also appears to have repaired, for the purposes of practice, to Bath and Buxton, during the seasons at those places. He published the 'Diall of Agues,' 1566; 'The Bathes of Bathes Ayde,' 1572; 'The benefit of the auncient Bathes of Buckstones,' 1572; 'Galen's Bookes of Elementes,' 1574; 'Discourse of the naturall beginning of all growing and living things,' &c., 1574; 'The Arte and Science of preserving Bodie and Soule in Healthe, Wisedome, and Catholike Religion,' 1579.—Athen. Cantab.

JONES, John, a Franciscan friar, who was executed in London, 1598. He was a native of Clenock, Carnarvonshire, and was also known by the names of Buckley, and of Godfrey Maurice.

JONES, John, D.D., a Benedictine monk, born in London, 1575, and educated at Merchant Taylor's School, from whence he was elected to St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. On being converted to the Catholic religion, he went to Spain, and joined the order of St. Benedict, taking in religion the name of Leander à Sancto-Martino. He was also created D.D. Subsequently he was appointed professor of Hebrew and divinity at Douay, where also he was chosen prior of the monastery, and president of the English congregation. Died 17 Dec., 1636. His publications are:—'Sacra Ars Memoriæ, ad Scripturas Divinas in promptu habendas, memoriterque ediscendas accommodata,' 8vo., Douay, 1623; 'Conciliatio Locorum Communium totius Scripturæ,' Douay, 1623; Biblia Sacra cum Glossa Interlineari, 6 vols. folio; Opera Ludovici Blosii; Arnobius contra Gentes, cum notis, Douay, 1634. In collaboration with Dr. Clement Reyner he compiled the valuable work entitled 'Apostolatus Benedictinorum,' 1626.

JONES, John, was born at Caermarthen 1700. He took his degrees in arts at Worcester College, Oxford, after which he was successively vicar of Alconbury, rector of Boulne-Hurst, in Bedfordshire, and vicar of Hitchin, with which last he held the curacy of Welwyn under Dr. Young. He was killed by a fall from his horse about 1770. His work entitled 'Free and Candid Disquisitions on the Church of England,' written on the side of Arianism, occasioned a sharp controversy in 1750.

JONES, JOHN, LL.D., a Unitarian minister, born at Llandovery, Caermarthenshire, 1768. From the grammar school at Brecon he removed to the New College, Hackney, where he remained six years, being a favourite pupil of Gilbert Wakefield. Here also he gained the friendship and patronage of Dr. Abraham Rees, whose daughter he afterwards married. In 1792 he was appointed classical and mathematical tutor in the Welsh academy at Swansea, where he remained three years. He next officiated to Unitarian congregations at Plymouth and Halifax, but finally settled in London, where he applied himself to literary pursuits and private tuition. Died 10 Jan., 1827. Of his theological works, the most remarkable are 'Ecclesiastical Researches, or Philo and Josephus proved to be historians and apologists of Christ, and followers of His Gospel;' and 'A Series of Important Facts demonstrating the Truth of the Christian Religion, drawn from the writings of its friends and enemies in the first and second centuries.' He likewise published some useful works intended to facilitate the study of the classical languages. 'The principal of these is A Greek and English Lexicon,' 1823; 2nd edit., 1825.

JONES, JOHN EDWARD, a sculptor of London, died in Dublin 25 July, 1862, aged 56.

JONES, JOHN PAUL, a commodore in the United States navy, was born at Arbigland, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, Scotland, 6 July, 1747. After being engaged in the English merchant service he settled in America, where he obtained a commission from Congress 1775, being made a captain of marines the next year. Well acquainted with the coasts of Ireland and Scotland, he came to Europe to infest the trade of this country, and made a descent at Whitehaven, where he destroyed the shipping of the harbour, and afterwards on the estates of the earl of Selkirk, whose plate and furniture he carried away in triumph. After taking the Drake, sloop of war, off Carrickfergus, he retired to Brest, and with a fresh reinforcement again scoured the Irish Sea, and advancing round the island, took the Serapis frigate, and the Countess of Scarborough, armed ship, after a gallant action off Flamborough Head. These exploits made him a favourite, not only in America, but in France, where the king presented him with a handsome gold-hilted sword. After the peace he was for a time in the service of Russia. He died at Paris 18 July, 1792.

JONES, OWEN, a Welsh antiquary, born in Denbighshire 1741. In early life he was sent to London, where he was taken into the employment of a firm of furriers in Thames Street, to whose business he eventually succeeded, and he continued to carry it on with credit until his death, on 26 Sept., 1814. An ardent lover of the language and literature of his own native country, he published the 'Myvyrian Archaiology of Wales,' 3 vols., 1801-7, which contains all the most distinguished productions of Welsh writers, from the 5th to the close of the 13th century. He also procured transcripts of ancient Welsh poetry, subsequent to the 13th century, making in all fifty 4to. vols., which are now in the British Museum. Mr. Jones also commenced a miscellany, the 'Greal,' of which one vol. was completed 1805; published the poems of Davydd ab Gwilym;' and founded the Gwyneddigion Society of London.—Williams.

JONES, PAUL. See JONES, JOHN PAUL.

JONES, RICE, of Blaenau, co. Merioneth, a Welsh poet, born 1713; died 14 Feb., 1801.

JONES, RICHARD, was born in Denbighshire 1603, and educated at Jesus College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. In 1655 he published, in his native language, a work containing with admirable brevity all the books and chapters of the Bible. It is entitled 'Gemma Cambricum, seu Mnemonica Biblorum; Perl y Cymro, neu Goviadur y Beibl.' The author died in Ireland, but when is not known.

JONES, THOMAS, a native of Lancashire; educated at Cambridge; became archbishop of Dublin 1605; and died 1619.

JONES, THOMAS, an eminent divine, was born at Beriew, Montgomeryshire, 23 June, 1756. He was educated at Shrewsbury School, and next at St. John's College, Cambridge, from which he removed to Trinity College, where he obtained a fellowship, and became a distinguished tutor, especially in mathematics. Died 18 July, 1807. The only things he published were, 'A Sermon on Duelling;' and 'An Address to the Volunteers of Montgomeryshire.'

JONES, WILLIAM, a mathematician, born 1680, in the island of Anglesey. He became early in life a schoolmaster in a ship of war; after which he settled in London, where he published 'A Treatise on Navigation;' and another entitled 'Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos, or a new introduction to the Mathematics,' 1706. These works procured him the friendship of several men of science, particularly Newton and Halley. He was also chosen mathematical tutor to Lord Macclesfield, who procured for him a sinecure place; and Lord Hardwicke made him secretary of the peace. Died July, 1749. Besides the above works he has some papers in the Philosophical Transactions; and he published, from Newton's manuscripts, 'Analysis per quantitatum Series, Fluxiones, ac Differentias.' He was father of Sir William Jones.

JONES, WILLIAM, a divine, born at Lowick, Northumberland, 30 July, 1726. He was educated at the Charterhouse, from whence he removed to University College, Oxford, where he contracted that friendship with Mr. Horne, afterwards bishop of Norwich, which lasted through life. On leaving the university he became curate of Finedon, Northamptonshire, and next of Wadenhoe, in the same county, where he wrote his 'Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity,' which has gone through numerous editions. In 1762 he published 'An Essay on the First Principles of Natural Philosophy,' which so pleased Lord Bute, that he authorised him to purchase in his name any instruments that he might want. In 1764 the archbishop of Canterbury gave him the vicarage of Bethersden, Kent, to which was afterwards added the rectory of Pluckley. He next obtained the perpetual curacy of Nayland, in Suffolk; soon after which he exchanged Pluckley for Paston, in Northamptonshire. When the French revolution gave birth to seditious movements in this country, Mr. Jones printed 'A Letter from Thomas Bull to his brother John,' which had an admirable effect. He was also concerned in establishing the British Critic; and he published a collection of excellent tracts, under the title of 'The Scholar armed against the Errors of the Times.' On the death of his friend, Bishop Horne, to whom he had been chaplain, he paid an affectionate tribute to his memor in an account of his life. In 1798 Archbishop Cornwallis presented him to the sinecure rectory of Hollingbourn, in Kent, which he did not long enjoy; for the loss of his wife was followed by a paralytic stroke, and he died 6 Feb., 1800. His works have been collected and published, in 12 vols. 8vo.

JONES, Sir WILLIAM, son of William Jones, the mathematician, mentioned above, was born 28 Sept., 1746. He was educated at Harrow School, from whence, at the age of eighteen, he went to University College, Oxford, where he had only been a few months when he was invited to be private tutor to Lord Althorp, afterwards Earl Spencer, with whom he made a tour on the Continent. In 1766 he obtained a fellowship, and about this time began his Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry, in imitation of Bishop Lowth's lectures. While thus engaged he was called to translate the life of Nadir Shah, from an eastern manuscript brought to England by the king of Denmark. This he executed in French; but when published he received no remuneration for his extraordinary labour, which no other man in the kingdom could have accomplished. In 1770 he was admitted of the Middle Temple; and in 1773 he took his master's degree at Oxford. In 1776 he was appointed a commissioner of bankrupts by Lord Bathurst; but his ambition was to obtain a judicial seat in Bengal, in which object he at last succeeded in 1783, when he received the honour of knighthood. Before he left England he married Miss Shipley, daughter of the bishop of St. Asaph; and one of his first objects after his arrival at Calcutta was to institute a society for the cultivation of oriental literature and science in general. This association took place in 1784, and Sir William Jones was chosen the first president. The early volumes of the 'Asiatic Researches' exhibit abundant testimonies of his diligence in this capacity, and of his varied attainments. Unfortunately, however, for the world of letters, his career was comparatively but short, for being attacked with an inflammation of the liver, of which he had no suspicion, it carried him off rather suddenly 27 April, 1794. His works were published uniformly in 6 vols. 4to., 1799; and subsequently an edition in 13 vols., with the life of the author, by Lord Teignmouth, was printed (1807). A monument was erected to his memory in St. Paul's, and also a statue at Bengal, both by order of the company. In University College, likewise, a monument, executed by Flaxman, was placed at the expense of Lady Jones. The learning of this great scholar was not confined to the ancient and modern languages, of which he understood at least thirteen; but he had a thorough knowledge of the law, he was a good mathematician, conversant with natural history, and an elegant poet.

JONG, LUDOLPH VON, a Dutch painter, born 1616; died 1697.

JONIN, GILBERT, a French Jesuit, and Latin poet, born in Auvergne 1596; died at Tournon 9 March, 1638.

JONSIUS, or JONSENIUS, JOHN, was born 1624, at Flensburg, in the duchy of Schleswig. After teaching at Konigsberg and Flensburg he went to Frankfort, as sub-rector of the university, where he died 1659. His principal work is 'De Scriptoribus Historiæ Philosophicæ.'

JONSON, BENJAMIN, was born in Westminster 11 June, 1574, about a month after the death of his father, who was a clergyman. Ben, as he was familiarly called, had his education at Westminster School, but was taken from thence to work at the business of his father-in-law, who was a bricklayer. This occupation, however, was so disagreeable to him, that he ran away, and served in the English army in Flanders. On his return he resumed his studies, and went to Cambridge; but, from the poverty of his circumstances, he was obliged to leave the university and take to the stage. At first he was not very successful, either as an actor or an author; and in the former capacity, having the misfortune to kill another player in a duel, he narrowly escaped the gallows. While in confinement he was converted to the Catholic religion, in which he continued some years. On his release he married, and recommenced writing for the stage, to which he was encouraged by Shakspere, who performed in one of his pieces. In 1598 came out his comedy of 'Every Man in his Humour;' which was followed by a new play every year, till the reign of James the First, when he was employed in the masques and entertainments at court. But, regardless of prudence, Ben joined Chapman and Marston in writing the comedy of 'Eastward Hoe,' which reflected so strongly on the Scotch nation that the authors were sent to prison. Jonson, on his release, made atonement for his indiscretion, by flattering the monarch; who in return honoured him with marks of his favour. In 1613 he went to Paris, where he told Cardinal Perron that his translation of Virgil was good for nothing. About this time, also, began his quarrel with Inigo Jones, towards whom he behaved with savage scurrility, and made him the object of ridicule in the comedy of 'Bartholomew Fair.' He was now at the height of popularity, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of master of arts; and, in 1616, he obtained a pension of one hundred marks, which was made one hundred pounds by King Charles; who also granted him a tierce of Canary wine yearly out of his majesty's cellars. Want of economy, however, kept him constantly poor; although, in addition to the royal bounty, he had a pension from the city. He died 16 Aug., 1637, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Besides his comedies, the best of which are the 'Alchymist,' 'Epicene,' and 'Every Man in his Humour,' he wrote some indifferent tragedies; poems; an 'English Grammar;' and 'Discoveries.' The best edition of his works is that of William Gifford, 9 vols. 8vo., 1816.

JORDAENS, JACOB, an historical and portrait-painter, born at Antwerp 1594; died 18 Oct., 1678. His works are very numerous.

JORDAN, CAMILLE, a French political orator, member of the Council of Five Hundred, of the Chamber of Deputies, and of the Council of State, was born at Lyons 11 Jan., 1771, and died 19 May, 1821. During the Hundred Days he figured among the most remarkable orators in the Chamber of Representatives.

JORDAN, CHARLES STEPHEN, a native of Berlin, was honoured with the friendship of the prince of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great, who bestowed on him several lucrative appointments. He wrote 'L'Histoire d'un Voyage Littéraire' in France, England, and Holland; 'Un Recueil de Littérature, de Philosophie, et d'Histoire;' Vie de M. Lacroze. His correspondence with Frederick the Great is printed in the 10th vol. of that monarch's posthumous works. Born 27 Aug., 1700; died 24 May, 1745.

JORDAN, Mrs. DOROTHEA, an actress, whose real name was Bland, was born at Waterford about 1762. She made her début on the Dublin stage, and then joined the Yorkshire company of Tate Wilkinson at Leeds. Here she soon acquired such popularity that she was engaged at Drury Lane, with a salary of £4 a week. Her inimitable acting of 'Peggy' in 'The Country Girl' drew crowded houses, and her salary was doubled, then trebled, while she was allowed two benefits during the season. She continued to act at the principal metropolitan and provincial theatres till 1790, about which time she formed a connection with the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., by whom she had ten children. This connection was suddenly broken off in 1811. Mrs. Jordan afterwards returned to the stage, and died in great poverty and distress at St. Cloud 5 July, 1816.

JORDANO. See GIORDANO.

JORDEN, EDWARD, M.D., was a native of High Halden, Kent. He took his degree at Padua, and, on his return, practised first in London, and afterwards at Bath, where he died in Jan., 1632-3, aged 63. He wrote A Discourse on the Bath Waters, and some chemical works.

JORTIN, JOHN, D.D., was born in the parish of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London, 23 Oct., 1698, and educated at the Charterhouse, from whence he removed to Jesus College, Cambridge. While an undergraduate he was employed in making extracts from Eustathius for Pope, who never made any inquiry after him. He took his bachelor's degree in 1719, and soon after was elected to a fellowship. In 1722 he took his master's degree, and, the same year, published some Latin poems, under the title of 'Lusus Poetici.' In 1727 he was presented to the college living of Swavesey, which he resigned the year following, and settled in London, where he officiated in different chapels till 1751, when Archbishop Herring presented him to the rectory of St. Dunstan-in-the-East. The same prelate conferred on him the degree of D.D., 1755. Previous to this he had published three volumes of 'Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.' The remaining volumes were printed after his death. In 1755 he published 'Six Dissertations upon different Subjects.' For the last of these, 'On the State of the Dead, as described by Homer and Virgil,' the author was violently attacked by Dr. Hurd, in what he called 'A seventh Dissertation on the Delicacy of Friendship,' but Jortin scorned to make any reply. In 1758 appeared the first volume of his 'Life of Erasmus,' and the second two years afterwards. In 1762 Bishop Osbaldeston, of London, made him his domestic chaplain, gave him a prebend of St. Paul's, and the living of Kensington, where he died Sept. 5, 1770. Besides the works already mentioned, he published—'Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern;' Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion; Remarks upon Spenser's Poems. After his death were printed seven volumes of his sermons, and two of 'Critical Remarks and Observations.' All his works have been collected in a uniform edition.

JOSEPH I., fifteenth emperor of the House of Austria, was born 1678; crowned king of Hungary 1687; elected king of the Romans 1690; succeeded to the empire of Germany 1705; died 17 April, 1711.

JOSEPH II., born 1741, was elected king of the Romans 1764, and crowned emperor of Germany the following year. He died 20 Feb., 1790.

JOSEPH EMANUEL, king of Portugal, was born 1714; succeeded John V., his brother, 1750; died 23 Feb., 1777.

JOSEPH, a Capuchin friar, commonly called Father Joseph, was born at Paris 4 Nov., 1577, and died 18 Dec., 1638. He founded the order of Benedictine Nuns of Calvary.

JOSEPH OF EXETER, or Josephus Iscanus, a writer of the twelfth century, so called from the place of his birth. He was an ecclesiastic, and accompanied Archbishop Baldwin to the Holy Land, where he was in great favour with Richard I. He afterwards became archbishop of Bordeaux, where he died, and was buried in the cathedral. He wrote two poems in Latin heroics, the one on the Trojan War, and the other entitled 'Antiochesis,' or the Crusade.

JOSEPHINE (MARIE JOSEPH ROSE TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE), empress of the French, was born at Trois Ilets (Martinique), 24 June, 1763. She was daughter of Count Tascher de la Pagerie, a captain in the royal navy, and married first the Count de Beauharnais, who perished on the scaffold. In 1796 she became the wife of General Bonaparte, and in 1804 she was crowned empress. She bore no heir to the emperor, who in consequence caused a divorce to take place in 1809. Josephine thereupon retired to Malmaison, where she died 29 May, 1814, leaving a son, the Prince Eugène Beauharnais, by her first marriage. See BEAUHARNAIS.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, the Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem of the Asmonean family, about A.D. 37. He made so quick a progress in learning that the chief priests paid deference to his judgment when he was no more than sixteen. After studying under Banun, a celebrated hermit, he joined the sect of the Pharisees. He took up arms in the defence of his country, and distinguished himself at the siege of Joppa, where he was taken prisoner by Vespasian, who would have put him to death, had it not been for the intercession of Titus. He now visited Alexandria, and studied philosophy; after which he accompanied his patron, Titus, to Rome, of which city he was made free, and died there in the reign of Domitian. The 'History of the Jewish War and Destruction of Jerusalem' was written at the command of Vespasian; and independently of its interest as a faithful and pathetic narrative of events, which the author witnessed in person, it is a noble testimony to the truth of the Christian religion. His 'Jewish Antiquities' is also a valuable work; besides which he wrote his own Memoirs, and two books against Apion, a great adversary of the Jews. The best edition of this author is that of Hudson, Oxon, 2 vols. fol. Josephus has been translated into English by L'Estrange and Whiston.

JOUBERT, BARTHÉLEMI CATHERINE, a French general, born 1769. He was second in command under Bonaparte in the conquest of Italy, and was slain at the battle of Novi 15 Aug., 1799.

JOUBERT, FRANÇOIS, a French Jansenist divine, born at Montpellier 12 Oct., 1689; died 29 Dec., 1763.

JOUBERT, LAURENT, a French medical writer, professor at Montpellier, and chancellor of the university there, was born at Valence (Dauphiné) 1529; died 21 Oct., 1583.

JOUFFROY D'ABBANS, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS DOROTHÉE, Marquis DE, was born in Franche Comté about 1751, and prior to the Revolution was a captain of infantry. Being at Paris 1775, he saw the famous steam-engine called the 'pompe à feu de Chaillot,' and at once conceived the idea of applying steam to navigation. He made his first experiment on the river Doubs, 1776, and renewed it with success 1783, on the Sâone at Lyons; but being without fortune or influence, he was unable to follow up his invention, which shortly afterwards raised Fulton to fortune and fame. Nevertheless, Jouffroy refused to carry his discovery to a foreign country. A company formed at Paris (1816) at last furnished him with the means of carrying out his plans, and the steamboat 'Charles Philippe' was launched on the Seine (20 March, 1816), but a concurrence of unfortunate circumstances prevented the success of the enterprise. In contradiction to the opinion of the English and Americans, who attribute to Fulton the invention of the steamboat, the Academy of Sciences solemnly declared in 1840 that the steamboats then in use were but imitations of the vessel launched on the Sâone by Jouffroy in 1783. Jouffroy died at the Invalides 1832.

JOUFFROY, JOHN DE, Joffredus, a French cardinal, grand almoner to Louis XI., was born at Luxeuil about 1412; died 24 Nov., 1473. It was at his solicitation that Louis XI. abolished the Pragmatic Sanction.

JOUFFROY, THÉODORE SIMON, a French philosopher, the greatest moralist of the eclectic school, was born at Les Pontets (Franche Comté) 6 July, 1796, and died at Paris 4 Feb., 1842. His numerous publications include French translations of Dugald Stewart's Sketches of Moral Philosophy, and of the works of Thomas Reid, both accompanied by remarkable prefaces; Course of Natural Law; and Philosophical Miscellanies.

JOURDAIN, AMABLE BRECHILLET, an oriental scholar, was born 1788. He was placed with a notary, but being related to Anquetil Duperron, he quitted the law to study the eastern languages, in which he made such progress, that Langles obtained for him the place of assistant-secretary in that department. Died 19 Feb., 1818. He enriched the Moniteur with curious dissertations, assisted Michaud in the 'History of the Crusades,' and obtained a prize from the Academy of Belles Lettres for a dissertation on those works of Aristotle, and the other Greek philosophers, for which we are indebted to the Arabs. At the time of his death he was engaged on a history of the rise and fall of the Barmecides.

JOURDAN, JEAN BAPTISTE, Marshal of France, was born at Limoges 29 April, 1762. He served in America from the age of sixteen; was appointed (1791) commander of a battalion of volunteers; distinguished himself under Dumouriez, in Belgium; and became a general of division 1793. He acquired fresh fame at the battle of Hondschoote (8 Sept., 1793), but was dismissed from his command in consequence of his having displeased some of the members of the committee of public safety. However they shortly afterwards gave him the command of the army of the Moselle, and afterwards that of the army of the Sambre and Meuse. He captured Dinant and Charleroi, gained the celebrated battle of Fleurus (26 June, 1794), and succeeded in passing the Rhine Sept., 1795; but he then experienced some reverses, and in 1796 demanded his recal. In 1799 he passed the Rhine a second time at the head of the army of the Danube, but being defeated by Prince Charles, he was replaced by Massena. Nominated a member of the Council of Five Hundred (1797), he caused the law on the conscription to be passed. A sincere republican, he opposed the coup d'état of the 18 Brumaire, and was excluded from the Legislative body. Nevertheless he was charged with the administration of Piedmont 1800, and was president of the consulta of that country. Napoleon appointed him senator, and then marshal of the empire (1804), but left him without any important command. In 1814 he declared his adhesion to the forfeiture of the emperor, and was made a peer. After 1830 he was made governor of the Invalides, and this post he retained till his death 24 Nov., 1833.

JOUSSE, DANIEL, a French jurist, born at Orleans 10 Feb., 1704; died 21 Aug., 1781. He wrote many legal works.

JOUVANCY, or JOUVENCY, JOSEPH DE, a Jesuit, born at Paris 14 Sept., 1643; died at Rome 29 May, 1719. His works are—The History of his Order; Orationes; De Ratione discendi et docendi; notes on the Latin Classics.

JOUVENET, JEAN, a French historical painter, born at Rouen 21 Aug., 1647; died at Paris 5 April, 1717.

JOVELLANOS, DON GASPAR MELCHIOR DE, a Spanish statesman, legist, dramatist, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Gijon, in the Asturias, 1749, and died 27 Nov., 1811.

JOVIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, born in Pannonia, of a noble family, 331; was elected emperor of Rome, after the death of Julian, 363; and died 17 Feb., 364.

JOVINIAN, a Milanese monk, and famous heresiarch of the 4th century, who maintained that fasting and other penitential works had no merit; that the virgin state was not superior to that of marriage; that Christ's body was only a phantasm; and that his mother did not remain a virgin after he was born. St. Augustine and St. Jerome wrote forcibly against him. He was condemned by Pope Syricus, and by a council, which St. Ambrose held at Milan 390; and being at length banished by the Emperor Theodosius, and afterwards by the Emperor Honorius, died miserably about 412.

JOVIUS, PAUL. See GIOVIO.

JOWETT, WILLIAM, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship (B.A. 1810; M.A. 1813). He was the first clergyman of the Church of England who volunteered (1813) for the foreign service of the Church Missionary Society. His field of labour was in the countries of the Mediterranean, and the fruits of his observation were published in his 'Christian Researches.' He was clerical secretary of the above-named society (1832-40), and for many years held the Sunday evening lectureship of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury. In 1851 he became minister of St. John's, Clapham, where he died 20 Feb., 1855, aged 68.

JOYCE, JEREMIAH, a Unitarian minister, died at Highgate 20 June, 1816, aged 52. He wrote several popular works on science, as 'Scientific Dialogues;' 'Dialogues in Chemistry;' 'Familiar Introduction to the Arts and Sciences.' He also superintended the 'Dictionary of Arts and Sciences' to which the name of Dr. Gregory was prefixed.

JOYE, GEORGE, was born in Bedfordshire, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, and obtained a fellowship (1517), which he was obliged to resign (1527), on account of his having embraced the principles of the Reformation. He then retired into Germany, where he was concerned in Tyndal's translation of the Bible. Died 1553. A list of his works is given in Cooper's 'Athenæ Cantabrigienses.'

JOYNER, or LYDE, WILLIAM, a Catholic writer, born at Oxford April, 1622. He became a fellow of Magdalen College, but quitted it in 1644, and changed his religion. After an absence of forty-three years he was restored to his fellowship by James II., but did not enjoy it many months, when he was expelled. He was great uncle to Thomas Phillips, who wrote the Life of Cardinal Pole. Joyner died at Ickford, Bucks, 14 Sept., 1706. His works are—'The Roman Empress,' a comedy, 1670; 'Observations on the Life of Cardinal Pole,' 1686; and various Latin and English poems scattered in several books.

JUAN Y SANTACILIA, DON GEORGE, a Spanish mathematician and knight of Malta, was born at Orihuela 1712. In 1735 he was sent with Ulloa to Peru to measure a degree of the meridian, and determine the figure of the earth. On his return to Europe he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. He died at Cadiz 21 June, 1774, leaving several Spanish treatises on naval affairs.

JUDA, LEO, one of the Reformers, was born in Alsatia 1482, and died in Switzerland 19 July, 1542. He appeared with Zwinglius at the Council of Zurich. His Latin Version of the Bible is joined to Vatable's 'Notes;' and he left other works.

JUDEX, MATTHEW, a Protestant divine, born at Dippoldiswalde, near Dresden, 21 Sept., 1528. He became professor of divinity at Jena, but being suspended by order of the duke of Saxony, he retired to Magdeburg, next to Weimar, and finally to Rostock, where he died 15 May, 1564. He had a share in the 'Centuries of Magdeburg;' and wrote a curious work 'De Typographiæ inventione,' 1566.

JUDSON, ADONIRAM, D.D., an American missionary to Burmah, was born 1788, and died 12 April, 1850. He embarked for the East in 1812, and was engaged for upwards of thirty-eight years in missionary work, chiefly in connection with the Baptist denomination. He translated the whole Bible into the language of Burmah, of which he also compiled a dictionary. A Life of him by Dr. F. Wayland was published 1853.

JUÉNIN, GASPARD, a French ecclesiastic, was born in 1650, at Varambon, in the diocese of Lyons. He taught divinity in several houses of the congregation of the Oratory, and died at Paris in 1713. His principal works are—A Treatise on the Sacraments, 2 vols.; Theological Institutions, 7 vols.

JUKES, JOSEPH BEETE, M.A., F.R.S., was born 10 Oct., 1811, and educated at the Free Grammar School at Wolverhampton, and at King Edward VI.'s School, Birmingham, whence he proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1836). In 1839 he was appointed Geological Surveyor of the colony of Newfoundland, and returned to England in 1840. In 1842 he was appointed by the Admiralty naturalist to her Majesty's ship 'Fly,' then about to proceed on a surveying and exploring voyage to the shores of Australia and New Guinea, under the command of Captain F. P. Blackwood, R.N. In 1846 he was appointed to a post on the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom, under Sir H. D. De la Beche, the Director-General. In 1850 he was transferred to Ireland as local director of that branch of the survey, and on the establishment of scientific lectureships in the Museum of Irish Industry under Sir Robert Kane, M.D., in 1854, he was also appointed lecturer on geology to that institution. He published many useful geological works, among which may be mentioned 'Sketch of the Physical Structure of Australia;' 'Popular Physical Geology;' 'Student's Manual of Geology;' 'Geology of the South Staffordshire Coal-field,' as well as numerous papers on geological subjects in the journals of the geological societies and in periodicals. He died at Dublin 29 July, 1869.

JULIAN, called the Apostate, a Roman emperor, was the younger son of Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. He was born 331, and educated in the Christian religion; but was perverted to paganism at Athens by Maximus, a philosopher of that place. During the life-time of his cousin, Constantius, he made a profession of the orthodox faith; but, on succeeding to the throne 361, he threw off all disguise, reopened the heathen temples, and laboured both by his pen and authority to destroy Christianity. He shut up the schools, prohibited the followers of that religion from teaching, and ordered by an edict that the name of Christians should be abolished. His malice was further evinced by an extraordinary indulgence to the Jews, and an attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, that the prophecy of Christ might be falsified. This design, however, was miraculously frustrated, and the truth of the gospel was confirmed by the means taken to disprove it. Julian did not long survive this disappointment, being slain 27 June, 363, in his expedition against the Persians. His works were published in Greek and Latin, by Spanheim, in 1696, 2 vols. folio.

JULIAN (ST.), archbishop of Toledo, died 8 March, 690. He wrote a treatise against the Jews entitled 'Testamentum xii. Prophetarum;' and other works.

JULIAN CESARINI. See CESARINI.

JULIANA, an anchoret of Norwich, was in 1393 leading the life of a recluse in the east part of the churchyard of St. Julian in that city. She had two servants to attend her in her old age, 1443. She wrote a work entitled 'XVI. Revelations of Divine Love,' published by Father Serenus Cressy in 1670, and reprinted in 1843.

JULIEN, PIERRE, a French sculptor, was born at St. Pauline 1731. After gaining a prize at the academy of Lyons, he settled in Paris, where he studied under William Coustou, and obtained another prize for a bas relief, representing Sabinus offering his chariot to the vestals. In 1768 he went to Rome, where he executed several fine works. On his return to France he became assistant to Coustou, and, in 1779, gained a place in the academy by his 'Dying Gladiator.' Died 17 Dec., 1804.

JULIEN, SIMON, a painter, born 1736, at Toulon. He was a pupil of Carlo Vanloo; after which he studied at Rome, where he quitted the French style for that of the great Italian masters, which procured him the name of Julian the Apostate. Among the works exhibited by him on his admission into the academy, that of the 'Triumph of Aurelian' was much admired. Died 23 Feb., 1800.

JULIUS I. (St.), a Roman, succeeded Pope St. Mark 337, and died 12 April, 352.

JULIUS II., Julian della Rovere, was elected Pope 1503, in succession to Pius III., and died 20 Feb., 1513.

JULIUS III., Giovanni Maria del Monte, succeeded Pope Paul III. 1550. He revived and continued the Council of Trent; and died 23 March, 1555.

JULIUS (St.). See Aaron (St.).

JULLIEN, Camille, a French musician, born 1811. For many years he resided in London, where he gave several series of popular concerts and other musical entertainments, from which, however, he derived no pecuniary benefit. Successive failures ended in his mental aberration, and he ended his days in a lunatic asylum in Paris 14 March, 1860.

JUNCKER, Christian, a classical scholar and historian, born at Dresden 16 Oct., 1668; died at Altenburg 19 June, 1714. He published 'Schediasma de diariis eruditorum;' Centuria feminarum eruditione et scriptis illustrium; Theatrum Latinitatis universæ Reghero-Junkerianum; Lineæ eruditionis universæ et historiæ Philosophicæ; Vita Lutheri ex nummis, &c.

JUNCKER, Gottlob John, a physician, born at Londorff, in Hesse, 1680. He took his doctor's degree at Halle, where he obtained a professorship, and died 25 Oct., 1759. He published several chemical and physiological works, in which he explained the doctrines of Stahl with great ability.

JUNCTIN, or GIUNTINO, Francis, an astronomer, born at Florence 1523; died at Lyons 1590. He published Commentaries on the Sphere of Sacrobosco; Speculum Astrologiæ, &c.

JUNGERMANN, Godfrey, a German writer, was a native of Leipsic. He published an old Greek translation of Caesar's Commentaries, and a Latin version of the 'Pastorals of Longus.' He died at Hanau 16 Aug., 1610.

JUNGERMANN, Louis, brother of the preceding, was born at Leipsic 1572, became professor of botany at Altdorf, and died 7 June, 1653. He published a Catalogue of Plants found near Altdorf; 'Hortus Eystettensis,' &c.

JUNGIUS, Joachim, a physician, born at Lubec 1587. He studied and took his doctor's degree at Giessen, where he professed mathematics; but in 1625 he was called to the chair of medicine at Helmstadt, from whence, four years afterwards, he removed to Hamburg, to superintend the school of that city, where he died 23 Sept., 1657. He was an excellent botanist, and introduced a variety of terms corresponding with those of Linnæus. He also formed a scientific institution, similar to our Royal Society. His works are Doxoscopiæ Physicæ Minores; Logica Hamburgensis; Geometria Empirica; Disputationes de naturali Dei cognitione, &c.

JUNGMANN, Joseph Jacob, a Bohemian scholar, born 13 July, 1773, became a professor in the university of Prague, where he died 14 Nov., 1847. He translated Milton's 'Paradise Lost' into Bohemian, and composed a 'History of the Bohemian Language and Literature.'

JUNIUS, Adrian, was born at Hootn, in Holland, about 1512. He studied medicine at Paris, and next at Bologna, where he took his doctor's degree; after which he visited England, and became physician to the Duke of Norfolk. While here he published a Greek and Latin Lexicon which the court of Rome condemned, because it was dedicated to Edward VI. On leaving England he went to Copenhagen, as physician to the king of Denmark; but soon quitted that place and settled at Haerlem, where he was made principal of the college. When that city was taken by the Spaniards he escaped to Middleburg, and died 16 June, 1575. His works are numerous.

JUNIUS, Francis, professor of divinity at Leyden, was born at Bourges 1545. He became minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp, after which he officiated as chaplain in the army of the prince of Orange; and on leaving that service, obtained a professorship at Heidelberg, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he died 13 Oct., 1602. He wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures, but is best known by his Latin version of the Bible, jointly with Tremellius.

JUNIUS, Francis, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg 1589. After studying at Leyden he went into the army, which he left in order to travel in France and England. He came to this country 1620, and found a patron in the earl of Arundel, with whom he resided thirty years, devoted to literary pursuits, particularly researches into the northern languages. He died in the house of his nephew, Isaac Vossius, at Windsor, 19 Nov., 1677. His principal works are, Glossarium Gothicum in quatuor Evangelia Gothica; 'De pictura veterum,' which has been translated into English; Observationes in Willerami Francicam paraphrasin Cantici Canticorum; Letters in the correspondence of Vossius. His manuscripts were bequeathed to the university of Oxford, and one of them was published in 1743, by Edward Lye, with this title, 'Etymologicon Anglicanum.'

JUNOT, Andoche, duke of Abrantès, a French general, born at Bussy-les-Forges (Côte-d'Or) 25 Oct., 1771. He accompanied Bonaparte, with whom he was a great favourite, in the expedition to Egypt, and after his return to France was made governor of Paris. In 1807 he was sent ambassador to Portugal, where he remained two years. The battle of Vimiera (1808), in which he was opposed to Sir A. Wellesley, led to his capitulating upon terms, and he and his army were transported to France in English vessels. After the retreat from Moscow he was appointed governor of the Illyrian provinces. Died 28 July, 1813. His wife, née Laure Permon, duchess of Abrantès, rendered herself remarkable by her extravagance and love of political intrigue. After the duke's decease she published her 'Memoirs' and several romances; and died at Chaillot 7 June, 1838.

JURIEU, Pierre, a French divine, born 24 Dec., 1637. He studied in England under his maternal uncle, Peter du Moulin, and while here was episcopally ordained, but afterwards, to please his Presbyterian friends, he submitted to reordination. He filled the chair of divinity at Sedan with reputation; but when that university was taken from the Protestants he retired to Holland, and settled at Rotterdam, where he wrote several books, and engaged in some fierce contentions, particularly with Bayle. He also distinguished himself by his opinions on the fulfilment of the prophecies, which ne lived to see falsified by the event. Being much hagrined by the decisions of some synods against his doctrines, he fell into a state of imbecility, and ied at Rotterdam 11 Jan., 1713. His principal works are:—'Preservative against popery;' La Justification de la Morale; La Politique du Clergé; L'Accomplissement des Prophetes; Histoire de Calvinisme et du Papisme; Lettres Pastorales; Traité de l'unité de l'eglise; Traité de la Nature et la Grace; Histoire des Dogmes et des Cultes.

JURIN, JAMES, a physician, was born in 1684. He received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and afterwards settled in London, as physician to Guy's Hospital. He was also a fellow of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he was a frequent contributor on mathematical and philosophical subjects. He published besides 'Physico-Mathematical Dissertations;' an Essay upon distinct and indistinct Vision; and a Translation of Varenius's Geography. He was a warm defender of the practice of inoculation, and as zealous an advocate for the Newtonian system. He died president of the College of Physicians, 1750.

JUSSIEU, ANTOINE DE, a physician and botanist, born at Lyons 22 April, 1686. He was admitted into the Academy of Sciences in 1712, and died 1758. He published an appendix to Tournefort's Plants, and various works on natural history. His brother, Bernard de Jussieu, was born at Lyons 1699. He practised physic, and became curator of the plants in the royal garden at Paris, and superintendent of that at Trianon. He died 6 Nov., 1777. His publications are, an edition of Tournefort on the plants near Paris, 2 vols. 12mo.; and 'L'Ami de l'Humanité.' There was another brother of these ingenious men, Joseph de Jussieu, born at Lyons 1704, went to Peru with the academicians sent thither to measure a degree of the meridian in 1726. He died 11 April, 1779. Some account of his travels and discoveries is in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. Antoine Laurent de Jussieu, nephew of the preceding, was born at Lyons 12 April, 1748. In 1770 he succeeded Lemonnier as demonstrator of botany in the Jardin des Plantes at Paris. He was named principal keeper of the royal garden 1777; professor of botany in the university of Paris 1804; died 17 Sept., 1836. He published a famous work on the 'Genera Plantarum;' 'Tableau synoptique de la méthode botanique;' 'Tableau de l'école de botanique du Jardin des Plantes,' &c. His son, Adrien de Jussieu, was the last of that series of botanists who, during a century and a half, were the honour of France. He was born at Paris 23 Dec., 1797, in the residence occupied by his father in the Museum of Natural History, and there he passed his whole life. He succeeded his father in the botanical chair at the museum 1826, and was admitted in 1831 a member of the Academy of Sciences. Died 29 June, 1853. His works on botany are numerous and highly esteemed.

JUSTEL, CHRISTOPHE, counsellor and secretary to the king of France, was born at Paris 1580, and died there 1649. His works are—'Code of Canons of the Church Universal; and the Councils of Africa,' with notes; Genealogical History of the House of Auvergne, fol. His collections of Greek and Latin Canons were inserted in the 'Bibliotheca Juris Canonici veteris.'

JUSTEL, HENRY, son of the above, was born at Paris in 1620. He succeeded his father as secretary and counsellor to the king. In 1675 he sent his father's Greek manuscripts to the university of Oxford, for which that learned body created him doctor of laws. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to England, and was appointed keeper of the king's library. He died 24 Sept., 1693.

JUSTIN, a Latin historian, supposed to have lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius. His work is an abridgment of Trogus Pompeius, who wrote a universal history, which is lost. The best edition of Justin is by Gronovius, 8vo., Leyden, 1719.

JUSTIN, ST., a celebrated martyr and Platonic philosopher, was a native of Neapolis, in Palestine. He was converted to Christianity about A.D. 132, by the sufferings which he saw the Christians endure, but neither quitted his philosophical profession nor habit. A persecution arising under Antoninus, Adrian's successor, Justin wrote an 'Apology' for the Christians, and presented another afterwards to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, in which he maintained the innocence and holiness of Christianity, against Crescentius, a cynic philosopher, and other calumniators. He suffered martyrdom at Rome about A.D. 167. The best edition of his works is by Dom Prudent Maran, O.S.B. His 'Apologies' have been translated into English.

JUSTIN I. was elected Emperor of the East 518, and died 527.

JUSTIN II., Emperor of the East, succeeded his uncle Justinian 565, and died 578.

JUSTINIAN I., a Roman emperor, who succeeded his uncle Justin A.D. 527. He was a zealous Christian, and enacted some severe laws against heretics. After settling the affairs of the empire, and defeating the Goths, he collected the Roman laws into one body, called 'The Code,' to which he gave his own name. The emperor next caused the judicial decisions and opinions in difficult cases to be reduced, and arranged in order; which labour was chiefly entrusted to Tribonian, an eminent lawyer, and at the expiration of ten years was completed. These collections were called 'The Digests, or Pandects;' after which Justinian ordered a summary of the whole to be drawn up, in four books, termed 'The Institutes;' and lastly, the modern laws were brought into one volume, to which the name of 'Novellæ,' or 'New Code,' was given. In the time of this emperor the consular dignity was abolished. He also built a number of churches, particularly that of Sancta Sophia, at Constantinople. He died 14 Nov., 565, aged 83.

JUSTINIAN II. succeeded his father, Constantine Pogonatus, 685; died 711.

JUSTINIANI. See GIUSTINIANI.

JUVENAL, DECIUS JUNIUS, a Latin poet, was born at Aquinum, in Campania, about the beginning of the reign of Claudius. He studied rhetoric under Fronto, the grammarian, and afterwards had, as is generally supposed, Quintilian for his master. He became an eminent pleader at the bar, and thereby acquired a large estate. His first poetical attempt was in a satire upon Paris, a player, who was the minion of Domitian, and for which he was sent into an honourable kind of exile, by being made commander of a cohort at Pentapolis, on the borders of Egypt. On Domitian's death he returned to Rome, where he died in his eightieth year, and in the eleventh of the reign of Adrian. He may be said to have been the last of the Roman poets, and many prefer his pieces to the morals of Aristotle. His satires are excessively severe, but the principles are good, and the language nervous. Juvenal has been admirably translated into English by Gifford.

JUVENCUS, Caius Vectius Aquilinus, a Latin poet, was born in Spain, and lived in the reign of Constantine. He turned the four gospels into Latin verse, but in a bad style.

JUXON, William, an English prelate, born at Chichester 1582, and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, from whence he was elected to St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He studied the law, and entered Gray's Inn, but altered his mind, took orders, and was presented to the vicarage of St. Giles, Oxford, with which he held the rectory of Somerton. In 1621 he was chosen president of his college, after which he rose rapidly, through the interest of Archbishop Laud, being successively made dean of Worcester, clerk of the closet, bishop of Hereford, dean of the chapel royal, and, in 1633, bishop of London. In 1635 he was advanced to the post of lord high treasurer, which no churchman had held since the reign of Henry VII. This office he resigned in 1641, when it was admitted by all parties that he had conducted himself without reproach. After attending his royal master at the treaty in the Isle of Wight, and on the scaffold, he went into retirement; but at the Restoration he was made archbishop of Canterbury, and had the satisfaction of placing the crown on the head of Charles II. Died 4 June, 1663.

K.

KAEMPFER, Engelbert, was born 16 Sept., 1651, at Lemgo, in Germany. In 1683 he accompanied the Swedish embassy to Persia, in which country he made large collections of natural curiosities, accounts of which were published at Lemgo in 1712. From Persia Kaempfer proceeded to Batavia, and in 1690 to Japan, as physician to the Dutch embassy. After spending two years there he returned to Java, and in 1693 arrived at Amsterdam. The year following he took his doctor's degree in physic at Leyden, and then settled at his native place, where he died 2 Nov., 1716. He published 'Decas Observationum exoticarum;' 'Amœnitates Exoticæ;' 'The History of Japan,' which has been translated into English, 2 vols. fol., 1727. Some of his botanical drawings were engraved at the expense of Sir Joseph Banks.

KAESTNER, Abraham Gotthelf, a learned mathematician, astronomer, and poet, was born at Leipsic 27 Sept., 1719, and died 20 June, 1800. He was a professor in the university of Göttingen for upwards of forty years. His principal work is a 'History of Mathematics.'

KALB, John Baron de, was born near Nuremberg about 1732, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general in the French army. At the commencement of the American revolution he volunteered his services in the cause of freedom, was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was for a time commander of the Southern army. He was killed at the battle of Camden 17 Aug., 1780, and a monument was ordered by Congress to be erected to his memory.

KALDI, George, an Hungarian Jesuit, born about 1572; died 1634. He translated the Bible into his native tongue.

KALF, William, a painter of still life, born at Amsterdam 1630; died 30 June, 1693.

KALKBRENNER, Christian, a musical composer, born at Minden (Hanover) 22 Sept., 1755; died at Paris 10 Aug., 1806.

KALM, Peter, a naturalist, born in Finland 1715. He became professor of botany at Abo, and in 1747 went to North America, for the purpose of exploring that country; where he remained two or three years, and then returned to Abo. He afterwards made an extensive tour in Russia, with the same object, and died in Sweden 16 Nov., 1779. His travels in America were translated into English by Forster 1771.

KAMES, Lord. See Home, Henry.

KAMPEN, Nicholas Godfrey van, a Dutch historian, born at Haarlem 15 May, 1776; died 14 March, 1839.

KANE, Elisha Kent, M.D., an Arctic explorer, born at Philadelphia 3 Feb., 1820. After studying medicine at Pennsylvania he was attached as physician to the embassy to China, and likewise visited the Philippine Islands, Ceylon, and the East Indies. He also made explorations into Africa, traversed Egypt up to the frontiers of Nubia, and then visited Goree and South Africa, including the kingdom of Dahomey. Subsequently he served as a volunteer in the Mexican war. Mr. Grinnell having undertaken to defray the cost of a polar expedition to search for Sir John Franklin, Lieutenant De Haven was placed at the head of it, Dr. Kane being appointed surgeon to the expedition, which set out in 1850. In the course of the voyage he made some valuable scientific observations, of which an account is given in his 'United States Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin.' Of a second expedition, also fitted out at the expense of Mr. Grinnell, Dr. Kane had the command. Beyond 80° 20′ he discovered a vast open basin, which geographers have since called 'Kane's Polar Sea.' This was the extreme point reached by the expedition, an account of which was published at Philadelphia, in 1856, under the title of 'Arctic Explorations in the years 1853, 1854, 1855.' Dr. Kane died at Havannah 16 Feb., 1857.

KANT, Immanuel, a German philosopher. His father, who spelt his name Cant, was descended from a Scotch family, and carried on the business of a sadler, first at Memel, and next at Konigsberg, where this son was born 22 April, 1724. He studied at the college of Fredericianum; after which he became a private tutor. In 1755 he took his degree of master of arts, and became a popular lecturer in metaphysics. In 1770 he obtained a professorship at Konigsberg, of which university he was made rector in 1786, and, two years afterwards, senior of the faculty of philosophy. Died 12 Feb., 1804. Kant published several works on mathematics and natural philosophy; but he is only known by the subtlety of his metaphysical system, which made a great noise in Germany.

KARAMZIN, Nicholas Michaelovitch, a Russian historian, born in Orenburg 1 Dec., 1765; died at St. Petersburg 22 May, 1826. In 1803 he was appointed historiographer of Russia. His 'History of the Russian Empire' to the year 1611 has been translated into English, French, Italian, German, and Chinese.

KATER, Captain Henry, F.R.S., was born at Bristol 16 April, 1777. He first studied the law, but on his father's death (1794) obtained a commission in the 12th regiment of foot, then stationed in India. During the following year he was engaged in the trigonometrical survey of India, and contributed greatly to the success of that stupendous undertaking. About the same time he constructed a peculiarly sensitive hygrometer, and published a description of it in the Asiatic Researches. Unremitted study during seven years in a hot climate greatly injured his constitution, and was the cause of the ill state of health under which he suffered to the close of his life. After his return to England he qualified himself to serve on the general staff. In 1814, however, he went on half-pay, and from that period his life was wholly devoted to science. His trigonometrical operations, his experiments for determining the length of a pendulum beating seconds, and his labours for constructing standards of weights and measures are well known. Most of the learned societies in Great Britain and on the Continent testified their sense of the value of Captain Kater's services by enrolling him among their members. The emperor of Russia employed him to construct standards for the weights and measures of his dominions, and was so pleased with the execution of them, that he presented him with the order of St. Anne and a diamond snuff-box. Capt. Kater died in London 26 April, 1835.

KATTERFELTO, Gustavus, a Prussian who, coming to London, soon gained a wide-spread notoriety, partly by means of advertisements headed 'Wonders! Wonders! Wonders!' which he persistently inserted in the newspapers. He is described as being a compound of conjuror and quack doctor. In both these capacities he worked upon the easy credulity of Cockneydom, during the influenza visitation of the year 1782, adding to his nostrums the fascinations of hocus-pocus. Amongst other philosophical apparatus, he employed the services of some extraordinary black cats, with which he astonished the ignorant and confounded the vulgar. Subsequently he made a tour in the provinces, where, however, his success was not so uniform as it had been in the metropolis. At Shrewsbury, indeed, he was committed to prison as a vagrant and impostor. Peter Pindar mentions this singular individual more than once, and Cowper, in the 'Task,' speaks of—

> 'Katterfelto with his hair on end,
> At his own wonders, wondering for his bread.'

He died at Bedale, Yorkshire, 25 Nov., 1799. An account of him, by the compiler of these pages, was printed in the 'Whitby Times' of 11 Dec., 1863.

KAUFFMANN, Maria Anna Angelica, a female artist, was born 30 Oct., 1740, at Chur, in Switzerland. She was instructed in painting by her father, who next took her for further improvement to Rome; from whence she removed to Venice, where she found a friend in Lady Wentworth, and accompanied her to England. In this country she experienced the most liberal patronage, and became a member of the Royal Academy. She married Sir A. Zucchi, a Venetian artist, with whom she returned to Italy, and died at Rome 5 Nov., 1807. Bartolozzi engraved a number of prints from her designs.

KAUNITZ, Prince of, Wenceslaus Anthony, count of Rietberg and prince of Kaunitz, an eminent statesman, who died at Vienna 24 June, 1794, aged 84 years, during forty of which he was chancellor and prime minister of Austria. He commenced his political career by an embassy to France, and obtained successively the confidence of Maria Teresa, Joseph II., and Leopold II. Under his prudent administration the cabinet of Vienna obtained a great influence in the other courts of Europe.

KAYE. See Caius.

KAYE, John, an English prelate, was a native of Hammersmith, where his father carried on the business of a linendraper. After being instructed by the celebrated Dr. Burney, at Hammersmith, he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. 1804, on which occasion he was placed at the head of both the mathematical and classical honour lists. The only other person, it may be remarked, who ever gained this double distinction was the late Baron Alderson. In 1814 Mr. Kaye was elected master of Christ's College, and the next year was created D.D. by royal mandate. In 1816 he was appointed regius professor of divinity. He was made bishop of Bristol 1820; translated to Lincoln 1827; and died 19 Feb., 1853, aged 70. He published a number of theological works, the principal of which is his 'Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria.' Some of his controversial pieces were published anonymously, such as his 'Remarks on Dr. Wiseman's Lectures,' and 'Reply to the Travels of an Irish Gentleman.'

KAZINCZY, Francis, a celebrated Hungarian writer, born at Erhemlyen 27 Oct., 1759; died 22 Aug., 1831.

KEACH, Benjamin, a Baptist minister, born 29 Feb., 1640, at Stokehaman, Bucks. In 1664 he was sentenced to stand in the pillory for a book called 'The Child's Instructor.' After this he was chosen pastor of a congregation in Goat Yard Passage, Horsleydown, Southwark, where he died 18 July, 1704. His 'Travels of True Godliness,' and 'Travels of Ungodliness,' written in the manner of Bunyan, were once very popular books; but he is best known by his 'Tropologia, or Key to open Scripture Metaphors.' He also wrote 'An Exposition of the Parables.'

KEAN, Charles, a distinguished tragedian, born 18 January, 1811. By his father, the celebrated Edmund Kean, he was sent to Eton as an 'oppidan' in 1824. Circumstances, not choice, caused him to adopt the stage as a profession, and, in the autumn of 1827, he made his first appearance at Drury Lane Theatre, as Young Norval. Other juvenile parts followed this performance; but though his early success was promising, he left London in the spring of 1828 with the intention of acquiring experience in the provinces. Mr. Edmund Kean's moral aberrations and neglect of his family had for some time estranged him from his son, but a meeting at Glasgow, in the course of the young tragedian's first provincial tour, led to a reconciliation, and in Oct., 1828, they appeared together as Brutus and Titus in Howard Payne's tragedy of 'Brutus,' Edmund playing for the benefit of Charles. In 1830 Mr. Charles Kean visited America, where he was warmly received; but his success when, in 1833, he appeared as Sir Edward Mortimer, at Covent Garden, was not sufficient to induce him to remain long in London. It was, however, during this engagement that he acted together with his father for the first and last time in the British capital, being the Iago to Edmund's Othello. In less than a month after this performance Edmund Kean was no more. Another provincial tour was followed by the appearance of Mr. Charles Kean at Drury Lane, as Hamlet, on 8 Jan., 1838. Practically, this may be regarded as his début; for it was, in 1838, that by his Hamlet, his Sir Giles Overreach, and his Richard, he fairly took his position as a tragedian of the highest rank. In 1842 he married Miss Ellen Tree. In 1850 he undertook, in conjunction with Mr. Keeley, the management of the Princess's Theatre, but was it not till after the dissolution of partnership that Mr. Kean commenced that gorgeous series of Shaksperian 'revivals' which make an epoch in the history of the stage, and which for several years rendered the theatre in Oxford Street, previously obscure, as fashionable as an Italian Opera House. He retired from the management of the Princess's in 1859. Subsequently he appeared several times in London, and played with great success in the provinces. But his most remarkable achievement was a professional voyage, which commenced with a visit to Australia, and comprised a series of performances through the United States. He died soon after his return to England 23 Jan., 1868.

KEAN, EDMUND, a famous actor, born in London 4 Nov., 1787. His father, a poor tailor, procured a situation for him as a figurant in the pantomimes at Drury Lane Theatre when he was only two years old, but here by the unnatural forced positions which he had to practise in order to make his limbs more pliable he became deformed. Some of the actors procured him surgical assistance, his limbs were supported, and he finally outgrew his bodily defects. At seven years his mother sent him to a little school, but order and obedience were not in his character, and he engaged himself as cabin boy in a vessel going to Madeira. This situation, however, equally displeased him, and to deliver himself in Madeira he feigned deafness, and played his part so well that the captain sent him home. In London he could not find out his mother, but a woman who had had him under her care recommended him to Miss Tidswell, an actress at Drury Lane Theatre, who gave him much assistance. At one period after his return to London he acted as a droll in a booth. After this he was placed in one of the minor theatres, and was much applauded for his recitations. From this period he commenced reading dramatic productions. His protectress recommended him to a company of players in Yorkshire, where he appeared under the name of Carey. Although not more than thirteen years old, he performed the parts of 'Hamlet,' 'Lord Hastings,' and Addison's 'Cato,' well enough to please a provincial audience. At Windsor he obtained the applause of the royal family by his recitation of Satan's 'Address to the Sun,' from 'Paradise Lost,' and of the first soliloquy in Shakspere's 'Richard III.' It has frequently been asserted that about this time he was fortunate enough to attract the attention of Dr. Drury, who sent him to Eton, where he remained three years, and is said to have made much progress in classical studies. This statement is, however, wholly unfounded. Playing Hamlet in the island of Guernsey, a local journal abused him, and when he afterwards performed Richard he was received with exclamations of displeasure. Kean for a while patiently submitted, but very significantly addressed a passage from his part to the pit—'Unmannered dog, stand thou, when I command!' Upon this the disorder increased, and instead of apologizing, he addressed his audience to the following effect—'You have shown some symptoms of understanding in applying the words to yourselves.' He had to pay dear for this imprudence. He was obliged to leave the town, and remained in great distress till some of his friends interceded for him with the governor of the island. Kean afterwards went to Dorchester. In the meantime, Dr. Drury, his old patron, had recommended him to the directing committee of Drury Lane, as fitted to revive the fortunes of this declining theatre. He was in consequence engaged for three years at 'Old Drury.' Kean appeared for the first time on the London boards (26 Jan., 1814) in the character of 'Shylock.' His first evening was decisive, but his 'Richard III.' made him the idol of the London play-going public. In 'Othello' also, and 'Sir Giles Overreach,' he was unequalled by any contemporary; and when he performed Massinger's Jew for the first time, the actors and others of his admirers presented him with a gold cup as a token of their esteem (25 June, 1814). In 1820 he visited the United States and performed in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, on the whole with great success. After his return to England the extravagance and dissoluteness which had always disgraced his character involved him in great embarrassments; and a second visit to America in 1825 was attended with little credit or advantage. He came back to England and died at Richmond, Surrey, 15 May, 1833. Mr Procter (Barry Cornwall), in his biography of Kean (2 vols. 8vo., 1835), sums up his histrionic qualities as follows:—'As a tragedian he was decidedly of the very first order. He possessed vigour, pathos, sarcasm, and the power of communicating terror in the highest degree: and his intensity in expressing all the passions has never been approached within our recollection.' The best biography of Kean is that by F. W. Hawkins, 2 vols., 1869.

KEANE, JOHN, Lord Keane, a British general, born at Belmont, co. Waterford, 1781; died 24 Aug., 1844. His chief military exploit was the capture in 1839 of the fortress of Ghuznée, in Cabool, which till then had been deemed impregnable. For this he received a peerage and a pension of £2000 from the East India Company.

KEARNEY, BARNABY, an Irish Jesuit, born at Cashel 1565; died 20 Aug., 1640. He published 'Heliotropion,' 8vo., Lyons, 1622, containing sermons in Latin, for the Sundays and feasts of the whole year. A second volume of his sermons, on the Passion of Christ, was published at Paris 1633.

KEATE, GEORGE, F.R.S., F.S.A., was born about 1729. He was educated at Kingston School, after which he went to Geneva, and, while there, contracted an acquaintance with Voltaire. On his return to England he was called to the bar; but did not follow that profession. His first literary work was 'Ancient and Modern Rome,' a poem, 1760. This was followed by 'A short Account of the Republic of Geneva,' dedicated to Voltaire. In 1762 came out 'An Epistle from Lady Jane Gray to Lord Guildford Dudley;' and in 1763, 'The Alps,' a poem. The next year he produced 'Netley Abbey;' and in 1765, 'The Temple Student.' In 1769 he married, and about the same time published 'Ferney,' an epistle to Voltaire; in which he introduced an eulogium on Shakspere, for which the corporation of Stratford presented him with a standish made out of the board's favourite mulberry-tree. In 1773 Mr. Keate published 'The Monument in Arcadia,' a dramatic poem; and in 1779 'Sketches from Nature, taken in a Journey to Margate,' 2 vols. This is an imitation of Sterne. His last publication was 'An Account of the Pelew Islands; composed from the Journals of Captain Henry Wilson and his officers, who were shipwrecked there in 1783.' Died 27 June, 1797.

KEATING, GEOFFREY, D.D., a pious and learned Irish clergyman of the Roman communion, author of many works both in prose and verse in his native language, was born at Tubrid, co. Tipperary, about 1570; died about 1644. His chief production is a History of Ireland from the earliest times to the Anglo-Norman invasion, its title in the original being 'Forus feasa air Eirinn.' A very incorrect English translation by Dermod O'Connor was published at London 1723. Another version appeared at Dublin in 2 vols., 1809; and a correct translation by William Halliday of the first portion of the History was printed at Dublin 1811, with the original Irish on the opposite pages. Another translation by John O'Mahony was published at New York 1857. Among Dr. Keating's other works are A Treatise on the Mass; A Moral Treatise on Death; and Poems. All of these are in Irish.

KEATS, JOHN, a poet, born in London 29 Oct., 1795, and educated in a private school at Enfield. In 1810 he was placed with a surgeon at Edmonton, and at the expiration of his apprenticeship he removed to London in order to 'walk the hospitals.' Here he became acquainted with several well-known literary men, incited by whose praise he published a volume of poems, which attracted but little attention. Being compelled by ill-health to abandon all idea of following his profession, he went on a visit into the country, where he commenced his 'Endymion,' published in 1817. The sharp criticisms on it which appeared in the Quarterly Review and Blackwood's Magazine produced an injurious effect on the health of the sensitive author, who, however, brought out another volume containing his beautiful odes on 'The Nightingale,' and the 'Grecian Urn,' the poems of 'Lamia,' and the 'The Eve of St. Agnes' and the magnificent fragment of 'Hyperion.' His illness becoming worse, he left England in 1820 to seek a warmer climate, and died at Rome 27 Feb., 1821. There have been numerous editions of his works.

KEBLE, JOHN, an Anglican divine and poet, was born 25 April, 1792, at Fairford, Gloucestershire, of which parish his father was the incumbent. He received his academical education at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. 1810. He was then elected a fellow of Oriel College, where he took the degree of M.A. 1813, in which year he gained the chancellor's prizes for an English essay on 'Translations from the Dead Languages,' and for a Latin essay 'A comparison of Xenophon and Julius Cæsar.' He took orders and obtained a fellowship at Oriel, but about 1823 he retired to his father's living at Fairford, where he had a few pupils, and whence he made frequent visits to Oxford. He was one of the four eminent clergymen who initiated the High Church or Oxford movement in 1832, by starting the celebrated 'Tracts for the Times,' of which Nos. 4, 13, 40, 52, and 89 were from Mr. Keble's pen. From 1831 to 1842 he was professor of poetry at Oxford; and in 1831 he was presented to the vicarage of Hursley, Hants, which he retained till his death on 29 March, 1866. His greatest work is a volume of poems, entitled 'The Christian Year,' which has passed through nearly a hundred editions. He was also author of the 'Lyra Innocentium,' 1846; and (with Newman, Froude, and others) of the 'Lyra Apostolica,' his poems in the latter work being distinguished by the Greek letter γ. To perpetuate his memory, his friends and admirers raised a large fund shortly after his decease, and founded Keble College in the university of Oxford.

KEBLE, JOSEPH, a barrister of Gray's Inn, born in London 1632; died Aug., 1710. Besides 'Reports,' and other legal works, he published two essays, one 'On Human Nature;' the other 'On Human Actions.'

KECKERMAN, BARTHOLOMEW, a native of Dantzic, became director of the academy there, and published a large number of works, once extensively used in the education of youth. Born 1571; died 1609.

KEELEY, ROBERT, an eminent comedian and theatrical manager, was born in London 1793, and died at Brompton 3 Feb., 1869.

KEENE, EDMUND, a prelate, born at Lynn, Norfolk, 1713, and educated at Caius College and Peterhouse, Cambridge, being elected a fellow of the latter society 1739. In 1740 he was collated to the valuable rectory of Stanhope, co. Durham, and he was master of Peterhouse from 1748 to 1754. He was made bishop of Chester 1752; translated to Ely 1770; and died 6 July, 1781. His only publications are five occasional sermons.

KEEPE, HENRY, a Londoner born, received his education at Oxford, and next studied law in the Inner Temple. He joined the communion of the Catholic Church, in which he died May, 1688. His works are 'Monumenta Westmonasteriensia' or an Historical Account of the Abbey Church of Westminster,' 1682; 'The Genealogies of the high-born Prince and Princess George and Anne of Denmark,' 1684; and 'A True and Perfect Narrative of the strange and unexpected finding the Crucifix and Gold Chain of that pious Prince St. Edward, the King and Confessor; which was found after six hundred and twenty years' interment,' 4to., 1688, published under the name of Charles Taylour.

KEILL, JAMES, M.D., F.R.S., was born in Scotland 27 March, 1673, and educated at Edinburgh and Leyden, though he obtained his doctor's degree from the university of Cambridge. In 1700 he settled at Northampton, where he died 16 July, 1719. Besides several papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he wrote 'Anatomy of the Human Body abridged;' a translation of Lemery's Course of Chemistry; and 'An Account of Animal Secretion.' The latter work was afterwards enlarged, with the title of 'Essays on several parts of the Animal Economy.' He had a controversy with Dr. Jurin, on the force of the heart.

KEILL, JOHN, M.D., F.R.S., a mathematician, brother of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh 1 Dec., 1671. After taking the degree of master of arts at the university of his native city, he removed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he read lectures on Newton's Principia. In 1699 he attacked Dr. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, and, in the following year, delivered lectures on natural philosophy in the public schools. In 1701 appeared his 'Introductio ad veram Physicam;' which he considerably enlarged in the edition of 1705. He was now elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and in 1709 appointed treasurer to the Palatines, whom he accompanied to New England. On his return he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy, and about the same time entered the lists against Leibnitz, on the invention of fluxions. He next defended Newton's doctrine against the Cartesians, and in 1711 was made decypherer to the queen. In 1713 he received the degree of doctor in physic; and two years afterwards published an edition of Commandine's Euclid. His last work was the 'Introductio ad veram Astronomiam,' which, at the desire of the duchess of Chandos, he translated into English. Dr. Keill died 1 Sept., 1721.

KEISER, Reinhard, one of the most renowned musical composers of the German school, was born near Leipsic 1673; and died at Hamburg 12 Sept., 1739.

KEITH, George, a native of Aberdeen, who was a fellow-student there with Bishop Burnet, and took his degree as master of arts, after which he turned Quaker, and went to Pennsylvania; but becoming dissatisfied with the sect, he formed a new one of his own. At length he entered into the church of England, took orders, and obtained some preferment. He died about 1715. He wrote several books for the Quakers, and some against Penn, with 'Reasons for renouncing that Sect,' 1700.

KEITH, George Keith Elphinstone, Viscount, a naval commander, fourth son of Charles, tenth Lord Elphinstone, was born 1747. In 1795, being then vice-admiral, he commanded the fleet destined for the capture of the Cape of Good Hope; in the object of which expedition he not only succeeded, but compelled the Dutch, who advanced to the relief of the colony, to surrender at discretion without firing a gun. For this he was rewarded with an Irish barony 1797; and his gallant exertions in the Foudroyant, on the coast of Egypt, during the campaign of 1801, caused his elevation to the peerage of the United Kingdom (1803) by the title of Baron Keith. He was promoted to a viscountcy 1814; and died 10 March, 1823.

KEITH, James Francis Edward, field-marshal in the Prussian service, was born in Scotland 1696. His father was William Keith, earl marshal of Scotland; and his schoolmaster was the celebrated Ruddiman. He afterwards went to the university of Aberdeen. In 1715 he joined the Pretender, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir, but made his escape to France, where he studied mathematics, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. From Paris he went to Madrid, and obtained a commission in the Irish brigade; but on accompanying the Spanish embassy to Russia, he entered the service of that state, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and invested with the order of the black eagle. By his skill Oczakow was taken; and in the war with Sweden he materially contributed to the victory of Willmanstrand, and the taking of the isles of Aland. He had afterwards a share in raising the Empress Elizabeth to the throne; but not being rewarded according to his services, he left St. Petersburg for Prussia, where the king made him governor of Berlin and field marshal. He was killed at the battle of Hochkirch 14 Oct., 1758.

KEITH, Robert, a prelate of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Scotland, was born in Kincardineshire 7 Feb., 1681, and educated at Aberdeen. In 1727 he was chosen coadjutor to Bishop Millar, of Edinburgh, being entrusted soon afterwards with the superintendence of Caithness, Orkney, and the Isles. In 1733 the clergy of Fife elected him to be their diocesan, and ten years later he was chosen Primus. Died 20 Jan., 1757. Bishop Keith wrote 'The History of the Affairs of the Church and State of Scotland, from the beginning of the Reformation in the reign of King James V., to the retreat of Queen Mary into England, anno 1568,' folio, 1734; 'Catalogue of the Bishops of the Several Sees within the Kingdom of Scotland down to the year 1688,' 4to., 1755. A new edition of the latter work, with a continuation to the date of publication by the Rev. M. Russell, LL.D., was published at Edinburgh 1824.—Anderson.

KEITH, Thomas, was born at Brandsburton, near Beverley, Yorkshire, 1751, and settled in London as a teacher of mathematics. He was appointed secretary to the master of the king's household 1804; 'professor of geography and the sciences' to the princess of Wales 1810; and accountant in the British Museum 1814. He died in London 29 June, 1824. His works consist of elementary treatises on arithmetic, geography, trigonometry, geometry, and the use of the globes.

KELGREN, John Henry, a Swedish philosopher, poet, and miscellaneous writer, born 1 Dec., 1751; died 12 April, 1795.

KELLER, James, Cellarius, a Jesuit, born at Seckingen 1568; died at Munich 23 Feb., 1631. He was confessor to Albert of Bavaria, and the confidential friend of the Emperor Maximilian. He published several religious and political works, the latter for the most part under assumed names. His book against France, 'Mysteria Politica,' was burnt by order of the government.

KELLERMANN, François Christophe, duc de Valmy, marshal of France, was born at Strasburg 30 May, 1735. He attained the rank of field-marshal 1788, after having served in the Seven Years' War, and distinguished himself at Berghem, at Friedberg, and against the Russians (1772). Appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Moselle 1792, he defeated the Prussians at Valmy, and forced them to evacuate the French territory. He was imprisoned as a suspected person 1793, but gained his liberty on the 9th Thermidor; and in 1795 was entrusted with the command of the army of the Alps and Italy. He was made by Napoleon a marshal of the empire 1804; and at the Restoration was created a peer of France. Died 12 Sept., 1820.

KELLISON, Matthew, D.D., a Catholic divine, born in Northamptonshire about 1560. He took his doctor's degree at Rheims, where he was rector of the university; from whence he removed to Douay, and became president o the English college. He died 21 Jan., 1640-1. His works are, Survey of the new Religion; Reply to Sutcliffe; Oratio coram Henrico IV. rege Christianissimo; The Gagg of the reformed Gospel; Examen Reformationis; The Right and Jurisdiction of the Prince and Prelate; A treatise on the Hierarchy of the Church; A brief and necessary Instruction for the Catholics of England; Comment. in tertiam partem Summæ Sancti Thomæ.

KELLY, or TALBOT, EDWARD, an alchemist, born at Worcester 1555, and educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford. He was obliged to leave the university, and after rambling about the kingdom was sentenced to lose his ears at Lancaster. He next became an associate of Dr. Dee, and accompanied him to Prague, where Kelly was knighted by the Emperor Rodolphus; but his tricks being discovered, he was thrown into prison, and in attempting to escape he fell, and bruised himself to such a degree that he died soon after, in 1595. He wrote a poem on chemistry, and another on the philosopher's stone; besides which he was the author of 'A true and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some spirits.'

KELLY, HUGH, a miscellaneous writer, was born near the lake of Killarney 1739. He was apprenticed to a staymaker in Dublin, and on the expiration of his time repaired to London, where he procured a situation in the office of an attorney. He next became a writer for the booksellers, and published several political pamphlets. In 1767 appeared the 'Babler,' in 2 vols., which was followed by 'Louisa Mildmay,' a novel. About this time also he published a poem, entitled 'Thespis,' in imitation of Churchill's Rosciad; and in 1768 his comedy of 'False Delicacy' was performed with success. His next dramatic piece, 'A Word to the Wise,' met with a different reception, in consequence of which he published it by subscription. His next attempt was a tragedy, called 'Clementina;' which was succeeded by the comedy of 'The School for Wives.' While thus employed he applied himself to the law, and was called to the bar, but was cut off prematurely by an abscess in the side 3 Feb., 1777. His other works were 'The Romance of an Hour,' and 'The Man of Reason,' comedies.

KELLY, JOHN, LL.D., was born at Douglas, in the Isle of Man, 1 Nov., 1750. Bishop Hildesley employed him in the translation of the Bible into the Manx tongue; after which he was ordained as minister of the episcopal congregation of Ayr, Scotland, where he was engaged by the duke of Gordon to superintend the studies of the marquis of Huntly. Through this patronage he obtained the vicarage of Ardleigh, and next the rectory of Copford, Essex; on which he entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he proceeded to the degree of LL.D. 1799. In 1803 he published a Grammar of the Manx Language; and he also had nearly completed a Dictionary of the Manx and English Languages, when the sheets were destroyed in the fire of Mr. Nichols, the printer. It has since been printed by the Manx Society (8vo., Douglas, 1866), under the editorial care of W. Gill. Dr. Kelly died 12 Nov., 1809.

KELLY, MICHAEL, a vocalist, born in Dublin 1762. After studying under Rauzzini in Dublin, and Fineroli at Naples, he performed with success at most of the Italian theatres; and, going to Germany, he was one of the original singers in the 'Nozze di Figaro' of Mozart, with whom he contracted a close intimacy during his stay at Vienna, where he had accepted an engagement in the service of the Emperor Joseph, by whom he was much caressed. He afterwards settled in London, where he made his first appearance at Drury Lane Theatre 1787. He retained his situation as first singer at that theatre, the musical performances of which he also directed until his final retirement from the stage. He composed the music for Colman's 'Bluebeard,' and for a great number of other popular pieces. He died at Margate 9 Oct., 1826. His 'Reminiscences' (2 vols., 1820; 2nd edit., 1826) is a very amusing work, and is by far the best addition to our theatrical history since Colley Cibber's 'Apology.'

KELLY, OLIVER, Catholic archbishop of Tuam, died at Albano, near Rome, 18 April, 1834.

KELLY, THOMAS, Catholic archbishop of Armagh, died 14 Jan., 1835, aged 39.

KELWAY, THOMAS, a celebrated composer of English church music, succeeded John Reading as organist of Chichester Cathedral 1726, and held that situation till his death 21 May, 1749.

KEMBLE, CHARLES, an eminent tragedian, brother of John Philip Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, was born 25 Nov., 1775, at Brecknock, where his father, Roger Kemble, was then manager of the theatre. He received an excellent education in the English Catholic College at Douay, and returned to England 1792. A situation which was obtained for him in the Post-office he threw up in disgust, and made his appearance on the boards of the Sheffield theatre, as 'Orlando,' in 'As You Like It.' Subsequently he played at Newcastle, but was decidedly unsuccessful. He was, however, engaged at Drury Lane in the season of 1794; and in 1797 he appeared at the Haymarket, by which time there was some improvement in his style of acting. Determined to achieve success, he gradually rose to the highest eminence in his profession. For a short time he was manager of Covent Garden, but was very unsuccessful. He retired from the stage 1840, on being appointed examiner of plays, though he subsequently appeared in public from time to time as a reader of Shakspere. Mr. Kemble tried his hand at dramatic composition, but while his adaptations from the foreign stage were elegant and successful, his original pieces were failures. Died 5 Nov., 1854.

KEMBLE, JOHN MITCHELL, a profound Anglo-Saxon scholar, eldest son of Charles Kemble, the tragedian, was born in London 1807, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1830; M.A. 1833). After quitting the university, he spent much of his time in Germany, being engaged in the unremitted study of the Anglo-Saxon language and literature. His death took place at Dublin 26 March, 1857. Mr. Kemble's principal works are 'Ueber die Stammtafel der Westsachsen,' 1836; 'Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici,' 6 vols. 8vo., 1839-48; 'Saxons in England,' 2 vols., 1849; 'A few Notes respecting the Bishops of East Anglia,' 1851; 'State Papers and Correspondence illustrative of the Social and Political State of Europe from the Revolution (1688) to the accession of the House of Hanover,' 1857. His 'Horæ Ferales, or, Studies in the Archæology of Northern Nations,' was published 1863, under the editorship of R. G. Latham and A. W. Franks.

KEMBLE, JOHN PHILIP. This ornament of the stage was the eldest son of Mr. Roger Kemble, the manager of a company of comedians in the north of England. He was born at Prescot, Lancashire, 1 Feb., 1757, and received his early education at the Catholic seminary of Sedgley Park, Staffordshire, from whence he proceeded to Douay, with a view to the clerical profession; but preferring the stage to other pursuits, he made his début at Liverpool. After performing with great reputation in many parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland, he appeared on the boards of Drury Lane 30 Sept., 1783, in the character of Hamlet. His success was complete, and from that time he was regarded as the first tragedian of the age. On the secession of Mr. King, he became manager of Drury Lane Theatre. In 1802 he took advantage of the peace to visit the continent, in order to study the French and Spanish histrionic establishments, with a view to the improvement of those at home. On his return he became manager of Covent Garden Theatre, where he continued till 1809, when that building was destroyed by fire. On the restoration of the edifice, Mr. Kemble became the object of popular resentment by raising the prices, which occasioned a series of riots. After a long and honourable career, he took leave of the stage (23 June, 1817), and for the recovery of his health, or at least for the alleviation of his spasmodic sufferings, he went to Montpellier, and from thence to Lausanne, where he died 26 Feb., 1823. In private life Mr. Kemble combined the scholar with the gentleman. He wrote 'Belisarius,' a tragedy; 'The Female Officer,' a farce; and 'Lodoiska,' an opera; besides which he altered and modernised a number of the old dramas. He was also the author of a pamphlet on the character of Macbeth.

KEMP, GEORGE MEIKLE, a Scotch architect, who died 6 March, 1844. The monument to Sir Walter Scott at Edinburgh is his masterpiece.

KEMP, JOSEPH, Mus. Doc., a musical composer, born at Exeter 1778. After studying under the celebrated William Jackson, he was appointed organist of Bristol Cathedral (1802), from whence he removed to London (1807). In 1808 he took the degree of bachelor of music at Cambridge, and the year following that of doctor, on which occasion his exercise entitled, 'The Crucifixion,' was performed. He now became a lecturer on music at several institutions, and invented a new mode of teaching the science. In 1818 he visited the continent, and on his return went to reside in his native city. In April, 1824, he came back to London, where he died on the 22nd of the following month. His works are—A new System of Musical Education, being a Self-Instructor; Twenty Psalmodical Melodies; The Jubilee, a Patriotic Entertainment; The Siege of Isca, an opera; The Vocal Magazine; Songs, Glees, Duets, &c.

KEMPELEN, WOLFFGANG, BARON DE, a mechanician, the inventor of the automaton chess-player and other ingenious contrivances. He was also the author of some poetical pieces. Born at Presburg, Hungary, 23 Jan., 1734; died 26 March, 1804.

KEMPIS, THOMAS À, was born at the village of Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, about 1380. He studied at Deventer, and in 1399 entered the monastery of regular canons of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwol, of which his brother was prior. Here he led a most exemplary life, and died, with the greatest reputation for sanctity, 25 July, 1471. His works were printed at Antwerp in 1615, 3 vols. 8vo. The principal performance in this collection is the treatise 'De Imitatione Christi,' which is universally known; yet it is much doubted whether Thomas à Kempis was the real author of it, many strong reasons being assigned for the claim of John Gersen, a Benedictine abbat.

KEN, THOMAS, was born at Berkhampstead, Hertfordshire, July, 1637. He was educated at Winchester School, and next at New College, Oxford. In 1666 he became fellow of Winchester College, soon after which he was presented to the rectory of Brixton, in the Isle of Wight, and a prebendal stall in the church of Westminster. In 1679 he completed his degrees in divinity, and about this time went to Holland, as chaplain to the princess of Orange. On his return he was appointed chaplain to Lord Dartmouth, whom he accompanied to Tangier. He next became chaplain to Charles II., and attended him in his dying moments, for which he was made bishop of Bath and Wells. He was one of the seven prelates who joined in a petition to James II. against reading the declaration for liberty of conscience, for which they were sent to the Tower, tried, and acquitted. Notwithstanding this, the good bishop could not, upon principle, transfer his allegiance to the new sovereign, and, in consequence, was deprived of his preferment at the Revolution. Queen Anne settled a pension upon him of two hundred a year, and he was universally esteemed for the excellence of his character. He died 19 March, 1710-11. His works, consisting of sermons, tracts, and poems, were printed in 4 vols. 8vo., 1721, with his life prefixed. The best life of him is that by 'a Layman' (i.e., J. L. Anderdon), 8vo., Lond., 1853.

KENDALL, GEORGE, D.D., a Calvinistic divine, born at Cofton, in the parish of Dawlish, Devonshire, and educated at Oxford. He obtained a prebend of Exeter and the rectory of Blissland, Cornwall; but was ejected at the Restoration for nonconformity. Died 19 Aug., 1663. He published 'Vindication of the Doctrine commonly received in churches concerning God's intentions of special grace and favour to his elect in the death of Christ;' 'Sancti Sanciti; or the common Doctrine of the perseverance of the Saints, &c., vindicated' against John Goodwin.

KENINGHAM. See CUNINGHAM.

KENNEDY, CHARLES RANN, a poet and translator, born about 1807, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself, and was elected to a fellowship. He then entered Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar 1835. While practising in London he was engaged in many important cases—taking, for example, a prominent share in the arguments of the famous case of 'Stockdale v. Hansard,' in reference to which he afterwards published a tract of some note in its day on 'The Privilege of Parliament.' Ill-health interrupting his professional labours, he was for some time engaged on the press, chiefly on the 'Globe' and 'John Bull.' Ultimately he returned to practice, joined the Midland Circuit, and settled at Birmingham. Died Dec., 1867, æt. 60. As a scholar he was widely known by his translations of Demosthenes' Orations, and of Virgil. He was also the author of poems, translations, and magazine articles, and at the time of his death he was engaged in the composition of a poem on 'Hannibal in Italy.'

KENNEDY, JAMES, bishop of St. Andrew's, was born about 1405. He was the son of James Kennedy, by the countess of Angus, and, in 1437, was made bishop of Dunkeld, with which he held the abbey of Scoon, and, in 1440, was raised to the see of St. Andrew's. In 1444 he was constituted lord chancellor, which dignity he soon resigned. He founded the college of St. Salvador, and the church within its precincts, also the abbey of the Observantines. In the minority of James III. he was appointed one of the lords of the regency. Died 10 May, 1466.

KENNEDY, JOHN, M.D., was a native of Scotland. He resided some years in Smyrna, and was a great collector of antiquities, particularly coins, which were sold by auction after his death, which occurred 26 Jan., 1760. He wrote a 'Dissertation on the Coins of Carausius; which was answered by Dr. Stukeley.

KENNEDY, JOHN, rector of Bradley, Derbyshire, published 'Scripture Chronology,' 1751, for which work Dr. Johnson wrote a dedication; An Examination of Jackson's Chronological Antiquities; The Doctrine of Commensurability. He attempted to prove the perfect chronology of the Hebrew Bible, and was answered by Ferguson; but much more ably in a series of letters by the Rev. Thomas Bowen, of Bristol, in the Christian Magazine. The date of his death is not recorded, but he was living in 1774.

KENNETH I., king of Scotland, ascended the throne 558, and died 604.

KENNETH II., son of Alpin, succeeded to the throne of Scotland 823, and died 854.

KENNETH III., son of Malcolm, began to reign 969, and was assassinated 994.

KENNETT, BASIL, D.D., brother of the bishop of Peterborough, was born at Postling, Kent, 1674. He was sent to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he was elected to a fellowship. In 1706 he went as chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn. He returned 1714, and died Jan., 1714-5. His principal works, besides translations of ancient and modern authors, are—Romæ Antiquæ Notitia, or the Antiquities of Rome; Lives of the Grecian Poets: Exposition of the Apostles' Creed; Sermons.

KENNETT, WHITE, was the son of the Rev. Basil Kennett, rector of Dunchurch, and vicar of Postling, in Kent. He was born at Dover 10 Aug., 1660, and received his education at Westminster School. Thence he proceeded to St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he took his master's degree in 1684, and the same year was presented to the vicarage of Ambrosden, Oxfordshire. In 1689, as he was shooting, the gun burst, and wounded him in the forehead, so that he was ever after obliged to wear a patch of black velvet. After this he became vice-principal of St. Edmund Hall, and, in 1693, rector of Shottesbrooke, Berks. In 1699 he took his doctor's degree, and the next year obtained the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate. He now became popular among the low church party, and had a controversy with Atterbury respecting the rights of convocation. In 1706 he was employed by the booksellers to superintend a collection of English historians, and to continue the work, of which a second edition appeared in 1719, in 3 vols. folio. He made himself conspicuous by a funeral sermon preached for the first duke of Devonshire (1707), which gave great offence, as an apology for the sins of the great. The same year he was made dean of Peterborough, but so obnoxious had he now made himself by his party zeal, that Welton, the rector of Whitechapel, caused his portrait to be exhibited in the character of Judas, in the altar-piece of that church. This act of indecency was properly resented, and the painting removed. In 1718 he was made bishop of Peterborough. He died 19 Dec., 1728. The bishop was an able antiquary, and particularly conversant in the northern languages. His principal works are 'Parochial Antiquities attempted in the History of Ambrosden, Burcester, and other adjacent parts in the counties of Oxford and Bucks, with a Glossary of obsolete terms,' 4to., 1695; new edition by Dr. Bandinel, 2 vols., 1818; Ecclesiastical Synods and Parliamentary Convocations in the Church of England; The History of the Convocation; The Case of Impropriations and of the augmentation of Vicarages; Account of the Society for propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts; A Register and Chronicle. This prelate's biographical MSS. form part of the Lansdowne collection in the British Museum.

KENNEY, JAMES, a dramatist, was a native of Ireland, and died at Brompton 25 July, 1849.

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN, D.D., was born 4 April, 1718, at Totnes, Devonshire, of which place his father was parish clerk. He received his education at the grammar school of his native town, after which he became the master of the charity school there till 1744, when, by the aid of some friends, he was enabled to go to Wadham College, Oxford. In 1747 he published 'Two Dissertations; the first on the Tree of Life in Paradise, and the second on the Oblations of Cain and Abel;' which procured him so much reputation that he was elected fellow of Exeter College; and the university, as a mark of favour, conferred on him his bachelor's degree without fees. In 1750 he took his degree of M.A., and soon after formed the design of collating the Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible. Preparatory to this great undertaking, he published in 1753 'The State of the printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament considered;' but it was not till 1758 that the design began to take effect, under the auspices of the university, and aided by a most liberal subscription. In the meantime Mr. Kennicott was appointed one of the preachers at Whitehall, and vicar of Culham, Oxfordshire. In 1761 he took his doctor's degree, and the same year the king gave him a pension of two hundred a year. In 1767 he was made Radcliffe librarian, and in 1769 he had concluded the Herculean task, in which he had been engaged for more than ten years. In 1770 he was promoted to a prebend of Westminster, which he exchanged for a canonry of Christ Church, where he died 18 Aug., 1783. Dr. Kennicott published 'Annual Accounts of his Collations;' several tracts and sermons; and his edition of the Hebrew Bible with Prologomena, 2 vols. folio, 1776 and 1780. After his death were printed 'Remarks on select Passages in the Old Testament, and sermons.'

KENRICK, WILLIAM, LL.D., was born at Watford, Herts. He was brought up to the business of a rule maker, which he quitted for literature, and might have attained respectability, had he conducted himself with propriety. Having procured a doctor's degree at Leyden, he began his career with poetry, and next turned critic, in the 'Monthly Review.' In 1765 he attacked Dr. Johnson's Shakspeare; but that great man only said 'He did not think himself bound by Kenrick's rules.' The next year he produced the play of 'Falstaff's Wedding,' an imitation of Shakspeare, and not devoid of merit. This was followed by the comedy of the 'Widowed Wife,' which had no success. After this he pretended to have discovered the perpetual motion, and, in 1772, was involved in a lawsuit with Garrick, against whom he had published a scandalous libel. In 1774 he delivered lectures on Shakspeare, and the next year commenced the 'London Review,' which he continued to his death, on 10 June, 1779.

KENT, EDWARD AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF, father of Queen Victoria, was the fourth son of George III., and born 2 Nov., 1767. His education in England was conducted by Dr. Fisher, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, and next at Göttingen, from whence he removed to Geneva, where he remained till 1790, when he proceeded in a military capacity to Gibraltar. The year following he went to Canada, and in 1793 passed through the United States to the West Indies, where he joined Sir Charles (afterwards Earl) Grey, and was present at the siege of St. Lucie. In 1794 he returned to North America, and served at Halifax as a major-general till 1796, when he became a lieutenant-general, and soon afterwards quitted that station for England. In 1799 he was created duke of Kent, Stratherne, and Dublin, at which time he obtained a parliamentary grant suited to his dignity. The same year he revisited America, but returned again in 1800, and in 1802 was made governor of Gibraltar, where his discipline occasioned such a dangerous mutiny that he was recalled the year following. In 1818 he married the youngest daughter of the duke of Saxe Coburg, and widow of the prince of Leinengen. Persevering in the economical plan which he had laid down prior to this change in his situation, the duke led a retired life, first in Germany, and next in England, especially after the birth of a daughter (afterwards Queen Victoria), at Kensington, 24 May, 1819. He then went to Sidmouth, Devonshire, for the benefit of the climate, but while there was attacked by a pulmonary complaint, which carried him off very suddenly, 23 Jan., 1820.

KENT, JAMES, an eminent composer of sacred music, was born at Winchester 1700. He was appointed organist at Trinity College, Cambridge, and afterwards (1737) at the college chapel, Winchester, where he died 1776.

KENT, JAMES, an eminent jurist of New York, author of 'Commentaries on American Law,' &c., was born 1763, and died 12 Dec., 1847.

KENT, MARIA LOUISA VICTORIA, DUCHESS OF, daughter of Francis, duke of Saxe-Saalfeld Coburg, was born 17 Aug., 1786. She married first the prince of Leiningen, and secondly (1818) the duke of Kent, by whom she had a daughter, who afterwards ascended the English throne as Queen Victoria. The duchess died at Frogmore 16 March, 1861.

KENT, WILLIAM, an artist, born in Yorkshire 1685. He was originally a coach-painter, but left that branch to study the principles of design, for which purpose he went to Rome, where he found a patron in Lord Burlington, who brought him to England, and lodged him in his own house in 1719. His paintings, however, are but indifferent, and his portraits not at all like the persons they were said to represent. In architecture he succeeded better; and he had also a good taste in ornamental gardening. By the interest of his patron he became master-carpenter, architect, keeper of the pictures, and principal painter to the crown. Died 12 April, 1748.

KENYON, LLOYD, Lord Kenyon, was son of Lloyd Kenyon, Esq., of Gredington, Flintshire, and born there 1733. After receiving his education at the school of Ruthin, Denbighshire, he was articled to Mr. Tomlinson, an attorney of Nantwich, in Cheshire. At the expiration of his time he entered Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar 1761. His progress was slow at first, but, on forming an acquaintance with Thurlow, his practice in the Court of Chancery increased. In 1780 he acquired celebrity by managing the defence of Lord George Gordon, and, in 1782, was appointed attorney-general, soon after which he was made chief justice of Chester. In 1784 he became master of the rolls, and was created a baronet. On the resignation of Lord Mansfield (1788), he was constituted chief justice of the King's Bench, and elevated to the peerage. He died at Bath 2 April, 1802.

KEPLER, JOHN, an astronomer, born at Wiel, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, 27 Dec., 1571. He was educated at Tubingen under Mæstlinus, and, in 1591, was appointed professor of astronomy at Gratz, soon after which he published his 'Mysterium Cosmographicum.' In 1598 he was banished the university for professing the reformed religion; but was afterwards recalled, and restored to his office. In 1600 he quitted that place of his own accord, to become mathematician to the Emperor Rodolphus, at Prague, where he experienced difficulties which compelled him to remove to Lintz, on a pension. He died at Ratisbon 15 Nov., 1630. To Kepler we are indebted for the discovery of the laws which govern the planetary motions, or that these bodies describe areas proportional to their times, that they move in elliptical orbits; and that the squares of their periodic times are as the cubes of their mean distances. His principal works are—The Rodolphine Tables; Optical Astronomy; Account of a new Star in Sagittarius; New Astronomy, or Celestial Physics; The Harmony of the World; Somnium Astronomicum.

KEPPEL, AUGUSTUS, Viscount Keppel, an English admiral, was the second son of William, earl of Albemarle, and born 2 April, 1725. He went with Anson round the world, and afterwards passed through all the gradations of the service till he attained the full rank of admiral. In 17 he commanded the channel fleet, and had a partial action with the French off Ushant, on 12 July, but nothing decisive being effected, the nation was dissatisfied. Counter-charges were brought against each other by Admiral Keppel and his second in command, Sir Hugh Palliser; when the former was acquitted, and the latter censured. As party spirit, however, was high on this occasion, it was believed by the best judges that justice was unequally administered. In 1782 Keppel was made a peer, and afterwards appointed first lord of the Admiralty. Died 3 Oct., 1786.

KER, JOHN, duke of Roxburghe. See ROXBURGHE.

KERCKHERDERE, JOHN GERARD, historiographer to the Emperor Joseph I., born at Maestricht, about 1678, and died 1738. He was author of many works on general history and theology.

KESSEL, John van, an artist, was born at Antwerp 1626; died about 1690. He painted portraits in the manner of Vandyck, but excelled in the representation of flowers, fruits, and insects. His son, Ferdinand, was patronized by John Sobieski.

KETEL, Cornelius, a Dutch artist, born at Gouda 1548. He came to England in the reign of Elizabeth, whose portrait he painted. On his return to Holland he laid aside the use of pencils, and painted with the tops of his fingers; and afterwards he tried to execute historical pictures with his toes. Died about 1610.

KETT, Henry, B.D., was born at Norwich 1761, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1790 he was appointed Bampton lecturer. After holding his fellowship for many years he married and obtained the living of Charlton, Gloucestershire. He was found drowned at Stanwell 30 June, 1825. He published 'History, the Interpreter of Prophecy;' 'Elements of General Knowledge,' 2 vols.; 'Emily,' a novel.

KETT, William, a tanner of Norfolk, who in the reign of Edward VI. excited a revolt in that county against the government. The insurgents, to the number of nearly 20,000 men, marched to Norwich, which they captured, and Kett formed a tribunal under a large oak, which was called the tree of reformation. They at first protested only against inclosures and the exactions of the nobility and gentry, but they afterwards inveighed against innovations in religion, and demanded the restoration of the Catholic faith. After defeating the marquis of Northampton, they were routed by the earl of Warwick, Kett, with several others, being hanged on the tree of reformation 1549.

KETTLEWELL, John, a divine, born at Northallerton, Yorkshire, 10 March, 1653. From the free school of his native town he went to St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and in 1675 obtained a fellowship in Lincoln College. In 1682 he was presented to the vicarge of Coleshill, Warwickshire, which he lost at the Revolution for refusing the oaths to the new government. Died 12 April, 1695. His works were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1718.

KEULEN, Jannssen van, a portrait painter, was born in London of Dutch parents, and died 1665. He was in great favour with Charles I. before Vandyck came to England.

KEULEN, Ludolph van, a Dutch mathematician, who acquired celebrity by his approximate calculation respecting the quadrature of the circle, died at Leyden 1610.

KEYNES, John, a Jesuit, was a native of Compton Painsford, Somersetshire. He was educated at St. Omer and Valladolid, where he joined the Society 1645. At the time of Oates's plot he was superior of his brethren in London, but he contrived to escape to the continent. In 1680 he was appointed rector of the college at Liege, and he was provincial of his order 1683-89. Died 15 May, 1697, æt. 73. He was an able controversialist, and wrote several pieces against Dr. Stillingfleet; also 'A Rational, Compendious Way to convince without any dispute all persons whatsoever dissenting from the True Religion,' 1674. This was translated into Latin and French. He was likewise the principal compiler of the 'Florus Anglo-Bavaricus,' 4to., Liege, 1685.—Dodd Oliver.

KEYSLER, John George, a German traveller and antiquary, born at Thurnau 1689. He was a fellow of the Royal Society of London; and died 20 June, 1743. His 'Travels through Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Switzerland, Italy, and Lorrain,' have been translated into English, 4 vols., 1756-7. His antiquarian essays were published under the title of 'Antiquitates selectæ Septentrionales et Celticæ,' 1720.

He became minister first of St. Alkmond's and then of Allhallows, Derby; and died 21 Oct., 1617. His work, entitled 'The Burthen of a loaden Conscience,' first published 1608, formerly enjoyed a high popularity.

KILBYE, RICHARD, D.D., was born at Ratcliffe, Leicestershire. He studied at Lincoln College, Oxford, of which society he became fellow, and, in 1590, rector. He was also professor of Hebrew in the university, and one of the translators of the Bible. He died 17 Nov., 1620, aged about sixty. Dr. Kilbye was the early friend and patron of Bishop Sanderson.

KILHAM, ALEXANDER, a Wesleyan preacher whose pamphlet, entitled 'The Progress of Liberty,' led to his expulsion by the Methodist conference. He thereupon established what is called the 'Methodist New Connexion;' and died 20 Dec., 1798.

KILIAN, CORNELIUS, a native of Brabant, who was corrector of the press to Plantin for nearly half a century. He published an Apology for Corrector of the Press, against Authors; 'Etymologicon Linguæ Teutonicæ;' and Latin poems. Died 1607.

KILLIGREW, ANNE, daughter of Henry Killigrew, D.D., was born in London. She evinced great genius at an early age, particularly in poetry and painting; but died of the small-pox, at the age of twenty-five, in June, 1685. Her poems were printed 1686, with an elegiac ode by Dryden. As an artist she drew several historic pieces; and also portraits of James II., when duke of York and his duchess.

KILLIGREW, CATHARINE, daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, was born at Giddy Hall, Essex, about 1530. She married Sir Henry Killigrew, of Cornwall; and was distinguished as well for her knowledge of the learned languages, as for her genius in poetry. She died about 1600.

KILLIGREW, HENRY, D.D., brother of Thomas and William Killigrew, was born 1612. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he proceeded doctor in divinity in 1642, in which year he was made prebendary of Westminster. He suffered much for his loyalty; but at the Restoration recovered his prebend, was appointed master of the Savoy, and rector of Wheathamstead, Herts. He wrote the Conspiracy, a tragedy, 1638; Pallantus and Eudora, a tragedy, 1652, folio; and sermons on several occasions. Died about 1690.

KILLIGREW, THOMAS, brother of William mentioned below, was born 1611. He was page to Charles I., and groom of the bedchamber to Charles II. He wrote nine plays, which were collected into a folio volume in 1664. He died 1682. This is the Killigrew who is commonly called King Charles's jester.

KILLIGREW, WILLIAM, a dramatist, the son of Sir Robert Killigrew, was born at Hanworth, Middlesex, 1605. He received his education at St. John's College, Oxford, after which he went upon his travels. On his return he was made governor of Falmouth and Pendennis Castle, and, for his faithful services to Charles I., suffered considerably in his estate. At the Restoration he was knighted and made vice-chamberlain to the king. He died in 1693. His plays are—The Siege of Urbin; Selindra; Ormasdes; and Love and Friendship. He also wrote Midnight and Daily Thoughts in prose and verse; and the Artless Midnight Thoughts of a Gentleman at Court.

KILMARNOCK, William Boyd, fourth Earl of, a Scottish nobleman, born 1704. Having joined the Pretender's standard in 1745, he displayed considerable courage till the fatal battle of Culloden, when, finding it impossible to escape, he surrendered himself prisoner to the king's troops. He was found guilty of high treason, and beheaded on Tower Hill 18 Aug., 1746.

KIMBER, Isaac, a dissenting minister, born at Wantage, Berks, 1 Dec., 1692. He studied under Mr. Eames and Professor Ward; after which he officiated to a congregation at Nantwich, in Cheshire; from whence he came to London, and became morning preacher at a meeting in Old Artillery Lane. But his principal support was derived from correcting the press, and compiling books of some popularity. The chief of these were a Life of Cromwell; and a History of England, in 4 vols. He died in 1758, about which time a volume of his sermons was printed. His son, Edward Kimber, was also a literary compiler, and died in 1769. His publications were the Peerages of Scotland and Ireland; the Baronetage of England; a History of England, 10 vols. 8vo.; and a novel, entitled 'The Adventures of Joe Thompson,' 2 vols.

KIMCHI, David, a celebrated Spanish rabbi and biblical commentator, who died in Provence about 1240.

KINASTON, Sir Francis, an English poet, born at Otley, Shropshire, in or about 1588. He studied at Oriel College, Oxford, from whence he removed to Cambridge, and there took his master's degree. Charles I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and made him one of the esquires of the body. In 1636 Sir Francis became regent of a literary institution, called the 'Musæum Minervæ;' but it died with the founder, about 1642. He translated Chaucer's 'Troilus and Cressida' into Latin; but is best known by his 'Leoline and Sydanis;' with 'Cinthiades,' 1641.

KING, Edward, an ingenious youth, who was fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, but was unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester to Ireland 10 Aug., 1637. This melancholy event gave occasion to Milton to write his Lycidas. He wrote some elegant poems, which are in Nichols's collection.

KING, Edward, F.R.S., F.S.A., was born in Norfolk 1735. He was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar, and became recorder of Lynn. In 1767 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1770, a member of that of Antiquaries, of which last he became president, on the death of Dean Milles in 1784; but being set aside at the next election, he withdrew from the society. Died 16 April, 1807. Mr. King published—An Essay on the English Constitution; Hymns to the Supreme Being; Proposals for a Marine School; Morsels of Criticism; Considerations on the National Debt; Remarks concerning Stones said to have fallen from the Clouds; Vestiges of Oxford Castle; Munimenta Antiqua, 3 vols. folio; Remarks on the Signs of the Times. The last-mentioned work was answered by Bishop Horsley.

KING, Gregory, an heraldic and commercial writer, born at Lichfield 15 Dec., 1648. After receiving a grammatical education at the free school of his native city, he became secretary to Sir William Dugdale, who employed him in painting arms, sketching views, and drawing pedigrees. He next worked under Ogilvy, and engraved a number of plates for that voluminous compiler's works. In 1677 he was created Rouge-dragon in the herald's office, where he was employed on every important occasion. He also became secretary to the commissioners of public accounts, and to the comptrollers of the army. Died 29 Aug., 1712. He published—The order of Installation of Prince George of Denmark, Charles Duke of Somerset, and George Duke of Northumberland; The Installation of Henry Duke of Norfolk, Henry Earl of Peterborough, and Laurence Earl of Rochester; 'Natural and Political Observations and Conclusions upon the State and Condition of England,' 12mo., 1696, reprinted in the 3rd edition of George Chalmers's Estimate 1802, and again, separately, 1810.

KING, Henry, son of the bishop of London, was born at Wornall, Bucks, Jan., 1591. He had his education at Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford. After taking his degrees in arts, he entered into orders, and became chaplain to James I. He was also made archdeacon of Colchester, residentiary of St. Paul's, and canon of Christ Church. In 1625 he took his doctor's degree; and in 1638 was made dean of Rochester. In 1641 he was advanced to the bishopric of Chichester, of which he was soon afterwards deprived by the ruling powers; but he recovered it at the Restoration, and died 1 Oct., 1669. His works are—Sermons; Exposition of the Lord's Prayer; A Poetical Version of the Psalms; Poems, Elegies, Paradoxes, and Sonnets; Latin and Greek Poems. His brother, John King, D.D., became a student of Christ Church, public orator of the university, canon of Windsor, and rector of Remenham in Berkshire. He died 2 Jan., 1638-9.

KING, John, an English bishop, born at Wornall, Bucks, about 1559, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford. He became chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and archdeacon of Nottingham. In 1601 he took his doctor's degree; in 1605 was made dean of Christ Church; and in 1611 bishop of London. He died 30 March, 1621, and soon afterwards a report was circulated, that he had been reconciled to the church of Rome, which was contradicted by his son in a sermon preached at Paul's Cross. The bishop published Lectures upon Jonah, 1594.

KING, John, D.D., was born at St. Columb, Cornwall, 1 May, 1652. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, but took the degree of D.D. at Catharine Hall, Cambridge. He became successively curate of Bray, Berks, rector of Pertenhall Bedfordshire, rector of Chelsea, and prebendary of York. Died 30 May, 1732. His publications are—Animadversions on a Letter of Advice to the Nonconformists; The Case of Bishop Atherton; Tolando-Pseudologo-Mastix, or a Currycomb for a lying Coxcomb. Some of his manuscripts are in the British Museum. His son, John King, born 5 Aug., 1696, was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of M.A. He afterwards settled as a physician at Stamford, and died there 12 Oct., 1728. He published a Latin letter to Dr. Freind on Epidemics; and an edition of 'Euripidis Hecuba, Orestes, et Phœnissæ,' 1726.

KING, JOHN GLEN, D.D., was born in Norfolk 1731, and educated at Caius College, Cambridge. In 1764 he became chaplain to the British factory at St. Petersburg, where the Empress Catharine appointed him her medallist. Soon after his return from Russia he purchased the chapel in Broad Court, Drury Lane, where he officiated till his death 2 Nov., 1787. He published 'The Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia;' and Observations on the Barberini Vase in the 'Archæologia.'

KING, PETER, Lord KING, Chancellor of England, was the son of a grocer at Exeter, where he was born 1669. His mother was sister to Mr. Locke, who assisted him in his studies, and advised him to study the law, in consequence of which he became a member of the Inner Temple. While following this pursuit, he published 'An Inquiry into the Constitution of the Primitive Church.' This produced a friendly controversy between the author and his countryman, Mr. Edmund Elys; and their letters were printed 1694. In 1699 he obtained a seat in the House of Commons; but neither this nor his legal occupations could draw his mind altogether from theological studies, the fruits of which appeared in 'The History of the Apostles' Creed,' a work of great value, and a necessary supplement to Pearson. In 1708 the author was chosen recorder of London, and the same year received the honour of knighthood. In 1709 he was one of the managers on the trial of Dr. Sacheverel; and on the accession of George I. he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas. In 1725 he was made lord chancellor, and created a baron. He resigned the seals in 1733, and died July 22, in the following year. His private diary, written in Rich's system of short-hand, has been decyphered by Thomas Rees, and printed under the title of 'Notes of Domestic and Foreign Affairs during the last years of the reign of George I. and the early part of the reign of George II.'

KING, PETER, seventh Lord King, was born 31 Aug., 1775, and it is said received his education in the university of Cambridge. He succeeded to the title 1793; and died in London 4 June, 1833. His principal work is 'The Life of John Locke, with extracts from his Correspondence, Journals, and Common-place Books,' 4to., London, 1829; 2 vols. 8vo., 1830; 1 vol. 8vo., 1858. His lordship's 'Select Speeches and Writings' were published in 1844, with a memoir of his life by Earl Fortescue.

KING, RICHARD, was born at Bristol 1749, and educated at Winchester School, from whence he removed to New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his master's degree in 1774. He became rector of Worthen, Shropshire, and vicar of Steeple Morden, Cambridgeshire, where he died 1810. He wrote—'On the Inspiration of the Scriptures;' The Alliance between Church and State; Letters from Abraham Plymley to his brother Peter, on the Catholic Question. His wife, Mrs. Frances Elizabeth King, who was the sister of Sir Thomas Bernard, wrote 'The Benefits of the Christian Temper;' and 'Female Scripture Biography.' She died 1821.

KING, RUFUS, an American statesman, born 1755; died 29 April, 1827.

KING, WILLIAM, D.C.L., was born in London 1663. He received his education, first at Westminster School, and next at Christ Church, Oxford (M.A. 1688). He then applied himself to the study of the civil law, in which he took both degrees in 1692, and was admitted an advocate in Doctors' Commons. In 1694 he answered Lord Molesworth's account of Denmark; for which the Princess Anne made him her secretary. In 1697 he had a share in the controversy with Bentley, respecting the epistles of Phalaris, for which he was roughly handled by that powerful critic. In 1698 came out 'A Journey to London,' an admirable piece of irony, which was followed by a similar piece, called the 'Transactioneer,' against the Royal Society. About 1703 he went to Ireland, where he was made judge of the Admiralty, commissioner of prizes, and keeper of the records; but for want of prudence he made no advantage of these appointments, and returned to London in 1708. In 1710 he was concerned in the Examiner, and he was also one of the defenders of Sacheverel. The next year he published 'An Historical Account of the Heathen Gods and Heroes;' and at this time was appointed gazetteer; but resigned the place soon after, and died on Christmas Day, 1712. His works were printed in 1778, in 3 vols. 8vo., with his life prefixed.

KING, WILLIAM, an Irish prelate, was born at Antrim 1 May, 1650. He was educated, first at the school of Dungannon, and next at Trinity College, Dublin. Having taken orders, he was made prebendary and precentor of Tuam; and in 167- chancellor of St. Patrick's, and minister of St. Werburgh's, Dublin. In 1686 he engaged in a controversy with Peter Manby, dean of Derry, who had embraced the Catholic religion. Indeed, during the reign of James II., Mr. King evinced such hostility towards Catholicism that at the revolution his zeal was rewarded with the deanery of St. Patrick's. In 1689 he took his doctor's degree, and in Jan., 1690-1, was promoted to the see of Derry, from whence he was translated to Dublin March, 1702-3. He died 8 May, 1729, and was buried in the churchyard of Donnybrook, near Dublin. His principal works are—'The State of the Protestants in Ireland under the late King James;' 'Discourse concerning the Invention of Men in the worship of God;' and 'De Origine Mali,' a translation of which by Edmund Law appeared in 1739.

KING, WILLIAM, D.C.L., was born at Stepney 1685. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he took his degree of doctor of laws 171- after which he became secretary to the duke of Ormond and the earl of Arran, when chancellors of the University, by virtue of which connection he was made principal of St. Mary Hall and public orator; in which last situation he distinguished himself by his eloquence, though he suffered much abuse on account of his Tory principles. Died 30 Dec., 1763. He edited several posthumous sermons, and published — Miltonis Epistola ad Pollionem; Sermo Pedestris; Scanicum, ecloga; Templum Libertatis; Tres Orationes culæ; Epistola Objurgatoria; Antonietti Du- Corscorum Epist. ad Corscos de rege eligend- Eulogium Jacci Etonensis, i.e. John Burton, of Eton, commonly called Dr. Jack; Aviti Epist. ad Perillam, virginem Scotam; Oratiuncula habita domo Convocationis Oxon, 1757. His 'Political and Literary Anecdotes of his Own Time (17- 60)' were published in 1818.

KINGSBOROUGH, EDWARD KING VISCOUNT

only son of George third earl of Kingston, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford. He represented the county of Cork from 1820-6; and died at Dublin 27 Feb., 1837, aged 42. His lordship was fond of antiquarian studies, and brought out a magnificent work on 'The Antiquities of Mexico,' 6 vols., 1831.

KINGSMILL, ANDREW, a divine born at Sidmanton, Hampshire, 1538, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford; but removed from thence to a fellowship at All Souls. He became an admired preacher; but on turning Puritan, went to Lausanne in Switzerland, where he died Sept., 1569. His works are—A View of Man's Estate, 1574; A Godly Advice touching Marriage, 1580; Treatise for such as are troubled in Mind, or afflicted in Body; Godly Exhortation to bear patiently all Afflictions for the Gospel; Conference between a learned Christian and an afflicted Conscience.

KIPLING, THOMAS, D.D., a native of Yorkshire, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he proceeded D.D., 1784, at which time he was appointed deputy professor of divinity under Bishop Watson. He preached the Boyle's Lectures 1792, but never printed the course. In 1793 Dr. Kipling rendered himself obnoxious to a certain party by leading the prosecution of William Frend, of Jesus College, for professing Unitarianism while he held a fellowship; in consequence of which that gentleman was deprived and expelled. As the doctor was selected to superintend the publication of the Codex of Beza Dr. Edwards attacked the work with great acrimony, amounting to personal hostility. He obtained the deanery of Peterborough, with which he held the living of Holme on Spalding Moor, Yorkshire, where he died 1822. His publications are—'The Elementary Parts of Dr. Smith's Complete System of Optics,' 1778; 'Codex Theodori Bezæ Cantabrigiensis, Evangelia et Apostolorum Acta complectens, Quadratis Literis Græco-Latinis,' 2 vols. folio, 1793; 'The Articles of the Church of England proved not to be Calvinistic,' 1802; 'Certain Accusations brought lately by the Irish Papists, against British and Irish Protestants, examined,' 1809.

KIPPIS, ANDREW, D.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., was born at Nottingham 28 March, 1725. He was educated under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton; and in 1746 became minister of an Independent congregation at Boston, Lincolnshire, from whence he removed, in 1750, to Dorking, Surrey; and in 1753 to the meeting in Prince's Street, Westminster. In 1763 he was chosen one of the tutors of Coward's Academy; and in 1767 the university of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity. In 1778 he was chosen a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries; and in 1779 a fellow of the Royal Society. Dr. Kippis was one of the tutors of the new academy or college, as it was called, at Hackney, in 1786; but in a few years he resigned that situation, and died 8 Oct., 1795. He undertook a new edition of the Biographia Britannica, of which five volumes were printed. He also projected the 'New Annual Register;' and published a number of pieces, the principal of which were—'The Life of Captain Cook;' 'A Vindication of the Dissenters;' a volume of sermons; and 'Observations on the late Contests in the Royal Society.' He was of the Socinian persuasion.

KIRBY, JOHN JOSHUA, F.R.S., F.S.A., a native of Parham, in Suffolk, who from the humble condition of a house painter raised himself by his talents and industry to a respectable rank among the artists of his day, and was elected a fellow of both the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He was born 1716, and first attracted public notice by a series of drawings which he published, taken from the monumental and other antiquities of the county in which he lived. 'A Treatise on Perspective,' which he edited in 1774, increased his reputation, and introduced him to the knowledge of the earl of Bute, through whose interest he was appointed drawing-master to Queen Charlotte, and clerk of the works at Kew Palace. His other writings are 'The Perspective of Architecture,' 2 vols. folio, 1761, printed at the expense of King George III.; 'A Map of Suffolk,' 1766, originally drawn by his father. He is also known as the father of Mrs. Trimmer. Mr. Kirby died 21 June, 1774, and was buried in Kew churchyard.

KIRBY, WILLIAM, F.R.S., an eminent entomologist, born at Witnesham, Suffolk, 1759, and educated at the grammar school at Ipswich, whence he removed to Caius College, Cambridge (B.A. 1781; M.A. 1816). He was inducted to the rectory of Barham, in his native county, 1796, and held that benefice until his death, 4 July, 1850. In addition to many learned papers in the Entomological and Zoological Journals, the Linnean Society's Transactions, &c., he wrote 'Monographia Apum Angliæ; or, an Attempt to divide into their natural Genera and Families such Species of the Linnean Genus Apis as have been discovered in England,' 2 vols., 1802; 'An Introduction to Entomology; or, Elements of the Natural History of Insects,' 4 vols., 1826, in collaboration with William Spence; 'History, Habits, and Instinct of Animals' (Bridgewater Treatise), 1835; the description of the insects of the 'Fauna Boreali America' of Sir John Richardson, M.D., forming the 4th vol. of that work, 1837; 'Sermons on our Lord's Temptation.' Mr. Kirby's 'Life and Letters,' by the Rev. John Freeman, appeared in 1852.

KIRCH, MARY MARGARET, was born at Panitzsch, in Upper Lusatia, 1670, being the daughter of Matthias Winckelmann, a Lutheran minister. She married (1692) Godfrey Kirch, who, when appointed royal astronomer at Berlin (1700), found in his wife an intelligent assistant and an able calculator. In 1702 she discovered a comet, on which she and her husband published some observations; and in 1707 she observed a remarkable Aurora Borealis. The husband died 25 July, 1710, aged 70, and the following year his widow published a discourse on the approaching conjunctions of Saturn, Jupiter, &c. She died at Berlin 29 Dec., 1720. Her son, Christian Frederick Kirch, acquired some celebrity by his astronomical writings, and died 9 March, 1740, aged 46.

KIRCHER, ATHANASIUS, a Jesuit, was born at Geysen, near Fulda, in Germany, 2 May, 1602. He studied at Wurtzburg, and next at Avignon, after which he was called to teach mathematics in the college belonging to his order at Rome, where also he was professor of Hebrew; and died 28 Nov., 1680. His principal works are—'Oedipus Ægyptiacus; id est, universalis Hieroglyphicæ veterum doctrinæ temporum injuria abolitæ, instauratio,' 4 vols. folio; Prælusiones Magneticæ; Primitiæ Gnomonicæ Catopticæ; Ars magna lucis et umbræ; Musurgia Universalis, 2 vols.; Obeliscus Pamphilius; Itinerarium extaticum; Obeliscus Ægyptiacus; Mundus Subterraneus, 2 vols.; China Illustrata; Turris Babel; Arca Noë; Latium; Phonurgia Nova; Ars sciendi Combinatoria; Polygraphia.

KIRCHER, CONRAD, a Protestant divine of Augsburg, who published in 1607 'Concordantia Veteris Testamenti Græcæ, Ebræis vocibus respondentes, &c.,' 2 vols. Died after 1622.

KIRCHMANN, JOHN, a German antiquary, born at Lübeck 18 Jan., 1575, became rector of the college there, and died 20 March, 1643. He wrote on the Funerals of the Romans; on Rings, &c.

KIRK, JOHN, D.D., an English divine of the Roman communion, was born at Acton Burnell, near Shrewsbury, 13 April, 1760, and at ten years of age was sent to Sedgley Park School. His early inclination to the ecclesiastical state, united with his talents and proficiency in every branch of elementary knowledge, soon recommended him to his superiors as a fit subject to be sent to the English college at Rome, where, during a residence of ten years, he finished his humanity studies with great applause, and prosecuted those of philosophy and divinity. He returned to England 1785, and afterwards became president at Sedgley Park. In 1795 he was appointed chaplain and private secretary to Dr. Charles Berington, vicar-apostolic of the midland district. Subsequently he settled in Lichfield, where he erected a new Catholic chapel in 1803. He was created D.D. by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1841. At Lichfield he spent the remainder of his long and laborious life, dying there 21 Dec., 1851. During his residence in Rome, and for upwards of forty years of his after life, he was preparing materials for a continuation of Dodd's 'Church History of England.' His collections formed upwards of 50 volumes in folio and quarto. These were afterwards handed over to the Rev. M. A. Tierney. Dr. Kirk also copied and prepared for publication the papers of Sir Ralph Sadler, which appeared in 1809 in 3 large quarto volumes, with a biographical sketch by Sir Walter Scott. In conjunction with the Rev. Joseph Berington he composed a well-known controversial work, entitled 'The Faith of Catholics confirmed by Scripture and attested by the Fathers of the Five First Centuries.' In 1815 he published 'Roman Catholic Principles in reference to God and the King; first published in the year 1680; to which is prefixed an Inquiry respecting the Editions and the Author of that valuable Tract.' He ascribes its authorship, with great probability, to James Corker the Benedictine.

KIRKES, WILLIAM SENHOUSE, M.D., one of the physicians to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, wrote 'A Handbook of Physiology.' Died 8 Dec., 1864.

KIRKLAND, THOMAS, M.D., a physician and writer on subjects connected with his profession, died at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, 17 Jan., 1798, aged 77.

KIRKPATRICK, WILLIAM, an English major-general, was born 1760, and died 22 March, 1812, in Bengal, where he had spent the greater part of his life in the service of the East India Company. He was reputed an accomplished orientalist, and published Biographies of Persian Poets in the 'New Asiatic Miscellany,' Calcutta, 1789; 'An Account of the Kingdom of Nepaul,' 4to., Lond., 1811; and a Selection of the Letters of the Sultan Tippoo-Saib, 4to., 1811.

KIRNBERGER, JOHN PHILIP, a musical composer, born at Saalfeld, in Thuringia, 1721; died 27 July, 1783.

KIRSTENIUS, GEORGE, professor of medicine at Stettin, in Pomerania, was born there 20 Jan., 1613, and died 4 March, 1660.

KIRSTENIUS, PETER, a physician, born at Breslau, in Silesia, on Christmas day, 1577. After studying at Leipsic and Jena, he applied himself to the Arabic language; and having taken his doctor's degree at Basle, went on his travels, which he extended as far as Asia. On the invitation of the Chancellor Oxenstiern, he settled at Upsal, where he became professor of physic, and died 8 April, 1640. He published—Grammatica Arabica; Tria specimena characterum Arabicorum; Decas Sacra Canticorum et Carminum Arabicorum, &c.; Vitæ quatuor Evangelistarum ex codice MS. Arabice; Liber Secundus canonis Avicennæ; Liber de vero usu et abusu Medicinæ; Notæ in Evangelium S. Matthæi ex collatione textuum Arabicorum, Syriacorum, Ægyptiacorum, Græcorum, et Latinorum.

KIRWAN, RICHARD, LL.D., was born near Galway 1734. He was originally intended for a profession, and was accordingly sent to St. Omer to be educated, but on the death of his elder brother he succeeded to the family estates, and thenceforth abandoning all professional ideas, he applied himself to those philosophical pursuits for which he was so singularly gifted. He died at Dublin 1 June, 1812. Dr. Kirwan published the following learned works: 'Elements of Mineralogy,' Lond., 2 vols. 8vo., 1784; 'Geological Essays,' Lond., 8vo., 1799; 'Essay on the Analysis of Mineral Waters,' Lond., 8vo., 1799; 'Logic, or an Essay on the Elements, Principles, and different Modes of Reasoning,' Lond., 2 vols. 8vo., 1807; 'Metaphysical Essays, containing the principles and fundamental objects of that science,' Lond., 8vo., 1809; 'An Essay on Phlogiston and the Constitution of Acids,' 8vo.; 'An Essay on the temperature of different Latitudes,' 8vo.; and numerous papers in the transactions of the various learned societies of which he was a member.

KIRWAN, WALTER BLAKE, an Irish divine, was born at Galway about 1754. He was educated in the English college at St. Omer, and next at Louvain, where he entered into priest's orders, and became professor of philosophy. In 1778 he was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy at London, but in 1787 he conformed to the state church in Dublin, where his popularity as a preacher was uncommonly great. In 1788 he was presented to a prebend in the cathedral of Dublin, and the living of St. Nicholas, but resigned the former in 1800, on being promoted to the deanery of Killala. Died 27 Oct., 1805. A volume of his sermons, published at London 1814, for the benefit of his family, does not appear to have added much to his fame.

KITCHIN, ANTHONY, originally a Benedictine monk, was consecrated bishop of Llandaff 1545. He was the only prelate who was in office at the death of Mary who took the oath of allegiance to Queen Elizabeth. He was in the commission for the consecration of Parker as archbishop of Canterbury, but refused to act. Died 31 Oct., 1565, aged about 90.—Athen. Cantab.

KITCHINER, WILLIAM, M.D., a miscellaneous writer, born in London about 1775; died 26 Feb., 1827. Among his publications are 'The Cook's 'Oracle;' 'Observations on Telescopes;' 'Art of prolonging Life;' 'Traveller's Oracle;' 'Health without Physic;' and 'Rural Rambles.'

KITTO, JOHN, D.D., author of many popular works connected with biblical literature, was born at Plymouth 4 Dec., 1804, being the son of a jobbing mason. His school education was very slight, but between his eighth and eleventh years he was placed for short and interrupted periods at four different schools, where he was taught nothing more than reading, writing, and the imperfect use of figures. As early as his twelfth year he began to attend upon his father at his work, and while thus occupied in 1817 he fell from the roof of a house, receiving considerable bodily injury, and being wholly deprived of the sense of hearing. The love of reading, which he had already acquired, now became the solace of his loneliness and the foundation of his attainments. A highly-interesting account of his studies is given in a book entitled 'The Lost Senses.' In 1819, his parents being unable to maintain or to find suitable employment for him, placed him in the workhouse, whence he was removed in 1821, to become an apprentice to a shoemaker, who proved such a tyrant that the poor boy made an appeal to the magistrates, his written statement being characterised by striking propriety of sentiment and diction. The indentures were cancelled, and he was sent back to the workhouse. In 1823, his talents and capabilities being better understood, he was enabled, by the kindness of two gentlemen of the neighbourhood, to publish a small volume of 'Letters and Essays,' and was placed in a position less unfavourable to self-improvement. The next ten years of his life appear to have been spent abroad. In attendance on Sir John M'Niel he journeyed over a large part of Europe and Asia, and acquired that familiarity with the scenery and customs of the East which he afterwards turned to such account in his literary productions. Returning to this country in 1833, he attracted attention by a series of papers in the Penny Magazine, under the title of 'The Deaf Traveller;' and having married, he commenced a career of literary activity, which was continued without interruption till within a few months of his death. That event occurred at Cannstatt, near Stuttgard, 25 Nov., 1854. His best-known works are 'The Pictorial Bible;' 'The Bible History of the Holy Land;' 'Physical Geography and Natural History;' 'Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature;' 'Ancient Jerusalem;' 'Modern Jerusalem;' 'Physical Geography of the Holy Land;' 'The Court of Persia viewed in connection with Scriptural Usages;' 'Daily Bible Illustrations;' 'History of Palestine;' and 'Scripture Lands.' In 1848 he commenced a periodical work entitled 'The Journal of Sacred Literature,' and in 1853 another called 'Sunday Reading for Christian Families.'

KLAPROTH, MARTIN HENRY VON, professor of chemistry at Berlin, died there 1 Jan., 1817, at a very advanced age, having been a distinguished writer on that science above forty years. He was the discoverer of uranium, the zirconia, and mellitic acid. He also made interesting experiments on copal, and completed the discovery of tellurium and titanium. His son, Henry Julius von Klaproth, a distinguished traveller and orientalist, was born at Berlin 11 Oct., 1783, and died at Paris 20 Aug., 1835, leaving 'Travels in the Caucasus and Georgia;' 'Asia Polyglotta;' and other learned works.

KLÉBER, JEAN BAPTISTE, a famous general, was born at Strasburg about 1754. He was originally an architect, but left that business for the Austrian service, in which he rose to the rank of lieutenant. On leaving the army he became superintendent of the public works in Upper Alsace; but when the French Revolution broke out he entered into it with ardour, and was engaged in several battles. He accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and was left by him to command there on his departure, after which Kléber took Cairo, and formed an alliance with Murat Bey, but was assassinated by an Arab 14 June, 1800.

KLEIN, JAMES THEODORE, a Prussian naturalist, born at Königsberg 1685; died at Danzig 27 Feb., 1759. His principal works are 'Naturalis Dispositio Echinodermatum;' and 'Historia Piscium.'

KLEIST, EWALD CHRISTIAN VON, a German poet, was born at Zoeblin, in Pomerania, 3 March, 1715. After studying at Königsberg he entered into the Danish service, and next into that of Prussia, where he rose to the rank of major, but was unfortunately killed at the battle of Kunnersdorff 12 Aug., 1759. His principal poem, entitled 'Spring,' which was published first in 1749, has been compared to the Seasons of Thomson. Kleist also wrote idylls, moral treatises, and a military romance called 'Cissides.'

KLEIST, HENRY VON, a German dramatic poet, born at Frankfort-on-the-Oder 1776; died by his own hand at Potsdam 21 Nov., 1811.

KLENZE, LEO VON, an architect of Munich, born 1784; died 26 Jan., 1864.

KLOCKER, DAVID, an historical painter, born 1620 at Hamburg; died 1698 at Stockholm, where he was liberally patronised by the king.

KLOPSTOCK, FREDERIC THEOPHILUS, was born at Quedlinburg 2 July, 1724. After a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his 'Messiah,' which he published in 1747, at Leipsic. Though this poem was censured by some, it was admired by more; and Bodmer, with the Swiss in general, were loud in its praises. Klopstock was invited into that country, from whence he was called to Copenhagen by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburg, as Danish legate, and counsellor of the margrave of Baden, who allowed him a pension. He died there 14 March, 1803. The character of Klopstock as a writer is that of a poet of fervid imagination; but though rich in imagery, and lofty in sentiment, he is frequently obscure, perplexed, and turgid. His wife was an amiable and very ingenious woman. She corresponded in English with Richardson, the novelist.

KLOSE, F. J., a musician and composer, was a native of London, where he died 8 March, 1830.

KLOTZ, CHRISTIAN ADOLPHUS, a German numismatist, philologist, poet, and miscellaneous writer, born at Bischofswerda, Saxony, 13 Nov., 1738. He was appointed professor of philosophy at Göttingen, but resigned that post on accepting a similar situation at Halle, with the rank of aulic counsellor. Died 31 Dec., 1771.

KLUIT, ADRIAN, a Dutch historian and publicist, born at Dort 9 Feb., 1735; died at Leyden 12 Jan., 1807.

KNAPTON, GEORGE, an English portrait painter in crayons, was the scholar of Richardson, and surveyor and keeper of the king's pictures. He died at Kensington 1778, aged 80.

KNELLER, Sir GODFREY, was born at Lübeck about 1648. He was intended for the army, but his genius for painting being discovered, he was placed under Bol, at Amsterdam, after which he received instructions from Rembrandt. In 1672 he went to Italy, and while at Venice painted the portraits of some families of distinction. From thence he came to England by the way of Hamburg, and was employed to paint a portrait of Charles II., at the same time with Lely, who candidly bestowed praise upon his performance. This success fixed Kneller at the English court, where he painted seven sovereigns, besides three foreign ones. His principal patron was William III., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and engaged him to paint the Hampton Court beauties. His pencil was also employed on several of the pictures of the admirals in that palace, and the Kit-Kat Club. George I. created him a baronet. He was a man of wit, but excessively vain, as appeared in his gift of five hundred pounds to Pope to write an extravagant epitaph for his monument in Westminster Abbey. He died very rich 27 Oct., 1723.

KNIGHT, EDWARD, a comic actor, born at Birmingham 1774. After achieving success at York, he came to the metropolis, where he quickly became a favourite with the public. Died in London 21 Feb., 1826.

KNIGHT, GAWIN, M.D., F.R.S., was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1739, and that of bachelor of physic in 1742. He practised in London, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. Falling into great distress, he made his case known to Dr. Fothergill, who went into his closet, and then returned with a cheque upon his banker for a thousand guineas, which he put into his friend's hand, and told him to go home and set his heart at rest. Dr. Knight published 'An Attempt to demonstrate that all the Phenomena in Nature may be explained by Attraction and Repulsion,' 1748. Died 1772.

KNIGHT, HENRY GALLY, an English gentleman, born in Yorkshire 2 Dec., 1786. He travelled much in early life; was afterwards for many years a member of parliament; and died in London 9 Feb., 1846. He published an account of his travels, and some poems, which have fallen into oblivion; but his memory will be kept alive by his admirable works on architectural history. These are: 'Saracenic and Norman Remains in Sicily,' 1830; 'Ecclesiastical Architecture of Italy, from the time of Constantine to the XV. century,' 2 vols., 1833-4; 'Architectural Tour in Normandy, with Remarks on Norman Architecture in England,' 1836, and again 1841. A sequel to the latter work was published 1838, under the title of 'Normans in Sicily.'

KNIGHT, RICHARD PAYNE, was born in Shropshire 1750. In his youth he was of so delicate a frame that his father would not suffer him to go to any public school, nor allow him to study the classics. On the death of this eccentric parent, which event happened when the son was in his fourteenth year, he went to school and made rapid progress in the Latin language. To the Greek he paid little attention till he was eighteen, and then he studied it assiduously. He spent several years in Italy, where he made a large collection of bronzes, medals, pictures, and drawings. On his return to England he was elected M.P. for Ludlow, but he did not distinguish himself as a senator. He was, however, placed on the committee for superintending the execution of the public monuments. Mr. Knight had a fine taste for the arts, but some of his works met with severe censure on account of the pruriency displayed in them, particularly in his 'Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus, lately existing in the Kingdom of Naples: to which is added a Discourse on the Worship of Priapus, and its connection with the Mystic Theology of the Ancients,' 1786. This work was printed only for private circulation. In 1791 the author published 'An Analytical Essay on the Greek Alphabet,' in 1794; 'The Landscape, a didactic poem;' and in the year following 'A Review of the Landscape;' also 'An Essay on the Picturesque, with Practical Remarks on Rural Ornament.' His next performance was 'The Progress of Civil Society,' a poem (1796), which was castigated in the reviews with great asperity. In 1805 appeared his 'Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste;' and in 1806 'A Monody on the Right Hon. Charles James Fox.' After this he published his 'Prologomena to Homer, with a Defence of the use of the Digamma,' and lastly, a poem called 'Alfred.' Died 28 April, 1824. He bequeathed his large collection of coins, medals, gems, bronzes, and drawings, with 30,000*l.* to the British Museum.

KNIGHT, SAMUEL, D.D., was a native of London. He received his education at St. Paul's School, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1707 he obtained the vicarage of Chippenham, and the rectory of Borough Green, Cambridgeshire; after which he was collated to a prebend in the cathedral of Ely. In 1717 he was presented to the rectory of Bluntesham, Huntingdonshire; and in 1735 made archdeacon of Berks. Died 10 Dec., 1746, aged 71. Dr. Knight published the lives of Erasmus and Dean Colet.

KNIGHT, THOMAS ANDREW, F.R.S., a gentleman well known by his researches into vegetable physiology, was born near Hereford 10 Oct., 1758, and educated at Balliol College, Oxford. It was about 1795 that he began to be publicly known as a vegetable physiologist. In that year he laid before the Royal Society his celebrated paper upon the inheritance of disease among fruit trees, and the propagation of debility by grafting. This was followed by accounts of experimental researches into vegetable fecundation, the ascent and descent of sap in trees, the phenomena of germination, the influence of light upon leaves, and a great variety of similar subjects. Mr. Knight succeeded Sir Joseph Banks as president of the Horticultural Society of London; and died 11 May, 1838. His separate publications are 'A Treatise on the Culture of the Pear and Apple, and on the Manufacture of Cider and Perry,' 1797, fourth edition, 1814; 'Pomona Herefordiensis, or Natural History of the old Cider and Perry Fruits of the County of Hereford,' 1811. His 'Physiological and Horticultural Papers' were published in 1841 with his Life prefixed.

KNIGHT, WILLIAM, a native of Arlington, Sussex, received his education at Christ's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1582-3; M.A. 1586). He was instituted to the rectory of Barley, Herts, 1598, but before the close of that year exchanged it for the rectory of Little Gransden, Cambs. He was author of 'A Concordance Axiomatical containing a survey of theological propositions with the reasons and uses in holy scripture,' folio, London, 1610.—Athen. Cantab. iii. 16.

KNIGHTBRIDGE, JOHN, D.D., founder of a professorship of casuistical divinity at Cambridge, died about 1681.

KNIGHTON, HENRY, an English historian, was a canon regular of Leicester Abbey, in the reign of Richard II., of whose deposition he wrote an account; also a chronicle from the Conquest to 1395.

KNIGHTON, Sir WILLIAM, M.D., an English baronet and physician, died in London 11 Oct., 1836, aged 59.

KNOLLES, RICHARD, an English writer, was born in Northamptonshire, and educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of Lincoln College. After this he was appointed master of the Free School at Sandwich, in Kent, and died there 1610. His principal work is 'The General History of the Turks,' folio, 1610; and continued afterwards by several hands. Dr. Johnson has bestowed high praise upon this history. Knolles also translated Bodin's Treatise of a Commonwealth; and wrote 'The Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Emperors.'

KNOLLIS, or KNOWLES, Sir FRANCIS, a statesman, was born at Grays, in Oxfordshire. He became a zealous advocate of the Reformation in the reign of Edward VI., on whose death he went to Germany. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England, and was made vice-chamberlain of the royal household. Afterwards he was appointed treasurer, and knight of the Garter. He died in the summer of 1596. Sir Francis wrote 'A Treatise against the Papal Usurpation;' and a 'General Survey of the Isle of Wyght.'

KNOLLYS, WILLIAM, a British general, and governor of Limerick, died at Paris 20 March, 1834. At one time he was styled Earl of Banbury, and in 1808 prosecuted the family claim to the title, which, however, was decided against him in the House of Lords.

KNORR VON ROSENROTH, CHRISTIAN, a learned German baron, born 1636. He became chancellor to the count palatine of Sulzbach; and distinguished himself by a curious work, entitled 'Kabbala denudata, seu doctrina Hebræorum transcendentalis, et Metaphysica atque Theologica.' Died 4 May, 1689.

KNOTT, EDWARD, a Jesuit, whose real name was Matthias Wilson, and who also at times assumed that of Nicholas Smith, was born at Pegsworth, near Morpeth, in Northumberland, 1580. He taught divinity in the English College at Rome, after which he was appointed provincial of his order in England; where he died 4 Jan., 1655-6, and was buried at St. Pancras. He had a controversy with Dr. Potter, provost of Queen's College, Oxford, and lastly with Chillingworth, against whom he wrote forcibly in his 'Infidelity unmasked,' printed at Ghent 1652. He was also the author of 'Monita utilissima pro Patribus Missionariis Anglicanis.'

KNOWLES, JAMES SHERIDAN, was born at Cork 1784. When only twelve years old his mind began to display its inherent inclination for the drama, and he composed a play for a company of juvenile performers of which he was the leader. At fourteen he wrote the pleasing ballad of 'The Welsh Harper.' When he attained the age of seventeen, a commission was procured for him, but he soon quitted the army, and appeared on the stage at Dublin, Waterford, Swansea, and other places. He next started a school in Belfast, and it was during his residence there that his first dramatic efforts were submitted to the public. Nothing could exceed the enthusiastic approbation with which they were received. The titles of his plays are subjoined:—'Brian Boroimhe;' 'Caius Gracchus;' 'Virginius;' 'William Tell;' 'The Beggar of Bethnal Green;' 'The Hunchback;' 'The Wife;' 'The Daughter;' 'The Love Chase;' 'Woman's Wit;' 'The Maid of Mariendorpt;' 'Love;' 'Old Maids;' 'John of Procida;' 'The Rose of Arragon;' and 'The Secretary.' Under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Knowles was allowed a pension of 200*l.* a-year. He resided for a considerable time in Scotland. During the latter years of his life he gave up writing for the stage and turned his attention to theology and preaching. He entertained a great fear and horror of the Catholic Church, and published 'The Rock of Rome,' and 'The Idol Demolished by its own Priest,' the latter being in reply to a book by H. E. Cardinal Wiseman, archbishop of Westminster. Mr. Knowles died at Torquay 30 Nov., 1862.

KNOWLES, THOMAS, D.D., was born at Ely 1723. He took his degrees at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which society he became fellow. He was also lecturer of St. Mary's, Bury St. Edmunds, prebendary of Ely, rector of Ickworth and Chedburgh, and vicar of Winston, in the county of Suffolk. Died 6 Oct., 1802. His principal works are Twelve Sermons on the Divine Existence and Attributes; Observations on the Tithe Bill; Primitive Christianity in favour of the Trinity; Observations on the Divine Mission of Moses; Advice to a Young Clergyman; Lectures on Passion Week.

KNOWLTON, THOMAS, an English botanist, who was gardener to Dr. Sherard, and afterwards to the earl of Burlington, at Lanesborough, Yorkshire; died 1782, aged 90. He discovered that singular production, the globe 'conferva,' or moor balls (Conferva Ægagropila, Linn.), which he first found in Wallengfen Mere. Extracts from some of his letters are printed in the Philosophical Transactions.

KNOX, JOHN, was born 1505, at Gifford, in the county of East Lothian. He received his education at the school of Haddington, and next at St. Andrew's, where he entered into the priesthood; but on embracing the principles of the Reformation he renounced the idea of rising in the church, and became tutor to some young gentlemen, whom he carefully brought up in Protestant principles, for which his life was sought by Cardinal Beton, and his successor, Archbishop Hamilton. Notwithstanding this, Knox went on propagating the new doctrines, and in 1547 appeared publicly as a preacher; but St. Andrew's being taken the same year by the French, he was carried off with the garrison. In 1549 he recovered his liberty, and landed in England, where he was appointed chaplain to Edward VI. On the accession of Queen Mary, he went to Geneva, and next to Frankfort, where he took part with the English exiles who opposed the use of the liturgy; but the other side prevailing, Knox returned to Geneva, and soon after went to Scotland. While engaged in the ministry, he received an invitation to return to Geneva, with which he complied; and in his absence the bishops passed sentence of death upon him for heresy; against which he published 'An Appellation.' In 1558 he printed 'The first Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regimen of Women,' intended as an attack upon Mary, queen of England, and his own sovereign; but it had afterwards the effect of provoking Queen Elizabeth and her ministers against the author. The year following he returned to his native country, where his presence animated the populace to acts of dreadful outrage; and they overturned the altars, defaced the pictures, broke in pieces the images, and even razed the finest works of architecture to the ground. Knox enjoyed this storm, and he insulted the queen to her face, solely on account of her religion. In 1567 he preached the sermon at the coronation of her son, and another at the opening of the parliament; but these labours broke his constitution, and he died 24 Nov., 1572. Besides what we have noticed, he wrote several religious pieces, and 'The History of the Reformation in Scotland.'

KNOX, JOHN, a bookseller of London, who wrote a Systematic View of Scotland, and planned a herring-fishery and settlement on the north-east coast of that country. Born 1720; died 1 Aug., 1791.

KNOX, ROBERT, an English seaman in the East India service, born about 1641. He went to sea with his father, who commanded a ship trading to the East; but in 1660 she was wrecked on the coast of Ceylon, where our author remained in captivity nearly twenty years, and then escaped to the Dutch settlement; from whence he obtained a passage to Batavia, and next to England. In 1681 he published 'An Historical Relation of the Island of Ceylon.' He was cousin to the historian John Strype.

KNOX, VICESIMUS, D.D., was born 8 Dec., 1752. His father, the Rev. Vicesimus Knox, or, as he spelt the name 'Knock,' was master of the school at Tunbridge, but the son was brought up at that of Merchant Taylors', from whence he removed to St. John's College, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of M.A. On the death of his father he succeeded him in the mastership of the school at Tunbridge, which he conducted with reputation thirty-three years, and then resigned it to his son. He accepted a doctor's degree from some obscure college in America. His church preferments were the united rectories of Rumwell and Ramsden, Essex, and the chapelry of Shipbourne, Kent. After his retirement from the school he fixed his residence in London, where he died 6 Sept., 1821. Dr. Knox was an impassioned and flowery preacher, which caused him to be much sought after, for the purpose of recommending charitable institutions from the pulpit. His works, original and compiled, are numerous. The former are 'Essays, Moral and Literary,' 3 vols.; 'Liberal Education,' 2 vols.; 'Winter Evenings,' 3 vols.; 'Personal Nobility, or Letters to a young Nobleman on his Studies;' 'Sermons on Faith, Hope, and Charity;' 'Christian Philosophy,' 2 vols.; 'Considerations on the Nature and Efficacy of the Lord's Supper;' and a pamphlet 'On Classical Education.' His compilations, under the titles of 'Elegant Extracts,' and 'Domestic Divinity,' are well known.

KNUPFER, NICHOLAS, a painter of Leipsic, born 1603; died 1660.

KNUTZEN, MARTIN, professor of philosophy, was born at Konigsberg 14 Dec., 1713, and died there 29 Jan., 1751. His principal works are Systema Causarum efficientium; Elementa Philosophicæ Rationalis, Methodo Mathematico demonstrata; Theoremata de Parabolis infinitis.

KNUTZEN, MATTHIAS, an atheist of Holstein, who first broached his impious tenets at Konigsberg 1673. His followers were called conscienciaries, because they would allow of no other divinity than what existed in a man's own mind. They denied a future state, and maintained that civil government was useless.

KOCH, CHRISTOPHE GUILLAUME DE, a French publicist, born at Bouxviller (Bas-Rhin) 9 May, 1737. He studied jurisprudence under Schoepflin, whom he succeeded (1771) as chief of the political school founded by that learned professor at Strasburg. In 1789 he was sent to Paris by the Protestants of Alsace to defend their civil and religious rights. Afterwards he was elected a deputy in the Legislative Assembly, and his opposition to the Jacobin party led to his being committed to prison, but he was liberated on the fall of Robespierre. Eventually he was made rector of the university of Strasburg; and died 25 Oct., 1813. His chief works are—A View of the Revolutions of Europe; Genealogical View of the Sovereign Houses of Europe; History of Treaties of Peace; and 'Sanctio Pragmatica Germanorum illustrata.'

KOEHLER, JOHN DAVID, an industrious German writer, born near Leipsic 18 Jan., 1684; died 10 March, 1755. He was for many years professor of history at Göttingen, and wrote 104 works, chiefly on antiquarian subjects.

KOENIG, EMMANUEL, a Swiss physician, born at Basle 1658; died 1731.

KOENIG, GEORGE MATTHIAS, a learned professor at Altdorf, author of a biographical dictionary entitled 'Bibliotheca Vetus et Nova,' was born 1616; and died 29 Dec., 1699.

KOENIG, HEINRICH, a German poet and novelist, was born at Fulda 19 March, 1790, and, thanks to the discernment of his schoolmaster, was saved from apprenticeship to a tailor, and sent to the Jesuits' Lyceum. For many years he contributed to the 'Cologne Gazette,' his best productions being personal reminiscences, tales in which his friends often recognized real personages, and historical or biographical romances, among which were William Shakspere, the Noble Bride, the Waldenses, the Clubbists of Mentz, and King Jerome's Carnival. He died 23 Sept., 1869, at Wiesbaden.

KOENIG, JOHN GERARD, a botanist and physician, born in Courland 1728. He studied under Linnæus, after which he travelled to Iceland, and next to India, where he died 31 July, 1785. His letters to Linnæus have been printed; and his botanical manuscripts were purchased by Sir Joseph Banks.

KOENIG, SAMUEL, a mathematician, born at Budingen, in Germany, 1712. He became professor of philosophy and the law of nature at Franeker, from whence he removed to the Hague, where he was appointed librarian to the prince and princess of Orange. Died 21 Aug., 1757. He was a member of the academy of Berlin; but was expelled for an attack upon the character of Maupertuis, the president. His brother, Daniel Kœnig, was murdered at the age of 22 by the populace of Franeker, who, hearing him speak French, concluded that he was a spy, and fell upon him with such savage fury, that he died of his wounds some time after. He translated Arbuthnot's Tables of Ancient Coins into Latin.

KOETS, ROELOF, a portrait painter, born 16 Jan., 1655, at Zwoll, where he died 25 June, 1725.

KOLBEN, PETER, a traveller, born at Dorflas, in the principality of Bayreuth, 1674; died 31 Dec., 1726. His 'Present State of the Cape of Good Hope' was translated into English by Medley, and printed at London, 2 vols., 1731.

KOLLAR, JOHN, a Hungarian poet, born at Moschowze 29 July, 1793; died 29 Jan., 1852, at Vienna, where he was professor of archæology.

KOLLMAN, AUGUSTUS FREDERIC CHARLES, a musical composer, born near Hanover 1756. He came to London 1782, on being appointed organist and schoolmaster at the Royal German Chapel at St. James's Palace. Died Nov., 1824.

KÖNIG. See KOENIG.

KOORNHERT, THEODORE, a Dutch heretic, was a native of Amsterdam, but settled as an engraver at Haarlem, of which city he eventually became secretary. He pretended that all the various Christian communions wanted reformation; and that it was not necessary to be a member of any visible Church to be a true Christian. His works occupy three folio volumes. Born 1522; died 29 Oct., 1590.

KORTHOLT, CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran divine, born at Burg, in the island of Femeren, 15 Jan., 1633. He was appointed Greek professor at Kostock 1662; and in 1665 was invited to the theological chair at Kiel, of which university he was afterwards vice-chancellor. Died 31 March, 1694. His works in Latin and German are numerous and esteemed by the learned. They include a treatise on the Persecutions of the Primitive Church; and another on the three great Impostors, Edward Herbert, Thomas Hobbes, and Benedict de Spinoza.

KORTHOLT, CHRISTIAN, grandson of the preceding, professor of divinity at Göttingen, where he died 1751, aged 42. He published a short account in Latin of the Society of Antiquaries of London; and some theological works.

KOSCIUSKO, THADDEUS, a Polish general, was born of a respectable family 28 Oct., 1746, and educated at the military school of Warsaw; after which he went to France, and next to America, where he served as aide-de-camp to Washington. On his return home he was made major-general, and distinguished himself greatly in the war of 1792, but without effect. Two years afterwards the Poles again took up arms, and were headed by Kosciusko; but all his exertions were fruitless, and he was made prisoner by the Russians, who treated him with great respect; and the Emperor Paul, gave him an estate. Kosciusko now visited America the second time; and in 1798 returned to Europe, and settled in France, where Bonaparte endeavoured in vain to tempt him into his service. He died at Soleure, in Switzerland, 15 Oct., 1817.

KOTTER, CHRISTOPHER, a Protestant fanatic and pseudo-prophet of Sprottau, in Silesia, was born 1585, and died 1647. His predictions were published by Comenius, in a book entitled 'Lux e Tenebris.'

KOTZEBUE, AUGUSTUS FREDERICK FERDINAND VON, was born at Weimar 30 May, 1761. At the age of 16 he was sent to the college of Jena, and from thence to Duisburg, where he organized a company of juvenile performers. In 1779 he returned to Jena, to study the law, instead of which most of his time was devoted to the playhouse. In 1781 he became secretary to General Bauer, whom he accompanied to St. Petersburg, where he produced a tragedy, called 'Demetrius, Czar of Muscovy.' Here he married a Russian lady, and was appointed president of the civil government at Revel. After this he wrote a number of dramas; some of which obtained great popularity on the Continent and in England. In 1789 he lost his wife, on which he went to Paris, and next to Vienna, where he became superintendent of the imperial theatre; but resigned that place, and returned to Russia. He had scarcely entered that country before he was arrested by the orders of Paul, and sent to Siberia, but did not remain long in exile; and, on his arrival at St. Petersburg, was taken into the emperor's favour. In 1813 he was appointed consul-general at Königsberg; but the climate disagreeing with him, he resigned the situation, and went to Manheim, where he was assassinated 23 March, 1819, by a fanatical student of Jena, named Sand, who then stabbed himself, but recovered from his wound, and was beheaded. The works of Kotzebue are too numerous to be specified.

KRABTREE. See CRABTREE.

KRANTZ, ALBERT, was born at Hamburg about 1450. He became professor at Rostock, and rector of the university there; but was afterwards appointed dean of the cathedral of his native city, where he died 7 Dec., 1517. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History of Saxony; a History of the Saxons; another of the Vandals; a Chronicle of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; and a treatise on the Mass.

KROMAYER, JOHN, a German divine and ecclesiastical historian, born at Cobelen (Misnia) 1576; died at Weimar 1643. His nephew, Jerome Kromayer, born at Zeitz 1610, became professor at Leipsic, and died 1670, leaving numerous theological works in Latin.

KRÜDENER, JULIE DE WIETINGHOFF, Baroness VON, an enthusiast, born at Riga, 21 Nov., 1764, being the daughter of count de Wietinghoff, governor of that place. At an early age she became the wife of baron von Krüdener, who was appointed ambassador from the empress of Russia at the court of Berlin, and afterwards at Venice, where the secretary of legation fell in love with her and committed suicide; on which subject she wrote a romance, called by her Christian name, 'Valerie.' At the commencement of the revolution she resided in the south of France, but afterwards returned to Germany; and in 1806 she appeared in the character of a prophetess, avowing that she had a mission to establish the reign of Christ upon earth. When Napoleon fell she followed the Emperor Alexander to Paris, and declared that he was the appointed regenerator of the world. Her predictions made a great noise; and when the allied sovereigns left Paris she went to Switzerland, where she preached the advent of the millennium, and thousands came from the mountains to attend on her mission. At length the states interfered, the multitude was dispersed, and Madame Krüdener, after making a convert of Benjamin Constant, went to the Crimea, where she died at Karasubassar 25 Dec., 1824.

KRUMMACHER, FREDERICK ADOLPHUS, a German poet and divine, born at Westphalia 13 July, 1768 · died at Bremen 14 April, 1845. He is principally known by his 'Parables in Verse.' His son,

Dr. Frederick William Krummacher, died at Potsdam 10 Dec., 1868. He was the most distinguished clerical member of the religious party called 'Pietists,' and became court preacher in the reign of the late king of Prussia, being warmly supported by his Majesty in his schemes for extending Protestant principles. He wrote a great number of religious books, many of which have been translated into English, such as 'Elijah the Tishbite;' 'Elisha;' and 'Blind Bartimeus.'

KRUMMACHER, GODFREY DANIEL, a German divine, brother of Frederick Adolphus Krummacher, was born 1 April, 1774, and died at Elberfeld 30 January, 1837. He was a prominent man among the 'Pietist' sect, and published several volumes of sermons.

KUGLER, FRANCIS THEODORE, a German writer on art, born at Stettin 19 Jan., 1808; died 18 March, 1858.

KUHLMANN, QUIRINUS, a famous visionary and prophet, born at Breslau 1651; was burnt at Moscow 3 Oct., 1689.

KUHN, JOACHIM, a German critic, born at Gripswalde (Pomerania) 1647; died 11 Dec., 1697. He held for many years the professorship of Greek and Hebrew at Strasburg; and published editions of Pausanias, Diogenes Laertius, and other classical authors.

KUNCKEL, JOHN, a chemist, born in the duchy of Schleswig 1630; died at Stockholm March, 1703. He discovered the phosphorus which is called after him; and made many other improvements in chemistry.

KUSTER, LUDOLPH, a learned critic, born Feb., 1670, at Blomberg, in Westphalia. He came to England 1699, and during his residence at Cambridge finished his edition of Suidas, which was published in 1705, at the press of that university, where he received the degree of doctor of laws. He then returned to Prussia, to take upon him a professorship in the college of Joachim; but he afterwards resigned it, and went to Amsterdam, where he published his 'Aristophanes,' 1710. The same year came out his edition of Mill's Greek Testament, with emendations. From Holland he removed to Antwerp, and there abjured the Protestant religion; after which he obtained a pension from the king of France. Died 12 Oct., 1716. His other works are—Historia Critica Homeri; Bibliotheca Librorum collecta à L. Neocoro; Jamblichi de Vita Pythagoræ, Græce et Latine, cum nova versione, &c.; Diatriba Anti-Gronoviana; De Musæo Alexandrino Diatriba; Picturæ Antiquæ Sepulcri Nasoniorum; De vero usu Verborum Medicorum apud Græcos, &c.

KYLE, JAMES, D.D., a Scotch Catholic prelate, born at Edinburgh 22 Sept., 1788. At the age of eleven, or thereabouts, he was sent to the college at Aquhorties, on the banks of the Don, and in 1812 was ordained priest. Except for a period of two or three years that he spent as a priest in Glasgow, Dr. Kyle, until he was raised to the mitre, continued to reside at Aquhorties as one of the professors there. He was nominated the first vicar apostolic of the newly-created northern district of Scotland Feb., 1827; and on 28 Sept., in the following year, was consecrated bishop of Germanica, in Syria (in partibus infidelium). Died 23 Feb., 1869.

KYRLE, JOHN, a benevolent Englishman, was a native of Ross, Herefordshire. Though he had only an estate of £500 a year, he expended large sums on charitable objects in the course of his life, and built a church, though in the latter undertaking he was aided by subscriptions from other persons. He is highly eulogised by Pope, who emphatically calls him the 'Man of Ross.' Died 7 Nov., 1724, aged 90.

LAAR, PETER VAN, an eminent Dutch painter, though properly of the Italian school, was born at Laeren, near Narden, 1613. While in Italy he obtained the nickname of Bamboccio, on account of his personal deformity, though some think it arose from the branch of painting in which he excelled, consisting chiefly of the sports of the populace, and scenes of vulgar life, commonly termed by the Italians 'Bambocciate.' He left Italy 1639, and resided some years at Amsterdam and Haerlem, where his pictures were held in great esteem. He drowned himself in a fit of melancholy 1673 or 1675. His elder brother, Rowland van Laar, who died at Genoa 1640, aged 29, painted in the same manner, and with little inferiority.

LABADIE, JEAN, a French enthusiast, born at Bourg, in Guienne, 13 Feb., 1610; died at Altona 13 Feb., 1674. He was originally a Jesuit, but quitted the order and set up a religion of his own, making many converts in Holland, particularly among the women. His numerous works have justly been allowed to fall into oblivion.

LABAT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a Dominican friar, born at Paris 1663; died there 6 Jan., 1738. He was for a long time employed as a missionary in South America, and on his return published accounts of his travels, besides editing the works of several other travellers.

LABBE, PHILIPPE, a celebrated Jesuit, born at Bourges 10 July, 1607. He taught ethics, philosophy, and moral theology with reputation in his native city, and then at Paris, where he died 25 March, 1667. He published numerous bulky historical compilations, the best known of which is his new 'Collection of the Councils,' 17 vols. folio, 1672.

LABÉ, LOUISE, a poetess, called 'the beautiful rope-maker,' because she married a rich ropemaker, who left her his property. She was born at Lyons 1526, and died March, 1566. The best edition of her poems is that published at Lyons 1824.

LABERIUS, DECIMUS, a Roman knight and poet, died B.C. 46.

LABLACHE, LOUIS, a famous vocalist, the greatest basso who has ever adorned the Italian opera, was born 6 Dec., 1794, at Naples, where he died 23 Jan., 1858. He made his first appearance on the London stage 1834, and from that time was a great favourite with the English public.

LABORDE. See BORDE.

LABORDE, ALEXANDRE LOUIS JOSEPH, Comte DE, a French politician and writer, born at Paris 15 Sept., 1774; died 24 Oct., 1842. He was a liberal deputy under the Restoration; aide-de-camp to the king after 1830; and a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. He published—'Voyage pittoresque et historique en Espagne;' 'Voyage pittoresque en Autriche,' &c.

LABORDE, Léon Emmanuel Simon Joseph, Comte de, a French archæologist and traveller, son of the preceding, was born at Paris 12 June, 1807. He was for many years conservator of the museum of antiquities in the Louvre, and in 1856 was appointed director-general of the archives of the empire. Died March, 1869. His works are—'Voyage de l'Arabie Petrée;' 'Voyage en Orient;' 'Histoire de la Gravure en manière noire, et de son application à l'Imprimerie;' 'Recherches sur la découverte de l'Imprimerie;' 'Le Procès de Guttemburg à Strasbourg;' 'Commentaire Géographique sur l'Exode et les Nombres;' 'Lettres sur les Bibliotheques;' 'Catalogue Raisonné des Émaux;' 'Catalogue des Artistes des Pays Bas;' 'Les Ducs de Bourgogne;' and 'La Renaissance des Arts à la Cour de France.'

LA BOURDONNAIS, Bertrand François Mahé de, a French statesman and naval commander, born at St. Malo 1699. Being constituted director-general (1735) of the isles of France and Bourbon, he made the former the most flourishing of all the French colonies. In 1746 he took Madras from the English, and forced them to raise the siege of Pondicherry. But differences which arose between him and Dupleix obliged him to return to Europe, and on his arrival in France he was arrested and thrown into the Bastille. On his liberation three years afterwards he was a ruined man. Died 9 Sept., 1753.

LABOUREUR, Jean le, a French historical writer, born at Montmorency 1623. He followed the court as gentleman-in-waiting, and attended the maréchal de Guébriant on his embassy to Poland (1644), of which journey he published an account. Afterwards taking orders, he became prior of Juigné, king's almoner, and commander of the order of St. Michael. Died June, 1675. He published several important works, including a History of the Maréchal de Guébriant; Memoirs of Michael de Castelnau; a translation of a history of Charles VI.; and a Treatise on Heraldry. His brother, Louis le Laboureur (born about 1615; died 1679), was author of several paltry pieces in French verse.

LABROUSSE, Clotilde Suzanne Courcelles de, a French visionary, born at Vauxain (Périgord) 8 May, 1747; died at Paris 1821. Her 'Prophecies' concerning the French revolution were published 1790.

LA BRUYÈRE, Jean de la. See Bruyère.

LACARRY, Gille, a French Jesuit and historian, born in the diocese of Castres 1605; died at Clermont-Ferrand 25 July, 1684.

LACÉPÈDE, Bernard Germain Étienne de la Ville, Comte de, a French naturalist, born at Agen 26 Dec., 1756. Prior to the Revolution he was a colonel in the Austrian service. Subsequently he was elected a deputy in the legislative assembly (1792); became senator and grand chancellor of the legion of honour 1803; and a peer of France under the Restoration. He was the disciple and friend of Buffon, who selected him to continue his 'Natural History.' His chief works are an 'Essay on Electricity;' 'A Poetical History of Music;' and 'Natural History of oviparous Quadrupeds'—of Reptiles—of Fishes—and of Cetacea. Died 6 Oct., 1825.

LA CHAPELLE, Jean de, a French writer, born at Bourges 1655. He was secretary to the prince of Conti, and a member of the French Academy. He wrote several plays, the Life of the Prince of Conti, and other works. Died 29 May, 1723.

LACHMANN, Charles, a celebrated German philologist, born at Brunswick 4 March, 1793; died 13 March, 1851, at Berlin, where he was professor and a member of the academy.

LACKINGTON, James, born at Wellington, Somersetshire, 31 Aug., 1746, established himself in business as a bookseller in Finsbury Square, London; and died 22 Nov., 1815. He published Memoirs of the first forty-five years of his Life, 1791; and 'Confessions,' 1802, to which he added two letters on the bad consequences of having daughters educated at boarding-schools.

LACLOS, Pierre Ambroise François Choderlos de, a French general and littérateur, born at Amiens 1741; died 5 Nov., 1803. His principal work is a licentious novel, entitled, 'Les Liaisons Dangereuses.'

LACOMBE, François, called Lacombe d'Avignon, was born 1733, and at the time of his decease, in 1795, was commissary of police at Montpellier. He published the Select Letters of Christina of Sweden; an apocryphal collection of the Secret Letters of the same sovereign; a Dictionary of Old French; 'Observations on London and its Environs;' and several translations from the English.

LACOMBE, Jacques, a French compiler of works on history and chronology, born at Paris 1724; died 16 July, 1811. His brother, Honoré Lacombe de Prezel, born 1715, published 'Dictionnaire du Citoyen;' 'Dictionnaire de Jurisprudence;' and other compilations of a similar kind.

LACORDAIRE, Jean Baptiste Henri, a famous French preacher, born 12 March, 1802, at Recey-sur-Ource (Côte-d'Or), being the son of a physician. He was brought up to the legal profession, and actually practised for a short time at the Paris bar, but at the age of twenty-two, having determined to embrace the ecclesiastical state, he entered the seminary of St. Sulpice, and was ordained priest 1827. Soon afterwards he associated himself with the Abbé Lamennais, and co-operated with him in the editorship of the 'Avenir,' a religious and political journal, which was condemned by the Holy See. In 1835 he commenced in the cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris, a series of 'Conferences,' in quite a new style, which attracted immense congregations, and led to some extraordinary conversions. He next conceived the idea of restoring in France the order of Dominican Friars, or Friars Preachers, and with that object in view went in 1839 to Rome, where he assumed, in the convent of the Minerva, the religious habit and the name of St. Dominic. In 1841 he again made his appearance in the pulpit of Notre Dame, where he resumed his 'Conferences' with even greater success than before, and he also preached to admiring audiences in several of the great towns of France. In 1848 he was elected a representative in the National Assembly, but soon quitted that scene of tumult. He was appointed provincial of his order in France in 1850, but declined to be re-elected on the expiration of his period of office in 1854, when he took the direction of the college of Sorèze. He was admitted into the French Academy 1860; and died at Sorèze 22 Nov., 1861. Father Lacordaire was undoubtedly one of the most brilliant orators of his time. His discourses, suited to the tastes of his hearers and the exigencies of the age, produced an astonishing effect, but they were more remarkable for imagination, fervour, and oratorical action than for close reasoning and the connection of ideas. In religion his desire was to reconcile Catholicism with what is termed modern progress and civilisation. Besides his 'Conferences,' which have been presented to the public in an English dress, he composed some remarkable funeral orations, and a Life of St. Dominic. His 'Complete Works' were published at Paris in 6 vols. 8vo.

LACRETELLE, Pierre Louis, a French jurist and author, born at Metz 1751; died at Paris 5 Sept., 1824.

LACROIX, Louis Antoine Nicolle de, a French abbé, author of a popular book on Modern Geography, was born 1704 at Paris, where he died 14 Sept., 1760.

LA CROZE, Mathurie Veyssière, a French Benedictine monk, born 1661. He renounced his order and his faith, and became a Protestant 1696. The king of Prussia made him his librarian, and professor of philosophy at Berlin, where he died 21 May, 1739. He compiled an Armenian Dictionary, and several other learned works.

LACRUZ Y CANO, Ramon de, a Spanish dramatist, born at Madrid 12 May, 1728; died 4 Nov., 1795.

LACTANTIUS, Lucius Cœlius Firmianus, an ecclesiastical author at the beginning of the fourth century, was probably a native of Africa. He studied rhetoric under Arnobius, and professed that science in Africa and at Nicomedia with such reputation that the Emperor Constantine appointed him preceptor to his son Crispus. He left several works written in very good Latin. The principal is entitled 'Divine Institutions,' in which he undertakes to prove the truth of Christianity. His complete works were published at Paris by Langlet, 2 vols., 1748.

LACY, John, a dramatic writer, was born near Doncaster, and bred a dancing-master; which employment he quitted for the army, and lastly he took to the stage; in which line he acquired such celebrity as a comic performer, that Charles II. had his portrait painted in three different characters. He wrote these comedies—'The Dumb Lady;' 'Sir Hercules Buffoon;' 'Old Troop;' 'Sawney the Scot.' Died 17 Sept., 1681. He was of the same family as William Lacy the Jesuit.

LACY, William, a native of Scarborough, received his education at Oxford, but afterwards studied at the English college in Rome, and in 1611 was admitted a professed member of the Society of Jesus at Nancy. After being for a time one of the professors at St. Omer, he was sent upon the English mission, and settling at Oxford, died there 17 July, 1673, aged 89. He was author of 'The Judgment of an University man concerning Mr. William Chillingworth, his late Pamphlet in answer to Charity Maintained,' 4to., 1639.

LADVOCAT, Jean Baptiste, a French abbe, born at Vaucouleurs (Meuse), 3 Jan., 1709. He took his doctor's degree in divinity 1738, after which he was made royal professor of theology, but resigned that office on being appointed librarian to the Sorbonne. He was also professor of Hebrew, and it was by his advice that the duke of Orleans revived the seminary of the Holy Family for students of divinity. He died at Paris 29 Dec., 1765. The work by which he is most widely known is his biographical dictionary, entitled 'Dictionnaire historique portatif des grands hommes,' 2 vols. 8vo., Paris, 1752; 3 vols. 8vo., 1777; and again (with additions) 5 vols. 8vo., 1821-24. This useful work, which is to a great extent an abridgment of Moreri, has been translated into Italian, German, and English. (See Collignon.) Ladvocat's other publications are a Hebrew Grammar; Tractatus de Consiliis; Lettres sur l'Autorité des Textes originaux de l'Écriture Sainte; Jugemens sur quelques nouvelles Traductions de l'Écriture Sainte, d'après le Texte Hebreu. He was the correspondent of Dr. Kennicott, whose great work he zealously promoted, and collated many MSS. for him in the Royal Library. He also assisted in the 'Dictionnaire Géographique' of the abbé de Vosgiens.

LADVOCAT, Louis François, a philosophical writer, and dean of the chamber of accounts at Paris, where he died 8 Feb., 1735, aged 91. He wrote 'Entretien sur un nouveau système de morale et de physique;' and 'Nouveau système de philosophie.'

LAENNEC, René Théodore Hyacinthe, a French physician, the discoverer of mediate auscultation, and the inventor of the stethoscope, was born 17 Feb., 1781, at Quimper (Brittany), where he died 13 August, 1826.

LAET, John de, an historical and geographical writer, was a native of Antwerp, and died there 1649.

LAFAYETTE, Marie Jean Paul Roch Yves Gilbert Motier, Marquis de, a French general and statesman, born at the castle of Chavagnac, in Auvergne, 6 Sept., 1757. At sixteen years of age he married Madame de Noailles, and four years later embarked on board a frigate fitted out at his own expense to assist the Americans in their revolt against Great Britain. After taking part in the engagements at Brandywine and Monmouth, he returned to France (1779) for reinforcements. The next year he was placed in command of Washington's army, and in 1781 entrusted with the defence of Virginia against Lord Cornwallis. In conjunction with Washington and Rochambeau he contributed to the operations which resulted in the capitulation of the English general at York Town. He then returned to France, intending to take back fresh reinforcements to America, but the peace of 1783 rendered it unnecessary for him to do so. In 1787 he was elected a member of the Assembly of Notables, and in 1789 returned as a deputy to the National Assembly, where he warmly advocated revolutionary principles, being the first to propose that a declaration should be made of the 'rights of man.' On 15 July, 1789, he was appointed commander of the National Guard, and in that capacity protected the royal family on the 5th and 6th of October in that year, and on 17 July, 1791, he forcibly dispersed the people assembled in the Champ de Mars. In 1792 he commanded with success one of the armies destined to repel foreign invasion; but he soon lost his popularity, and was outlawed by the Jacobin party. He now endeavoured to seek refuge in a neutral country; but in his flight was arrested by the Austrians, and confined in the fortress of Olmütz, where he remained a prisoner till 1797, when he was set at liberty by virtue of a special clause in the treaty of Campo-Formio. Under the Consulate and the Empire he took no part in public affairs, and under the Restoration he zealously opposed the elder branch of the Bourbons. In 1825 he paid a visit to the United States, where he met with an enthusiastic reception. After the revolution of 1830, he was again constituted chief of the National Guard, and during his continuance in that office he contributed very largely to the maintenance of order and the establishment of the new dynasty. When Casimir Périer came into power (1831) Lafayette again joined the ranks of the opposition, and continued to vote with them till his death, which occurred at Paris 19 May, 1834. His 'Memoirs' were published in 8 vols. 8vo., 1837-40.

LAFFITE, JACQUES, a French politician and financier, born at Bayonne 1767. He was appointed governor of the bank of France 1816, but three years afterwards was deprived of that situation. He played a leading part in the revolution of 1830, from which date he was president of the chamber of deputies, minister of finances, and president of the council. Died 27 May, 1844. He wrote a number of works on financial subjects.

LAFITAU, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS, a French Jesuit, was a native of Bordeaux, where he died 1755, after having been engaged for several years as a missionary among the Iroquois Indians. His book on the 'Customs of the American Savages, compared with those of the early ages,' displays great ingenuity and knowledge of antiquity. He also published a History of the Discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World.

LAFITAU, PIERRE FRANÇOIS, brother of the above, was born at Bordeaux 1685, and entered the Society of Jesus, which he quitted on being consecrated (1719) bishop of Sisteron, where he died 3 April, 1764. He wrote some treatises on the bull 'Unigenitus;' History of Clement XI., &c.

LAFONT, JOSEPH DE, a French dramatist, born at Paris 1686; died at Passy 1725.

LAFONTAINE, JEAN DE, a French poet, born at Chateau Thierry 8 July, 1621. He was educated in the congregation of the Oratory, which society he quitted to become an assistant in the office of his father, who was superintendent of the watercourses and forests. But having no turn for business, he applied himself to the study of the poets. At the desire of his parents he married, but on going to Paris, where he procured a pension, he forgot his wife, and never went into the country, except when he stood in need of money. Madame de la Sabliere, a lady of fortune, took him into her house, where he resided till her death. He was extremely simple in his manners, and so unmindful of everything as to appear almost idiotic. He died 13 April, 1695. His tales and fables are very popular, but the former are too licentious. The best edition of his complete works is that of Paris, 6 vols. 8vo., 1826.

LAFONTAINE, HENRY JULIUS AUGUSTUS, a German novelist, born at Brunswick 6 Feb., 1756, or 1750; died 20 April, 1831.

LA FORCE, JACQUES NOMPAR DE CAUMONT, DUC DE, marshal of France, was born 1558. He was a child, in bed with his father and elder brother, when they were murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but being unperceived by the assassins, he escaped. He signalised himself greatly under Henry IV., and afterwards joined the Protestants against Louis XIII. However, he soon made his submission to the king, and was appointed marshal of France, lieutenant-general of the army, and created a duke. He took Pignerol, and defeated the Spaniards at Carignano 1630. Died 10 May, 1652.

LA FOSSE, ANTOINE DE, nephew of Charles, was born at Paris 1658. He became lord of Aubigny, and was successively secretary to the marquis de Crequi and the duc d'Aumont. When the former nobleman was killed at the battle of Luzara, La Fosse was employed to carry his heart to Paris, on which affecting occasion he wrote some verses. His tragedies of 'Polixene,' 'Manlius,' and 'Theseus,' maintained their position on the French stage till the Revolution; and all his dramas abound with passages which would not disgrace the finest tragic writers of France. Died 2 Nov., 1708.

LA FOSSE, CHARLES DE, a painter, born at Paris 1640; died 1716. He resided for a time in London, where he decorated Montagu House.

LAGALLA, JULIUS CÆSAR, a learned physician and writer, born at Padulla (Naples) 1576.; died at Rome 15 March, 1624.

LAGARAYE, CLAUDE TOUSSAINT MAROT DE, a French philanthropist and writer, born at Rennes 1675; died 2 July, 1755.

LAGERLOEF, PETER, a learned Swede, who was professor of eloquence at Upsal, and wrote the Ancient and Modern History of the Northern Parts of Europe. Born 1648; died 7 Jan., 1699.

LAGNY, THOMAS FANTET DE, a French mathematician, one of the keepers of the royal library at Paris, was born at Lyons 1660, and died 12 April, 1734.

LAGOMARSINI, JEROME, a Jesuit and classical scholar, born at Genoa 1698; died at Rome 18 May, 1773.

LAGRANGE, JOSEPH DE CHANCEL DE, a poet, was born in 1676 in Perigord. He wrote a comedy at nine years old, and a tragedy at sixteen; but the work which made him known was a satire, entitled 'Philippics,' against Philip duke of Orleans. For this he was seized, and ordered to be imprisoned in the Isle of St. Margaret, from whence he made his escape, and got to Sardinia, and afterwards to Holland. He died 26 Dec., 1758. His works make 5 vols. 12mo.

LAGRANGE, JOSEPH LOUIS, a mathematician, was born at Turin 25 Jan., 1736. At the age of sixteen he became a teacher in the royal school of artillery, where he formed an association, which afterwards rose to the rank of an academy of sciences. Here he made many important discoveries, particularly in calculating the motion of fluids, and the theory of vibrations. He communicated to the society a number of papers, and some to the academy of Paris, of which he was chosen a foreign member. In 1766 he removed to Berlin, where he was appointed director of the academy, the transactions of which body contain a number of his memoirs. In 1787 he settled at Paris, and became successively professor of the Normal School and Polytechnic School. Died 10 April, 1813. His separate works are 'Mecanique Analytique;' 'Fonctions Analytiques;' Leçons sur le calcule; Traité de resolution numerique des Equations.

LAGRIVE, JEAN, a French ecclesiastic and topographer, born 1689; died 18 April, 1757.

LAGUERRE, Louis, a French painter, born 1663. In 1683 he came to England, and was much employed in painting ceilings, halls, and staircases in the houses of the nobility and gentry. He died in Drury Lane Theatre 1721.

LAGUNA, Andrew, a Spanish physician and writer, born at Segovia 1499; died 1560.

LA HARPE, John François de, a French writer, born at Paris 20 Nov., 1739. His father was an officer in the army, but died in poor circumstances; in consequence of which the son was taken into the college of Harcourt by the president, M. Asselin. Unfortunately, however, he lost the favour of his patron by a satire, of which he was suspected to be the author. After a confinement of some time he was set at liberty, but the disgrace made a strong impression on his mind. In 1763 he wrote his tragedy of 'Warwick,' which met with great success. This was followed by 'Timoleon,' and 'Pharamond,' which had less popularity. But his 'Eloges,' particularly that on Henry IV., were much admired. In 1766 he produced the tragedy of 'Gustavus Vasa;' but neither this nor his subsequent pieces equalled his Warwick, except his 'Philoctetes,' a translation from Sophocles. He was much in favour with Voltaire, and wrote his éloge. In 1779 he undertook an abridgment of Prevost's History of Voyages; and the same year he published his poem entitled 'Tangu et Felime.' But his greatest work is the 'Lyceum, or Course of Literature,' 12 vols. M. de la Harpe took an active part in the Revolution, and, in 1793, was thrown into prison, where he was brought to a belief of Christianity by the bishop of St. Brieux, who happened to be his fellow-prisoner. On recovering his liberty, he devoted his pen to loyalty and religion. Died 11 Feb., 1803. Besides the above works, he published Melanges Litteraires; a translation of Suetonius; a translation of the Lusiad of Camöens; Correspondence addressé à Paul I. empereur de Russe, 4 vols.; Commentaire des tragedies de Racine, 7 vols.; Refutation de l'Esprit de Helvetius; and a translation of the Psalms.

LA HIRE, Philippe de, was the son of Laurent de La Hire, a celebrated painter, who died in 1656. Philippe was born at Paris 1640, and became so distinguished by his knowledge of mathematics, that Colbert employed him and Picard in making the observations for constructing a new map of France. He was also engaged by the Academy of Sciences, of which society he was a member, in taking the levels for the aqueducts proposed to be made by Louis XIV. Died 21 April, 1718. His works are Nouvelle methode en Geometrie, pour les sections des superficies coniques et cylindriques; De la Cycloide; Nouveaux Elemens des sections Coniques; La Gnomonique: Sectiones Conicæ; Tabulæ Astronomicæ; Veterum mathematicorum opera Græcè et Latinè. His son, Philippe, was bred a physician, but applied himself chiefly to landscape painting. He died at the age of 42, in 1719.

LAINEZ, Alexandre, a French poet, born at Chimai about 1650; died at Paris 18 April, 1710.

LAINEZ, James. See Laynez.

LAING, Major Alexander Gordon, an African traveller, born at Edinburgh 27 Dec., 1793, was assassinated near Timbuctoo, while on an expedition to explore the course of the Niger, Sept., 1826. He published an account of his 'Travels in the Timmanee, Kooranko, and Soolima Countries, in Western Africa,' 1825.

LAING, Malcolm, an historian, born 1762, at Stryndzia, in Orkney, and educated at Kirkwall; whence he removed to Edinburgh; after which he studied the law, and was called to the bar, but had little practice. On the death of Dr. Henry he was employed to complete an unfinished volume of that writer's History of England; in which he gave little satisfaction to the public. After this he published 'A History of Scotland,' 4 vols., remarkable only for its partiality and attack upon the character of the unfortunate Mary. During the Foxite administration, to which he was attached, he was elected into parliament for the county of Orkney. His last literary undertaking was an edition of Ossian's, or Macpherson's poems, the authority of which he endeavoured to demolish by a preliminary dissertation. Died 1818.

LAIRE, François Xavier, a French Minim friar and bibliographer, was born in Franche-Comté 10 Nov., 1738, and died 27 March, 1801. He was librarian first to cardinal de Brienne and afterwards to the town of Auxerre. His works include a catalogue of the books printed by the Alduses; and an Index of Books from the invention of printing to the year 1500.

LAIRESSE, Gerard de, an historical and portrait painter, born at Liege 1640; died at Amsterdam 28 July, 1711. An English translation by W. M. Craig of his 'Treatise on the Art of Painting in all its Branches' was published at London in 2 vols. 4to., 1817.

LAITHWAITE, or SCOTT, Thomas, a distinguished English Jesuit, was a native of Lancashire, and died 10 June, 1655, aged 76.

LAKE, Arthur, an English prelate, was born at Southampton about 1550, and educated at Winchester School; whence he was sent to New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. On taking orders he became fellow of Winchester College; in 1603 he was made master of the hospital of St. Cross; in 1605 archdeacon of Surrey; in 1608 dean of Worcester; and in 1616 bishop of Bath and Wells. He died 4 May, 1626; and after his death were published several volumes of his sermons and meditations.

LALANDE, Jacques de, an eminent lawyer of Orleans, born 2 Dec., 1622; died 5 Feb., 1703.

LALANDE, Joseph Jerome Lefrançais de, a celebrated French astronomer, born at Bourg-en-Bresse 11 July, 1732. He was intended for the law, but relinquished that pursuit to study mathematics; and so great was his progress that, at the age of eighteen, he was deputed by the Academy of Sciences to go to Berlin, to make observations for determining the parallax of the moon, and its distance from the earth. In 1759 he published an edition of Halley's Tables; and the year following he began the 'Connoissance des Temps.' In 1764 appeared his 'Traité Astronomique;' and his reputation being now established, he was employed on the Encyclopédie. He was also appointed professor of astronomy in the college of France; and it is only to be lamented that with so much science he should have taken a decided part in the sanguinary revolution, and more so that he should have avowed atheistical sentiments. He died 4 April, 1807. Besides the works already mentioned, he published 'Voyage d'Italie;' Traité des Canaux; Bibliographie Astronomique; Abrégé de Navigation; and an edition of Montucla's History of Mathematics.

LALANDE, Michel Richard de, a musician and composer, born at Paris 15 Dec., 1657; died 18 Jan., 1726.

LALLI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian poet and jurist, born 1572, at Norcia, in Umbria, where he died 3 Feb., 1637.

LALLY, THOMAS ARTHUR, Count DE, baron of Tullendally, or Tolendal, in Ireland, was descended from an Irish family, and born at Romans, in Dauphiné, 1702. He entered the military service of France, and distinguished himself so gallantly at the battle of Fontenoy, as to be appointed brigadier-general. In 1756 he was made governor of Pondicherry, where he suffered some severe defeats, and was compelled to surrender that capital of the French settlements in India; for which public clamour ran so high against him, that he was beheaded by an iniquitous sentence 9 May, 1766. His son, M. Lally de Tollendal, obtained, in 1783, the restoration of the estates of his father, and a reversal of all the proceedings.

LAMANON, ROBERT DE PAUL, Chevalier DE, a French naturalist, born at Salon, in Provence, 1752, was murdered in one of the islands of the Southern Archipelago 10 Dec., 1787. Many of his papers are in the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences; besides which he wrote 'A Theory of the Earth.'

LAMARCK, JEAN BAPTISTE PIERRE ANTOINE DE MONET, Chevalier DE, a celebrated French botanist and zoologist, born at Bazantin (Somme) 1 April, 1744; died 8 Dec., 1826.

LAMB, CHARLES, an essayist and poet, born in London 10 Feb., 1775. In his eighteenth year he was sent to Christ's Hospital, where he acquired a taste for general literature, and a fitness for the pursuits of commercial life. He continued there till 1789, about which time he obtained a situation as clerk in the India House, where he continued till 1825, and then retired on a handsome annuity on the superannuated list. He died at Edmonton, Middlesex, 27 Dec., 1834. His first literary venture was a small volume of poems (1797), written conjointly with Coleridge and Lloyd. This was followed by 'John Woodvil, a tragedy,' 1802; but Lamb's fame rests mainly on his prose works, especially his charming 'Essays of Elia.' There have been several editions of his works, which, however, do not include his 'Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakespeare.' In collaboration with his sister he wrote 'Tales from Shakespeare,' and some other works.

LAMB, EDWARD BUCKTON, an English architect, who died in London 30 Aug., 1869, aged 63.

LAMB, Sir JAMES BLAND, was born at Gibraltar 1752, being the son of George Burges, comptroller-general of the customs in Scotland. He was educated at Edinburgh and at Westminster School, whence he removed to University College, Oxford. In 1777 he was called to the bar, and in 1787 was returned to Parliament for Helston, in Cornwall, being in 1789 appointed an under-secretary of state. Soon after the commencement of the French revolution he established 'The Sun,' an evening newspaper, to which he contributed, under the signature of 'Alfred,' several letters, which in 1792 were collected into a volume. In 1795 he was created a baronet, and appointed for life knight-marshal of the king's household. He assumed the name of Lamb by royal sign-manual 1821; and died 1824. His works are 'Heroic Epistles from Serjeant Bradshaw in the Shades to John Dunning, Esq.;' 'Considerations on the Law of Insolvency;' 'Address to the Country Gentlemen of England and Wales on County Courts;' 'The Birth and Triumph of Love,' a poem; 'Richard the First,' an heroic poem; 'The Exodiad,' written in collaboration with Cumberland; 'Riches, or the Wife and Brother,' a comedy, altered from Massinger; and 'Reasons for a new Translation of the Bible.'

LAMBARDE, WILLIAM, a lawyer and antiquary, born in London 18 Oct., 1536. He was a member of Lincoln's Inn, and became possessed of the manor of Greenwich, where he founded a hospital for the poor. He was appointed a justice of the peace for the county of Kent, and in 1592 a master in Chancery. In 1597 he was made keeper of the rolls, and, in 1600, keeper of the records in the Tower. Died 19 Aug., 1601. He wrote Archaionomia, sive de priscis Anglorum legibus, 4to.; 'A Perambulation of Kent,' the earliest of our county histories, first published 1576; Eirenarcha, or the Office of the Justices of Peace; The Duties of Constables; Archeion, or a Discourse upon the High Courts of Justice in England. This was posthumous; as also was the 'Dictionarium Angliæ Topographicum et Historicum.'

LAMBECIUS, PETER, was born at Hamburg 1628. In 1652 he was appointed professor of history in his native city, and in 1660 rector of the college there. The ill-temper of his wife, who was old, and whom he had only married for her money, induced him to run away from Hamburg; and going to Rome he openly embraced the Catholic religion. He was afterwards librarian, counsellor, and historiographer to the emperor; and died at Vienna 1680. His principal works are 'Lucubrationes Gelianarum Podromus;' 'Origines Hamburgenses;' 'Animadversiones ad Codini Origines Constantinopolitanas;' a Catalogue of the MSS. in the Emperor's Library; and 'Podromus Historiæ Litterariæ.'

LAMBERT (ST.), bishop of Maestricht, was born in that city about 640; and was murdered at Liege on 17 Sept., about the year 708.

LAMBERT OF ASCHAFFENBURG, in Franconia, a Benedictine monk, who in 1058 made a journey to Jerusalem, and on his return to Europe composed a chronicle from Adam in 1077; the greater part of it, however, is a history of Germany. It was printed at Basle 1660.

LAMBERT, ANNE THÉRÈSE DE MARGUENAT DE COURCELLES, marchioness DE, a French authoress, born 1647, at Paris, where she died 12 July, 1733. She is principally known by her 'Advice of a Mother to her Son and Daughter.'

LAMBERT, AYLMER BOURKE, F.R.S., F.S.A., an English botanist, born 2 Feb., 1761; died at Kew 10 Jan., 1842.

LAMBERT, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, a French literary compiler, was a native of Dôle; and died 14 April, 1765.

LAMBERT, FRANÇOIS, a Franciscan friar, born at Avignon 1487. He was one of the first Frenchmen who left the cloister to embrace the Lutheran religion. Retiring to Wittemberg, he married. He was much esteemed by Luther, and was one of the principal divines employed by the landgrave of Hesse to introduce Lutheranism into his dominions. Lambert preached in Switzerland and Germany as Luther's disciple; was appointed professor of divinity at Marburg 1527; and died 18 April, 1530. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, and several polemical treatises.

LAMBERT, GEORGE, a landscape painter and engraver, born in Kent 1710; died in London 1 Feb., 1765.

LAMBERT, JOHN, major-general in the Parliament army, in the reign of Charles I. He distinguished himself at the battles of Naseby and Fife, and assisted Cromwell in his advancement to the Protectorate, but opposed his taking the title of king. For this Cromwell deprived him of his commission, but from prudential motives granted him a pension of 2000*l.* a-year. Being now divested of all employment, he withdrew to Wimbledon House in a situation of mind but ill calculated to enjoy the tranquillity of domestic retirement. On the death of the Protector he joined Fleetwood, Desborough, and others, in restoring the members of the Long Parliament, who had been dismissed, for which he was appointed one of the council of state, and colonel of a regiment of horse. The parliament, however, growing jealous of his influence in the army, directed him to resign his commission; but this he absolutely refused, and marching up to London, dislodged the members by force in October, 1659. He was then appointed major-general of the army, and sent to command the forces in the north; but General Monk having defeated him, and restored the parliament, he was deserted by his army, submitted, and was committed prisoner to the Tower. At the Restoration he was tried and condemned, but received a pardon, and died in exile at Guernsey March, 1694.

LAMBERT, JOHN HENRY, a mathematician and man of universal learning, was born at Mühlhausen, in Alsace, 29 Aug., 1728. He was brought up a tailor, but attained such a knowledge of the sciences as qualified him to become tutor to the sons of Baron Salis, president of the Swiss confederacy. He went with his pupils to Göttingen, next to Utrecht, and afterwards to Paris; in all which places he made friends. In 1759 he published his treatise on Perspective, and the next year his 'Photometry;' which procured him admission into the Bavarian academy; besides which he was a member of that at Berlin, where he died 25 Sept., 1777. Besides a prodigious number of memoirs and dissertations on all kinds of subjects, Lambert wrote many separate works. The most important of these are 'Photometria, sive de gradibus luminis, colorum, et umbræ;' 'Novum Organon, or New Key to the Sciences;' and 'Pyrometrie.'

LAMBERT, MARK. See BARKWORTH.

LAMBIN, DENIS, a critic, born at Montreuil-sur-Mer about 1516. He became professor of eloquence and Greek literature in the college of France, and published editions of several classical authors. Died Sept., 1572.

LAMBINET, PIERRE, a French ecclesiastic and bibliographer, born at Tourne, near Mézières, 1742; died at Paris 10 Dec., 1813. His principal work is 'Researches concerning the Origin of Printing, and more particularly the earliest printing establishments in Belgium.'

LAMBORN, PETER SPENDELOW, an engraver. He resided at Cambridge, where he died 6 Nov., 1774.

LAMBTON, earl of Durham. See DURHAM.

LAMBTON, Lieutenant-Colonel WILLIAM, an English officer, who was engaged for upwards of twenty years in conducting the grand trigonometrical survey of India. Died 20 Jan., 1823.

LAMENNAIS, FELICITÉ ROBERT DE, a French abbé, born at St. Malo 1782; died 27 Jan., 1854. After being ordained priest (1816) he rendered himself conspicuous by his opposition to Gallican principles, and between 1817 and 1823 he brought out in 4 vols. his 'Essay on Indifference in Matters of Religion,' an eloquent but paradoxical work, which, while it created a profound sensation in France, was received in some quarters with very harsh criticisms, to which Lamennais replied in a 'Defence' of his essay. In his 'Religion considered in the Political and Civil Order,' he violently assailed the celebrated declaration made by the French bishops in 1682; and he continued his attacks in his treatise 'Of the progress of the Revolution and the War against the Church,' which was censured by the archbishop of Paris. In 1830, however, he became a convert to the democratic cause, and started a journal called the 'Avenir,' with the professed object of regenerating the church by rendering Catholicism subservient to the enfranchisement of the people. He also advocated the complete separation of the spiritual from the temporal power of the pope. These exaggerated doctrines were condemned by the Holy Father himself in an encyclical (1832). This proceeding deeply wounded the self-love of Lamennais, who, repudiating all his former beliefs and opinions, published 'The Words of a Believer,' 'Modern Slavery,' and a number of other works, in which he attacked religion and monarchy with the utmost virulence. Died 27 Jan., 1854.

LAMENNAIS, JEAN MARIE ROBERT DE, brother of the above, was born 1778, and entering the priesthood, led a most exemplary and holy life. He founded at Ploërmel the congregation of the Brothers of St. Joseph, and wrote several works, the most important of which were undertaken in conjunction with his brother before his apostacy. Died 1860.

LAMI, BERNARD, a priest of the oratory, born at Mans 1640. He became a teacher of philosophy at Saumur and Angers, till he was deprived for being a Cartesian, and banished to Grenoble; where Cardinal le Camus appointed him professor of divinity. He died at Rouen 29 Jan., 1715. His works are 'Les Elemens de Geometrie, et de Mathematiques;' 'Traité de Perspective,' which has been translated into English; 'Entretiens sur les Sciences;' 'Apparatus Biblicus,' of which we have also a translation; 'De Tabernaculo fœderis, de sancta Civitate Jerusalem, et de Templo ejus;' 'Demonstration, ou preuves evidentes de la Verité et de la Sainteté de la Morale Chretienne;' 'Harmonia sive Concordia Evangelii;' A System of Rhetoric; Reflexions sur l'Art Poetique, &c.

LAMI, FRANCIS, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at Montereau, near Chartres, 1636; and died 4 April, 1711. He wrote a book on Self-knowledge; some esteemed works in defence of Christianity against Spinoza, &c.

LAMI, JOHN BAPTIST, professor of ecclesiastical history at Florence, and librarian of that city, wrote, among other esteemed works, 'De recta Patrum Nicenorum fide Dissertatio' (1730), in which he contended, in opposition to Leclerc and others, that the Nicene Creed concerning the Trinity was identical with the belief of the primitive Christians. He also edited the works of Meursius. Born 1697; died 6 Feb., 1770.

LA MOTHE LE VAYER, FRANÇOIS DE, a sceptical philosopher, born at Paris 1588. He relinquished the law for literary pursuits, and in 1639 was admitted a member of the French academy. In 1647 he was appointed preceptor to the duke of Anjou; and he also obtained the titles of historiographer of France and counsellor of state. He died 1672. His works have been published in 2 vols. fol., and 14 vols. 8vo.

LAMOTTE, ANTOINE HOUDART DE, a French poet, born at Paris 1672. He was bred to the law, which he abandoned for dramatic composition. In 1710 he obtained admission into the academy, at which time he was nearly blind, and before his death he lost his sight entirely. He produced several tragedies and comedies, some of which were very successful, particularly that entitled 'Inez de Castro.' In 1714 he published a translation of the Iliad, and had a controversy respecting Homer with Madame Dacier. In 1719 appeared his 'Fables,' besides which he wrote a number of odes, eclogues, and other pieces. Died 26 Dec., 1731. An edition of his works was printed in 1754, in 11 vols. 8vo.

LAMOTTE, GUILLAUME, a French surgeon and accoucheur, flourished about 1720.

LAMOTTE FOUQUÉ, CAROLINE, baroness DE, a German writer, was a native of Saxony, and died 21 July, 1831. She composed a great many romances, tales, and letters on the education of women.

LAMOTTE FOUQUÉ, FREDERICK HENRY CHARLES, baron DE, a German author, husband of the preceding, was born at Brandenburg 1777, and died 23 Jan., 1843. Of his numerous works the most popular are the tales of 'Peter Schlemihl,' and 'Undine.'

LAMOUROUX, JEAN VINCENT FÉLIX, a French naturalist, born at Agen 3 May, 1779, was professor of natural history at Caen from 1809 till his death, which occurred 26 March, 1825, leaving several esteemed works.

LAMPE, FREDERICK ADOLPHUS, a Protestant divine, born at Dethmold, Westphalia, 19 Feb., 1683. He became rector of the university of Bremen, where he died 3 Dec., 1729. His principal works are: De Cymbalis Veterum; Synopsis of Sacred and Ecclesiastical History; and a Commentary on St. John's Gospel.

LAMPE, JOHN FREDERICK, a musical composer, was a native of Saxony. He came to England about 1726, and set to music many operas and dramatic pieces, including 'Amelia,' 'The Dragon of Wantley,' and 'Pyramus and Thisbe.' He likewise published 'A Plain and Compendious Method of teaching Thorough-base,' 1737, a work of great merit; and 'The Art of Music,' 1740. In 1748 he settled in Dublin, but in 1750 removed to Edinburgh, where he died 25 July, 1751.

LAMPILLAS, FRANCIS XAVIER, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Jaen 1739, became professor of polite literature at Seville, but on the suppression of his order retired to Genoa, where he died 1798. In his 'Saggio Storico' he triumphantly vindicated the literature of Spain against Bettinelli and Tiraboschi, who had spoken of it in unfavourable terms.

LAMPLUGH, THOMAS, an English prelate, born in Yorkshire 1615, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he became fellow in 1642. He complied with the Presbyterians in the time of the civil war, but conformed at the Restoration, and became D.D., principal of St. Alban Hall, and vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, London. In 1672 he was made dean of Rochester, and in 1676 bishop of Exeter. When the prince of Orange landed the bishop made a speech to the clergy and gentry, encouraging them to be loyal to King James, who bestowed upon him the archbishopric of York 1688. Notwithstanding this, he took the oaths to William and Mary. Died 5 May, 1691.

LAMPRIDIUS, BENEDICT, a Latin poet, was a native of Cremona, and died at Mantua 1540.

LANA TERZI, FRANCIS, an Italian Jesuit and mathematician, born 13 Dec., 1631, at Brescia, where he died 26 Feb., 1687. He published a work entitled 'Magisterium Naturæ et Artis,' 1684, which is said by the detractors of Montgolfier to contain the earliest hint of the principles of aerostatic machines, to be conducted by gas.

LANCASTER, Sir JAMES, an English navigator. He sailed to the coast of America 1591, and afterwards doubled the Cape of Good Hope on a voyage to the East Indies, where he touched at Ceylon and Pulo Penang; but a mutinous spirit breaking out among his crew, he returned to England 1594. The same year he went out again from Dartmouth, and after taking several prizes, made himself master of the town of Pernambuco, on the coast of Brazil, where he gained considerable plunder. In 1600 Lancaster commanded an armament fitted out for the East Indies, where he settled a treaty of commerce with the sovereign of Achen, and opened a friendly intercourse with the king of Bantam. He returned to England in 1603. Lancaster, who received the honour of knighthood in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, died about 1620.

LANCASTER, JOSEPH, is known by the method of mutual instruction which bears his name, although he was not the inventor of it. He was born in London 1771, and was for some time a member of the Society of Friends, which he quitted in order to devote himself exclusively to the education of children. Having become acquainted with the method of teaching which had been introduced into this country from India by Dr. Bell, he promoted it with great zeal, and his schools for a time met with signal success, though they were afterwards comparatively deserted, in consequence of the exertions of Dr. Bell, who was backed by the powerful influence of the Anglican clergy. After being several times imprisoned for debt, Lancaster left the country, and died in indigence at New York 24 Oct., 1838. His treatise on 'Improvements in Education' was published at London 1805.

LANCASTER, NATHANIEL, D.D., a native of Cheshire, was educated at Cambridge, and became rector of Stamford Rivers, Essex, where he died 20 June, 1775. He wrote an 'Essay on Delicacy,' 1748; and a poem entitled 'The Old Serpent, or Methodism Triumphant.'

LANCE, GEORGE, a celebrated flower and fruit painter, was born at Little Easton, Essex, 1802, and died at New Brighton, Cheshire, 18 June, 1864.

LANCELOT, CLAUDE, was born at Paris 1616. He taught the belles lettres in the school of Port Royal, and had a share in the education of the Prince of Conti; but being removed from that employment he took the habit of St. Benedict, in the abbey of St. Cyran. Afterwards he was banished to Lower Brittany, where he died 15 April, 1695. He wrote 'Nouvelle Méthode pour apprendre la langue Latine;' 'Nouvelle Méthode pour apprendre le Grec.' These are called the Port Royal grammars, and have been translated into English. His other works are 'The Garden of Greek Roots, or Primitives of the Greek Tongue;' An Italian Grammar; A Spanish Grammar; Dissertations, Remarks, and Sacred Chronology; The General and Rational Grammar; Delectus Epigrammatum; La Vie de M. de St. Cyran; Relation du voyage d'Alet.

LANCISI, JOHN MARIA, a Roman physician and medical writer, born 1654; died 21 Jan., 1720.

LANCRET, NICOLAS, a French painter, born 1690 at Paris, where he died 14 Sept., 1743.

LANCRINCK, PROSPER HENRY, a landscape painter, born at Antwerp about 1628. He spent the greater part of his life in England, and died Aug., 1692.

LANDELLS, EBENEZER, a wood-engraver, was a native of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where he was a pupil of the celebrated Bewick. He came to London about 1830, and became connected with the leading illustrated periodicals of the day. In 1841 he was one of the originators of 'Punch.' The next year he was commissioned by the proprietors of the 'Illustrated London News' to sketch and engrave the scenes and incidents of the Queen's visit to Scotland, and his success on this occasion led to his being subsequently engaged to illustrate for that journal several royal visits to various parts of the United Kingdom and the Continent. He was also the originator of the 'Illuminated Magazine,' and one of the proprietors of the 'Ladies' Newspaper.' He died at Brompton 1 Sept., 1860, aged 51.

LANDEN, JOHN, F.R.S., a mathematician, born at Peakirk, Northamptonshire, Jan., 1719. He became an early contributor to the 'Lady's Diary;' and, in 1754, communicated to the Philosophical Transactions 'An Investigation of Theorems which suggest several peculiar properties of the Circle.' In 1755 he published a volume of 'Mathematical Lucubrations.' After this he was appointed agent to Earl Fitzwilliam. In 1764 appeared his 'Residual Analysis,' but he never completed the work. In 1766 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, whose volumes he enriched with many valuable papers. Died 15 Jan., 1790. Besides the works already noticed, he published Mathematical Memoirs; and three tracts on the 'Summation of Converging Series.'

LANDER, RICHARD, an English traveller, born at Truro, Cornwall, 8 Feb., 1804. He commenced life as a servant, in which capacity he accompanied some of his masters to the West Indies, and to several countries on the continent of Europe. Inspired with a desire to explore the interior of Africa, he volunteered to accompany Capt. Clapperton on his second expedition, and he remained with that gentleman till his death, which occurred at Socatoo in April, 1827. Lander then made his way back to England, where he published 'Records of Captain Clapperton's Last Expedition to Africa,' 2 vols., 1830. He then undertook, under the auspices of the government, another expedition to Africa, in company with his brother John. They arrived at Cape Castle 22 Feb., 1830, reached Boossà, on the west bank of the Niger, June 17, and thence ascended the river a distance of about a hundred miles to Yaooria, the extreme point of the expedition, where they arrived June 27. Returning to Boossà on Aug. 2, they there embarked in canoes on the Niger to descend the stream, in perfect uncertainty as to where it might take them. After undergoing great hardships, and being taken prisoners at Eboe, they eventually found their way back to England, and arrived at Portsmouth 9 June, 1831. An account of their adventures was published under the title of 'Journal of an Expedition to explore the Course and Termination of the Niger, by Richard and John Lander,' 1832. Several merchants of Liverpool having formed themselves into a company, projected an expedition, to be placed under the direction of Richard Lander, for the purpose of ascending the Niger and establishing a trade with the natives of Central Africa. The expedition, consisting of two steamers and a sailing brig, sailed 25 July, 1832, and reached Cape Coast Castle on Oct. 7. After tracing the winding of the Niger for a considerable part of its course, Lander was wounded in the thigh by a musket-shot, in a conflict with the savages on the banks of the Brass river, in consequence of which he died at Fernando Po 7 Feb., 1834. An account of his last expedition was published in 2 vols., 1835, under the title of 'Narrative of an Expedition into the interior of Africa by the River Niger, in the steam-vessels Quorra and Alburkah, in 1832, 1833, and 1834, by MacGregor Laird and R. A. K. Oldfield, surviving officers of the Expedition.'

LANDINO, CHRISTOPHER, one of the leading members of the Platonic academy at Florence, was a native of that city. He was tutor to Lorenzo and Julian de Medici, and wrote commentaries on Virgil, Horace, and Dante; an Italian translation of Pliny's Natural History; Latin poems, &c. Born 1424; died 1504.

LANDO was elected pope 5 Dec., 914, and died 26 April, 915.

LANDON, LETITIA ELIZABETH, a poet and romancist, born in London 1802, being the daughter of an army-agent. At an early age she evinced a talent for poetry, and contributed to the periodicals of the day, and in particular to the 'Annuals,' numerous pieces signed with her initials 'L. E. L.' Her principal poems are the 'Improvisatrice;' 'The Troubadour;' the 'Golden Violet;' the 'Venetian Bracelet;' 'The Zenana;' and the 'Vow of the Peacock.' She also wrote in prose several novels, 'Ethel Churchill;' 'Francesca Carrara;' 'Lady Anne Granard;' 'Romance and Reality;' and 'Duty and Inclination;' which met with a flattering reception. On 7 June, 1838, she was married to Mr. George Maclean, and proceeded shortly afterwards to Cape Coast Castle, South Africa, of which settlement her husband was governor. She had not been long, however, in her new residence when she died 15 Oct., 1838, in consequence of taking an overdose of prussic acid, which she had been in the habit of using as a remedy for spasmodic affections to which she had been subject.

LANDOR, ROBERT EYRES, younger brother of Walter Savage Landor, received his education at Worcester College, Oxford (B.A. 1801; M.A. 1804), and after taking orders, held for some time the appointment of chaplain-in-ordinary to the prince regent. He was subsequently collated to the rectory of Birlingham, Worcestershire, where he died 26 Jan., 1869, aged 87. He wrote 'The Count Arezzi,' a tragedy, 1824; 'The Impious Feast,' a poem, 1828; 'The Earl of Brecon, a tragedy, Faith's Fraud, a tragedy, and The Ferryman, a drama, 1841; and 'The Fountain of Arethusa,' 2 vols., 1848.

LANDOR, WALTER SAVAGE, was born 30 Jan., 1775, at Ipsley Court, in the county of Warwick, where his father, Mr. Walter Landor, possessed a considerable estate. He was sent first to Rugby School, and afterwards to Trinity College, Oxford; but his conduct at both places was insubordinate, and he never took a degree. From his earliest years, indeed, he had exhibited a strange intractableness of temper; and he now refused to enter the army, to study the law, or to take any step which his friends urged upon him. He showed, however, that he possessed great abilities, and in his twentieth year published 'A Collection of Poems,' 1795, which was followed by 'Gebir,' 1798, and 'Poems from the Arabic and Persian,' 1800. His principles, both in religion and politics, being founded on an almost exclusive study of classical models, had scant regard for creeds or kings. They were widely different from those of his family; and his relations with his family became thereby so unpleasant that he quitted England and travelled on the Continent for some years. When the Spaniards rose in arms, in 1808, Mr. Landor, who had by that time inherited the family estate, embraced their cause with ardour, and received a colonel's commission, though he never distinguished himself in the field. In 1814, on the restoration of Ferdinand VII., he quitted the Peninsula, and passed the remainder of his protracted life in literary pursuits. In 1811 he married a lady of German parentage, by whom he had a family, but the union was not a happy one. His ideas of domestic life appear to have been formed rather on the classic model; and at length a separation ensued, whereupon Mr. Landor returned to England after an absence of several years. He was an intimate friend of Southey, though he retained and even exaggerated all the wild notions that the latter had abandoned—a circumstance which was not overlooked by Lord Byron, who reproached the laureate for his intimacy with an avowed republican and but half-concealed pagan. Thenceforth Landor was at daggers drawn with Byron, as indeed he was with many people, his temper being fierce and irritable, and never kept under any sort of control. In 1824-8 was published the first series of his 'Imaginary Conversations of Literary Men and Statesmen,' of which a Second Series appeared in 1829. These supposed dialogues, on which Landor's fame as a writer must rest, admirably illustrate the peculiarities of the different interlocutors and the periods in which they lived, and abound also in paradoxical and original opinions. His principal other works are, 'Simonidea, a poem,' 1806; 'Commentary on Memoirs of Mr. Fox,' 1812 (suppressed); 'Idyllia Heroica decem,' 1820; 'Gebir, Count Julian, and other Poems,' 1835; 'Pericles and Aspasia,' 1836; 'A Satire on Satirists, and Admonition to Detractors,' 1836; 'Pentameron and Pentalogia,' 1837; 'Andrea of Hungary and Giovanna of Naples,' two dramas, 1839; 'Poemata et Inscriptiones,' 1847; 'Hellenics,' 1847, 'Popery, British and Foreign,' 1853; 'Citation and Examination of Shakspeare,' 1853; 'The Last Fruit off an Old Tree,' 1853; 'Letters of an American,' 1854; and 'Dry Sticks Fagoted,' 1857. The last-named work contained some gross and filthy attacks upon a lady residing at Bath, where Landor had been living for some time. The lady sought reparation in a court of law, and obtained a verdict of £1000 against Landor, who, to avoid payment, fled to Florence, and there died 17 Sept., 1864. It only remains to add that Landor was a frequent contributor to the 'Examiner' newspaper; that his works appeared in a collected form in 1846, and again in 1853; and that a biography of him by John Forster was published in 1869.

LANDSEER, JOHN, F.S.A., an engraver and antiquary, born at Lincoln, 1761. He became a pupil of William Byrne, the celebrated landscape engraver. His earliest productions of importance were the vignettes, after the designs of Loutherbourg, for Macklin's Bible and Bowyer's History of England, working in conjunction with the eminent artists Bromley, Heath, and Skelton. In 1806 he appeared as a lecturer on the art of engraving before the Royal Institution, where he maintained that engraving was 'a species of sculpture, performed by incision,' and this doctrine he supported with learning, spirit, and ingenuity. In the same year he was elected an associate engraver of the Royal Academy; and he also held, for some time, the appointment of engraver to King George III. In 1809 he had a correspondence with the Academy on the question of admitting engravers to the rank and title of Royal Academicians; but his proposals were rejected. This failure increased the ill-feeling which the engravers entertained on the subject; but a still more lamentable result was the distaste acquired by Landseer for his profession, and the perversion of a mind eminently qualified for success in art into less congenial channels. He now commenced artistic critic in a short-lived periodical, entitled 'The Review of the Fine Arts,' and another publication called 'The Probe,' in which the artists were treated to more caustic criticism than was agreeable to their sensitive temperament. The titles of the more important of his other publications are, 'Sabæan Researches, in a Series of Essays; including the substance of Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, on the engraved Hieroglyphics of Chaldæa, Egypt, and Canaan,' 1823; 'Descriptive Catalogue of Fifty of the Earliest Pictures in the National Gallery,' 1834; and 'Antiquities of Dacca,' twenty plates, from drawings by Sir C. D'Oyly. Mr. Landseer died 29 Feb., 1852.

LANDUS, BASSIANUS, an Italian physician and medical writer, born at Piacenza, where he was assassinated 1562.

LANE, Sir RICHARD, LL.D, an English judge, was a native of Northamptonshire. He studied in the Middle Temple, was called to the bar, and in 1640 was counsel for the earl of Strafford. In 1643 he was made chief baron of the Exchequer by Charles I., who also conferred on him the honour of knighthood. About the same time he was created LL.D. by the university of Oxford. He was one of the commissioners at the treaty of Uxbridge, and had the great seal delivered to him on the death of Edward Lord Littleton. He died in Jersey 1650 or 1651. His reports in the Exchequer were printed in 1657.

LANFRANC, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Pavia 1005. He became a professor of law at Avranches, and next took the vows in the Abbey of Bec, of which house he was chosen prior 1044. Here he established a seminary, which rose to such eminence as excited the envy of Berengarius, of Tours, who attacked Lanfranc on the subject of the Eucharist. In 1062 he was made abbat of St. Stephen's at Caen, and when the duke of Normandy obtained the English crown, he procured Lanfranc to be elected archbishop of Canterbury, the claims of which see he asserted against the archbishop of York. He died 28 May, 1089. He rebuilt the cathedral of Canterbury, and founded the hospitals of Harbledown and St. John, at Canterbury. His works were published in 1648, folio.

LANFRANC, an eminent surgeon, was a native of Milan, and died in France, about 1300. His 'Chirurgia Magna et Parva' was first printed 1490.

LANFRANCO, Giovanni, a painter, born at Parma 1581. He entered the service of Count Schotte, who, perceiving his genius for drawing, placed him under Agostino Caracci, on whose death he went to Rome, where he was employed by Annibale in the church of St. Jago. His principal excellence lay in fresco-painting on a large scale. In conjunction with Badalocchi he etched the prints from Raphael's pictures of the History of the Bible. Died 1647.

LANG, John Michael, a Protestant divine, born 9 March, 1664, at Ezelwangen, in the duchy of Salzburg. He was some time theological professor at Altorf, and died at Prentzlow 20 June, 1731. He wrote 'Philologia Barbaro-Græca;' 'Dissertationes Botanico-Theologicæ;' and several treatises on the Mahommedan religion.

LANGALLERIE, Philippe de Gentils de la Jonchat, Marquis de, first baron of Saintonge, was born 1656. He distinguished himself in thirty-two campaigns in the French service, and attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1704. On some disgust he went to Vienna, and was made a general of cavalry; but soon quitted the Imperial service for that of Poland, which he also left, and retired to Frankfort; from whence he removed to Berlin, and next to the Hague, where he entered into a negotiation with the Turkish ambassador, of which the emperor being apprised he caused him to be arrested at Stade in 1716, and conducted to Vienna, where he died 20 June, 1717. In 1753 appeared his 'Memoirs,' said to be written by him in prison; but it is a mere romance.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, D.D., was born at Bartonkirke, Westmoreland, about 1608. He became a servitor in Queen's College, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of D.D. in 1646. He was at this time keeper of the archives, and provost of his college, which places he held till his death 10 Feb., 1657-8. He endowed a free school at his native place, and published an edition of Longinus; Brief Discourse relating to the Times of Edward VI.; Episcopal Inheritance; A Review of the Covenant; The Foundation of the University of Oxford; The Foundation of the University of Cambridge, &c.

LANGBAINE, Gerard, son of the preceding, was born at Oxford 15 July, 1656, and educated at University College. He was appointed esquire beadle of law, and died 23 June, 1692. He wrote 'An Account of the English Dramatic Poets,' 8vo., Oxford, 1691. The copy of this work in the British Museum, with Oldys's MS. notes, is well known to every student of dramatic history.

LANGDALE, Charles, an English Catholic gentleman, third son of the sixteenth Lord Stourton, was born 1787. After the passing of the Relief Act he represented Beverley in the House of Commons for a short time, and sat for Knaresborough 1837-41. Throughout his life he took a leading part in matters relating to the interests of Roman Catholics; and he exerted himself in an especial manner to promote the education of poor children belonging to that community. He died in London 1 Dec., 1868. Mr. Langdale published 'Memoirs of Mrs. Fitzherbert; with an Account of her Marriage with H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV.,' 1856.

LANGDALE, Henry Bickersteth, Lord, the brother of the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, who has been already noticed in this work, was born at Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmoreland, 18 June, 1783. He served an apprenticeship to his father, who was a surgeon and apothecary, after which he travelled on the continent as medical attendant to the earl of Oxford, whose daughter he subsequently married. He graduated at Caius College, Cambridge, 1808, was called to the bar 1811, distinguished himself by his assiduous attention to professional duties, and rose to eminence in the equity courts, to which he confined his practice. In 1836 he was appointed master of the rolls, in succession to Lord Cottenham, and at the same time was created Lord Langdale, and sworn of the privy council. He held his judicial office until a short time before his death, which occurred at Tunbridge Wells 18 April, 1851.

LANGEBECK, James, a learned Dane, who became keeper of the national archives and a councillor of state. His most important works are, a History of the Mines of Norway; and 'Scriptores Rerum Danicarum Medii Ævi.' Born 1710; died 16 Aug., 1774.

LANGHAM, Simon de, Cardinal, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Langham, co. Rutland. He became a monk, and afterwards abbat of St. Peter's, Westminster. In 1360 Edward III. made him lord high treasurer; next year he was chosen bishop of London; but the see of Ely being offered him at the same time, he preferred the latter. In 1364 he was appointed chancellor, and in 1366 promoted to the see of Canterbury; in which station he distinguished himself by his zeal against Wickliffe. In 1368 he was made a cardinal, which gave so much offence to the king, that he seized the temporalities of his see. Langham, upon this, went to the papal court at Avignon, where he was amply remunerated, and much employed in diplomatic affairs. He died abroad 22 July, 1376, and his body being brought to England, was interred in Westminster Abbey, to which he had been a munificent benefactor.

LANGHANS, Charles Gothard, a Prussian architect, born at Landhuter, in Silesia, 1733; died 1 Oct., 1808. He was appointed director of the royal buildings at Berlin, which city he adorned with several handsome structures.

LANGHORNE, Daniel, B.D., was born in London, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree 1657. In 1663 he obtained a fellowship in Corpus Christi College, and in 1664 took his degree of B.D. In 1670 he was presented to the living of Layston, in Hertfordshire, where he died 1681. His works are, 'Elenchus Antiquitatum Albionensium;' and 'Chronicon Regum Anglorum.'

LANGHORNE, John, D.D., an English divine, was born at Kirkby Steven, Westmoreland, in March, 1735. He was educated at Appleby School, after which he became a tutor in a private family. His next occupation was that of usher in the school of Wakefield, and while there he was admitted into orders. In 1759 he went to reside with Mr. Cracroft, of Hackthorn, Lincolnshire, as tutor to his sons; and the year following he entered at Clare Hall, Cambridge. He now published several pieces, particularly 'Letters on Religious Retirement;' a novel, called 'Solyman and Almena;' and another, more popular, entitled 'Letters between Theodosius and Constantia.' In 1764 he obtained the curacy of St. John's, Clerkenwell, and soon after was appointed assistant-preacher at Lincoln's Inn. Having published a poem entitled 'Genius and Valour,' in which he defended Scotland from the scurrility thrown out by Churchill in his 'Prophecy of Famine,' he was complimented with the degree of D.D. by the university of Edinburgh. In 1767 he married Miss Cracroft, and at the same time was presented to the rectory of Blagdon, Somersetshire; but the next year he lost his wife in childbed; and it is not a little remarkable that his second lady died in the same manner. In 1770 Dr. Langhorne and his brother published their translation of Plutarch. In 1771 appeared our author's 'Fables of Flora.' In 1777 he was presented to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Wells; and the same year printed his poem of 'The Country Justice.' Died 1 April, 1779. Dr. Langhorne printed two volumes of sermons, and in 1804 his son published his father's poems, in two volumes, with a biographical memoir. William Langhorne, the doctor's brother, born 1721, was presented (1754) to the rectory of Hakinge, and the perpetual curacy of Folkstone, where he died 17 Feb., 1772. He wrote 'Job,' a poem; a paraphrase of part of Isaiah, and had a principal share in the translation of Plutarch.

LANGIUS or LANGE, JOHN, a physician and medical writer, born at Löwenberg, in Silesia, 1485; died June, 1565, at Heidelberg, where he was principal physician to the elector palatine.

LANGIUS, JOSEPH, a classical editor and mathematician, who was professor at Friburg about 1610.

LANGIUS, RODOLPH, a learned man of the fifteenth century, who was provost of the cathedral of Munster. He contributed much to the restoration of classical purity in the teaching of the schools, particularly at Munster. He died 1519, aged 80. His Latin poems were printed 1486.

LANGLAND. See LONGLAND.

LANGLÈS, LOUIS MATHIEU, a French orientalist, born at Péronne 23 Aug., 1763. Appointed professor of Persian and Malay, and keeper of the oriental MSS. in Paris, he devoted his laborious career to popularising the study of the Eastern languages, and employed his vast philological erudition in solving many knotty problems concerning the history, geography, and statistics of the different countries of Asia. A long list of his publications may be seen in Querard's 'France littéraire.' Died 28 July, 1824.

LANGLEY, BATTY, an English architect, who published many useful, practical books, such as the Builder's Jewel, the Builder's Price-Book; also 'Gothic Architecture Improved,' 1742; 'Pomona, or the Fruit Garden Illustrated,' &c. Died 1751.

LANGRISH, BROWNE, M.D., an English physician, who was a fellow of the Royal Society, and distinguished himself as an able physiologist. He died in London 29 Nov., 1759. His works are, A new Essay on Muscular Motion, 1733; Modern Theory of Physic, 1738; Physical Experiments on Brutes, 1745; Croonian Lectures on Muscular Motion, 1747; A treatise on the Small Pox, 1758.

LANGTOFT, PETER, an English historian, was so named from Langtoft, in Yorkshire. He was a canon of the order of St. Augustine, at Bridlington, and died at the beginning of the reign of Edward II. He translated from the Latin into French verse Boscam's Life of Thomas à Becket, and compiled in the same language a metrical Chronicle of England; printed by Hearne in 1725, 2 vols.

LANGTON, STEPHEN, Cardinal, archbishop of Canterbury, is said by Prince to have been a native of Devonshire, though it is more probable that he was born in Lincolnshire. He was educated at Paris, of which university he became chancellor. On going to Rome 1207, he was made a cardinal by Pope Innocent III., who also compelled the monks of Canterbury to elect him to the vacant archbishopric. This so greatly incensed King John that he took possession of the cathedral, banished the monks, and threatened the pope; who, in return, laid the kingdom under an interdict. John at last submitted, and in 1213 Langton took possession of his see, which he filled in a different manner from what the Pope expected, by joining the barons, and assisting them in procuring the Great Charter. He acted with the same firmness in the reign of Henry III., and died 9 July, 1228, leaving many works, several of which have been printed.

LANGUET, HUBERT, a statesman, born at Viteaux 1518. He studied the law, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty at Padua; after which he went to Wittemberg, where he embraced the Protestant religion. He then entered into the service of the elector of Saxony, who made him minister of state. He was at Paris at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, on which occasion he saved the life of Wechelius the printer. Being suspected of Zuinglianism, he retired from the elector's service, and went into that of the prince of Orange. He died at Antwerp 20 Sept., 1581. He wrote, a History of the Siege of Gotha, in Latin; Latin Letters to Sir Philip Sydney, translated into English by Pears 1845; Epist. ad principem suum Augustum Saxonicæ ducem; Epist. ad Joachim Camerarium, &c.; Hist. descriptio susceptæ à Cæsarea majestate executionis Augusto Saxoniæ duce contra S. Romani imp. rebelles; Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.

LANGUET DE GERGY, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH, a pious ecclesiastic, born at Dijon 1675. He became a doctor of the Sorbonne, and in 1714 vicar of St. Sulpice, which church he rebuilt on a large and magnificent scale, by subscriptions. He also founded the asylum of the Infant Jesus, consisting of two divisions; the first composed of thirty-five reduced ladies, and the next of four hundred poor women and children, who were all employed in various works for the general support. This institution was afterwards enlarged. Languet's other charities were also very extensive. Died 11 Oct., 1750.

LANGUET DE GERGY, JEAN JOSEPH, brother of the preceding, was born at Dijon 1677; became bishop of Soissons (1715) and afterwards of Sens

(1730); and died 11 May, 1753. He distinguished himself by his writings in defence of the bull 'Unigenitus.'

LANIERE, NICHOLAS, an Italian painter and musician, who came to England in the reign of James I. He drew portraits, and also employed himself in etching; but his principal excellence lay in musical composition; and his cantata of 'Hero and Leander' was much celebrated. Died Nov., 1646, aged 78.

LANINI, BERNARDINO, a painter, of Vercelli, died about 1578.

LA NOUE, and LANOVIUS. See NOUE.

LANSBERG, PHILIP, a Protestant minister and writer on mathematics, astronomy, and sacred chronology, was born in Zealand 1561, and died at Middleburg 1632.

LANSDOWNE, GEORGE GRANVILLE LORD, was the grandson of Sir Bevil Greenville, and born 1667. He was educated at Westminster, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was created master of arts at the age of thirteen. He lived a retired life till the accession of Queen Anne, when he was elected into parliament. In 1710 he was appointed secretary at war and on 1 Jan., 1711-12, advanced to the peerage. In 1712 he was sworn of the privy council, and soon after made treasurer to the queen; from which office he was removed in the next reign, and sent to the Tower, as being attached to the house of Stuart; but was soon released. Died 30 Jan., 1734-5. His poetical and prose works were published in 2 vols. 4to., 1732.

LANSDOWNE, HENRY PETTY FITZMAURICE, MARQUIS OF, son of the first marquis, was born in London 2 July, 1780, and educated at Westminster School, at Edinburgh, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. At the age of 22 he was returned to parliament for the borough of Calne, but it was not till 1806 that Lord Henry Petty fully discovered to the House of Commons those talents which made him the worthy opponent of Mr. Pitt. This was in the debate concerning the conduct of Lord Melville as treasurer of the navy. Mr. Pitt on this occasion interposed his shield before his colleague, in spite of which Lord Henry Petty prosecuted his attack with energy until he had fixed upon the treasurer the charge of peculation and corruption. In the ministry familiarly known as 'All the Talents' he became the chancellor of the Exchequer, and at the same time was returned to parliament for the university of Cambridge in the place of Mr. Pitt. The ministry, after being in office little more than a year, were totally defeated on the Catholic Relief Bill. Lord Henry Petty lost with office what he valued far more—his seat for Cambridge University. He sat for a few months as member for Camelford, but in Nov., 1809, he was transferred to the House of Peers, the marquisate of Lansdowne devolving upon him by the death of his half-brother. In 1826, when Mr. Canning took office on moderate liberal principles, Lord Lansdowne responded to his call and became home secretary. Under Mr. Canning's successor, Lord Goderich, he held the seals of the foreign department; but the short duration of the ministry did not give him time to develop his capacity in the wide range of foreign politics. After remaining in opposition to the duke of Wellington from 1829 to 1831, Lord Lansdowne took office under Earl Grey as lord president of the council, in which position his judgment and experience were of great service to his party, and he aided in carrying the Reform Bill through each of its successive stages. On the accession of Sir Robert Peel he became the recognised leader of the opposition in the House of Lords, a position in which his manly courtesy, his dignity, and his generous disposition conciliated the respect and esteem of his opponents. During Lord John Russell's tenure of office he held the presidency of the council, and went into opposition with him on the advent of Lord Derby; yet he refused the reins of government, and suffered them to pass into the hands of Lord Aberdeen in December, 1852, though requested by the queen herself to undertake the premiership. He consented, however, to hold a seat in the cabinet without office. In the latter part of his life the influence of Lord Lansdowne upon his party was conservative in its bearing. For fifty years the advocate of liberal measures, he was satisfied with the progress that had been made, and he had no wish to endanger the cause of good government by countenancing crude and ill-considered projects and sweeping changes. Died 31 Jan., 1863.

LANSDOWNE, WILLIAM PETTY, first MARQUIS OF, was born 1737. He succeeded his father as earl of Shelburne 1761, and, in 1765, married the daughter of Earl Granville, by whom he became possessed of Lansdowne Hill, near Bath. By this lady, who died 1771, he had a son, who succeeded him, but died without issue. He married, secondly, Lady Louisa Fitzpatrick, by whom he had Lord Henry Petty, the subsequent possessor of the title. In 1763 Lord Shelburne was placed at the head of the board of trade, which he soon quitted to join Lord Chatham, with whom he came into power, in 1766; but on the change of ministry, in 1768, he became a zealous oppositionist, and so continued till 1782, when he was appointed secretary of state for the foreign department. When the marquis of Rockingham died, his lordship became the head of the ministry, but was forced to yield to the coalition of Lord North and Mr. Fox; after which he was created marquis of Lansdowne. Died 7 May, 1805. His collection of manuscripts is in the British Museum.

LANTIER, ÉTIENNE FRANÇOIS DE, a French dramatist and miscellaneous writer, born 1 Oct., 1734, at Marseilles, where he died 31 Jan., 1826.

LANZI, LOUIS, an Italian antiquary, born in 1732, near Macerata. He became a member of the order of Jesus, and, on the suppression of the society, was appointed sub-director of the gallery at Florence. He published a guide to that gallery in 1782; which was followed by an 'Essay on the Tuscan Language,' 3 vols.; but his greatest work is 'A History of Painting in Italy,' which has been translated into English by Thomas Roscoe, 6 vols., 1828. His other publications are, 'Dissertations on the Etruscan Vases;' and a translation of 'Hesiod.' He died at Florence 31 March, 1810.

LANZONI, JOSEPH, a physician, born at Ferrara 26 Oct., 1663. He became professor of philosophy and medicine in the college of his native city, where he died Feb., 1730. His works were published at Lausanne, 3 vols., 1738.

LAPARELLI, FRANCIS, an Italian architect, born at Cortona 1521; died 1570.

LAPIDE, CORNELIUS À, the Latinized name of Cornelius Van den Steen, called by the French Corneille de la Pierre, one of the most renowned of all the commentators on Scripture. He was born in the diocese of Liege 1566, and having entered the Society of Jesus, soon distinguished himself by his progress in the study of the languages, of the belles lettres, and, above all, of the Sacred Scripture. Having made himself master of the Hebrew and Greek languages and the other helps to the study of the Bible, he devoted all his energies to that study for a period of forty years. He has left us the fruit of his meditations in ten folio volumes, in which he has explained the entire scripture of the Old and New Testament except the Psalms and Job. He was employed for a long time in teaching the Scripture, first at Louvain and afterwards at Rome, where he died 12 March, 1657. The best edition of his Commentary is that of Antwerp, printed in 1681. The exposition of the Pentateuch and that on the Epistles of St. Paul are the most esteemed parts of the work; but the entire work was received with the highest approval by Catholics, who still regard the author as one of their greatest scriptural scholars.—Dixon.

LAPLACE, Pierre Simon, a French mathematician of the highest celebrity, was born 22 March, 1749, at Beaumont-en-Auge, being the son of a farmer. After teaching mathematics in his native town, he removed in 1768 to Paris, where, through the influence of D'Alembert, he obtained a chair of mathematics at the military school. He first attracted the attention of the scientific world by a paper communicated in 1772 to the Memoirs of the Academy of Turin, on the integration of equations of finite differences, and from this period his reputation increased until he was placed by universal assent in the foremost rank among mathematicians. In politics he was less successful. Appointed by Bonaparte to the post of minister of the interior in 1799, he proved so incapable that he was removed at the end of six weeks to the presidency of the Sénat Conservateur. He was also created a count by the emperor, but notwithstanding this he voted for his deposition in 1814. He was advanced to the dignity of a marquis immediately after the restoration of Louis XVIII.; and died 5 March, 1827. His principal works are, 'Théorie du Mouvement et de la Figure Elliptique des Planètes;' 'Théorie des Attractions des Sphéroïdes et de la Figure des Planètes;' 'Exposition du Système du Monde;' 'Traité de Mécanique Céleste;' 'Théorie Analytique des Probabilités;' and 'Essai Philosophique sur les Probabilités.'

LAPO, Arnolfo Di, a famous architect, born 1232; died at Florence 1300. He built the cathedral at Florence and other great works.

LARCHER, Pierre Henri, a learned Hellenist, born at Dijon 12 Oct., 1726. He studied in the college of Laon, at Paris; and, in 1750, published his translation of the Electra of Euripides, which met with indifferent success. In 1758 appeared his translation of 'Chereas and Callirrhoe,' from the Greek; after which he had a violent quarrel with Voltaire, who was, however, the aggressor. Larcher now undertook a translation of Herodotus, which did not come out till 1786. The best edition is in nine volumes octavo. His other works are 'Memoire sur Venus;' and a translation of Xenophon. Died 22 Dec., 1812.

LARDNER, Dionysius, LL.D., a popular writer on scientific subjects, was the son of a Dublin solicitor. After receiving such education as was to be had in Irish schools at the beginning of the present century, he was placed in his father's office. Evincing, however, a very decided distaste for the profession, he was entered at Trinity College, Dublin, and devoted himself to scientific studies. He soon showed that he had now chosen the right path in life, and he rapidly gained an extraordinary number of prizes. In 1817 he obtained the degree of B.A., and for ten years remained at the university, publishing at first various treatises on mathematics, including the differential and integral calculus, and subsequently on the steam-engine. For this he obtained a gold medal from the Royal Dublin Society, and his reputation being now in a great measure established, he began to contribute to the Edinburgh Encyclopædia and the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, writing elaborate articles on pure mathematics as well as on the applied sciences. In 1827, on the establishment of the London University, Dr. Lardner accepted the chair of natural philosophy, and removing to London he set on foot a scheme for a 'Cabinet Encyclopædia,' which he gradually perfected, obtaining the co-operation of many eminent men. In 1840 he went to the United States and delivered, with much success, a series of lectures, which he afterwards published. After devoting much time to 'Railway Economy,' and writing a good deal on this and other subjects, Dr. Lardner started his last important work, the 'Museum of Science and Art,' which contains many of the best popular treatises on science which have ever been written. He died at Paris 29 April, 1859, aged 66.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, D.D., a dissenting minister, born at Hawkhurst, Kent, 6 June, 1684. He studied at Utrecht and Leyden, after which he resided with Lady Treby, as her chaplain, and tutor to her son, whom he accompanied on his travels. In 1723 he was engaged with other ministers in a lecture at the Old Jewry; and, in 1727, he published the first part of 'The Credibility of the Gospel History.' In 1729 he became minister of a congregation in Crutched Friars. Though his income was small, he continued his great work at his own expense; and he also published 'A Vindication of the Miracles against Woolston;' a 'Letter on the Logos;' and several sermons. The university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity; but his literary labours were not sufficiently appreciated in his life-time, as he sold the copyright of his 'Credibility' for one hundred and fifty pounds. He died at Hawkhurst 24 July, 1768. His works were collected into eleven volumes 8vo., 1788, with a life of the author by Dr. Kippis.

LARGILLIÈRE, Nicolas, a portrait painter, born 1656, at Paris, where he died 20 March, 1746. He resided several years in England, and was much employed by Charles II. and James II.

LARIVE, Jean Mauduit de, a French tragedian, born at La Rochelle 6 Dec. 1744; died 30 April, 1827.

LARIVEY, Pierre de, a French dramatist, was a native of Troyes, and died about 1612.

LAROCHEFOUCAULD. See Rochefoucauld.

LARREY, Dominique Jean Baron, a celebrated French army surgeon, born at Beaudeau, near Bagnères de Bigorre, 1766; died at Paris 25 July, 1841. He was the inventor of a system of 'ambulances volantes,' which enabled the surgeons to follow all the movements of their respective corps and to tend the wounded the moment they fell. Napoleon, who used to call him 'the virtuous Larrey,' bestowed many honours upon him, and remembered him in his will.

LARREY, Isaac de, an historian, born at Montivilliers, in France, 7 Sept., 1638, of Protestant parents. He was bred to the law; but on the revocation of the edict of Nantes he went to Holland, where he was made historiographer to the states-general; afterwards he removed to Berlin, and obtained a pension. He died 17 March, 1719. His works are, The History of Augustus; History of Eleanor, wife of Henry II.; History of England, 4 vols.; History of the Seven Sages of Greece; History of France under Louis XIV.

LARROQUE, Daniel de, son of Mathieu de Larroque (hereafter noticed), was born at Vitré about 1660, and educated for the Protestant ministry. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, however, he fled to this country, and afterwards visited Copenhagen and Amsterdam. In 1690 he returned to France, where he was reconciled to the Catholic religion. A satire which he wrote on Louis XIV., on account of the famine of 1693, led to his imprisonment for five years; but on his release he obtained a situation under government. Died at Paris 5 Sept., 1731. His most important works are, The True Motives of the Conversion of De Rancy, abbat of La Trappe; Life of Mezeray, a satirical romance; Life of Mahomet, translated from the English of Prideaux; and a translation of Echard's Roman History.

LARROQUE, Mathieu de, a Protestant minister, born at Leirac (Guienne), 1619. After officiating as pastor of Vitré, in Brittany, for twenty-seven years, he removed to Rouen, where he died 31 Jan., 1684. He was a man of profound erudition, and left numerous controversial works, among which we may mention, A History of the Eucharist; and a Reply to Bossuet's book on Communion under both kinds.

LASALLE, Antoine Charles Louis Collinet de, one of Napoleon's generals, was born at Metz 10 May, 1775, and fell at the battle of Wagram 6 July, 1809.

LASCARIS, Andrew John, a learned Greek, was a descendant of the imperial family at Constantinople. On the fall of that city he settled at Padua. Lorenzo de' Medici sent him to Greece to procure manuscripts, in which employment he was very successful. In 1494 he went to France, where he was patronized by Louis XII., who appointed him his ambassador to Venice. In 1513 he went to Rome, and persuaded Leo X. to found the Greek college, of which Lascaris became the principal, and also the superintendent of the Greek press. In 1518 he returned to France, and was employed by Francis I. in forming the royal library. He died at Rome in 1535. Lascaris published the Greek Anthologia, fol., 1494; four of the tragedies of Euripides; the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius; and Scholia on Homer and Sophocles. He also translated Polybius into Latin; and wrote epigrams in Greek and Latin, printed at Paris, in 1527, 4to.

LASCARIS, Constantine, of the same family as the preceding, was born at Constantinople; but when that city was taken by the Turks (1454) he went to Milan, where he instructed the daughter of the grand duke in the Greek language. From thence he removed to Rome, and next to Naples, in which city he opened a school for Greek and rhetoric. Lastly, he settled at Messina, where he died about 1500. His Greek grammar was printed at Milan, 1476; and again by Aldus, 1495.

LAS CASAS, Bartholomew de. See Casas.

LAS CASAS, Emmanuel Augustin Dieudonne Marin Joseph, Marquis de, a French historian, one of the companions of the Emperor Napoleon at St. Helena, was born at the castle of Las Casas (Languedoc) 1766. After having gone into exile he returned to France after the 18th Brumaire; was made imperial chamberlain, and held several important administrative offices. In 1814 he refused to declare the forfeiture of the emperor, whom he accompanied to St. Helena, where his conversations with the illustrious prisoner led to his afterwards publishing the 'Mémorial de Sainte-Hélène,' 1822-3. In 1816 he was compelled to quit St. Helena, and for eight months he was kept a prisoner by the English at the Cape of Good Hope. After 1830 he sat several times in the chamber of deputies, always voting with the extreme left. Died 15 May, 1842. Las Casas published under the assumed name of Le Sage an 'Historical and Geographical Atlas,' which met with much success.

LASCY, Pierre de, a field marshal in the service of Russia, was born in the county of Limerick, Ireland, 1678. After serving in France, Austria, and Poland, he entered the service of Peter the Great, who made him governor-general of Livonia. Died 1751. His son, Joseph François Maurice, count De Lascy (born at St. Petersburg 1725; died at Vienna 30 Nov., 1801), became a general in the Austrian service, and distinguished himself in the Seven Years' War.

LASENA, Peter, an Italian jurist and critic, born at Naples 1590; died at Rome 3 Sept., 1636.

LASSALA, Manuel, a Spanish Jesuit, born 1729, at Valencia; died 1798, at Bologna. He wrote some esteemed works, both in verse and prose, in Spanish, Italian, Latin, and Hebrew. His principal pieces in his native tongue are an Essay on General History; and an Account of the Castilian Poets.

LASSELS, Richard, an English priest and traveller, born at Brokenborough, Yorkshire, in or about 1603. He was admitted a student of the English college at Douay 1623, and ordained priest 1632. Afterwards being engaged as tutor to several persons of distinction he made with them, at different times, three journeys into Flanders, six into France, five into Italy, and one through Holland and Germany. He died at Montpellier Sept., 1668. His work entitled 'The Voyage of Italy' was published after his death by S. Wilson, 8vo., Paris, 1670, and reprinted 1698 in a wretchedly debased and altered form. Mr. Lassels also wrote 'A Method to hear Mass,' originally published 1686, and reprinted by Dr. Thomas Doyle, and edition, 1864; A Treatise of the Invocation of Saints; and an Apology for Catholics. There is an unpublished MS. by him in the British Museum (Addit. 4217), entitled 'An Account of the Journey of Lady Catherine Whetenhall from Brussells to Italy in 1650.'

LASSO, Orlando di, a famous musical composer, born at Mons 1520; died at Munich 14 June, 1594.

LASSONE, Joseph Marie François de, a French physician and chemist, born at Carpentras 1717; died at Paris 8 Oct., 1788.

LATHAM, John, M.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., an ornithologist, was the son of a surgeon and apothecary at Eltham, Kent, where he was born 27 June, 1740. He was for many years a country practitioner, first at Dartford, in his native county, and afterwards at Romsey, Hampshire. He obtained his doctor's degree from a foreign university, and died at Winchester 11 Feb., 1837. Dr. Latham was the author of 'A General Synopsis of Birds,' 6 vols. 4to., 1781-5, with a Supplement in two vols., 1787-1801; 'Index Ornithologicus,' 2 vols., 1790; and 'Supplementum Indicis Ornithologici' (called the Second Supplement), 1802. A new edition of the whole, enlarged and rearranged, with a general index, appeared at Winchester, 1821-8, 4to., 11 vols. in 10, with coloured plates.

LATHAM, JOHN, M.D., was born at Gansworth, Cheshire, 29 Dec., 1761, and educated at Manchester School, whence he removed to Brasenose College, Oxford (B.A. 1782; M.A. 1784; M.B. 1786; M.D. 1788). He was originally intended for holy orders, but ultimately determined to devote himself to the study of medicine. In Manchester, and afterwards in London, he obtained a high reputation and extensive practice, and filled the office of president of the College of Physicians. He was likewise physician extraordinary to the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV. He retired from practice 1829, and spent the remainder of his days at Bradwall, in his native county, where he died 20 April, 1843. His works are, 'A Plan for a charitable Institution to be established on the Sea Coast,' 1791; 'On Rheumatism and Gout,' 1796; 'Facts and Opinions concerning Diabetes,' 1811; several papers on practical subjects in 'Medical Transactions.'

LATHBURY, THOMAS, born 1798, and educated at Oxford, became incumbent of the parish of SS. Simon and Jude, Bristol, 1848. He was author of 'History of Convocation;' 'History of the English Episcopacy from 1640 to 1662;' 'History of the Nonjurors;' 'Memoirs of Ernest the Pious;' 'History of the Book of Common Prayer and other Books of Authority;' and many other works in theology and general literature. Died 11 Feb., 1865.

LATIMER, HUGH, was the son of a yeoman at Thurcaston, Leicestershire, where he was born 1490 or 1491. At the age of fourteen he was sent to the university of Cambridge, being elected a fellow of Clare Hall in Feb., 1509-10, and graduating B.A. 1510-11; M.A. 1514. Having taken orders, he was in 1523 appointed one of the university preachers, and in 1524 he proceeded B.D., on which occasion he delivered an oration against Melancthon and his opinions. At this period he was a fervent and zealous son of the Church, and wholly opposed to the Lutheran doctrines, but shortly afterwards his religious opinions underwent a complete change, in consequence of his attendance on the divinity lectures of George Stafford, and his conversations with Thomas Bilney. He now became noted as a popular preacher, and by his coarse abuse of the Church and her doctrines, not unnaturally made many enemies. However, he ingratiated himself with King Henry VIII. by giving an opinion in favour of the divorce, and that monarch conferred upon him the rectory of West Kington, Wiltshire. Subsequently, by the influence of Anne Boleyn and Thomas Cromwell, he was elevated to the see of Worcester (1535). While holding this dignity he was ordered to preach the sermon at the execution of Friar Forest, who had been condemned to death for denying the royal supremacy, and there is extant a letter from Latimer to Cromwell in which he refers in terms of unpardonable flippancy to the odious task imposed upon him. After the passing of the act of the Six Articles he resigned his see and retired into the country, but coming to London for medical advice in 1546, he was committed to the Tower for having been in communication with Dr. Crome. On the death of King Henry he was released, and he then went to reside with Archbishop Cranmer at Lambeth. He assisted that prelate in the revision of the homilies, and became a frequent preacher at court, and in the city and provinces, but declined to be reinstated in the see of Worcester, or to accept any other bishopric. He was, however, in the commissions for reforming the ecclesiastical laws and suppressing heresies, and, to his disgrace, he took part in the scandalous proceedings against Joan Bocher, who was burnt for holding that our Saviour was not incarnate of the Blessed Virgin. Shortly after the accession of Queen Mary the tables were turned, and Latimer was consigned to the fate which he had been so eager to bring upon others. Being committed to the Tower in Sept., 1553, he remained in confinement there till the following March, when he and his fellow-prisoners, Archbishop Cranmer and Bishop Ridley, were removed to Oxford. After being convicted of heresy, he was handed over to the secular power and burnt, together with Ridley, 16 Oct., 1555, at a place then called Canditch, situate near the front of Balliol College, and not far from Bocardo, the common gaol of the city of Oxford. He met his fate with great fortitude, saying to his fellow-sufferer, 'Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man: we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out.' Latimer was a man of little learning, and endeavoured to make up for his deficiency in this respect by coarseness and scurrility. His complete works were edited by the Rev. George Elwes Corrie, for the Parker Society, 2 vols. 8vo., 1844-45.—Athen. Cantab.

LATIMER, WILLIAM, a classical scholar of eminence, was educated at Oxford, where, in 1489, he became fellow of All Souls. He went to Padua for instruction in Greek, and on his return was appointed tutor to Reginald Pole, by whose interest he obtained some ecclesiastical preferments. He also taught Erasmus the Greek language, and assisted him in his edition of the New Testament. He died about Sept., 1545, and was buried in his parish church of Saintbury, Gloucestershire. There are only some of his letters extant.

LATINI, BRUNETTO, was born at Florence, which country he left when his party of the Guelphs were defeated by the Ghibelins. He then went to France, but after residing there some years returned to Italy, and died in his native city 1294. He compiled a body of science, under the title of 'Tresor,' and another called 'Tesoretto,' somewhat similar to our Cyclopædias. He was the tutor of Dante.

LATINUS, LATINIUS, a learned priest, born at Viterbo about 1513; died at Rome 21 Jan., 1593, leaving 'Epistolæ;' 'Bibliotheca Sacra et Profana,' &c.

LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE, THÉOPHILE MALO CORRET DE, a celebrated soldier and philologist, called 'the first grenadier of France,' was born at Carhaix 1743. Entering the army early in life, he served in the war with Spain, and having attained the rank of captain, made the campaign of 1792 with the army of the Alps. His corps of grenadiers, called the 'Infernal Column,' was for a long time the terror of the enemy. As modest as he was courageous, he refused to accept the rank of general. After the peace he retired to Carhaix, and busied himself with literary researches; but he generously left his books to join the army again as a substitute for the son of one of his friends who had been drawn in the conscription; and was killed at Neuburg 27 June, 1800. He wrote 'Origines Gauloises,' and other philological works.

LATREILLE, Pierre André, a French naturalist, born at Brives 29 Nov., 1762; died at Paris 6 Feb., 1833. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences, and professor at the Museum of Natural History. His works are very numerous.

LAUD, William, was the son of a clothier at Reading, and was born there 7 Oct., 1573. From the free school of his native place he went to St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1604 he took his degree of B.D., but gave offence to the Calvinists by his open avowal of the Arminian tenets. His first preferment was the vicarage of Stanford, Northamptonshire, soon after which he was presented to the living of North Kilworth, Leicestershire, but exchanged it for West Tilbury, Essex. He now took his doctor's degree, and became chaplain to Bishop Neile, of Rochester, who gave him the rectory of Cuckstone, which he resigned for that of Norton. In 1611 he was chosen president of his college; and in 1614 made prebend of Lincoln, to which was added the archdeaconry of Huntingdon. In 1616 he was advanced to the deanery of Gloucester, and soon after he accompanied the king to Scotland. In 1621 he was installed prebendary of Westminster, and the same year consecrated bishop of St. David's, on which he resigned his headship, though he might have held it according to the statutes. In 1622 he had a conference with Fisher, the Jesuit, in the presence of the marquis of Buckingham and his mother. The particulars of this disputation were published by both parties. In 1626 he was translated to Bath and Wells, and in 1628 to London. In 1630 he was chosen chancellor of Oxford, and no man ever filled that situation more advantageously to the university or the general interests of learning, of which his buildings and endowments there are lasting memorials. In 1633 he was raised to the archbishopric of Canterbury, and the same year chosen chancellor of the university of Dublin. The zeal which he displayed for conformity to the Church, and his endeavours to introduce the Liturgy into Scotland, created him numerous enemies. At the commencement of the Long Parliament, therefore, he was impeached by the Commons, and sent to the Tower. After lying there three years, he was brought to his trial before the Lords, by whom he was acquitted, which so provoked the faction in the Lower House, that they carried an ordinance declaring him guilty of treason, which they compelled the Peers to pass, and the archbishop was accordingly beheaded on Tower Hill, 10 Jan., 1644-5. His 'Theological Works' were published at Oxford, 6 vols. 8vo., 1847-9.

LAUDER, James Eckford, a painter, born at Silvermills, near Edinburgh, 1812; died at Edinburgh 29 March, 1869. He was a member of the Royal Scottish Academy.

LAUDER, Robert Scott, brother of the preceding, and, like him, a member of the Royal Scottish Academy, attained great distinction as a painter. He was born at Silvermills 1803, and died 21 April, 1869.

LAUDER, Sir Thomas Dick, son of Sir Andrew Lauder, Bart., of Fountainhall, Haddingtonshire, was born 1784, and succeeded to the title 1820. In 1839 he was appointed secretary to the Board of Scottish Manufactures, which was soon afterwards amalgamated with the Fishery Board; and he became, in addition, secretary to the Board of British White Herring Fishery. He ably discharged the duties of his secretaryship till within a short time of his death, which took place 29 May, 1848. Sir Thomas was a respectable writer, and contributed a good deal to 'Blackwood' and other magazines. Of his separate publications the most important are 'Lochander, a romance,' 1825; 'The Wolf of Badenoch, a historical romance of the fourteenth century,' 1827; 'Account of the Great Moray Floods of 1829;' 'Highland Rambles and Legends,' 1837; 'Legends and Tales of the Highlands,' 1841; 'Tour round the Coast of Scotland,' 1842; and editions of Gilpin's Forest Scenery and Price's Essays on the Picturesque.

LAUDER, William, a native of Scotland, who was educated at Edinburgh, where he taught the Latin class with reputation in 1734; but failing in his expectations of a professorship, he removed to London, after publishing an edition of 'Johnston's Psalms.' In 1747 he began an attack upon the literary character of Milton, in the 'Gentleman's Magazine;' and in 1751 published a pamphlet entitled 'An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost.' Lauder's forgeries, after imposing upon Dr. Johnson, were exposed by Dr. Douglas, afterwards bishop of Salisbury, which drew from the fabricator an acknowledgment of his guilt. Yet after this he returned to the charge in a tract with this title, 'The Grand Impostor detected, or Milton convicted of Forgery against Charles I.' Lauder died at Barbadoes about 1771.

LAUDERDALE, James Maitland, eighth earl of, was born at Hatton, in Mid Lothian, 26 Jan., 1759, and studied at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Paris. In 1780 he was elected M.P. for Newport, in Cornwall, and in 1784 for Malmesbury, being, during the time he sat in the Lower House, a steady supporter of the principles of Mr. Fox. He succeeded his father 1789, and, at the general election in the ensuing year, was chosen a representative peer for Scotland. In the House of Lords he was a frequent speaker, and distinguished himself by his extreme opinions, and his active opposition to the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, the Sedition Bill, and other measures of the administration. On the formation of the Grenville administration, in Feb., 1806, he was created a baron of the United Kingdom, and sworn of the Privy Council. In July the same year he was appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland, and shortly afterwards sent to France, with full powers to conclude peace. An account of the negotiations will be found in the 'London Gazette' of 21 Oct., 1806. His lordship only held office till the change of administration in March, 1807; and the last ten years of his life he spent in retirement, engaged in agricultural pursuits. Died 13 Sept., 1839. His lordship was the author of 'An Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Public Wealth, and into the Means and Causes of its Increase,' 1804, which was translated into French; and of other works on financial subjects.—Anderson.

LAUDERDALE, JOHN MAITLAND, DUKE OF, was born at Lethington, in Scotland, 24 May, 1616, being eldest son of the first earl of Lauderdale, to whose title he succeeded 1645. In early life he was an earnest adherent of the Covenanters, who employed him on several occasions to treat with Charles I.; but he eventually changed sides, and became an enthusiastic supporter of the royalist cause. He formed one of Charles II.'s court at the Hague, and was with that monarch at the battle of Worcester, when he was taken prisoner. Set at liberty at the Restoration, he was appointed principal secretary of state in Scotland, and was afterwards also made one of the extraordinary lords of Session, president of the Council, first commissioner of the Treasury, one of the lords of the king's bedchamber, and governor of Edinburgh Castle. Having undertaken to force episcopacy on the Scotch nation, and to make the king's authority absolute and arbitrary, he stretched the power of the crown to every kind of excess, and assumed to himself a sort of lawless administration. He went so far, indeed, as to name the privy councillors, to place and remove the lords of the Session and Exchequer, to grant gifts and pensions, to levy and disband forces, to appoint general officers, and to transact all matters belonging to the prerogative. He was, besides, one of the five lords who had the management of affairs in England, and were called the 'Cabal.' In 1672 he was created marquis of March, duke of Lauderdale, and K.G.; but these honours did not protect him from the indignation of the House of Commons, by whom, the next year, he was voted a 'grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any office or place of trust.' And though his Majesty thought proper to create him baron of Petersham and earl of Guilford in the English peerage (1674), the House of Commons, the next year, presented an address to the king to remove him from all his employments and from his Majesty's presence and counsels for ever. This was followed by other addresses of the same kind, the result being that he was deprived of all his offices except that of extraordinary lord of Session, which had been granted to him for life. He died at Tunbridge Wells, 24 Aug., 1682, leaving a character which no historian has been hardy enough to vindicate.

LAUDERDALE, RICHARD MAITLAND, fourth EARL OF, went to France at the Revolution, and joined the court of James II. at St. Germains; but, although a Catholic, he disapproved the violent measures of the abdicated king, and was consequently not admitted to any share in his confidence. He died at Paris 1695. His translation of Virgil was printed in 2 vols., 1737. Dryden, who saw the MS., adopted many of the lines into his own translation.

LAUDOHN, GIDEON ERNEST, a celebrated Austrian general, born at Tootzen 1716; died 14 July, 1790.

LAUNAY, FRANÇOIS DE, a French jurist, professor of law in the university of Paris, was born at Angers, 12 Aug., 1612, and died 9 July, 1693.

LAUNAY, PIERRE DE, a French Protestant writer, born at Blois 1573; died 27 June, 1661.

LAUNOY, JEAN DE, a celebrated doctor of the Sorbonne, was born 21 Dec., 1603, at Valdéric, in the diocese of Coutances, and died at Paris 10 March, 1678, leaving a great number of theological works, which were published in a collected form by Granet, 10 vols. folio, 1721-33.

LAURAGUAIS, LOUIS LÉON FÉLICITÉ BRANCAS, duc DE, was born 3 July, 1733, at Paris, where he died 9 Oct., 1824. He was remarkable for his extensive scientific attainments, and especially for his knowledge of chemistry. He made some important discoveries respecting the nature and qualities of the diamond, and suggested several improvements in the manufacture of porcelain.

LAURENCE GIUSTINIANI (ST.), the first patriarch of Venice, was born there 1 July, 1381, and died 8 Jan., 1455, leaving several works on religious subjects.

LAURENCE O'TOOLE (ST.). Born of a noble Irish family, he devoted himself to the priesthood, and, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, was appointed abbat of Glendalough. He was consecrated archbishop of Dublin, and died 14 Nov., 1180. In 1218 he was canonized by Pope Honorius III. His life, published by Surius, is said to have been written by Ralph of Bristol, bishop of Kildare about the commencement of the thirteenth century.

LAURENCE, FRENCH, D.C.L. See LAWRENCE.

LAURENCE, RICHARD, the last Protestant archbishop of Cashel, was the brother of Dr. French Lawrence. He was born at Bath 1760, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, though he subsequently removed to University College. He was appointed regius professor of Hebrew, and a canon of Christ Church, 1814; was promoted to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel 1822; and died 28 Dec., 1838. As a theologian he was greatly esteemed by the members of his communion. His principal publications are, 'An Attempt to illustrate those Articles of the Church of England which the Calvinists improperly consider Calvinistical, in eight Sermons, at Bampton's Lecture,' 1805; 'Dissertation on the Logos of St. John,' 1808; 'Critical Reflections upon some important Misrepresentations in the Unitarian version of the New Testament,' 1811; 'Remarks upon the systematical Classification of MSS. adopted by Griesbach in his edition of the Greek Testament,' 1814; 'The Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration contrasted with the Tenets of Calvin,' 1815; 'The Doctrine of the Church of England upon the Efficacy of Baptism, vindicated from Misrepresentation,' 1818; 'Tracts, theological and critical,' 1819; 'Authentic Documents relative to the Predestinarian Controversy in the Time of Queen Mary, published from a MS. in the Bodleian Library,' 1819; 'Ascensio Isaiæ Vatis, Opusculum pseudographum, multis abhinc Seculis, ut videtur, deperditum, nunc autem apud Æthiopas compertum, et cum Versione Latina Anglicanaque publici juris factum,' 1819; 'Remarks on the Critical Principles adopted by Writers who have recommended a new Translation of the Bible,' 1820; Reply to Prof. Samuel Lee's Strictures on the preceding work, 1821; 'The Book of Enoch the Prophet; an apocryphal production, supposed to have been lost for ages, but discovered at the close of the last century in Abyssinia, now first published from an Ethiopic MS. in the Bodleian Library,' 1821, again 1838.

LAURENS, HENRY, an American merchant and statesman, born at Charleston, South Carolina, 1724; died there 8 Dec., 1792.

LAURENSON, JOHN, a Jesuit, born at Chippen

Hill, near Witham, Essex, 6 Jan., 1760; died at Bury St. Edmunds, 19 Sept., 1834. He translated from French into English Huby's 'Considerations on the Law of God;' the Père d'Orleans' 'Life of St. Stanislaus Kostka;' and Grou's 'Christian sanctified by the Lord's Prayer.'

LAURENT, PETER JOSEPH, an engineer and mechanician, born in Flanders in 1715. He is said to have constructed some hydraulic machines when he was not more than ten years of age; and at twenty-one he was made superintendent of several public works, among which was the direction of the canals in the Netherlands. He also projected the junction of the Somme and the Scheldt, for which he was honoured with the order of St. Michael. Died 1773.

LAURI, FILIPPO, a painter, born 1623, at Rome, where he died 1694.

LAURIÈRE, EUSÈBE JACOB DE, a French advocate and legal writer, born at Paris 31 July, 1659; died 9 Jan., 1728.

LAURISTON, JACQUES ALEXANDRE BERNARD LAW, marquis DE, a marshal of France and diplomatist, born at Pondicherry, in the East Indies, 1 Feb., 1768; died at Paris 11 June, 1828. He was the grand-nephew of John Law, the celebrated projector.

LA VALETTE, ANTOINE MARIE CHAMANS, comte DE, a French officer, born at Paris 1769. At the breaking-out of the Revolution he became an officer of the National Guard, in which capacity he was one of the last defenders of the king, on 10 Aug., 1792. Entering the Republican army, he distinguished himself on the Rhine and in La Vendée, and gained the confidence of Napoleon, who appointed him his adjutant and private secretary. He accompanied Napoleon to Egypt, and became more nearly allied to him by marrying a niece of Josephine. After the 18th Brumaire he was made postmaster-general and advanced to the dignity of a count. In 1814 he lost his office, but regained it after the return of Napoleon from Elba. After the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was arrested for having aided the emperor, and condemned to death. He escaped by the aid of his wife and daughter and three English gentlemen, and went to Munich, where he was kindly received by the king. Madame La Valette, after the escape was discovered, was kept for some time imprisoned, and became insane; but she survived till June, 1855. In 1822 La Valette was pardoned, and returned to France, where he lived in obscurity. He died at Paris, 15 Feb., 1830. His 'Memoires et Souvenirs,' containing an interesting account of his escape, was published the following year. Napoleon I. bequeathed 300,000 francs to La Valette, of which 60,000 were paid to him. In 1855 Napoleon III. caused the remainder to be paid to his heirs.

LAVATER, JOHN CASPAR, a Swiss divine and writer on physiognomy, born at Zürich 15 Nov., 1741. He became pastor of the Orphan's Church at Zurich, and afterwards of St. Peter's, the principal church in that city. His death occurred 2 Jan., 1801, in consequence of a wound he received in 1799, when the French troops, under Massena, took Zurich by storm. Lavater was a man of brilliant talents, which were, however, mingled with much mystic enthusiasm. Of his best-known work, the 'Essays on Physiognomy,' there are several English translations. He also wrote Poems; Secret Journal of a Self-Observer; Fraternal Letters; Letters supposed to have been written by St. Paul before his Conversion; and Aphorisms on Man.

LAVATER, LOUIS, a Protestant divine, born 11 March, 1527, at Kiburg, in the canton of Zurich. He became canon and pastor of Zurich, where he died 15 July, 1586, leaving a Sacramentarian History; a Life of Bullinger; a treatise 'Of Ghostes and Spirites,' translated into English 1572; and other works. His exposition of the Book of Ruth was 'translated by Ephraim Pagett, a Childe of eleuen Yeares of Age,' and published at London 1586.

LAVINGTON, GEORGE, an English prelate, born 1683, at Mildenhall, in Wilts. He was educated at Winchester School, from whence he removed to a fellowship at New College, Oxford, where he took his degree of bachelor of civil law 1713. In 1717 he was presented to the living of Hayford Warren, Oxfordshire, after which he was made prebendary of Worcester; and in 1732 canon residentiary of St. Paul's. In this year he took his doctor's degree, and obtained successively the rectories of St. Mary Aldermary and St. Michael Bassishaw. In 1747 he was advanced to the bishopric of Exeter, where he died 13 Sept., 1762. Besides some sermons, he published a work entitled 'The Enthusiasm of the Methodists and Papists compared,' which involved him in a controversy with Whitefield and Wesley.

LAVOISIER, ANTOINE LAURENT, an eminent chemist, born at Paris 16 Aug., 1743. As early as 1764, when the French government proposed a prize question respecting the best mode of lighting the streets, he wrote a dissertation on the subject, which obtained a gold medal from the king; and two years afterwards he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, the Memoirs of which society he continued to enrich with numerous papers. In 1774 he published 'Experiments on the gaseous fluids;' after which he turned his attention to the calcination of metals, and printed the result of his observations. In 1789 appeared his 'Traité Elementaire de Chimie;' and he was employed in the application of his scientific acquirements, to the most important purposes, when the Revolution put a stop, not only to his pursuits, but to his life, for he suffered on the scaffold 8 May, 1794.

LAW, EDMUND, a learned bishop, born at Cartmel, Lancashire, 1703. He was educated at Kendal, from whence he removed to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1723, and soon after was elected fellow of Christ's College. In 1727 he proceeded to the degree of master of arts, and in 1732 published a translation of Archbishop King's 'Origin of Evil,' with notes. He also, while at college, conducted a new edition of Stephens's Latin Thesaurus through the press. In 1737 he was presented to the rectory of Graystock, Cumberland. In 1743 he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Carlisle, which he resigned in 1756, on being chosen master of Peterhouse. About 1760 he was made librarian of the university, and some years afterwards was promoted to the archdeaconry of Stafford, and to a prebend in Lincoln Cathedral. In 1768 he was advanced to the bishopric of Carlisle, where he died 14 Aug., 1787. He was the author of Considerations on the Theory of Religion; An Inquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, &c. He also published an edition of Locke's works. Two of his sons came to be bishops, and one a judge.

LAW, Edward, Lord Ellenborough. See Ellenborough.

LAW, John, of Lauriston, a famous financial projector, was born at Edinburgh April, 1671. On the death of his father, who was a goldsmith, he came into possession of an estate called Lauriston; and in 1694 visited London, where he fought a duel, and killed his antagonist, for which he was sent to prison, but effected his escape, and returned to Scotland. He next went to Holland, and from thence to Paris, where, in 1716, he opened a bank, which being dissolved by an arrêt, and a new one erected called the Royal Bank, Law was named the director. After this he erected a company, to which was granted a tract of land on the Mississippi, whence the scheme obtained that name. An immense number of notes was issued, for which people were eager to dispose of their real property; and thousands were thereby brought to ruin. At the same period a similar scheme was set on foot in England by the directors of the South Sea Bubble, which resulted in the ruin of hundreds of speculators. In 1720 Law was made comptroller of the finances; but the same year the bubble burst, and he escaped to Brussels, next to England, and lastly to Venice, where he died 21 March, 1729.

LAW, William, a mystic divine, born at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, 1686. He was of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and took his master's degree, in 1712; but on refusing the oaths at the accession of George I., he was obliged to leave the university. After officiating as a curate in London, he became tutor to Mr. Gibbon, of Putney, father of the historian; and such was the regard in which he was held, that Mrs. Hester Gibbon, his pupil's sister, and Mrs. Hutcheson, a widow lady, formed a united establishment at King's Cliffe, of which Mr. Law was the spiritual director. At this place he founded an almshouse and a school. He died 9 April, 1761. His principal works are, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life; Three letters to the bishop of Bangor; Treatise on Christian Perfection; Remarks on the Fable of the Bees; The Unlawfulness of Stage Entertainments; The Case of Reason; Answer to Dr. Trappe, on being righteous overmuch; On Regeneration; Answer to Hoadly on the Sacrament; The Spirit of Prayer; The Spirit of Love. Latterly he fell into the notions of Behmen, whose works he published.

LAWES, Henry, a musician, was born about 1600, at Salisbury, of which cathedral his father was vicar-choral. In 1625 he became a gentleman of the chapel royal; and was much employed in composing airs and songs for masques, particularly that of Comus, by Milton. He died 21 Oct., 1662. His brother, William, was also a composer, and a gentleman of the chapel royal. He was killed at the siege of Chester 1645.

LAWLESS, Matthew James, an English artist, died in London 6 Aug., 1864, aged 27. He painted in oil cabinet pictures full of character and marked by extraordinary correctness of costume. He also contributed numerous sketches to 'Once a Week,' 'London Society,' and other periodicals.

LAWLESS, Valentine Browne, Lord Cloncurry. See Cloncurry.

LAWRENCE, Andrew, an able English engraver, born in Westminster 1708; died in Paris July, 1747.

LAWRENCE, French, D.C.L., a civilian, was a native of Bristol, and received his education at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He became a member of the college of advocates, and rose to eminence as a civilian. In 1797 he was appointed regius professor of civil law at Oxford; and having for many years enjoyed the friendship of Burke, he obtained, through his means, the patronage of Earl Fitzwilliam, and thereby a seat in the House of Commons. Died 27 Feb., 1809. He was one of the executors of Mr. Burke, and the joint editor of his works. His own productions are some of the 'Probationary Odes,' written in conjunction with Richardson; some of the Annual Registers; and 'Critical Remarks on detached passages of the New Testament, particularly the Revelation of St. John,' 8vo., Oxford, 1810. His Correspondence with Burke was published at London 1827. He was brother of the archbishop of Cashel. See Lawrence.

LAWRENCE, Sir Henry Montgomery, was born at Mattura, in Ceylon, 28 June, 1806, being a younger son of Lieut.-Col. Alexander Lawrence, who fought with honour in India against Tippoo Saib. He studied at the military college at Addiscombe, obtained a cadetship in the Bengal artillery (1821), served in the Affghan campaign in 1843, and the same year, having then attained the rank of major, was appointed British resident at Catmandoo. He distinguished himself in the Sutlej campaigns, was made a military companion of the Bath, and from 1846 to 1849 was agent for the governor-general on the north-west frontier, and resident at Lahore, where his services won for him the civil decoration of K.C.B. He was next appointed chief of the board of administration in the Punjaub, and received the commission of colonel and the honorary appointment of aide-de-camp to the queen. From 1852 to 1857, he was agent of the governor-general in Rajpootana. Although ill-health demanded his return to England, he consented, at the request of the Indian government, to assume the chief commissionership of Oude, and arrived at Lucknow in March, just before the commencement of the mutiny. When the first disturbances occurred he demanded and obtained full powers as chief military commander in Oude, receiving at the same time a commission as brigadier-general; and the memorable defence of the residency was made under his direction up to the time of his death. He was mortally wounded by a shell 2 July, 1857, and died on the 4th of that month. Sir Henry was the author of 'Adventures of an Officer in Runjeet Singh's Service,' and of various military and political essays, published in a collected form 1859.

LAWRENCE, Stringer, an English general in the service of the East India Company, born 1697; died 10 Jan., 1775. His services were acknowledged by the Company, who erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

LAWRENCE, Thomas, M.D., was born in Westminster 25 May, 1711. He took his degree of doctor at Trinity College, Oxford, 1740; and the same year was chosen anatomical reader to the university. In 1744 he was elected fellow of the College of Physicians, for whose edition of the works of Harvey he wrote the biographical memoir, and received a compliment of one hundred guineas. In 1767 he became president of the college, and was re-elected for the seven following years. Died 6 June, 1783. Besides the Life of Harvey, he wrote 'De Hydrope;' and 'De Natura Musculorum Prælectiones tres.' One of his sons was Sir Soulden Lawrence, judge of the King's Bench.

LAWRENCE, Sir THOMAS, the eminent portrait painter, was born 13 April, 1769, at Bristol. His father kept an inn in that city, but shortly after the birth of the future artist he removed to Devizes. At a very early age young Lawrence showed that he possessed extraordinary abilities, which are thus alluded to in Mr. Barrington's 'Miscellanies,' published in 1781:—'This boy is now [Feb., 1780] nearly ten years and a half old, but at the age of nine, without the most distant instruction from any one, he was capable of copying historical pictures in a masterly style, and also succeeded amazingly in compositions of his own, particularly that of Peter denying Christ. In about seven minutes he scarcely ever failed of drawing a strong likeness of any person present, which had generally much freedom and grace if the subject permitted. He is likewise an excellent reader of blank verse, and will immediately convince any one that he both understands and feels the striking passages of Milton and Shakspere.' Failing in business at Devizes, his father removed to Bath, where the precocious son was placed as a pupil with William Hoare, the father of the well-known Prince Hoare. Under so accomplished an instructor he made rapid progress, and the family were at this period maintained by the sale of his drawings. Before he attained his seventeenth year the family removed to London. His first appearance as an exhibitor at Somerset House was in 1787, and he rapidly became the fashionable portrait painter of the day, a pre-eminence which he maintained for upwards of forty years. In 1791 he was chosen a 'supplemental associate' of the Royal Academy, his age not permitting him to become a candidate for associate membership. This, it may be observed, is the only instance in which such an exceptional honour has been conferred. In 1792 he was appointed by George III. to succeed Sir Joshua Reynolds as his principal painter in ordinary. The peace of 1814 was an auspicious era for Lawrence, who received a magnificent commission from the king to paint the portraits of the allied sovereigns, their ministers, and the exalted personages of Europe, including Pope Pius VII., Metternich, Blucher, Platoff, and Cardinal Gonsalvi. For this purpose he visited Paris, Vienna, Rome, and the other principal cities of the continent, and painted a series of portraits which is now deposited in the Waterloo Hall at Windsor. He was knighted in 1815, and in 1820 was elected president of the Royal Academy on the death of Benjamin West. In 1826 he paid a second visit to Paris to paint the portrait of Charles X., who rewarded him with the cross of the legion of honour. He died at his house in Russell Square, London, 7 Jan., 1830. The characteristics of his style are brilliancy of colour and a delicate mode of conveying a faithful resemblance with a beautiful sense of grace and effect. He charged high for his portraits, but, notwithstanding his immense receipts, died comparatively poor in consequence of his profuse expenditure and extravagant style of living. His Life and Correspondence by D. E. Williams was published in 1831, and a collection of engravings from fifty of his choicest works, with biographical and critical notices, in 1845.

LAWSON, Sir JOHN, a brave English admiral, was a native of Hull, and rose from the lowest station to the command of a ship. He served the parliament with great fidelity, but co-operated with Monk in effecting the Restoration, for which he received the thanks of both Houses. He afterwards served under James duke of York as rear-admiral, and was killed in the engagement with the Dutch fleet 1665.

LAX, WILLIAM, Lowndean professor of astronomy and geometry at Cambridge, died at St. Ibbs near Hitchin, Herts, of which parish he was vicar, 29 Oct., 1836, aged 75.

LAYNEZ, JAMES, the second general of the Jesuits, was born at Almacario, in the diocese of Siguenza, in Spain, 1512. He was one of the earliest companions of St. Ignatius of Loyola, after whose death he succeeded to the generalship of the Society 1558. He appeared with great distinction at the Council of Trent and the Colloquy of Poissy; was much esteemed for his prudence, learning, and piety; refused a cardinal's hat; and died at Rome 19 Jan., 1565, leaving several theological works in Latin. Father Theophilus Raynaud attributes to him also the 'Declarations on the Constitutions of the Jesuits;' while others assert that Laynez drew up the 'Constitutions' themselves, but this is an error which can be refuted by the most incontestable dates and facts. What some writers say concerning the changes introduced by Laynez into the institute of the Jesuits is equally fabulous.

LAZIUS, WOLFGANG, a physician and historian, born 1514, at Vienna, where he died 19 June, 1565.

LEACH, HUMPHREY, a native of Allerton, Shropshire, received his education at Brasenose College, Oxford, and taking orders, obtained preferment in the Established Church; but having determined to profess the Catholic religion, he repaired to Rome, and was admitted into the Society of Jesus. In due time he was sent back on the mission and stationed in Cheshire, till his death, which occurred 8 June, 1629, at the age of 56. He published 'The Triumph of Truth,' 8vo., Douay, 1609, with an appendix, concerning his conversion to the Catholic faith. There also goes under his name 'Dutifull Considerations addressed to King James concerning his premonitory Epistle to Christian Princes,' 4to., St. Omer, 1609, but Father Persons had the chief hand in its composition.

LEAKE, JOHN, M.D., was a native of Ainstable, Cumberland. He became a surgeon in London, and afterwards a licentiate of the college of physicians; but devoted himself to obstetric practice. He purchased the ground for the Westminster Lying-in Hospital, and then gave it to the governors. His principal work, 'Medical Instructions towards the prevention and cure of various Diseases incident to Women,' was translated into French and German. Died 8 Aug., 1792.

LEAKE, Sir JOHN, son of Richard Leake, mentioned below, was born at Rotherhithe 1656. He served with his father, and at the Revolution obtained the command of a ship of seventy guns. In 1692 he was at the battle off La Hogue; and in 1701 was made first captain of the 'Britannia' under the earl of Pembroke, lord high admiral of England. The year following he expelled the French from Newfoundland, and on his return was made rear-admiral of the blue in 1703. In 1704 he assisted Admiral Rooke in taking Gibraltar, for which he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1705 he saved that fortress from the conbined attacks of France and Spain. The same year he was engaged in the reduction of Barcelona, and in 1706 he so seasonably relieved that place that King Philip was obliged to raise the siege. This was followed by the reduction of Carthagena, Alicant, and Majorca. On the death of Sir Cloudesly Shovel, he was appointed admiral of the white, and commander-in-chief of the fleet. In 1708 he conveyed the queen of Spain to her consort King Charles, after which he reduced the islands of Sardinia and Minorca. Having thus terminated the campaign he returned to England, and was chosen M.P. for Rochester. On the death of Queen Anne he lost his places, after which he led a retired life. Died 1 Aug., 1720.

LEAKE, RICHARD, a naval officer, born at Harwich 1629. He displayed uncommon courage in the Dutch war after the Restoration, and subsequently was appointed master-gunner of England, and storekeeper of the ordnance. He contrived the method of firing a mortar by the blast of a piece. Died 1686.

LEAKE, STEPHEN MARTIN, F.S.A., was born 170-, being the son of Captain Martin, who married a sister of Admiral Leake, which gallant officer bequeathed his property to the captain, and the son, out of gratitude, assumed the name of Leake. On the revival of the order of the Bath he was made one of the esquires of the deputy earl marshal; in 1727 Lancaster herald; in 1729 Norroy; in 1741 Clarenceux; and in 1754 Garter king at arms. Died 24 March, 1773. His works are Reasons for granting Commissions to the Provincial Kings at Arms to visit their Provinces; Nummi Brit. Historia, or a Historical Account of English Money; The Life of Admiral Sir John Leake; The Statutes of the Order of the Garter.

LEAKE, WILLIAM MARTIN, F.R.S., served for some years in the Royal Artillery, and retired with the rank of lieutenant-colonel 1823. Having been employed during the early part of his career on special service in the east, he travelled over the whole of Greece and Asia Minor, and gave to the public the results of his labours in the following works: 'Researches in Greece, containing Remarks on the languages spoken in Greece at the present day,' 1814; 'The Topography of Athens,' 1821; second edition, enlarged, 2 vols., 1841; 'Journal of a Tour in Asia Minor,' 1824; 'Historical Outline of the Greek Revolution,' 1826; 'Travels in the Morea,' 3 vols., 1830; 'Travels in Northern Greece,' 1835-41; 'Peloponnesiaca: a Supplement to Travels in the Morea,' 1846; 'Numismata Hellenica,' 1854, with appendix, 1859. In the compilation of the last-named valuable work he was assisted by his wife, formerly Mrs. W. Marsden, née Wilkins. Col. Leake, who was an earnest advocate of the freedom and independence of Greece, died at Brighton 10 Jan., 1860.

LEAKEY, JAMES, painter, died at Exeter 16 Feb., 1865, aged 90.

LEANDER A S. MARTINO. See JONES, JOHN.

LEAPOR, MARY, was born 1722, at Marston St. Lawrence, Northamptonshire, where her father was gardener to Judge Blencowe. She died at Brackley 12 Nov., 1746. After her death, two volumes of her poems were published by subscription.

LE BAS, Rev. CHARLES WEBB, died at Brighton 25 Jan., 1861, æt. 82. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as fourth wrangler in 1800, having previously obtained a Craven scholarship. He studied originally for the bar, but finding that his deafness would prove an insuperable obstacle to his success in the legal profession, he took orders. He was prebendary of Lincoln, and held the professorship of mathematics at the East India College, Haileybury, of which establishment he was subsequently elected principal. He wrote the lives of Bishop Middleton, Wickliffe, Cranmer, Jewel, and Laud, besides numerous sermons, and articles in the 'British Critic.'

LE BAS, JEAN PHILIPPE, a French engraver, born at Paris 1707; died 14 April, 1783.

LEBEUF, JEAN, born 1687, at Auxerre, associate of the Academy of Belles Lettres and Inscriptions, honorary canon of the cathedral of Auxerre, died 10 April, 1760. He was author of 'L'Histoire d'Auxerre,' 2 vols. 4to.; 'Traité du Chant ecclésiastique,' 8vo., 1741; 'Recueil de Dissertations sur l'Histoire de France,' 3 vols. 12mo.; and 'L'Histoire du Diocèse de Paris,' 15 vols. 12mo. These works are written in a heavy style: but they contain much information.

LE BLANC, JEAN BERNARD, was born at Dijon 3 Dec., 1707. He became an abbé, and was distinguished as a man of letters. He died 1781. His principal work is entitled 'Letters on the English Nation,' of which there is a translation. He also wrote a tragedy called 'Abensaide.'

LEBLANC, MARCEL, one of the fourteen Jesuits sent by Louis XIV. to Siam. He laboured for the conversion of the Talapoins, and embarked for China; but the vessel was taken by the English, and he continued a prisoner till 1690. He died at Mozambique 1693, aged 40. We have from him a History of the Revolution of Siam.

LE BLANC, Sir SIMON, was born in or about 1749, and in 1766 was admitted of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in which society he enjoyed a fellowship for twenty years. He was made a serjeant-at-law 1787, and in June, 1799, a justice of the King's Bench, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood. Died 15 April, 1816.

LE BLOND, CHRISTOPHER, a miniature painter, born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1670. He lived some time in England, where he invented a method of engraving in colours, after which he went to Paris, and died in an hospital 1740. He wrote a treatise on ideal beauty.

LEBRUN, CHARLES, an eminent painter, of Scotch extraction, was born in France 1619, and died 12 Feb., 1690. He published a book on Physiognomy, and another on the Character of the Passions; but his greatest works are his paintings of Alexander's battles.

LEBRUN, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, duke of Placentia, a French statesman and writer, born at St. Sauveur, near Coutances, 19 March, 1739. In 1768 he became inspector-general of the property of the crown, and secretary to chancellor Maupeou, whose most celebrated reports and decrees he drew up. He shared, under Louis XVI., the disgrace of his protector; was elected (1789) deputy in the Constituent Assembly, where he voted with 'the right;' went into retirement under the Legislative Assembly and the Convention; became a member of the Council of Five Hundred, 1795; and took part (1799) in the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, when he was appointed third consul. The reorganization of the finances, and the creation of the Cour des Comptes were owing, in a great degree, to his exertions. Napoleon, on becoming emperor, made him his principal treasurer, and entrusted him (1806) with the government of Liguria, and the organization of that republic in French departments (1810) and also with the government of Holland. He was created a peer of France 1814; held for a time the office of grand master of the university of Paris; and died 16 June, 1824. He published free translations of the Jerusalem Delivered, the Iliad, and the Odyssey.

LEBRUN, LAURENT, a French Jesuit, who published 'Virgilius Christianus,' and 'Ovidius Christianus,' which show more piety than taste. He was born at Nantes in 1607, and died at Paris 1 Sept., 1663. Besides the above works, he was the author of 'Eloquentia Poetica,' which is a useful treatise on poetical composition.

LE BRUN, PIERRE, a learned priest of the Oratory, born at Brignolles 11 June, 1661; died at Paris 6 Jan., 1729. His chief works are a Critical History of Superstitious Practices; Explanation of the Ceremonies of the Mass; a treatise against dramatic performances; and another against the Divining Rod.

LEBRUN, PONCE DENIS ÉCOUCHARD, a French lyric poet, born 1729, at Paris, where he died 2 Sept., 1807.

LECCHI, JOHN ANTHONY, a mathematician, born at Milan 17 Nov., 1702. He entered the society of Jesus, and was appointed professor of rhetoric at Brera; afterwards of mathematics at Pavia, and next at Milan. In 1759 he settled at Vienna, as mathematician to the imperial court; and he displayed great ability in measuring the bed of the river Reno, on which he was employed several years. His works are Theoria Lucis; Arithmetica Universalis Is. Newtoni, illustrata et aucta; Elementa Geometriæ; Elementa Trigonometriæ; De Sectionibus Conicis; Idrostatica esaminata; Relasione della visita alle terre dannegiate delle acque di Bologna, Ferrere e Ravenna; Memoire idrostatico-storiche dell operazioni esequite nella inalveazione del Reno; Trattato de' Canali Navigabili. Died 24 Aug., 1776.

LE CÈNE, CHARLES, a Protestant divine, born at Caen, 1646. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he came to England, where he died May, 1703. In 1696 he published the prospectus of a new French translation of the Scriptures. This was translated into English, without any acknowledgment, by Henry Ross, and two editions of it met with a favourable reception. Le Cène's version was printed by his son, at Amsterdam, and greatly disappointed those who had formed expectations of it from the Essay.

LE CLERC, DANIEL, a physician, born at Genoa 1652. After studying at Paris and Montpellier he took his doctor's degree at Valentia, and then settled in his own country, where he practised with success till 1704, when he retired from the profession on becoming a member of the council of state. Died 8 June, 1728. His works are 'Bibliotheca Anatomica,' 2 vols. folio; a 'History of Medicine,' which has been translated into English; and 'Historia Latorum Lumbricorum.'

LE CLERC, JEAN, an eminent writer, brother of the preceding, was born at Geneva 1657. After going through a proper course of study he was ordained at Geneva; but on embracing the Arminian doctrines he left his native country, and went to Saumur, from whence he proceeded to London, where he officiated for some time in two French churches. The climate of England not agreeing with his constitution, he went to Amsterdam, and became professor of philosophy, Hebrew, and belles lettres, in the Remonstrant College. Le Clerc survived his mental faculties, and died 8 Jan., 1736. It would occupy too much room to give a catalogue of his works. In 1686 he commenced a literary journal, entitled 'Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique,' continued to 1693, in 25 vols. 12mo. From 1703 to 1713 he conducted another, entitled 'Bibliothèque Choisie,' 28 vols. 12mo., which was followed by his 'Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne,' from 1714 to 1729, 29 vols. 12mo. He also published Systems of Logic, Ontology, and Pneumatology; but one of his best performances is his Ars Critica. Besides these he published several miscellaneous pieces; editions of ancient and modern authors; a translation of the Bible into French; Commentaries on the Scriptures, &c.

LECLERC, NICOLAS GABRIEL, a French physician and historian, born at Baume-les-Dames (Franche-Comté) 1726; died at Versailles 30 Dec., 1798. He visited Russia several times, and, by order of Louis XV., collected materials for a history of that country, which was published at Paris, in 6 vols. 4to., 1783-94. He wrote other works on the healing art, the education of youth, &c.

LE CLERC, SÉBASTIEN, a designer and engraver, born at Metz 1637: died 23 Oct., 1714. Pope Clement XI. conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and Louis XIV. appointed him his engraver in ordinary. He executed above three thousand pieces; besides which he published A Treatise of Theoretic and Practical Geometry; A Treatise on Architecture; and A Discourse on Perspective. He had a son of both his names, who became an historical painter, and many engravings have been made from his pictures. He was a member of the Academy of Painting at Paris, and died, aged 86, in 1763. Another son of Sébastien was Laurent Jose Le Clerc, an ecclesiastic, who published three volumes of remarks on Moreri's Dictionary. He died 7 May, 1736.

LECLERC, VICTOR EMMANUEL, a French general, born at Pontoise 17 March, 1772. He served in the armies of the Alps and of Italy, and became a general of brigade 1797, in which year he married Pauline, the sister of Napoleon. He distinguished himself under Moreau, in Germany (1799), took part in the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, and was nominated commander of the expedition to St. Domingo. He sailed from Brest in Dec., 1801, and achieved some successes; but being seized with yellow fever, he died 2 Dec., 1802.

L'ÉCLUSE, CHARLES DE, Clusius, a botanist, born at Arras 1526. He was educated at Ghent and Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in physic; after which he travelled in various countries, and three times visited England. The Emperor Maximilian II. conferred on him the rank of nobility; and in 1593 he was chosen professor of botany at Leyden, where he died 4 April, 1609. His works are very valuable.

LECOMTE, FÉLIX, a sculptor, of Paris, born 16 Jan., 1737; died 11 Feb., 1817. The statues of Rollin and Fénélon are regarded as his masterpieces.

LECOMTE, LOUIS, a French Jesuit, born about 1650, at Bordeaux, where he died 1729. He was sent to China as a missionary and mathematician (1685), and on his return published 'Memoirs' relating to that country, which were censured by the faculty of divinity at Paris, and condemned by the parliament to be burnt.

LECOQ, PIERRE, a French ecclesiastic, born at Ifs, near Caen, 1708; died 1777. He wrote on the Usury of Commercial Loans; Letters on Ecclesiastical Discipline; a treatise on different kinds of Property; another on Funds, &c.

LECOUVRIER, ADRIENNE, a celebrated French actress, who played the principal tragic and comic parts at Paris, from 1717 till her death, 20 March, 1730, aged 41.

LEDERLIN, JOHN HENRY, professor of Hebrew and Greek at Strasburg, was an accomplished critic, and published editions of several classical authors. Born 1672; died 1737.

LEDIARD, THOMAS, author of a 'Naval History of England,' and a Life of the Duke of Marlborough, died June, 1743.

LEDRAN, HENRI FRANÇOIS, a famous surgeon and lithotomist, author of Surgery, 2 vols., and other professional works, was born 1685, at Paris, where he died 17 Oct., 1770.

LEDWICH, EDWARD, LL.D., an antiquary, was a native of Ireland, and received his education in Trinity College, Dublin, where he was elected to a fellowship. He was also presented to the college living of Aghadoe in the Queen's county, and became secretary to the Royal Irish Academy. Died 3 Aug., 1823, aged 83. His works consist of 'Antiquities of Ireland,' 1793; 'Statistical Account of the Parish of Aghadoe,' 1796; papers in the Archæologia,' and in the Memoirs of the Royal Irish Academy.

LEDYARD, JOHN, a traveller born in Connecticut 1751. After going round the world with Captain Cook, he formed the design of traversing the whole of the north of Europe on foot, which he accomplished, even to Behring's Straits and Hudson's Bay. This romantic enterprise he executed, alone and unarmed. He next undertook to traverse the regions of Africa; but died at Cairo 1788.

LEE, CHARLES, was born at Dernhall, Cheshire, 1731. After serving in the English army, under Generals Abercrombie and Burgoyne, he went to Virginia (1773), and at the commencement of the revolutionary war was appointed a major-general in the American army, and afterwards to the command of the troops in the Southern States. He rendered important services to the United States; but being censured and suspended for disobedience of orders, he retired into private life. Died at Philadelphia 2 Oct., 1782. Anecdotes of General Lee, with his Political and Military Essays, were published at London 1792.

LEE, EDWARD, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Great Lee, Kent, and sent to Magdalen College, Oxford, about 1498, but took his M.A. degree at Cambridge 1504. He was appointed chaplain and almoner to Henry VIII., who employed him on several embassies. In Feb., 1528-9, he was made chancellor of the church of Sarum, and in 1530 promoted to the archbishopric of York. Died 13 Sept., 1544. A list of his writings is given in Cooper's 'Athenæ Cantabrigienses.'

LEE, FRANCIS, M.D., was born at Cobham, Surrey, 1660, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship, which he lost at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. He then went to Italy, where he took his doctor's degree, and in 1708 was admitted a fellow of the College of Physicians in London. He was the intimate friend of the pious Nelson, and assisted him in his book on the Fasts and Feasts, as he also did Dr. Grabe in his edition of the LXX. He died in France, 1719. His own works are 'The Life of John Kettlewell;' 'The History of Montanism;' 'Dissertation on Esdras;' two volumes of theological and mathematical miscellanies, published, with his life, for the benefit of his daughter, 1752.

LEE, HARRIET. See LEE, SOPHIA.

LEE, HENRY, for many years the proprietor and manager of theatres in the west of England, died in London, 30 March, 1836, aged 71. He wrote various poems and dramatic pieces, including 'Caleb Quotem and his Wife, an Opera,' 8vo., 1810.

LEE, JOHN, D.D., LL.D., M.D., a learned Scotch divine and theological writer, born in the parish of Stow, Mid Lothian, 1780. He was appointed principal of the university of Edinburgh, 1840, and continued in that office till his death on 2 May, 1859.

LEE, NATHANIEL, a dramatic poet, born at Hatfield, Herts, and educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1668). After an unsuccessful attempt to gain a living as an actor, he turned dramatic author, and wrote several tragedies, which were received with applause. The best are 'The Rival Queens,' and 'Theodosius.' Died 1692.

LEE, SAMUEL, a Puritan divine, born in London 1625. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and next at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he obtained the degree of M.A., and was chosen fellow of Wadham College. He became a popular preacher in London, but, being silenced at the Restoration, went to New England. After the Revolution he embarked for his own country, but was taken on the passage, and carried to France, where he died Nov., 1691. His works are 'Chronicon Castrense,' added to King's Vale Royal of Cheshire; Orbis Miraculum, or the Temple of Solomon pourtrayed; Contemplations on Mortality; and other works. He also had a considerable hand in Hevicus's 'Theatrum Historicum,' edit. 1662.

LEE, SAMUEL, D.D., an accomplished linguist, born at Longnor, Shropshire, 14 May, 1783, of humble parentage. He was educated in the charity-school of his native village, and at the age of twelve was apprenticed to a carpenter. While labouring at his craft he mastered the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Syriac languages. Subsequently he acquired a knowledge of Arabic, Persian, French, German, and Italian, with the assistance of Archdeacon Corbett, who procured his appointment (1810) to the mastership of a foundation school at Shrewsbury. He entered Queen's College, Cambridge, 1813, graduated B.A. 1818, took orders, and became professor of Arabic in that university 1819, and in 1831 regius professor of Hebrew. In 1833, being then a member of Trinity College, he proceeded to his D.D. degree at Cambridge; but the same honour had been conferred upon him more than ten years previously by the university of Halle. He died at Barley, Herts, 16 Dec., 1852. His principal works are, 'A Grammar of the Hebrew Language,' 1827; sixth edition 1844; 'On the Study of the Holy Scriptures,' 1830; 'The Travels of Ibn Batuta, translated from the Arabic 1833; a translation of Job, 1837; 'Hebrew, Chaldee, and English Lexicon,' 1844.

LEE, SOPHIA, an English authoress, was the daughter of John Lee, an actor at Covent Garden, after whose death she kept a school at Bath in conjunction with her sister Harriet. After amassing a competency she died at Clifton 13 March, 1824. Her works are 'The Chapter of Accidents,' a comedy; 'Assignation,' a comedy; 'The Recess,' said to be the first English romance in which history is blended with fiction; 'The Hermit's Tale,' a ballad; 'Almeyda, Queen of Grenada,' a tragedy; 'The Life of a Lover,' a novel; and two of the stories in her sister's 'Canterbury Tales.' Harriet Lee survived her sister many years, dying at Clifton 1 Aug., 1851, aged 94. Her works are 'The Error of Innocence,' a novel, 1786; 'The New Peerage, or Our Eyes may deceive us,' a comedy; 'The Canterbury Tales,' 5 vols., 1797-1805; 'Kruitzner,' a tale which suggested to Byron his tragedy of Werner; 'Clara Lennox,' a novel; and a play called 'The Mysterious Marriage, or the Heirship of Roselva.'

LEE, WILLIAM, an ingenious inventor, was a native of Woodborough, Notts, and was matriculated as a sizar of Christ's College, Cambridge, May, 1579. He subsequently removed to St. John's College, and as a member of that society proceeded B.A. 1582-3. It is believed that he commenced M.A. 1586. In 1589, at which time, it is stated, he was curate of Calverton, near Nottingham, he invented the stocking frame. The tradition is that he was deeply in love with a young woman at or near Calverton; but she, whenever he went to visit her, seemed more mindful of her knitting than of his addresses. This creating an aversion on his part to knitting by hand, he determined to contrive a machine which should turn out work enough to render the common knitting an unprofitable employment. He taught his brother James and others to work under him, and for some years practised his new art at Calverton. Either he or his brother exhibited the machine at work to Queen Elizabeth; but his invention was slighted and discouraged by his countrymen. Henry IV. invited him to settle in France, promising him great rewards, privileges, and honours. Accordingly, he and nine workmen established themselves, with as many frames, at Rouen, where they carried on the manufacture of stockings with success and approbation under the king's protection. The assassination of Henry IV., and the troubles which ensued in France, disappointed Lee's hopes of obtaining the promised privileges; and he died of grief at Paris in or soon after 1610. Upon his decease seven of his workmen returned to England, and they, with one Aston, of Calverton, who had been his apprentice, laid the foundation of the manufacture in this country.—Athen. Cantab. iii. 37.

LEECH, JOHN, a caricaturist, was born 29 Aug., 1817, being son of Mr. John Leech, who kept the London Coffee House, Ludgate Hill. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and afterwards placed with a medical practitioner at Hoxton. Here he diversified his medical studies by pen-and-ink sketches of his master and fellow-students; and some of these falling in the way of Mr. Barham, the author of the 'Ingoldsby Legends,' the young man was by him introduced to Bentley the publisher. An engagement to illustrate the 'Legends' followed, and the medical profession was at once abandoned. Soon after 'Punch' was started Leech joined its staff, and he continued so employed, among other occupations, for the rest of his life, his first sketch, entitled 'Foreign Affairs,' appearing in Aug., 1841, and his last on the day of his funeral. Three volumes of his pictorial contributions to 'Punch,' were published in a collected form under the title of 'Pictures of Life and Character.' He also illustrated several of Albert Smith's novels, the 'Comic History of England,' and other works. His death happened at Kensington, 29 Oct., 1864.

LEECHMAN, William, D.D., was born at Dolphington, Lanarkshire, 1706, and educated at Edinburgh. He became professor of theology at Glasgow 1743; principal of that university 1761; and died 3 Dec., 1785. He wrote 'Sermons,' published in a collected form, 1789; and a life of Dr. Hutcheson, prefixed to the latter's 'Moral Philosophy,' 1755.

LEEDS, THOMAS OSBORNE, DUKE OF, was the son and heir of Sir Edward Osborne, Bart. In 1673 he was created Viscount Latimer, and in the following year earl of Danby. He succeeded Lord Clifford in the office of lord high treasurer which the latter had resigned on the passing of the Test Act (1673). When he entered upon this employment the Treasury was totally exhausted, and the very title of lord treasurer had become odious; so that it required the utmost stretch of his abilities to restore in some degree the public credit, and bring the revenue into tolerable order. This he, by skilful management and great industry, effected; but he was thought to be too much in the interest of the court to act with integrity in his high office. The earl of Shaftesbury, his capital enemy, caused him to be impeached in parliament 1678, and he was imprisoned till 1684. He was created marquis of Carmarthen 1689; duke of Leeds 1694; and died 1712.

LEEPE, JOHN ANTHONY VAN DER, a painter of Bruges, died 1720, aged 56.

LEFEBVRE, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, duke of Danzig, a marshal of France, born at Rufach (Haut-Rhin) 1755, died at Paris 14 Sept., 1820. His principal exploit was the capture of Danzig (24 May, 1807) for which he was rewarded with the title of duke.

LEFÈVRE, CLAUDE, a French portrait painter born at Fontainebleau 1631; died in London 1675.

LEFÈVRE DE LA BODERIE, GUI, was born in Lower Normandy 1541. He acquired a great knowledge of the Oriental languages, and had a concern in the Polyglot Bible which bears the name of Montanus. He was secretary to the duke d'Alençon, and died 1598. His brother, Nicolas, was also a very learned man, and died in 1605. Antoine Lefèvre, another brother, was distinguished by his skill in diplomacy, and died 1615. His negotiations were printed 1749.

LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES, JACQUES, was born at Étaples, in Picardy, about 1440. He contributed to the revival of letters in the university of Paris but, being suspected of Lutheranism, was obliged to retire to Meaux, where for some time the bishop protected him, till the violence of Lefèvre's enemies compelled him to remove to Blois, and from thence to Guienne. Died 1537. He was the friend of Erasmus, and, like him, was too timid to separate entirely from the church of Rome. In 151 he published a translation of St. Paul's Epistles and in 1530 a French version of the Bible.

LEFÈVRE, JACQUES, doctor of the Sorbonne and grand vicar of Bourges, was a native of Coutance. He gained great celebrity by his 'Motifs invincibles pour convaincre ceux de la Religio prétendue Réformée.' He wrote several othe controversial pieces. Died 1 July, 1716.

LEFÈVRE, ROBERT, a French portrait painter, born at Bayeux (Calvados) 1756; died at Paris Jan., 1831.

LEFÈVRE, ROLAND a portrait painter, was a native of Anjou, and died in England, 1677.

LEFORT, FRANCIS, a general and admiral in the Russian service, the esteemed friend and adviser of Peter the Great, was born at Geneva 1656, and died at Moscow 12 March, 1699.

LEFROY, THOMAS LANGLOIS, LL.D., an Irish judge, born 8 Jan., 1776. He was chief justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland from 1852 till his death, which occurred 4 May, 1869. He published a volume of legal 'Reports.'

LEGALLOIS, JULIEN JEAN CÉSAR, a French physician and physiologist, born 1770; died Feb., 1814.

LEGENDRE, ADRIEN MARIE, one of the greatest of French mathematicians, was born at Toulouse 1752; died 10 Jan., 1833. His beautiful theorem on the spherical excess of a small spherical triangle, his discoveries relative to the theory of numbers, and his famous method of least squares, are sufficient to immortalise his name. Of his works, the best known is the 'Elements of Geometry,' which has been translated into English by Sir David Brewster.

LEGENDRE, GILBERT CHARLES, marquis of St. Aubin-sur-Loire, wrote A Treatise on Opinion, Antiquities of the Royal House of France, &c. Born 1688 at Paris; died there 8 May, 1746.

LEGENDRE, LOUIS, a French priest, author of several esteemed historical and biographical works, was born at Rouen 1659, and died at Paris 1 Feb., 1733.

LEGENDRE, LOUIS, a deputy in the national convention, who, after being a sailor and then a butcher, became a fitting instrument of the atrocities of Marat and Robespierre. Born at Paris 1756; died 13 Dec., 1797.

LEGER, ANTHONY, a Protestant divine, born at Ville Seiche, in Piedmont, 1594, became professor of divinity at Geneva, and died 1661. He published an edition of the Greek Testament, accompanied by the Romaic version of Maximus Calliopolitanus; and 'Authentic Monuments of the Religion of the Greeks.' His son of the same names, born at Geneva 1652, became professor of divinity there, and died 1719, leaving a number of sermons and Latin dissertations. John Leger, nephew of Anthony the elder, was born at Ville Seiche 1615, and died pastor of the Walloon church at Leyden, about 1680. He wrote in French a history of the Piedmontese Protestants.

LEGGE, GEORGE, Lord Dartmouth. See DARTMOUTH.

LEGOUVÉ, GABRIEL MARIE JEAN BAPTISTE, a French poet and dramatist, born at Paris 23 June, 1764; died 30 Aug., 1812.

LEGRAIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French historian, born at Paris 1565; died 2 July, 1642.

LE GRAND, ANTOINE, a Franciscan friar, known in religion as Bonaventura à S. Anna, was a native of Douay, where he became professor of philosophy and divinity. Afterwards he was sent as a missionary to England, and resided principally in Oxfordshire. He was elected provincial of his order 10 July, 1698, and died 26 July, 1699. Father Le Grand was much attached to the Cartesian system, of which he published an explanation, frequently printed in England. Besides this work he wrote some in Latin and French on metaphysical subjects; but his best performance is an ecclesiastical history, entitled 'Historia Sacra a mundo condito ad Constantinum Magnum.'

LEGRAND, JACQUES GUILLAUME, a French architect, born at Paris 9 May, 1743; died at St. Denis 9 Nov., 1807.

LEGRAND, JOACHIM, was born 6 Feb., 1653, at St. Lo, in Normandy. He entered into the congregation of the Oratory, but quitted it to become a tutor at Paris; after which he went to Portugal, as secretary to the embassy, and Spain. He held a controversy with Bishop Burnet, respecting the divorce of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, on which subject he published three volumes. He died at Paris 30 April, 1733. His other works are a translation of Lobo's History of Abyssinia, and 'De la Succession à la Couronne de France.'

LEGRAND D'AUSSY, PIERRE JEAN BAPTISTE, was born at Amiens 1737. He was educated at Amiens in the college of the Jesuits, of which order he became a member, and was appointed professor of rhetoric at Caen. On the suppression of the society he was made secretary of the military school, and in 1796 conservator of the French manuscripts in the national library. Died 5 Dec., 1800. He is known by his 'Fabliaux,' or tales of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, 5 vols.; 'Contes dévots, Fables, et Romans anciens, pour servir de suite aux Fabliaux,' 'Histoire de la vie privé des Français;' A Tour to Auvergne; 'Vie d'Apollonius de Tyanes.' At the time of his death, he was engaged on a History of French Poetry, which he left unfinished.

LEGROS, NICOLAS, canon of Rheims, was born in that city 1675. For his zeal against the bull Unigenitus he was excommunicated, on which he went to Holland; but when Louis XIV. died, the ecclesiastical censure was taken off, and he returned to Rheims in 1716. In 1721 he was banished on the same account; and after visiting Italy he settled in Holland, and died there 4 Dec., 1751. His principal works are 'La Sainte Bible, traduite sur les textes originaux, avec les différences de la Vulgate,' 6 vols.; 'Méditations sur la concorde des Évangiles;' 'Sur l'Épitre aux Romains;' 'Sur les Épitres canoniques.' Besides these he published several books on the bull Unigenitus, and other controversial subjects.

LEGUANO, STEFANO MARIA, an historical painter, born at Bologna 1660; died 1715.

LEIBNITZ, GODFREY WILLIAM, was born at Leipsic 3 July, 1646. His father was professor of philosophy, and secretary of the university, but died when his son was about six years old. At the age of fifteen he entered the college of his native place after which he went to Jena, with a view to the study of the law, in which he took his doctor's degree. He next visited the university of Nuremberg, where he applied himself to chemistry, but removed from thence to the court of Mentz, and was appointed a counsellor. In 1672 he went to Paris, and, while there, studied the mathematics. The year following he visited England, and became acquainted with Oldenburg, from whom he received an account of Newton's invention of fluxions, which afterwards he claimed as his own. In 1679 he obtained the patronage of the electoral prince of Hanover, who employed him to write the history of the house of Brunswick; for which pur-sician, and published several treatises on medical and chemical subjects.

LEMNIUS, Lævinus, a physician, born in Zealand 1504. On the decease of his wife he took orders, and obtained a canonry. Died 1 July, 1568. He wrote an account of the plants mentioned in Scripture; a book on astrology; 'De occultis Naturæ Miraculis;' and other works, several of which have been translated into English.

LEMOINE, Abraham, a Frenchman, who, on account of his religion, came to London, where he officiated to a congregation of French Protestants; and died 1760. He translated into French Bishop Gibson's Pastoral Letters, and other works on divinity.

LEMOINE, Etienne, a Protestant divine, was born at Caen, in 1624, and died 3 April, 1689, at Leyden, where he was professor of theology. His dissertations on critical subjects were collected into 2 vols. 4to., under the title of 'Varia Sacra.'

LEMOINE, François, a painter, born at Paris 1688. He was employed for four years on the Apotheosis of Hercules, in the saloon at Versailles; for which he had a pension. He destroyed himself in a fit of lunacy, 4 June, 1737.

LEMOINE, Pierre, a French poet, born at Chaumont, in Bassigny, 1602. He became a Jesuit; and his greatest work is an epic on the history of St. Louis. Died 22 Aug., 1671.

LEMON, George William, an English clergyman, master of Norwich School, died 1797, aged 71. He was author of 'English Etymology, or a derivative Dictionary of the English Language,' 4to. London, 1783.

LEMON, Robert, F.S.A., deputy-keeper of his majesty's state papers, died in London 29 July, 1835, aged 56. In the duties of his office he evinced the greatest zeal and enthusiasm, and nearly every historical work published in his time bears a testimony to his exertions.

LEMONNIER, Pierre, professor of philosophy in the college of Harcourt, in Paris, died 27 Nov., 1757, aged 82. He wrote 'Cursus Philosophicus,' 6 vols.

LEMONNIER, Pierre Charles, an astronomer, son of the preceding, was a member of the Academy of Sciences and of the National Institute. He was born at Paris 23 Nov., 1715. At the age of twenty-one he became assistant to Maupertuis in the measurement of a degree at the Polar Circle. After this he determined the positions of the zodiacal stars, and traced at St. Sulpice a new meridian line. He also traced the inequalities produced in the motion of Saturn by the action of Jupiter. He died 2 April, 1799, leaving some able works on astronomy. His brother, Louis Guillaume Lemonnier (b. 1717; d. 7 Sept., 1799), was also a member of the Academy of Sciences, of the National Institute, and a fellow of the Royal Society of London. He was a very able physician and experimental philosopher, and contributed to the 'Encyclopédie' several articles on electricity.

LEMPRIERE, John, D.D., was born in the island of Jersey 1765, and educated at Reading School, under Dr. Valpy, whence he removed to Pembroke College, Oxford (M.A. 1792; B.D. 1801; D.D. 1803). About 1793 he became master of Abingdon School, which he conducted with reputation for some years, and then was elected to the grammar school of Exeter. Here, however, he did not continue long, owing to his pertinacity in obtruding books on the school, contrary to the established regulations. After many disputes he was compelled to resign the situation, whereupon he petitioned parliament for redress, without effect. In 1811 he obtained the rectory of Meath, Devonshire. He died suddenly in London 1 Feb., 1824. His works are 'Bibliotheca Classica; or a Classical Dictionary,' taken chiefly from Sabatier's 'Siècles Payens;' a translation of Herodotus, of which only one volume was published; Universal Biography.

LENCLOS, Anne, or more familiarly Ninon de, a celebrated beauty, born 15 May, 1616, at Paris, of a respectable family. Her mother wished to devote her to the seclusion of a convent, but her father, who was a man of gallantry, prevented it; and the daughter, losing both her parents at the age of fifteen, soon devoted herself to the pleasures of the world. Courted for her understanding and her wit, but more for her beauty, she rejected the honourable offers of matrimony; and as she possessed opulence she determined to enjoy her liberty, and therefore yielded her person to those who, for greatness of talents, of birth, or of rank, were most pleasing to her licentious imagination. Yet she affected to preserve the manners of a woman of virtue; and so dignified was her personal deportment that ladies of character became her friends and associates. Sensible of the charms of virtue, and well skilled in the works of Montaigne and Charron, she talked as a philosopher; but while she reasoned like Socrates, she acted the part of Laïs. Long flattered by the gay and the opulent, she preserved her beauty almost to the last, and died 17 Oct., 1706, aged 90. One of her sons, ignorant of her relationship, became enamoured of her; and when she declared herself to be his mother the unfortunate youth, in despair, stabbed himself in her presence. There are a few genuine letters by her in the works of St. Evremond; but those under her name addressed to the Marquis de Sévigné are fictitious.

LE NEVE, John, an antiquary, was born in London 27 Dec., 1679, and educated at Eton, whence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, but left the university without a degree. After publishing the works enumerated below, without deriving from them any pecuniary benefit, he took orders in his forty-fourth year, and in Jan., 1721-2, was instituted to the rectory of Thornton-le-Moor, Lincolnshire; but this addition to his means, though evidently intended to afford him some relief from his troubles, had a directly contrary effect, for as soon as the circumstance became known to his creditors, they arrested him and threw him into Lincoln gaol. In all probability he died at his rectory in 1741. His principal work is 'Fasti Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ,' folio, 1716, a most useful compilation, chiefly from Bishop Kennett's MSS., containing a list of the principal dignitaries in every cathedral, collegiate church or chapel, in England and Wales. A greatly improved edition, with a continuation by Mr. T. Duffus Hardy, from 1715 to the date of publication, appeared at Oxford, 3 vols. 8vo., 1854. Le Neve's other productions are a Life of Dr. Field, Dean of Gloucester, 1716; 'Monumenta Anglicana: being Inscriptions on the Monuments of several eminent Persons deceased' (from 1600 to 1718), 5 vols. 8vo., 1717-19; a collection of monumental inscriptions (from A.D. 1400 to A.D. 1716) in Harl. MSS. 3605-3616; Lives of the Protestant Bishops, 2 parts, 1720 (all published), containing the Archbishops of Canterbury and York.

LE NEVE, PETER, F.R.S., F.S.A., was born 21 Jan., 1661-2, and entering the College of Arms, became Rouge-Croix pursuivant 17 Jan., 1688-9; next Richmond herald; and finally Norroy, king-at-arms. He likewise held the office of deputy-chamberlain of the Exchequer, and had the honour of being chosen the first president of the Society of Antiquaries on its revival in 1717. Died 24 Sept., 1729. He left numerous MSS. on genealogy and topography, some of which came into the possession of Honest Tom Martin, of Palgrave, in Suffolk, who married his widow.

LE NEVE, Sir WILLIAM, LL.D., was born at Aslacton, Norfolk, and educated at Caius College, Cambridge. Entering the College of Arms, he was appointed Mowbray herald extraordinary 24 June, 1624; York herald, 25 Nov., 1625; Norroy king-at-arms 3 Jan., 1633-4, about which time he received the honour of knighthood; and Clarenceux king-at-arms 22 June, 1635. During the civil war he several times, in his tabard, preceded by a trumpeter, summoned garrisons, and upon their refusing to surrender, declared them traitors, at the imminent risk of his life. Being at Oxford with the king in 1642, that university honoured him with the degree of LL.D. In 1646 the Parliament not only deprived him of his office of Clarenceux, but seized his estate, sequestrating it till they had obtained £524—a very large sum in those days. Grief for his own and his sovereign's misfortunes led to the loss of his reason. He died 1661, being buried on the 15th of Aug., in the church of St. Bennet, Paul's Wharf.

LENFANT, JACQUES, a French Protestant divine, born at Bazoches (La Beauce) 1661; went in 1688 to Berlin, where he was appointed preacher to the queen of Prussia, member of the Academy of Sciences, and counsellor of the Superior Consistory. Died 7 Aug., 1728. He wrote a vast number of works on ecclesiastical history, including a history of Pope Joan, and published, in collaboration with Beausobre, a French translation of the New Testament.

LENG, JOHN, was born at Norwich 1665, and educated at St. Paul's School, from whence he removed to Catharine Hall, Cambridge. In 1708 he was presented to the rectory of Beddington, Surrey, and in 1723 made bishop of Norwich. Died 26 Oct., 1727. He published two of the comedies of Aristophanes; a Course of Sermons at Boyle's Lecture; an edition of Terence; and a volume of Sermons.

LENGLET DU FRESNOY, NICOLAS, a French writer, born at Beauvais 5 Oct., 1674. He was an ecclesiastic, but so much given to satire and political intrigues that he was frequently sent to the Bastille. He also acted the part of a spy, and committed many acts of treachery to gain intelligence and gratify his employers. His death was occasioned by falling into the fire 15 Jan., 1755. His principal works are Méthode pour étudier l'Histoire, avec un Catalogue des principaux Historiens, 32 vols.; Méthode pour étudier la Geographie; Histoire de la Philosophie Hermetique; Tablettes Chronologiques de l'Histoire Universelle, 2 vols. His Method of studying History, and Chronological Tables, have been translated into English.

LENNARD, SAMPSON, an English translator, was a native of Kent. In early life he followed the profession of arms, and was attached to Sir Philip Sidney, with whom he fought at the battle of Zutphen. Afterwards he became distinguished as a man of letters and as a member of the College of Arms. He was appointed Rouge Rose pursuivant-extraordinary Feb., 1615; was very shortly afterwards advanced to the post of Bluemantle pursuivant-in-ordinary; and dying in Aug., 1633, was buried on the 17th of that month, at St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf. He published various translations from the Latin and French, particularly Perrin's 'History of the Waldenses;' Du Plessis Mornay's 'History of Papacie;' and Charron 'On Wisdom.'

LENNEP, JOHN DANIEL VAN, a learned Hellenist, born at Leeuwarden (Holland) 1724; died at Aix-la-Chapelle 6 Feb., 1771. He was professor of Greek and Latin at Groningen (1752-68), and afterwards at Franeker. His principal work is 'Etymologicum Linguæ Græcæ.'

LENNOX, CHARLOTTE, an ingenious lady, of whose history nothing more is known than that she was born 1720; that her father, Colonel Ramsay, was lieutenant-governor of New York, by whom she was sent to England, where she married early, and was left a widow with one child. In 1747 she published a volume of poems; and in 1751 her novel of 'Harriet Stuart;' which was followed the next year by 'The Female Quixote.' After this appeared, in quick succession, several works translated from the French, and 'Henrietta,' a novel of considerable merit. She also wrote some dramatic pieces. Her last publication was 'Euphemia,' a novel. MRS. Lennox enjoyed the friendship of several persons of eminence, particularly Dr. Johnson. Died 4 Jan., 1804.

LENS, BERNARD, a miniature painter, and enameller to George II., died 30 Dec., 1740, aged 58. He published some drawing-books, and several views.

LENTHALL, WILLIAM, an English lawyer, and speaker of the Long Parliament, was born at Henley-on-Thames, Oxfordshire, June, 1591. He was educated at St. Alban Hall, Oxford, and going afterwards to Lincoln's Inn was called to the bar, and became eminent as a counsellor. In 1639 he was elected M.P. for Woodstock, and in 1640 chosen speaker of the House of Commons, in which capacity he amassed a considerable fortune by siding with the ruling party. He was also master of the rolls, a commissioner of the great seal, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was turned out by Cromwell 1653; but the year following he became speaker of the parliament called by the usurper, as he did also of the Rump. At the Restoration he was exempted from the Act of Indemnity, but obtained a general pardon from the king. Died 3 Sept., 1662. Several of his speeches and letters are in print.

LEO (ST.), The Great, a doctor of the Church, and one of the most eminent men who have occupied the Holy See, was a native of Rome, and was elected Pope 440. He distinguished himself by his zeal against the Manichæans, Pelagians, and Priscillianists. When Attila marched against Rome Leo met him, and prevailed upon him to return home. This pope also saved the city from being destroyed by Genseric. Died 3 Nov., 461. The best edition of his works is by Father Quesnel, folio, Lyons, 1700.

LEO II. (ST.), a Sicilian, succeeded Pope Agatho 17 Aug., 682; died 3 July, 683.

LEO III., a Roman, elected Pope 795; died 11 June, 816.

LEO IV., a Roman, elected Pope 847; died 17 July, 855.

LEO V., a native of Ardea, succeeded Benedict IV. 904, but was deposed by Christopher about a month afterwards, and sent to prison, where he died of grief.

LEO VI., a Roman, succeeded John X. 6 July, 928; died 20 Jan., 929.

LEO VII., a Roman, elected pope 936; died 23 April, 939.

LEO VIII. was elected pope by the emperor Otho's authority 963. Fleury mentions him as a legitimate pontiff; but Baronius and Pagi treat him as an intruder and an anti-pope. Died April, 965. Benedict V. disputed the papal chair with him.

LEO IX. (St.), Bruno, was elected pope 1048; died 19 April, 1054.

LEO X. was born at Florence 1475, being the second son of Lorenzo de' Medici, and baptized by the name of John. At the age of thirteen he was made a cardinal. He succeeded Pope Julius II. 1513, and assumed the name of Leo. He was a patron of literature, and encouraged the study of the Greek language. After opposing the king of France he made peace with him, and in 1515 concluded a concordat on the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction. But the most remarkable circumstance in this pontificate was the rise of the Reformation under Luther, occasioned by the indulgences which Leo issued, to enable him to complete the church of St. Peter. Died 1 Dec., 1521.

LEO XI., Alexander de' Medici, was elected Pope 1 April, 1605, and died on the 17th of the same month.

LEO XII., Annibal della Genga, born 1760; was elected successor to Pius VII. 28 Sept., 1823; and died 10 Feb., 1829.

LEO I., The Elder, emperor of the East, ascended the throne 457, and died 474.

LEO II., The Younger, was the son of Zeno and of Ariadne, daughter of Leo I. He succeeded his uncle, 474, under the guardianship of his father, who soon afterwards caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Leo died the same year.

LEO III., The Isaurian, was associated in the empire with Anastasius II. 717, and died 741.

LEO IV., son of Constantine Copronymus, succeeded his father 775, at the age of twenty-five; and died 780.

LEO V., The Armenian, was elected emperor, 813, and was assassinated 820.

LEO VI., surnamed The Wise, or The Philosopher, succeeded his father, Basil the Macedonian, 886. He expelled the patriarch Photius, and defeated the Hungarians and Bulgarians. Died 911. His works are, A System of Tactics; Novellæ Constitutiones; and Opus Basilicon.

LEO, of Modena, a Jewish writer, whose real name was Rabbi Jehudah Arie, was born at Modena about 1574, and died at Venice 1654. He wrote in Italian a valuable work on the ceremonies of the Jews; a Hebrew and Italian dictionary, &c.

LEO, John, a geographer, was born of Moorish parents, at Grenada; but when that city was taken in 1492, he went to Africa, whence he obtained the name of Africanus. He renounced the Mohammedan religion, and died about 1526. Leo wrote a description of Africa in Arabic, and translated it himself into Italian. John Pory published an English translation of it 1600. Leo was also the author of the 'Lives of Arabian Philosophers,' printed by Hottinger, in Latin, 1664.

LEO ALLATIUS. See Allatius.

LEONARDO, Leo, a musical composer of Naples, born 1689; died about 1742.

LEONICENUS, Nicholas, an Italian physician, was professor at Ferrara for sixty years. He was the first who translated Galen into Latin. He also wrote poems; an Examination of the Errors of Pliny's Natural History, &c. Born 1428; died 1524.

LEONIDAS, king of Sparta, was slain while gloriously defending the pass of Thermopylæ against the Persians, B.C. 480.

LEOPOLD I., Emperor of Germany, was the second son of Ferdinand III. He was born 1640; became king of Hungary 1655; king of Bohemia 1656; emperor 1658; died 6 May, 1705.

LEOPOLD II., son of the Emperor Francis I. and of Maria Theresa of Austria, was born at Vienna 1747; succeeded his father as grand-duke of Tuscany 1765; became emperor on the decease of Joseph II., 1790; died 1 March, 1792.

LEOPOLD, duke of Lorraine, son of Charles the fifth duke and of Eleanora of Austria, was restored (1697) to his estates which had been taken from his father by the French; and died 27 March, 1729, aged 50.

LEOPOLD I., king of the Belgians, born 1790. In early life he was known as Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld. Among his elder brothers and sisters were, Prince Ernest of Saxe-Coburg, the father of Prince Albert, consort of Queen Victoria; Prince Ferdinand, grandfather of the present (1870) king of Portugal; and the Princess Victoria, afterwards duchess of Kent, and mother of Queen Victoria. After experiencing many vicissitudes of fortune, he married in 1816 the Princess Charlotte, and received the title of duke of Kendal in the English peerage. The princess died in Nov., 1817, but the prince had so identified himself with the nation, and had so won their confidence, that even after the bond which attached him personally to England had been broken, he continued to be regarded by the nation as one of themselves. He resided in the closest retirement at Claremont until 1830, when he was offered the kingdom of Greece, which however he declined. In June, 1831, the Belgian people elected him their king, and in the following month he solemnly swore to observe the constitution, and to preserve the independence and integrity of the country. He had first, however, to fight for his crown, for the Dutch had not yet consented to the severance of Belgium. He was beaten at Louvain, but an army of 50,000 men having been sent from France to his relief, the king of the Netherlands withdrew his troops. The remainder of his life was chiefly occupied in developing the internal resources of his kingdom. Leopold's position, however, sank into insignificance when compared with the part he played in the state affairs of Europe. With singular unanimity he was chosen the umpire in international disputes; the grievances of hostile governments were submitted to him; and the secrets of most royal houses were in his keeping. M. de Laguéronnière, indeed, did not scruple to call him 'le Juge de Paix de l'Europe.' He died 10 Dec., 1865, and was succeeded by his eldest son (Leopold II.), by his second wife, the Princess Louise, eldest daughter of Louis Philippe.

LEOWITZ, Cyprian, Leovitius, a Bohemian astronomer and astrologer, who frightened many people nearly out of their wits by predicting that the world would come to an end in 1584. Born 1504; died 1574.

LEPAUTE, JEAN ANDRÉ, a French clock and watch-maker, who made several improvements in his art, and published a useful Treatise on Horology. Born 1709; died 11 April, 1789.

LE PRINCE, JEAN, a French painter, born at Metz 1733; died 30 Sept., 1781.

LE PRINCE DE BEAUMONT, MARIE, sister of the preceding, was born at Rouen 26 April, 1711, and died 1780. She contracted a marriage with M. Beaumont, which, however, was declared null and void. Her first romance 'Le Triomphe de la verité,' was presented by the authoress herself to the king of Poland. She afterwards resided for some time in England, where she published a number of works, chiefly moral tales. Altogether she published no fewer than 69 volumes.

LERNOUT, JOHN, Janus Lernutius, a modern Latin poet, born at Bruges 1545; died there 29 Sept., 1619.

LEROY, JULIEN, a celebrated horologist, born at Tours 1686; died at Paris 1759.

LEROY, JULIEN DAVID, an architect, son of the preceding, was born at Paris 1728. His work on 'Les Ruines des plus beaux Monuments de la Grèce,' procured him admission into the academy of inscription, and tended to banish the bad taste which had been introduced into French architecture. He wrote other able works; and died 28 Jan., 1803.

LE SAGE. See LAS CASAS.

LE SAGE, ALAIN RENÉ, one of the most popular of French authors, was born 8 May, 1668, at Sarzeau, in the department of Morbihan. He received a superior education in the Jesuits' College at Vannes, and it is conjectured that he was subsequently engaged for several years in the collection of taxes in Brittany. In 1692 he went to Paris and determined to give his whole time and energies to literary pursuits. While struggling for fame he found a kind and generous friend in the abbé de Lyonne, who not only granted him an annual pension of 600 livres, but also taught him the Spanish language, and pointed out to him the beauties of Castilian literature. Three comedies, 'Le Traître puni,' 'Don Félix de Mendoce,' and 'Le Point d'honneur,' were the first pieces which Le Sage translated, or rather imitated, from the Spanish. The last of them was the only one put on the stage, and its reception was by no means flattering. Nor was Le Sage more successful in his next attempt, 'Les Nouvelles Aventures de Don Quichotte' (1704-6), a version of Avellaneda's spiritless continuation of Cervantes' masterpiece. In 1707, however, Le Sage achieved a double triumph, by his comedy of 'Don César Ursin,' imitated from Calderon, and an original farce called 'Crispin rival de son Maître.' Ever busy with his pen, he brought out soon afterwards 'Le Diable Boiteux,' which in the English translation bears the title of 'The Devil on Two Sticks.' The idea and the title of the work were derived from 'El Diablo Cojuelo,' of Louis Velez de Guevara. 'Turcaret,' a five-act play, which constitutes one of Le Sage's chief titles to fame, was levelled against the vampires who managed the revenues and farmed the taxes of France, and who tried hard, but without success, to prevent its being represented on the stage. It was played at the Théâtre Français 14 Feb., 1709, and had a great run. The famous novel 'Gil Blas de Santillane,' which appeared 1715 in 2 vols., augmented by a third vol. 1724, and by a fourth 1735, raised Le Sage's popularity to the utmost height. Yet, in order to gain a livelihood, the writer of this admirable romance, which has been translated into the language of every civilised nation, did not disdain to compose for twenty-six consecutive years little pieces for the theatrical exhibitions at the fairs of St. Germain and St. Laurent. His other productions were a free translation of Bojardo's 'Orlando Innamorato' (1717-21); 'Les Aventures de Guzman d'Alfarache' (1732); 'Aventures de Robert, dit le Chevalier de Beauchesne' (1732); 'Histoire d' Estevanille Gonzalès, surnommé le Garçon de bonne humeur' (1734); 'Une Journée des Parques' (1735); 'Les Amants Jaloux,' a comedy; 'Le Bachelier de Salamanque' (1738); 'La Valise trouvée' (1740); and 'Melange amusant de saillies d'esprit et de traits historiques des plus frappants' (1743). In 1743 he retired to Boulogne with his wife and daughter, in order to be near his favourite son, who was a canon of the cathedral in that city. Le Sage died there 17 Nov., 1747. The best edition of his works is by Renouard 12 vols. 8vo., Paris, 1821-22. Most of his novels have been translated into English.

LESCAILLE, JAMES, a printer, born at Geneva 1610. He settled at Amsterdam, where his press was famous for its beautiful productions. Lescaille was also a good poet; and died 1677. His daughter Catherine, who died 8 June, 1711, obtained the name of the Dutch Sappho. Her poems were printed 1728.

LE SEUR, THOMAS, a mathematician and ecclesiastic, born at Rethel, in Champagne, 1703. He entered into the order of Minims, and became a celebrated professor of mathematics, philosophy, and theology, in the college of Sapienza, at Rome; where he died 1770. He joined with father Jacquier in a commentary upon Newton's Principia; and also in a profound work on the 'Integral Calculus.' Le Seur published besides, 'The Principles of Natural Philosophy,' 4 vols.; 'Institutiones Philosophicæ,' 5 vols.

LESLEY, ALEXANDER, a Scotch Jesuit, born in Aberdeen 7 Nov., 1693; died in Rome about 1760. He edited the Mozarabic Missal, 1755; assisted Father Azevedo in compiling several of his works; and left in MS. a valuable treatise on the Legions of Rome.

LESLEY, JOHN, a prelate of Scotland, born 29 Sept., 1526, and educated at Aberdeen and Paris. He accompanied Queen Mary to Scotland 1561, and in 1564 was made abbat of Lindores. He was afterwards elevated to the bishopric of Ross, and distinguished himself by procuring the Scotch laws to be printed in black letter. When Mary fled to England Bishop Lesley appeared at the court of Elizabeth, as the ambassador of his unfortunate sovereign, whose cause he pleaded with great energy, but unsuccessfully. He also endeavoured to effect her escape, and, among other schemes, projected a marriage between Mary and the duke of Norfolk, which proved the ruin of both. Lesley, upon this, was put under arrest, and in 1573 sent out of the kingdom. In 1579 he was made vicar-general to the archbishop of Rouen, where he narrowly escaped being delivered up again to Queen Elizabeth. In 1590 he was thrown into prison, and obliged to pay a large sum to obtain his liberty. In 1593 he was appointed bishop of Coutances, in Normandy; but he never got peaceable possession of the see, and at length he retired to the monastery of Guirtenburg, near Brussels, where he died 31 May, 1596. He laid the foundation of three colleges for his countrymen; one at Paris, one at Rome, and the other at Douay. His principal works are a Defence of Mary Queen of Scotland, and her title to the Crown of England, 1571; 'Afflicti Animi Consolationes, et Tranquilli Animæ Conversatio;' 'De Origine, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis Scotorum,' to which are appended 'Parænesis ad Nobilitatem, Populumque Scotorum,' and 'Regionum et Insularum Scotiæ Descriptio;' De Titulo et Jure Mariæ Scot. Reg.; 'De illustrium Fœminarum in Republica administranda, Authoritate;' 'History of Scotland,' from 1436 to 1561, edited by Thomas Thomson for the Bannatyne Club, 1830.

LESLEY, William Aloysius, D.D., a Jesuit, born in Aberdeenshire 1641. For nine years he was superior of the Scotch College at Rome, and from 1674 to 1683 a missionary in Scotland, where he died 1704. He wrote, in Italian, The Life of St. Margaret of Scotland, 12mo., Rome, 1675.

LESLIE, Charles, second son of the bishop of Clogher, was born in Ireland 1650. He received his education at Dublin, after which he became a student in the Temple, but relinquished the law, and took orders. In 1687 he was made chancellor of Connor, where he rendered himself notorious by his persecution of the Catholics. Notwithstanding this zeal for the established religion and the laws, Leslie could not transfer his allegiance to a new government by taking the oaths to William. He therefore quitted Ireland and settled in London, where his pen was employed on political and theological subjects. In the reign of Queen Anne he wrote a weekly paper, called 'The Rehearsal, or a View of the Times;' in which, besides combating the sceptics, he attacked Locke and Hoadly on the doctrine of government. To promote the interests of the exiled family, he made frequent excursions to the court of St. Germains, and he even accompanied the son of James II. to Italy; but being convinced that the cause was hopeless, he returned home, and died at Glaslough, co. Monaghan, 13 April, 1722. His theological works, of which the most considerable are his treatises against the Deists and Socinians, were printed in 2 vols. folio. His 'Rehearsals' have been collected into 4 vols. 8vo., and also into 6 vols. 12mo. His other political pieces are too many to be enumerated.

LESLIE, Charles Robert, an eminent painter, born in London, of American parents, 1794. A few years after his birth his parents left this country, and went to Philadelphia, where the future painter received an ordinary education. After a short apprenticeship to his brother, who was a bookseller, he returned to England in order to study art under his celebrated countrymen Benjamin West and Washington Allston. He first tried historical painting on a large scale, but subsequently commenced a class of subjects particularly adapted to display his powers, and in which, for many years, he had no superior among English artists. The great humorous writers of England became the chief sources of his inspiration, and many familiar scenes from Shakspere, Addison, Sterne, Pope, Goldsmith, Fielding and Smollett were illustrated by his pencil. 'Don Quixote,' 'Gil Blas,' and Molière's plays also suggested to him some of his happiest efforts. His 'Anne Page and Slender,' 'Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church,' 'May Day in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth,' and other pictures of the kind, exhibited betwen 1820 and 1825, established his reputation. In 1821 he was elected an associate of the Academy and in 1826 full R.A. The American government appointed him, in 1833, professor of drawing in the United States Academy at West Point; but he soon got heartily tired of this situation, and, at the end of five months, threw it up and returned to this country. In 1847 he became professor of painting at the Royal Academy; and the lectures which he delivered during his four years' tenure of that office were published in 1855, under the title of 'A Hand Book for Young Painters.' Leslie died in London 5 May, 1859. He wrote a Life of his friend John Constable, the landscape painter (1843), and left an unfinished work on the 'Life and Times of Sir Joshua Reynolds,' which was completed and published in 2 vols., 1865, by Mr. Tom Taylor, who also edited Leslie's 'Autobiographical Recollections,' 2 vols. 8vo., 1860.

LESLIE, John, D.D., a prelate, born at Balquhain, Aberdeenshire. He received his education at Aberdeen and Oxford, after which he went abroad, and was present at the siege of Rochelle, and in the expedition to the Isle of Rhé. On his return home he was made bishop of the Isles (1628), from whence he was translated (1633) to Raphoe, in Ireland, where he built a palace, which he defended against Cromwell. In 1661 he was appointed bishop of Clogher. He died 1671, at the age of one hundred years, during fifty of which he had been a bishop.

LESLIE, Sir John, was born at Largo, Fifeshire, 16 April, 1766, and educated at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. After visiting America and various continental countries, and working in London for the booksellers, he was elected in 1805 professor of mathematics at Edinburgh, in succession to Dr. Playfair, whom he also succeeded in 1819 in the chair of natural philosophy. He died at his residence, Coates, Fifeshire, 3 Nov., 1832, having, only a few months previously, been created a knight of the Guelphic order. Sir John was the inventor of the differential thermometer, by which he was greatly aided in his researches concerning the nature of heat; and of the hygrometer, which led to his discovering the process of artificial freezing. His chief works are, a translation of Buffon's History of Birds, 9 vols.; an 'Essay on the Nature and Propagation of Heat;' 'Elements of Geometry;' 'Account of Experiments and Instruments depending on the Relation of Air to Heat and Moisture;' and 'Philosophy of Arithmetic;' besides numerous papers in scientific periodicals.

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, a German writer, born at Kamentz, Pomerania, 22 Jan., 1729. He was educated at Meissen, from whence he removed to Leipsic, and next to Berlin, where he wrote, in conjunction with Mylius, 'A Sketch of the History and Progress of the Drama.' From Berlin he went to Wittenberg, and, having taken his master's degree, returned to the former city, and became secretary to General Tauenzein, with whom he went to reside at Breslaw. After this, Prince Leopold, of Brunswick Wolfenbuttle, made him his librarian, in which situation he published a periodical work, called 'Contributions to Literary History,' till the licentiousness of it occasioned its suppression. His latter performances were 'Nathan the Wise,' and a 'Dissertation on Education.' He died at Hamburg 15 Feb., 1781.

LESSIUS, LEONARD, a Jesuit, born near Antwerp 1 Oct., 1554. He became professor of philosophy at Douay, from whence he removed to the divinity chair at Louvain. Lessius was accused of Semi-pelagianism; and the faculty of theology at Louvain condemned thirty-four of his propositions; but the universities of Mayence, Treves, and Ingoldstadt declared in his favour. Died 15 Jan., 1623. His principal works are De Justitia et Jure; De potestate summi Pontificis; Hygiasticon, seu vera ratio valetudinis bonæ vitæ; and various treatises, collected in 2 vols. folio.

L'ESTRANGE, Sir ROGER, was born 17 Dec., 1616, at Hunstanton Hall, Norfolk, the seat of his father, Sir Hamond L'Estrange, author of a history of Charles I., and a commentary on the Liturgy, entitled 'The Alliance of Divine Offices.' The son was educated at Lynn, and in 1639 accompanied King Charles on his expedition to Scotland; but in 1644 he was made prisoner by the parliamentary forces, and sent to London, where he was condemned to be hanged as a spy. With great difficulty, however, he obtained a reprieve, but remained in Newgate four years, and then effected his escape to the Continent. In 1653 he returned, and was discharged by order of Cromwell. After the Restoration he was made licenser of the press, which place he enjoyed till the Revolution. In 1663 he set up a newspaper called 'The Public Intelligencer,' which he dropped in 1665, when the 'London Gazette' was established. In 1679 he instituted another paper, called the 'Observator.' In the reign of James II. he was knighted; but, as he did not concur with all the measures of that monarch, his paper was suppressed. Died 11 Sept., 1704. Sir Roger was an indefatigable writer, but particularly distinguished himself in translations; of which Josephus, Cicero's Offices, Seneca's Morals, and Erasmus's Colloquies, are the best.

LESUEUR, EUSTACHE, a painter, born at Paris 1617. He was the disciple of Simon Vouet, but far surpassed him, though he never went out of France. He painted a set of pictures on the history of St. Bruno, for the Chartreux. Died 1655.

LESUEUR, JEAN, a Protestant divine, pastor of the church of Feste-sous-Jouarre en Brie, was the author of some valuable works, the principal of which are 'Traité de la Divinité de l'Ecriture Sainte;' 'Histoire de l'Eglise et de l'Empire,' 8 vols., 1730. This last was continued by Pictet. Died 1681.

LESUEUR, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French musical composer, born at Drucat-Plessiel, near Abbeville, 15 Feb., 1760; died at Chaillot 6 Oct., 1837.

LE SUEUR. See LE SEUR.

LETHIEULLIER, SMART, F.S.A., an antiquary and virtuoso, born in Essex, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. He made a noble collection of antiquities, fossils, and other curiosities, and died 27 Aug., 1760, aged 59.

LETI, GREGORIO, was born at Milan 29 May, 1630. He turned Protestant at Lausanne, and there married the daughter of a physician; after which he settled at Geneva, where he resided twenty years, and then came to England. Charles II., seeing him at his levee one day, said, 'Leti, I hear you are writing the history of my court.' To this Leti answered, 'Sir, I am collecting materials for such a work.' 'Take care,' said the king, 'that your history does not give offence.' 'Sir,' replied Leti, 'I will do what I can; but if a man were as wise as Solomon he would hardly be able to avoid giving some offence.' 'Why, then,' retorted Charles, 'be as wise as Solomon; write proverbs, and let history alone.' Leti, however, did not take this advice. The history appeared, under the title of 'Teatro Britannico;' and the author was ordered to quit the kingdom. He then went to Amsterdam, where he died 9 June, 1701. His principal works are The Life of Sixtus V.; Life of Charles V.; Life of Queen Elizabeth; History of Oliver Cromwell; History of Geneva; History of the Cardinals. These histories are nothing more than amusing romances. John Le Clerc married the daughter of Leti.

LETTICE, JOHN, D.D., was born at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 27 Dec., 1737, and educated at Sidney College, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship (B.A. 1761; M.A. 1764; B.D. 1771; D.D. 1797). In 1768 he was nominated chaplain and secretary to the British embassy at Copenhagen, where he witnessed the revolution of 1772. On returning to his native country he was engaged for several years in the dreary work of private tuition; but in 1785 he was presented to the living of Peasemarsh, Sussex. He was then forty-seven years of age, and in all probability never dreamed that he should live another forty-seven years in the possession of his benefice. He died at Peasemarsh 18 Oct., 1832. His works are, 'On the Conversion of St. Paul,' a poem, which gained for him the Seatonian prize 1764; a translation into English blank verse of his friend Hawkins Browne's Latin poem 'De Animi Immortalitate;' 'The Antiquities of Herculaneum,' conjointly with Professor Martyn; 'Letters on a Tour through various parts of Scotland;' Fables for the Fireside; Strictures on Elocution; Miscellaneous Pieces on Sacred Subjects, in prose and verse; Sermons and Tracts; and a translation from the Danish of Baron Holberg's Parallel Lives of Famous Ladies.

LETTSOM, JOHN COAKLEY, M.D., a physician, born on a small island, called Little Vandyke, near Tortola, 1744. His father was a planter, and his mother was descended from a respectable Irish family. They were of the society of Quakers; and young Lettsom, being sent to England, was placed under the care of Samuel Fothergill, a celebrated preacher of that sect, who sent him to an academy at Warrington. On arriving at a proper age he was bound apprentice to an apothecary at Settle, Yorkshire, after which he became a pupil of St. Thomas's Hospital. The death of his elder brother induced him to visit his native island to look after his property; but finding that it chiefly consisted of slaves, he emancipated them all, and settled at Tortola. His stay there was not long, and on his return to Europe he took his doctor's degree at Leyden. He then fixed his residence in London, where, by the friendship of Dr. Fothergill, and his connection with the Quakers, he attained a most extensive practice. Dr. Lettsom, however, quitted the society some years before his death, which happened 1 Nov., 1815. He was a zealous philanthropist, and a member of most of the literary and scientific societies in Europe and America. His works are numerous.

LEUCIPPUS, a philosopher of Elea, who lived in the fifth century before the Christian era. He was the disciple of Zeno, and the master of Democritus. The atomic system originated with him.

LEUNCLAVIUS, JOHN, a German historian, born at Amelbrun, in Westphalia, about 1533; died at Vienna in 1593.

LEUSDEN, JOHN, a learned divine, born at Utrecht 26 April, 1624, was appointed Hebrew professor there 1650, and died 30 Sept., 1699. As a critical editor he is entitled to high commendation for skill and accuracy.

LEUWENHOEK, ANTHONY VAN, a Dutch naturalist, born at Delft 1632; died 26 Aug., 1723. He is celebrated for his microscopical improvements and discoveries. His works have been translated into English.

LEVER, Sir ASHTON, virtuoso, was the son of Sir D'Arcy Lever, of Alkington, near Manchester. He completed his education at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, after which he resided at his seat in the country, where he formed the finest aviary in the kingdom. He also spared no expense in collecting rare animals and curiosities from all parts of the world, which, in 1785, he disposed of by a lottery. The winner, Mr. Parkinson, removed the museum from Leicester Fields to Blackfriars Road, but after exhibiting it some years, sold the whole by auction in 1806. Sir Ashton died at Manchester 1788.

LEVER, D'ARCY, son of the Rev. John Lever, grandson of Sir D'Arcy Lever, and nephew of Sir Ashton Lever, led a somewhat eventful life. When young he went to India, and on the voyage out asked one of the sailors something about the rigging of the vessel, when the reply was, 'Find it out, as I have done.' This put him on his mettle, and during the outward and homeward passages he made himself so completely master of the subject that he afterwards wrote a book of Seamanship, which was for some time a standard work in the navy. He died at Edinburgh 22 Jan., 1837.

LEVERIDGE, RICHARD, an English actor and vocalist, born 1670; died 1758.

LEVESQUE DE POUILLY, LOUIS JEAN, lieutenant-general of Rheims, greatly ornamented and improved that city, where he also established schools for mathematics and design. His 'Theory of Agreeable Sensations' has been translated into English. Born 1691; died 1750.

LÉVESQUE, PIERRE CHARLES, a French writer and translator, born 26 March, 1737, at Paris, where he died 12 May, 1812.

LEVI, DAVID, a Jew, born in London 1740. He was originally a shoemaker and afterwards a hatter, but published some works which evinced much study and ability. In 1783 came out a volume on the Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews, which was followed by his 'Lingua Sacra, or a Hebrew and English Dictionary,' 3 vols. In 1787 he printed 'Letters to Dr. Priestley,' in reply to that polemic's Letters to the Jews; and in 1789 appeared a second series of Letters to the doctor and others. He also published 'The Pentateuch in Hebrew and English;' a translation of the Hebrew Liturgy, in 6 vols.; 'Dissertations on the Prophecies;' and some other works. Died July, 1799.

LEVIZAC, JEAN PONS VICTOR LECOUTZ DE, a French priest, who, being forced to quit his country at the Revolution, came to England, where he taught the French language with much success. He died in London 1813. He published several works intended to facilitate the acquisition of the French language.

LEVRET, ANDRÉ, a French surgeon and accoucheur, who published some esteemed professional works, and improved some of the instruments used in obstetric cases of difficulty. Born 1703; died 22 Jan., 1780.

LEWGAR, JOHN, a Catholic writer, born in London in or about 1602, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of B.D. He obtained a benefice in Essex; but, following the example of his friend Chillingworth, he resigned all his worldly advantages, and was reconciled to the Church of Rome. He accompanied Cecil Calvert, Lord Baltimore, to Maryland, where Mr. Lewgar lived several years; but his wife dying, he returned to England some years before the Restoration. He still, however, continued in Lord Baltimore's family in London, where he died 1665. He published anonymously several pamphlets in support of the royalist cause, and a work entitled 'Erastus Senior and Erastus Junior,' in which he sought to prove the invalidity of the Protestant consecrations from an essential defect in the form.

LEWIS, DAVID. See BAKER, CHARLES.

LEWIS, Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL, a distinguished statesman and man of letters, was born 1806, being the eldest son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, Bart., of Harpton Court, Radnorshire. He was early sent to Eton, and from thence to Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated 1828, taking high honours. Three years later he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple; but his entry there was merely nominal, as he was destined to other pursuits than those of the law. In 1835 he was appointed one of the commissioners to inquire into the affairs of Malta; and he was a poor-law commissioner from 1839 to 1847, when he was first elected M.P. for Herefordshire, which county he continued to represent till 1852; but from March, 1855, till his decease he sat for the Radnor district of boroughs. He filled several important offices in the government. He was secretary to the Board of Control from Nov., 1847, to May, 1848; under-secretary for the Home Department from May, 1848, to July, 1850; and financial secretary to the Treasury from July, 1850, to Feb., 1852. He succeeded to the baronetcy on his father's death in 1855. Up to this time Sir George had not made much of a figure in the House of Commons, and had he at this period declined to re-enter parliament his name would have been added to the long list of men who, eminent in letters and philosophy, have proved failures in political life. But in 1855 he was returned for the Radnor boroughs, and Lord Palmerston selected him to fill the office of chancellor of the Exchequer, in the place of Mr. Gladstone; and on the first occasion when it fell to his lot to defend the measures of the government, he exerted himself in a manner wholly unexpected, and at once established his reputation as one who was thenceforward to take a leading part in the deliberations of the House. Sir George held the chancellorship of the Exchequer till Feb., 1858, and on the return of the Liberals to power, in June of the following year, he accepted the Home Secretaryship, which he retained till July, 1861, when he was appointed by Lord Palmerston to succeed Lord Herbert of Lea in the post of secretary of state for war. Year by year his position was growing on the House, his wide information more acknowledged, and his judgment more confided in, when his career was suddenly cut short by the hand of death, 13 April, 1863. Sir George Lewis's literary labours were multifarious and varied, as were his political undertakings. For some years he was editor of the 'Edinburgh Review,' which he enriched with many valuable contributions; and to him scholars owe the recovery of 'Fables of Babrius,' together with many other brochures in classical literature. In philosophy his essay 'On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion,' holds a foremost place, while his bias to the science of politics appears in several of his publications, as, for instance, 'On the Use and Abuse of Political Terms,' 'On the Method of Observation and Reasoning in Politics,' and 'A Dialogue on the best form of Government.' His other principal works are 'An Essay on the Origin and Formation of the Romance Languages;' 'An Inquiry into the Credibility of the Early Roman History;' 'Essay on the Government of Dependencies;' a valuable treatise 'On the Astronomy of the Ancients;' a translation of Boeckh's 'Public Economy of Athens;' and 'A Glossary of Provincial Words used in Herefordshire. Sir George married (1844) Maria Theresa, sister of the earl of Clarendon and widow of Mr. Thomas Henry Lister, of Armitage Park, Yorkshire.' Lady Lewis, who died at Oxford 9 Nov., 1865, aged 61, had a taste for literature, her principal publications being 'The Lives of Lord Clarendon's Friends and Contemporaries,' and 'Extracts of the Journals and Correspondence of Miss Berry,' 3 vols., 1865.

LEWIS, JOHN, was born at Bristol 29 Aug., 1675. Having lost his father when young, he removed to Poole, in Dorsetshire, where he received part of his education, which he completed at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1697 he was ordained, and two years afterwards obtained the rectory of Acryse, in Kent, to which Archbishop Tenison added the living of Hawkinge, in the same county. In 1705 he became minister of Margate, and in 1708, vicar of Mynstre. He took his master's degree at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1712, and, in 1717, was made master of Eastbridge Hospital. Died 16 Jan., 1746. His principal works are, The Church Catechism explained; The History of John Wycliffe; The History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet; Specimen of Errors in Collier's Ecclesiastical History; History and Antiquities of the abbey of Feversham; The New Testament translated by John Wycliffe, to which is prefixed a history of the several translations of the Bible, which was also printed separately; Life of Caxton; Dissertation on the Use of Seals in England; the Life of Reynold Pecock, bishop of St. Asaph, and Whichester.

LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY, a licentious writer, born in London 9 July, 1775. His father was deputy secretary at war, and possessed of large estates in the West Indies. The son received his education at Westminster School, after which he went abroad, and on his return obtained a seat in Parliament, but made no figure in the house. On the death of his father he went to Jamaica, and died on the passage home 14 May, 1818. His principal works are, The Monk, an infamous novel; The Castle Spectre, a drama; Adelmorn, a tragedy; Tales of Winter; Feudal Tyrants, a romance; Tales of Terror; Romantic Tales; Timoni, a drama; Poems.

LEY, or LEIGH, Sir JAMES, a judge, born in Wiltshire about 1552. He studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and next in Lincoln's Inn. In 1603 he was made serjeant, and, the year following, chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland. In 1620 he was created a baronet, and the next year made chief justice of the Court of King's Bench in England. In 1625 he was raised to the office of lord high treasurer; and soon after created earl of Marlborough, and president of the council. Died 14 March, 1628. His works are, Reports of Cases in the Reigns of James and Charles I.; Treatise of Wards; and some Discourses on antiquarian subjects, published by Hearne.

LEYBOURN, WILLIAM, a mathematical writer, was originally a printer in London. He became a schoolmaster, and published a number of practical works, which were once popular and of great utility, particularly 'A Treatise on Surveying,' folio; 'A Course of Mathematics;' and the 'Ready Reckoner, or Trader's Sure Guide.' He died about 1700.

LEYBURN, GEORGE, D.D., an English divine of the Roman communion, born in Westmorland 1593. He was admitted a student in the English college at Douay 1617, and ordained priest 1625. Afterwards he went to Paris and took up his residence in Arras College, a small community, where several English divines lived together in order to take their degrees in that university, but chiefly to employ their time in composing books of controversy. On leaving Paris, he returned to England upon the mission 1630, and was taken prisoner at Dover, but soon obtained his release through the intercession of the Queen Henrietta Maria, who made him one of her chaplains, and consulted him upon most affairs appertaining to the Catholics. Again going to Douay, he taught philosophy and divinity there; but graduated D.D. at Rheims. He then returned to this country, and in 1644 was a prisoner in the Tower, where he became acquainted with General Monk, whose future greatness he predicted. On regaining his liberty he repaired to France, where he was very useful to the royalist party. About 1647 he was sent to Ireland with credentials and instructions from the court in banishment in order to bring the two Catholic armies and the duke of Ormond to a better understanding. An account of this negotiation, which was attended with little success, was written by Dr. Leyburn, and published in 1722 by Dodd, the ecclesiastical historian. In 1648 Richard Smith, bishop of Chalcedon, at that time residing at Paris, appointed Dr. Leyburn his vicar-general in England, in conjunction with Mark Harrington, B.D. He was afterwards chosen president of the English college at Douay 1652, and governed that society about eighteen years, resigning his office to his nephew, John Leyburn, in 1670. He died at Châlons-sur-Marne 29 Dec., 1677. His works are, 'An Epistle Declaratory or Manifest to his Brethren residing in England,' London, 1657; An encyclical answer to an encyclical epistle, subscribed by the dean and chapter, 4to., Douay, 1661; 'Holy Characters,' 8vo., Douay, 1662; 'Vindiciæ Censuræ Duacenæ,' under the name of Jonas Thamon (1661), which piece has been also ascribed to John Warner; 'Memoirs, being a Journal of his Agency for Prince Charles in Ireland in 1647,' 8vo., London, 1722.

LEYBURN, JOHN, nephew of the above, was born in or about 1620, and admitted into the English college at Douay 1633. After receiving holy orders he spent some time in teaching the classics, and in 1670 he succeeded his uncle in the government of the college. He resigned the post, however, in 1675, when he went to Rome, where he was constituted secretary and auditor to Cardinal Howard. On 9th Sept., 1685, he was consecrated bishop of Adrumetum, in partibus, having been appointed vicar-apostolic of the London district. Proceeding to the English capital, he had an apartment prepared for him in St. James's Palace, with an allowance of 1,000*l.* per annum. He was the first Catholic bishop resident in this country since the reign of Charles I. In the Revolution of 1688 he was committed prisoner to the Tower, but was released in consequence of his peaceful and inoffensive behaviour. He was afterwards frequently alarmed and summoned when any disturbance happened in relation to the government, but the ministry being fully satisfied with his conduct took no further notice of him. They only desired to know his place of abode, which he failed not to acquaint them with whenever he had occasion to change his lodgings. In this manner he spent the remainder of his days, dying 9 June, 1702. He wrote an elegant Latin style, and left a MS. volume of letters in that language. His publications are a translation of Kenelm Digby's Treatise of Bodies and of the Immortality of the Soul, folio, Paris, 1651; and a Pastoral Letter to the Catholics of England 1688.

LEYDECKER, MELCHIOR, a Protestant divine and ecclesiastical historian, born at Middleburg 25 Jan., 1652, was appointed professor at Utrecht 1678; and died there 6 Jan., 1721.

LEYDEN, JOHN, M.D., a physician and poet, born 8 Sept., 1775, at Denholm, Roxburghshire, where his father was a shepherd. He received his education at the parish school of Kirktown, and next under a minister of the Secession Church; after which he went to Edinburgh, where he wrote several poems. He was also employed as a private tutor, and, on going to St. Andrew's, obtained a licence to preach; but he relinquished the pulpit for the surgery, and, having taken his doctor's degree, he went to India. In 1806 he was appointed professor of Hindustani at the college of Calcutta, and he also for some time officiated as a judge. In 1811 he accompanied Lord Minto in the expedition against Java, where he died on 28 August, the same year. His poetical works and memoirs were printed 1819. There is a highly interesting account of his life in Sir Walter Scott's Miscellaneous Prose Works.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, D.D., was born at Stoke-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, 19 or 29 March, 1602. He became a student of Christ's College, Cambridge, which he left, on taking the degree of bachelor of arts, to be an assistant in the school at Repton, in Derbyshire. On entering into orders he obtained the curacy of Norton, Shropshire, where he contracted an intimacy with Sir Rowland Cotton, who taught him Hebrew. In 1628 he was appointed minister of Stone, Staffordshire, which office he soon left to reside near London, where he printed, in 1629, his first work, 'Erubhim, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical,' dedicated to Rowland Cotton, who in 1631 presented him to the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. Here he resided till his appointment as a member of the assembly of divines rendered it necessary for him to settle in London, where he was chosen minister of St. Bartholomew behind the Exchange. In 1643 he was made master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, with which he held the living of Much Munden, Herts. He distinguished himself as a zealous promoter of the Polyglott Bible, and at the Restoration was appointed one of the assistants to the Savoy conference. Died 6 Dec., 1675. He left a great number of works in French (30 vols. 12mo., 1807), all sparkling with wit and originality.

LIGONIER, JOHN, Earl Ligonier, field-marshal in the British army, who served in all the wars of Queen Anne, under the great duke of Marlborough, with distinguished glory, and was employed in every succeeding war. Died 1770, aged 92.

LIGUORI, ST. ALFONSO MARIA DE' bishop of St. Agatha of the Goths, and founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, came of a noble Neapolitan family, and was born at Marianella, near Naples, 27 Sept., 1696. At the age of ten he joined the association of young nobles among the Oratorians at Naples, and was remarkable for his candour, his innocence, and his horror of sin. He completed his education under his paternal roof, being instructed by able masters. At this early age he was of a very pious turn of mind. He communicated once a week, and visited the Blessed Sacrament daily. At seventeen years old he was created LL.D., and adopted the profession of advocate; but although he had a brilliant career before him, he soon resolved to quit the law for the ecclesiastical state. Ordained priest in 1726, he devoted himself especially to the preaching of missions. After having edified Naples by his discourses, he passed through the dioceses of Amalfi and Scala, where he gained the title of the Apostle of the Poor and Ignorant. His success encouraged him to found the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, on the model of the Congregation of St. Vincent of Paul. The association bound themselves in 1742 by simple vows, and appointed St. Alfonso superior-general of the order, which was approved by Benedict XIV. 1749. Clement XIII. compelled him in 1762 to accept the bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths, the suffragan see of Benevento. After an episcopate of thirty years, he asked to be relieved of his bishopric, and he did not reserve any pension to himself. Retiring to a house of his order at Nocera, he there composed a great number of theological and devotional works, which are highly prized by Catholics in every part of the world. Translated into English we have 'The Christian Virtues and the Means for obtaining them;' 'Conformity with the Will of God;' 'The Glories of Mary;' 'The Clock of the Passion;' 'Instructions and Considerations on the Religious State;' 'The History of Heresies and their Refutation;' 'Hymns and Verses on Spiritual Subjects;' 'The Eternal Truths. He was beatified by Pius VII. 1816; declared a saint by Pius VIII. 1830; and solemnly canonized by Gregory XVI. 1839. Festival Aug. 2.

LILBURNE, JOHN, was born in the county of Durham 1618. He served his time to a clothier in London; but in 1636 Dr. Bastwick persuaded him to go to Holland, to superintend the printing of some libels against the government. With this cargo he returned, and soon after was taken up, and sentenced to be first whipped, then to stand in the pillory, and afterwards confined in the Fleet. The Long Parliament, however, remunerated him for what he had endured by profuse grants of sequestrated estates. He fought at the battle of Edgehill as a captain of foot; but at Brentford he was made prisoner and carried to Oxford, where he would have been hanged had not the Parliament threatened retaliation. He then obtained his liberty, and was made first a major and afterwards a colonel of dragoons. Being of a quarrelsome temper, he libelled the earl of Manchester, for which he was sent to the Tower, where he remained till 1648. He had not been long out of confinement before he renewed his old practice of abusing his superiors, for which he was banished the kingdom. After residing some time in Holland he returned in 1657, and was tried at the Old Bailey, but acquitted. He now settled at Eltham, where he turned Quaker, and died the same year, 29 Aug., 1657. His publications were numerous, but not worth notice.

LILLO, GEORGE, a dramatist, born in London 4 Feb., 1693. He was a jeweller by trade, which occupation he carried on some years with reputation. His tragedies, which are deeply pathetic and strictly moral, are 'George Barnwell;' 'Fatal Curiosity;' 'Arden of Feversham;' 'Elmerick.' Died 3 Sept., 1739. His Dramatic Works were published at London, in 2 vols., 1770, with a biographical memoir by Thomas Davies.

LILLY, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was born in Kent about 1553. He took his master's degree at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1575; after which he went to court, but died in distressed circumstances Nov., 1606. He wrote a number of plays; a book called 'Euphues,' remarkable for its bombastic style; and a pamphlet against Martin Marprelate, entitled 'Pap with a Hatchet, alias a fig for my godson.' A collection of his Dramatic Works was published in 2 vols., 1858, with a life of the author by F. W. Fairholt.

LILLY, WILLIAM, M.D., an astrologer, born at Diseworth, Leicestershire, 1602. He became bookkeeper to a tradesman in London, whose widow he married, and on her death took another wife, who by her conduct made him poor and miserable. He, however, married a third time, and gained a considerable estate by his pretended skill in casting nativities. In the civil wars he was much employed by both parties, and after the Restoration the archbishop of Canterbury conferred upon him the degree of doctor of medicine. He died at Hersham, Surrey, 9 June, 1681. Lilly wrote some curious works, the chief of which are, Observations on the Life and Death of Charles I.; Christian Astrology; and 'Annus Tenebrosus,' which brought on a controversy between him and C taker, respecting the verity of astrological pr ciples. He was also author of an extremely curic 'History of his Life and Times,' printed at Lond 1715.

LILY, or LILYE, WILLIAM, a grammari born at Odiham, Hampshire, about 1468. studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, after whi he went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and c tinued five years in the Isle of Rhodes to perf himself in the Greek language. LINCOLN, ABRAHAM, president of the Uni States, was born at Hardin county, Kentuc 1809, being the son of Thomas Lincoln, a bouring farmer. While he was still a boy father removed to the wilds of Illinois, and h he began life as a labourer in the bush, build rail fences—a circumstance which gained for in after years the designation of the 'rail-splitte and working as a common sailor on the flat b which navigated the Mississippi. While thus ployed he picked up some little learning, and gave ill his spare time to reading what books came in is way. He served as captain of militia during ne Indian troubles of the North-West, and in 834 was elected to the Illinois legislature. Three ears later he was admitted to the bar, and met with much success as an advocate. In 1847 he as returned to Congress, where he supported the Whig party, and became conspicuous as an uncompromising opponent of slavery. The Whig arty was broken up soon after the presidential ection of 1852, and two years afterwards he appeared as a leader of the newly-organised Republican party. He made several unsuccessful attempts o obtain a seat in the senate. In 1860, however, e was raised to the highest office in the republic. he National Republican Convention met at Chigago in June in that year, and up to the eleventh our it was supposed that Mr. Chase, of Ohio, and r. Bates, of Missouri, would divide the votes of ne western delegates; but they were suddenly bandoned, and Mr. Lincoln was brought forward their stead. The local pressure from without as so great that he was nominated over Mr. ward, and elected president in Nov., 1860. The sults of that election were most disastrous. Almost all the Southern States seceded from the nion before the new president was inaugurated. hen came the attack on Fort Sumter, and the rrible civil war which for four years devastated e Central States of the Union. At the expiration his term of office he was re-elected to the presidency, and he lived to see the substantial success the Federal arms, and the surrender of Richond and of the army of General Lee. While a visit to Ford's Theatre, at Washington, on April, 1865, he was shot through the head by actor named John Wilkes Booth, and died on e following morning. His death caused unralleled outbursts of sorrow throughout the orthern States.

LINCOLN, Edward Fiennes, otherwise Clinton, Earl of, K.G., only son of Thomas Lord inton, was born 1514, and at three years of age ceeded to his father's barony. He distinguished mself as a naval commander during the reigns of enry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, olding the office of lord high admiral under the ree last-named sovereigns. He was created earl Lincoln 1572, and died 6 Jan., 1584-5.—Athen. ntab.

LINCOLN, Richard, D.D., was appointed Catolic archbishop of Dublin 1757; died 1762.

LIND, James, M.D., some time physician to the val hospital at Haslar, died at Gosport 18 July, 94. He was deservedly celebrated as a medical iter, his principal works being a Treatise on e Scurvy; Essay on the means of preserving the alth of Seamen (which, like the preceding rk, was translated into French); and an Essay the Diseases incidental to Europeans in Hot mates.

LIND, James, M.D., F.R.S., was born in Scotnd 17 May, 1736. When a young man he went t as surgeon in an Indiaman, and visited China. 1768 he took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, inaugural dissertation being entitled 'De Febre rmittente Putrida Paludum quæ grassabatur in ngalia,' of which he afterwards published a transion, under the title of 'Treatise on the Fever of 2 at Bengal.' In 1770 he was admitted a fellow the College of Physicians at Edinburgh, and two years later he accompanied Mr., afterwards Sir Joseph Banks, on his voyage to Iceland. About 1777 he settled at Windsor, where he died 17 Oct., 1812. Dr. Lind printed at his private press 'The Genealogy of the Families of Lind, and the Montgomeries of Smithson, written by Sir Robert Douglas, Bart., author of the History of Scotlan' ' 1795.

LINDANUS, William, a native of Dort, became bishop of Roermond 1562; bishop of Ghent 1588; died 11 Nov., 1588. He wrote some theological works in Latin.

LINDE, Samuel Bogumil, a learned Pole, the compiler of a valuable dictionary of his native language, was born at Thorn 1771, and died at Warsaw 8 Aug., 1847.

LINDEWOOD, William, a learned civilian, who was a member of the university of Oxford, and sent by Henry V. as ambassador to Spain and Portugal in 1422. On his return to England he was made bishop of St. David's in 1434, and died 21 Oct., 1446. He compiled a collection of canons and constitutions of the archbishops of Canterbury, printed at Paris in 1505; at London in 1557; and at Oxford in 1663; and again in 1679.

LINDLEY, John, Ph.D., F.R.S., a botanist, born at Catton, near Norwich, 5 Feb., 1799. His father was proprietor of a large nursery garden, a circumstance which doubtless gave birth to the taste for botany so early manifested in the son. After leaving the grammar school at Norwich, he devoted his attention to botanical studies, his first publication being a translation of Richard's 'Analyse du Fruit,' 1819, which was followed the next year by a work entitled, 'Monographia Rosarum,' containing descriptions of several new species of roses. At this period, also, he contributed some remarkable papers to the Transactions of the Linnæan Society. Coming to London, he received the appointment of assistant-secretary to the Horticultural Society, and was engaged by Mr. Loudon to write the descriptive portion of his 'Encyclopædia of Plants,' the merit of which as a botanical work was entirely due to him. In his 'Introduction to the Natural System of Botany,' he lucidly set forth the advantages of a natural classification of plants over the artificial system of Linnæus. His principal other works are an 'Introduction to Systematic and Physiological Botany,' 1832; and 'The Vegetable Kingdom,' 1846. He also edited the 'Gardener's Chronicle,' and was a frequent contributor to the periodical press on his favourite subject. The degree of Ph.D. was conferred on him by the university of Munich. Died 1 Nov., 1865.

LINDSAY. See Balcarres, Earl of.

LINDSAY, or LYNDSAY, Sir David, of the Mount, a Scotch poet, born at Garmylton, in Haddingtonshire, 1490. He was page of honour to James V.; and in 1530 was inaugurated Lord Lyon king-at-arms. He was much employed as a herald, and is supposed to have died in 1567. His poems were published by George Chalmers in 1806, in 3 vols.

LINDSAY, John, an English divine, who was educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford; after which he officiated many years to a congregation of nonjurors, in Aldersgate Street. He was also corrector of the press to Mr. Bowyer, and died at the age of eighty-two 21 June, 1768. He published a translation of Mason's Vindication of the Church of England, 1728; A short History of the Regal Succession; Remarks on Whiston's Scripture Politics.

LINDSAY, JOHN, Earl of Crawford. See CRAWFORD.

LINDSEY, ROBERT BERTIE, EARL OF, K.G., lord high chamberlain of England in the reign of Charles I., was the eldest son of Peregrine, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, by Mary, daughter of John Vere, earl of Oxford, and grandson of Richard Bertie, Esq., by Catharine, duchess of Suffolk. He was born 1582, and in 1601, upon the death of his father, succeeded to his title and estate. In the first year of the reign of James I. he made his claim to the earldom of Oxford, and to the titles of Lord Bulbech, Sandford, and Badlesmere, and to the office of lord high chamberlain of England, as son and heir of Mary, the sole heir female of that great family. After considerable dispute judgment was given in his favour for the office of lord high chamberlain, and the same year he took his seat in the House of Lords above all the barons. He graduated M.A. at Cambridge as a member of Corpus Christi College 4 March, 1612. On 22 Nov., 1626, he was advanced to the dignity of earl of Lindsey, and four years afterwards was made a knight of the Garter. In 1635 he was constituted lord high admiral of England, and a fleet of forty ships of war was sent out under his command. In 1639, upon the Scotch taking arms, he was appointed governor of Berwick. The year following he was appointed lord high constable of England at the trial of the earl of Strafford. In 1642 he was constituted general of the king's forces, and on the 23rd of Oct. in the same year received his death wound at the battle of Edgehill.

LINDSEY, THEOPHILUS, was born at Middlewich, Cheshire, 20 June, 1723. He took his degrees in arts at St. John's College, Cambridge, and on entering into orders obtained successively the livings of Kirkby Wiske, Yorkshire; Piddletown, Dorset; and Catterick, in the former county, which last he resigned 1773, having embraced the Socinian tenets. He then settled in London, where he opened a chapel in Essex Street, which he served till 1793, when he retired from the ministry. Died 3 Nov., 1808. Mr. Lindsey published 'An Apology for his Resignation of the Vicarage of Catterick;' and some other pieces in defence of his peculiar sentiments.

LINE, or HALL, FRANCIS, a Jesuit, born in London 1595, joined the Society 1623, and was professed 1640. He was deservedly in repute as a professor of Hebrew and mathematics. During the time he was serving the English mission he constructed in the garden of Whitehall Palace a very curious dial, of which a description was published by him at Liege. He also wrote 'Refutation of the Attempt to Square the Circle,' 8vo., Lond., 1660, against Father Goswin Nickel; 'A Treatise on the Barometer;' and 'De corporum inseparabilitate.' It is said that he had a controversy with Newton on his theory of light.—Oliver.

LINEGAR, JOHN, D.D., a Catholic divine, appointed archbishop of Dublin 1734; died 1756.

LINGARD, JOHN, D.D., LL.D., the Catholic historian of England, was born at Winchester 5 Feb., 1771, of parents who occupied a humble position in society. At an early age he was recommended to the notice of Bishop Challoner, and by the successor of that prelate, Bishop James Talbot, he was sent in 1782 to the English college at Douay. After a course of humanities, in which the brilliancy of his genius was equalled only by the modesty of his disposition, he entered the school of theology in Oct., 1792. In the following year, during the troubles of the French revolution, the establishment at Douay was broken up and its members dispersed. Some of them, including young Lingard, effected their escape to this country, and on 15 Oct., 1794, eight individuals, the sad but honoured representatives of the famous college of Douay, took possession of Crook Hall, near Durham, and resumed their collegiate exercises, Lingard receiving the appointment of vice-president. He was ordained priest 1795; became about the same time prefect of the studies, and for many years filled the chair both of natural and moral philosophy. In 1808 the community removed to Ushaw, where Lingard, whose attention had been directed in an especial manner to the study of our early ecclesiastical history, read to his friends a series of papers on Anglo-Saxon antiquities. These were subsequently published under the title of 'The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church,' 2 vols., Newcastle, 1806; 2nd edit., 1810; 3rd edit., greatly enlarged, and almost entirely rewritten, 2 vols. 1845; 4th edit., 1858. In Sept., 1811, Mr. Lingard retired from Ushaw, and withdrew to the secluded mission of Hornby, Lancashire, where he spent the remainder of his days engaged in literary pursuits, the principal events of his subsequent life being two visits to Rome. The first three volumes of his celebrated 'History of England' were published at London in 1819, and the eighth and concluding volume, bringing the history down to the revolution of 1688, appeared in 1830. Both at home and on the Continent the work was hailed with admiration by scholars of every creed and every shade of opinion; and it is now all but universally admitted to be the most accurate and impartial history of our country that has yet been written. It has been translated into French, Italian, and German, and been several times reprinted both in England and the United States. A special decree of the university of Paris ordered the work to be placed in the library of every college in France; and it has for a long time been used as a text book in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1821 Pope Pius VII. conferred on its author the degrees of doctor in divinity and doctor of canon and civil law, and Leo XII. sent him the gold medal usually bestowed only on cardinals and princes. It has also been stated that Dr. Lingard was actually created a cardinal in petto, but this assertion appears not to be correct. Besides his history he wrote a number of other works, for the most part in defence of the doctrines of the Catholic Church. The principal are Documents to ascertain the Sentiments of British Catholics in former ages in regard to the power of the Pope,' 1812; 'A Review of certain Anti-Catholic Publications,' 1813; 'Strictures on Dr. Marsh's Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome,' 1815; 'A Collection of Tracts on several subjects connected with the civil and religious principles of the Catholics,' 1826; 'A New Version of the Four Gospels, by a Catholic,' 1836; and 'Catechetical Instructions on the Doctrines and Worship of the Catholic Church,' 1840. In 1823, at the request of Bishop Milner, he compiled the lessons for the English saints which were afterwards approved and inserted the Breviary. Dr. Lingard died 17 July, 1851, and was buried in the cloister of the cemetery at St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw.

LINGLEBACH, JOHN, a painter, born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1625; died 1687.

LINGUET, SIMON NICOLAS HENRI, a French advocate and political writer, was born at Rheims 1736, and fell under the guillotine 27 June, 1794.

LINLEY, GEORGE, an English poet and composer, was the son of a Leeds tradesman, and in a great measure self-taught. He set to music some of our best modern ballads, and wrote several satirical works, one of which, 'The Modern Hudibras,' had an extensive sale. Died at Kensington to Sept., 1865, aged 66.

LINLEY, THOMAS, a musical composer, born at Bath about 1725. He commenced his musical studies under Chillcott, the organist of the abbey church at Bath, and completed them under Paradies, a celebrated Venetian composer, after which he became conductor of the oratorios and concerts then regularly performed at Bath. His connection with Richard Brinsley Sheridan, who married his daughter, induced him to embark in theatrical speculations, and in 1776, in conjunction with his son-in-law and a Mr. Ford, he purchased Garrick's share in Drury Lane Theatre for £35,000. Previous to this he had become favourably known to the public as the joint composer, with his son, of the songs in Sheridan's 'Duenna.' His career at Drury Lane commenced with the successful production of a musical piece called 'Zelima and Azore,' in which the song, 'No Flower that blows,' was rapturously applauded. In 1777 he produced his accompaniments to the original airs in the 'Beggar's Opera,' which have been justly eulogised both by foreign and native composers. His subsequent compositions were the music to 'The Camp,' 'The Spanish Rivals,' 'The Strangers at Home,' and part of the music to Sheridan's monody on the death of Garrick. He also published several ballads full of pathos, spirit, and originality, particularly that commencing, 'Sing of the days that are gone.' Mr. Linley's family afflictions were unusually severe, and after having lost two sons and a daughter under very distressing circumstances, he was seldom, if ever, seen to smile. He died in London 19 Nov., 1795. As a musician he is distinguished by taste and feeling. He did not seek to astonish by sublime effects, but his compositions always soothe and charm by delicacy, simplicity, and tenderness. He has also the merit of having restored the music of Handel and the performance of it to the notice of the public.

LINLEY, THOMAS, son of the preceding, was born at Bath 1756, and acquired a well-merited reputation as a musical composer. He met his death under very melancholy circumstances 7 Aug., 1778. Being on a visit with his sisters at Grimsthorpe, Lincolnshire, the seat of the duke of Ancaster, he, in conjunction with three other young men, embarked on board a sailing-boat in the duke's canal. The boat, however, was upset, and Linley's companions clung to the keel whilst he swam off for assistance, but just as he was on the point of reaching the bank he sank to rise no more. An edition of his posthumous works was published by Preston, in which is to be found the greater part of his miscellaneous music, consisting of songs, elegies, and cantatas.

LINLEY, WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, was born about 1767. For many years he was in the service of the East India Company, and after amassing a fortune, he returned to this country, and lived a London life, for the most part in musical society. He composed numerous glees, canzonets, &c., and compiled the 'Dramatic Songs of Shakespeare,' in which are several of his own compositions. He also wrote two comic operas, and several novels. Died 16 May, 1835.

LINNÆUS, or VON LINNÉ, CHARLES, was the son of a clergyman at Rashult, in Sweden, and born there 13 May, 1707. He was educated at Lund, from whence he removed to Upsal, where he was appointed to read lectures on botany in 1730; and the year following he received a commission from the Academy of Sciences to travel in Lapland and Norway. In this journey he paid attention to the art of assaying metals, on which he afterwards delivered a course of lectures. In 1735 he went to Harderwyck, in Holland, where he took his doctor's degree, and while in that country he became, through the introduction of Boerhaave, superintendent of Mr. Clifford's garden at Hartecamp, of which he drew up a catalogue. While in this situation he published also his 'Flora Lapponica;' after which he visited England. On his return to Holland he continued his 'Genera Plantarum,' and was chosen a member of the Imperial Academy 'Naturæ Curiosorum.' In 1737 he printed the 'Hortus Cliffortianus,' and his 'Critica Botanica.' He returned to Sweden 1738, and was chosen a member of the academy at Upsal; and soon afterwards he laid the foundation of that at Stockholm. In 1740 he was chosen professor of medicine at the former place, where he undertook the reform of the botanical garden, to which he gave many valuable exotics. In 1745 he published his 'Flora Suecica;' which was followed by the 'Fauna Suecica.' At this time his merits were so well appreciated that a medal was struck to his honour, and he was appointed archiator to the king. In 1749 appeared his 'Materia Medica;' and in 1751 he published the 'Philosophia Botanica.' His most splendid publication came out in 1754, with this title, 'Musæum Regis Adolphi Frederici,' comprising a description of the natural curiosities in the royal museum. While conducting this work through the press, Linnæus was honoured with the order of the Polar Star, and in 1756 he was ennobled. In the meantime he prepared for publication his 'Species Plantarum,' which was followed by the 'Systema Naturæ.' This illustrious naturalist died at Upsal 10 Jan., 1778, and his remains were interred with great solemnity in the cathedral of that city, where his pupils erected a monument to his memory. His son, Charles Linnæus, born in 1741, became demonstrator in the botanic garden, and published some valuable works. He was ill used by his mother, which is supposed to have hastened his death 1 Nov. 1783. His sister, Elizabeth Christina, discovered a luminous property in the flowers of the nasturtium.

LINT, PETER VAN, an historical painter, born at Antwerp 1609; died there 1668.

LIOTARD, JEAN ETIENNE, a painter, called from his eastern dress, The Turk, was born at Geneva 1702. He worked in enamel, crayons, and miniature. Travelling to Constantinople, he there fell in with Sir Everard Fawkener, who brought him to England, where he was much employed for portraits. In the Dresden Gallery there are four of his works in pastel, one being the celebrated 'Vienna Chocolate Girl.' Died 1779.

LIPPI, FRA FILIPPO, an historical painter, born at Florence 1412. He was the disciple of Massaccio, whose manner he imitated. He was originally a Carmelite, but quitted the order to follow the arts. On a voyage in the Levant, he fell into the hands of the Moors, and was carried to Barbary; but by drawing the portrait of his master, he recovered his liberty, and returned to Florence, where he was employed by the grand duke. He was poisoned (1469) by the relations of a female whom he had seduced, and by whom he had a son, Filippino Lippi (b. 1460; died 1505), who was also a celebrated painter.

LIPPI, LORENZO, a painter of Florence, who was also a musician and poet. He wrote a popular work, entitled, 'Il Malmantile Racquistato.' Born 1606; died 1664.

LIPSIUS, JUSTUS, a famous classical scholar, was born at Isch, a village between Brussels and Louvain, 18 October, 1547, and studied successively at Brussels, Ath, Cologne, and Louvain. At the age of eighteen he published his 'Variæ Lectiones,' with a dedication to Cardinal Granvelle, and on visiting Rome, 1567, he was made secretary to that distinguished ecclesiastic. In 1569 he returned to Louvain, and next went to Vienna, but in 1572 he settled at Jena, where he occupied the chair of eloquence and history for two years. In 1574 he retired to solitude and study at Isch, but the tumults of war drove him away again, and between 1579 and 1591 he held the professorship of history at Leyden. The remainder of his life was spent at Louvain, where he died 23 March, 1606. Lipsius, Scaliger, and Casaubon, were called the triumvirs of the literary republic. In his religious opinions, or rather professions, Lipsius was culpably inconsistent. He was brought up a Catholic, but became a Lutheran at Jena, again a Catholic on his return to Brabant, a Calvinist at Leyden, and once more a Catholic at Louvain. His works were published at Antwerp, 6 vols. folio, 1637; and at Wesel, 4 vols. 8vo., 1675. The most esteemed are, Commentaries on Tacitus; 'Electa;' 'Saturnalia;' Orations on the Concord, and on the Death of the Duke of Saxony; a treatise on the Roman Militia; and Lectures.

LISLE. See DELISLE.

LISLE, Sir GEORGE, was the son of a bookseller in London. He had his military education in the Netherlands, but on the breaking out of the civil wars he entered the royal army, where he behaved so well that he was appointed to a command. At the battle of Newbury, when it grew so dark that his men could not distinguish him, he put his shirt over his clothes, in order that he might be more conspicuous. The king, who was an eye-witness of his bravery, knighted him on the field of battle. He held Colchester a long time against the parliament forces, and surrendered as a prisoner of war, but was basely put to death by the victors 28 August, 1648.

LIST, FREDERICK, a German political economist, born at Reutlingen, in Würtemberg, 6 Aug., 1789; died by his own hand 30 Nov., 1846. He first originated (1819) the idea of the 'Zollverein,' or Customs Association, which was ultimately adopted by all the German States. His complete works were published at Stuttgard, 3 vols., 1850-51.

LISTER, MARTIN, M.D., F.R.S., was born at Radcliffe, Bucks, about 1638. He was brought up by his great uncle, Sir Matthew Lister, physician to Charles I., who sent him to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; but he took his doctor's degree at Oxford. He then settled as a physician at York, where he applied himself very much to natural history. In 1689 he accompanied the earl of Portland on his embassy to France, of which journey he published an account. In 1709 he was appointed physician in ordinary to Queen Anne. Died 2 Feb., 1711-12. His works are, 'Historia, sive synopsis Conchyliorum,' 2 vols.; 'Hist. Animalium Angliæ;' 'De Fontibus Medicalibus Angliæ;' 'Exercitatio Anatomica;' 'Cochlearum ex Limacum exercitatio anatomica;' 'Conchyliorum Bivalvium utriusque aquæ exercitatio;' 'Exercitationes Medicinales.'

LISTER, Sir MATTHEW, M.D., physician to Anne of Denmark, the consort of James I., and physician-in-ordinary to Charles I., was born at Thornton, Yorkshire, about 1565, and died Dec., 1656.

LISTER, THOMAS HENRY, registrar-general of births, marriages, and deaths, was born 1801, and died at Kent House, Knightsbridge, the residence of his relative, the earl of Morley, 5 June, 1842. He was author of two novels, 'Granby' (1826), and 'Herbert Lacy;' 'Epicharis; an Historical Tragedy,' 1829; 'The Life and Administration of Edward, first Earl of Clarendon,' 3 vols., 1838; and 'An Answer to the misrepresentations contained in an article on the Life of Clarendon in No. 124 of the Quarterly Review,' 1839.

LISTON, JOHN, a celebrated comic actor, born in London 1776, being the son of a watchmaker. He started in life as teacher in a day school in Castle Street, Leicester Square, but, while holding this situation, formed an acquaintance with Charles Mathews, and like him became 'stage-struck.' After figuring on the boards of a private theatre, they both resolved to make the stage their profession, and accordingly joined a country company. Liston, who at this period believed that his forte lay in the representation of tragic characters, eventually obtained an engagement at Dublin, and next at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where he discovered that he had mistaken his powers, and essaying a comic cast of characters he succeeded so fully that he thenceforward devoted himself exclusively to the performance of low comedy. In 1805 he made his first bow to a London audience at the Haymarket in the character of 'Zekiel Homespun.' His efforts were crowned with the highest success, and a long list of subsequent performances ratified and increased his popularity. In the same year he removed to Covent Garden, where he remained till 1823, when he accepted an engagement at Drury Lane. His famous character of 'Paul Pry,' first performed in 1825, created at the time an extraordinary sensation. In 183 Madame Vestris engaged him at the enormous salary of £100 a week for the Olympic Theatre, where he remained six seasons, and then retired from the stage, with a considerable fortune. He died in London 22 March, 1846.

LISTON, ROBERT, F.R.S., an eminent surgeon, born at Ecclesmachan, co. Linlithgow, 28 Oct., 1794. After completing his professional studies he established himself as a surgeon in Edinburgh (1817), and delivered lectures, first on anatomy, and afterwards on surgery, from 1822 to 1834. He speedily rose to eminence both as a lecturer and as an operator, having in the latter capacity few rivals and no superior. In 1834 he was appointed surgeon to the North London Hospital; and subsequently professor of clinical surgery in University College. His London practice was extensive, his name had become familiar in every medical school of Europe and America, when his career was suddenly terminated by death 7 Dec., 1847. His work on the 'Elements of Surgery' went through several editions.

LITHGOW, WILLIAM, a Scotch pedestrian traveller, born in the parish of Lanark between 1580 and 1590. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was thrown into the inquisition in Spain, and so cruelly tortured, as to be deprived of the use of his limbs. On regaining his liberty and coming to England, he published an account of his adventures, which he presented to James I. He also wrote a narrative of the siege of Breda, and died about 1645. His 'Poetical Remains' were first collected and edited by James Maidment, 4to., Edinb., 1863.

LITTLETON, ADAM, D.D., was born at Hales Owen, Shropshire, 8 Nov., 1627. He was educated at Westminster School; from whence he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, but was expelled by the parliamentary visitors 1648. After this he became usher of Westminster School; and in 1670, on being made chaplain to the king, he accumulated his degrees in divinity. In 1674 he was presented to the rectory of Chelsea; and he also obtained a prebendal stall at Westminster, of which church he became sub-dean. Dr. Littleton published a Latin Dictionary, and some grammatical treatises, sermons, and other works. Died 30 June, 1694.

LITTLETON, EDWARD, Lord Littleton of Mounslow, lord-keeper of the great seal, was descended from the celebrated judge, and born at Henley, Shropshire, 1589. He became a commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. He succeeded his father as a Welsh judge; after which he became recorder of London. In 1634 he was appointed solicitor-general; in 1639 made chief-justice of the Common Pleas, and the next year he received the great seal, with the title of Lord Littleton of Mounslow. He died at Oxford 27 Aug., 1645. His Reports were printed 1683.

LITTLETON, EDWARD, LL.D., was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge (LL.D. 1728). He became assistant at Eton School, afterwards fellow of the college, and vicar of Mapledurham, in Oxfordshire, where he died 1734. A volume of his discourses was printed for the benefit of his widow and daughters. He also wrote some poems, which are in Dodsley's Collection.

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, Sir THOMAS, a great lawyer, was the son of Thomas Westcote, of the county of Devon, by Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Littleton, of Frankley, in Worcestershire; in compliance with whose wish this son took the maternal name and arms. He studied in the Temple, and was appointed by Henry VI. judge of the Marshalsea; in 1455 made king's serjeant and judge of the assize; in 1466 nominated one of the justices of the Common Pleas: and, in 1475, created knight of the Bath. Died 23 Aug., 1481. He wrote in Norman French a celebrated treatise on Tenures for the use of his son Richard, who was also a distinguished lawyer. The first edition of it is supposed to have been printed a little after the author's death, in folio, at Rouen. Sir Edward Coke's commentary on this famous work is well known. A new edition of the 'Tenures,' in English, was published by H. Roscoe, 1825.

LIVERPOOL, CHARLES JENKINSON, EARL OF, was the eldest son of Colonel Jenkinson, the younger brother of Sir Robert Jenkinson, baronet. He was born 16 May, 1727, and had his education at the Charterhouse; from whence he removed to University College, Oxford (M.A. 1752). In 1761 he obtained a seat in parliament, and was appointed under-secretary of State. In 1766 he was nominated a ord of the Admiralty; from which board he removed to the Treasury. In 1772 he was made joint vice-treasurer of Ireland, which he exchanged for the clerkship of the pells. In 1778 he became secretary at war, and in 1784 president of the Board of Trade. In 1786 he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Hawkesbury, and in 1796 to the earldom of Liverpool. Died 17 Dec., 1808. His lordship published, A Discourse on the Establishment of a National and Constitutional Force in England; A Discourse on the Conduct of Great Britain in respect to Neutral Nations during War; A Collection of Treaties, 3 vols.; A Treatise on the Coins of the Realm, 1805.

LIVERPOOL, ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON, EARL OF, son of the preceding, was born 7 June, 1770, and was sent from the Charterhouse to Christ Church, Oxford, where he formed a lasting friendship with Canning. Making the 'grand tour,' he witnessed the capture of the Bastille, and while yet a minor obtained a seat in parliament as member for Appleby. His maiden speech (1791) was in defence of the armaments with which Pitt threatened resistance to Russian aggressions in Turkey, and was a decided success. In the following session he advocated immediate war with France, and deprecated any negotiations with a 'band of sanguinary ruffians.' He also showed his hereditary conservatism by opposing Earl Grey's motion for parliamentary reform. In 1793 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the India Board. He assumed the title of Lord Hawkesbury, the second title of his father, who had just been created earl of Liverpool. Subsequently he became master of the Mint, and when George III.'s repugnance to Catholic Emancipation caused Pitt's resignation, he adhered to Addington, and was entrusted with the seals of the Foreign Office (1801). He directed the diplomacy which resulted in the peace of Amiens. In 1803 he was transferred to the Upper House as Lord Hawkesbury, and on Pitt's return to power he became its leader, though shifted to the Home Office. On the death of Pitt (1806) he declined the premiership, but was appointed by the king, as a mark of esteem, lord warden of the Cinque Ports. On the formation of the duke of Portland's administration (1807) he returned to the Home Office, but was transferred to the war department on Perceval's succession to the premiership. He succeeded his father in the earldom (1808), and immediately after the assassination of Mr Perceval (1812) he became prime minister. His administration lasted, with no considerable changes, until a short time before his decease. Their foreign policy was crowned with success, and resulted in the treaty of Paris (1815), but their domestic policy is open to grave censure, especially in respect to the postponement of the claims of the Catholics. On 27 Feb., 1827, his lordship was seized with a fit of paralysis and apoplexy, and after lingering several months in a state of mental imbecility, he died 4 Dec., 1828. An account of his Life and Administration, by Charles Duke Yonge, was published in 3 vols., 1868.

LIVINEIUS. See LIEVENS.

LIVINGSTON, JAMES, earl of Calendar. See CALENDAR.

LIVINGSTON, JOHN, a Scotch presbyterian divine, born in Stirlingshire 21 Jan., 1603, and educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A. He was banished from Scotland 1663, for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, on which he went to Rotterdam, where he died 9 Aug., 1672. His 'Remarkable Observations upon the Lives of the most Eminent Ministers and Professors in the Church of Scotland' were printed, with his Memoirs, 1754.

LIVIUS, TITUS, a Roman historian, was born of an illustrious family at Patavium, now Padua, B.C. 59. He lived at Rome in the reign of Augustus, to whom he dedicated some dialogues upon philosophy, which are lost. After collecting his materials for the History of Rome he retired to Naples, that he might have more leisure to compose the work than he could enjoy in a distracted capital. It is said, however, that he read portions of the history to Mecænas and Augustus. On the death of the latter he returned to his native place, where he died A.D. 17, at the age of seventy-six. The history of Livy originally consisted of one hundred and forty-two books, of which only thirty-five are extant. The first edition is that of Rome, printed by Sweynhaym and Pannartz in 1469, and the best that of Gronovius, in 3 vols. 8vo., 1679. The best English translation is by George Baker, 6 vols. 8vo., 1797.

LLORENTE, JUAN ANTONIO, a Spanish ecclesiastic, born near Calahorra 30 March, 1756. He was secretary-general of the Inquisition, and attached himself to Joseph Bonaparte 1808, on whose fall he went to France, 1814. Died 5 Feb., 1823. He wrote a History of the Spanish Inquisition; Memoirs concerning the Revolution in Spain; and other works.

LLOYD, CHARLES, D.D., a prelate of the Church of England, born 26 Sept., 1784. From Eton he proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, of which society he became, in due time, tutor and censor. He succeeded Dr. Hodgson as regius professor of divinity 1822; was promoted to the see of Oxford 1827; and died 31 May, 1829. Dr. Lloyd, to his credit be it recorded, was a warm supporter of the Catholic Relief Bill. He brought out an edition of the Greek Testament, and edited a work, published long after his death, and entitled 'Formularies of Faith put forth by authority during the Reign of Henry VIII., viz. Articles about Religion, 1536. The Institution of a Christian Man, 1537. A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for a Christian Man,' 8vo., Oxford, 1856. A copy of Hephæstion's Enchiridion, with copious MS. notes by him, is in the British Museum.

LLOYD, CHARLES, an English poet, the friend of Wordsworth, Lamb, and Southey, was the son of Charles Lloyd, a banker, of Birmingham. He was born in that town 1775, and after being privately educated under a Mr. Gilpin, was admitted a fellow-commoner of Caius College, Cambridge; but he quitted the university without taking a degree. He died at Chaillot, near Paris, 16 Jan., 1839. His works are 'Poems on Various Subjects,' 1795; 'Blank Verse, by Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb,' 1798; 'Poetical Essays on the Character of Pope, as a poet and moralist; and on the language and objects most fit for poetry,' 1821; 'Desultory Thoughts in London; Titus and Gisippus; with other Poems,' 2 vols., 1821; 'The Duke d'Ormond, a tragedy, and Beritola, a tale,' 1822; 'Poems,' 1823.

LLOYD, DAVID, a biographer, was born at Pant Mawr, in the parish of Trawsvinydd, Merionethshire, 28 Sept., 1625. He took his degrees at Oriel College, Oxford; after which he was presented to the rectory of Ibston, but resigned it to settle in London, where he became reader of the Charterhouse. Afterwards he obtained a prebend of St. Asaph, and the vicarage of Abergeley, which last he exchanged for that of Northop, in Flintshire, where also he kept school. Died 16 Feb., 1691. His principal works are, The Statesmen and Favourites of England since the Reformation; Memoirs of the Lives of Persons who suffered for their Loyalty; Life of General Monk; Portraiture of Charles II.; The Countess of Bridgewater's Ghost; 'History of Plots and Conspiracies,' published with the name of Foulis; Wonders no Miracles, or Mr. Valentine Greatrakes's Gift of Healing examined. His 'Memoirs of Statesmen' were reprinted by Charles Whitworth, 2 vols. 8vo., 1766, with an account of the author.

LLOYD, HENRY, a writer on military tactics, born in Wales 1729. Appointed aide-de-camp to the Austrian General Lascy, he served during the Seven Years' War, rose to the rank of lieutenant-general, and in 1760 was placed at the head of a large detachment in order to observe the movements of the Prussian army. Disappointed, however, in his expectations of advancement, he joined the Prussian army, and became general aide-de-camp to the prince of Brunswick. After the peace he went to St. Petersburg, and obtained from the Empress Catharine the grade of major-general and a command in the army sent against the Turks. He greatly distinguished himself as a tactician, and was about to be placed at the head of 30,000 men in Finland, when the peace concluded with Sweden rendered it unnecessary to form an army. On quitting the Russian service he travelled in various countries on the Continent, and paid a furtive visit to England, which he was soon obliged to leave, though not before he had, by clandestine explorations, acquired a profound knowledge of our coasts and the points most open to attack. Retiring to Huy, in Belgium, he died there 19 June, 1783. His principal work is 'The History of the late War in Germany, between the King of Prussia and the Empress of Germany and her Allies 1757-59,' 3 vols. 4to., London, 1766-90. This is one of the best accounts of any campaign ever printed.

LLOYD, NICHOLAS, an historical writer, born at Holton, Flintshire, 1634, and educated at Winchester School; after which he went to Wadham College, Oxford, of which he became fellow. The bishop of Worcester, to whom he was chaplain, presented him to the rectory of St. Mary, Newington, in Surrey, where he died 27 Nov., 1680. He published an Historical Dictionary in Latin, folio, 1670; reprinted 1686.

LLOYD, ROBERT, a poet, born in Westminster 1733. His father, Dr. Pierson Lloyd, was for nearly fifty years usher of Westminster School, where also this son was educated, after which he went to Trinity College, Cambridge. Having completed his degrees in arts, he became an assistant in the school where he had been bred, but lost the situation, and died in the Fleet 15 Dec., 1764. He was the companion of Wilkes and Churchill, to which association he was indebted for his misfortunes. His poems are now forgotten.

LLOYD, WILLIAM, a learned prelate, born at Tilehurst, Berks, 1627. He became a student of Oriel College, Oxford, but afterwards removed to Jesus College, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1667 he was collated to a prebend in the church of Sarum, on which he completed his degrees in divinity. The year following he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading, and about the same time made archdeacon of Merioneth. In 1672 he was promoted to the deanery of Bangor, and, in 1674, to a canonry of Salisbury. In 1676 he obtained the vicarage of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, and in 1680 was elevated the see of St. Asaph. He was one of the seven bishops prosecuted by James II.; but in the next reign he was translated to Worcester. Died 30 Aug., 1717. He wrote several pieces against the Catholic religion; a Dissertation on Daniel's Prophecy of the seventy Weeks; a Discourse of God's Way of disposing Kingdoms; an Historical Account of Church Government; a Chronological Account of Pythagoras; a Harmony of the Gospels; and several other works.

LOBAU, GEORGE MOUTON Comte DE, a marshal of France, born at Phalsbourg 1770. He became a general of division 1807, and greatly distinguished himself at Eckmühl and Wagram. After the battle of Leipsic he was sent into Hungary by the Austrians, in spite of the capitulation of Dresden. He returned, however, to France in the following year; fought at Waterloo; and was exiled under the Restoration. He was elected to the chamber of deputies 1828. At the revolution of 1830 he was transferred to the chamber of peers, created a marshal, and appointed to succeed La Fayette in the command of the national guard. Died 29 Nov., 1838. 'Lobau,' said Napoleon, 'was the best colonel that ever commanded a French regiment.'

LOBB, THEOPHILUS, a physician, was the son of Stephen Lobb, a dissenting minister, who was much in the confidence of James II. The son was born in London 17 Aug., 1678, and educated for the ministry, which profession he quitted to study physic. He died 19 May, 1763, leaving several works on medical and religious subjects.

LOBEIRA, Vasco, the original author of the famous romance of 'Amadis of Gaul,' was born in Portugal about 1270, and died 1325.

LOBEL, MATTHIAS DE, a botanist, born at Lisle 1538. He studied physic at Montpellier, and afterwards settled in London, where he had the superintendence of the garden of Lord Zouch, at Hackney. He died 3 March, 1616. Lobel published, 'Stirpium Adversaria nova,' 1570; 'Plantarum seu Stirpium Historia,' Antwerp, 1576; and 'Icones Stirpium,' 1581 and 1591, with an Index in seven languages. Plumier dedicated to him the genus 'Lobelia.'

LOBINEAU, GUI ALEXIS, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born in 1666 at Rennes, and died at the abbey of St. Jagut, near St. Malo, 3 June, 1727. He published, A History of Brittany; A History of the Saints of Brittany; A History of the Conquest of Spain by the Moors; and A History of Paris.

LOBO, JEROME, a Jesuit, born at Lisbon 1593. He went as a missionary to Abyssinia, and, on his return to Europe, became rector of the college of Coimbra, where he died 29 Jan., 1678. He wrote 'An Account of Abyssinia;' of which Dr. Johnson published an abridged translation 1735.

LOCK, MATTHEW, a musician, was born at Exeter, where he became a chorister in the cathedral. He published some musical pieces in 1657, and, after the Restoration, he was employed as a composer of operas. He was also appointed composer to the chapel royal. He died in communion with the Catholic Church 1677. His vocal music is much admired.

LOCKE, JOHN, was born at Wrington, in Somersetshire, where his father was a lawyer and steward, 29 Aug., 1632. He received his education at Westminster School, from whence he was elected in 1652 to Christ Church, Oxford, where he had a studentship, and took his degree of M.A. 1658. He then applied himself to the study of physic, in which he graduated 1674. Though he did not enter upon regular practice, his advice was often solicited in difficult cases, particularly by the earl of Shaftesbury, with whom he formed a close connexion, and became tutor to his son. In 1675 he went to France, and, while at Montpellier, paid particular attention to the culture of the vine, and the rearing of silkworms. When Lord Shaftesbury withdrew to Holland, Mr. Locke followed him, for which he was deprived of his student's place by an order from the king. During his residence abroad he wrote in Latin his 'Letter on Toleration,' printed at Gouda 1689. He there finished also his 'Essay on the Human Understanding,' an abridgment of which was inserted by Le Clerc in the 'Bibliothèque Universelle.' Locke returned to England in the same fleet with the prince of Orange, and soon afterwards published his 'Essay,' which was followed by 'Considerations on the Consequences of lowering the Interest and raising the Value of Money.' He now went to reside at Oates, in Essex, the seat of Sir Francis Masham, whose lady, the daughter of Dr. Cudworth, entertained for him the greatest respect. In 1693 he published his 'Thoughts on Education;' and in 1695 his treatise on 'The Reasonableness of Christianity;' which was attacked by Dr. Edwards, of Cambridge, and defended by Mr. Samuel Bold. But the most powerful assailant of this work was Bishop Stillingfleet, in reply to whom our author wrote several letters. About this time he was appointed one of the commissioners of trade and plantations; which place, however, he resigned 1700. He died at Oates 28 Oct., 1704. Besides the works already noticed, he wrote, Two Treatises concerning Civil Government; Observations on the Value of Money; and A Paraphrase on the Epistles. His works have been several times published in a collected form, and his Life has been written by Lord King, 4to., 1829; 2 vols. 8vo., 1830; 1 vol. 8vo., 1858.

LOCKE, JOSEPH, F.R.S., a civil engineer, was born at Attencliffe, near Sheffield, 1805, and educated at Bursley Grammar School, after which he was placed with George Stephenson at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, under whom he was employed in the construction of the Manchester and Liverpool railway. In conjunction with the Stephensons he was instrumental in determining the superior capabilities of the locomotive. Subsequently he constructed the railways between Warrington and Birmingham, Lancaster and Preston, Sheffield and Manchester, London and Southampton; besides several lines on the Continent, all his works being carried out with great economy. Mr. Locke, who received the decoration of the legion of honour 1845, was president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and M.P. for Honiton from 1847 till his death, which occurred at Moffat, in Annandale, 18 Sept., 1860.

LOCKER, JOHN, F.S.A., was born of a good family in Middlesex, and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, from whence he removed to Merton College, Oxford, and was afterwards called to the bar at Gray's Inn. He translated the first two books of Voltaire's Life of Charles XII., and wrote the preface. He also made collections for a life of Lord Bacon, which he communicated to Dr. Birch and Mr. Mallet. Died May, 1760.

LOCKHART, JOHN GIBSON, LL.D., a critic, novelist, and biographer, was born in Glasgow 1793, and being sent to the university there he was elected to one of the Snell exhibitions, or bursaries, at Balliol College, Oxford. He was admitted a Scotch advocate 1816, but very soon abandoned the law in order to devote himself exclusively to literary pursuits. In 1817 Blackwood's Magazine was established, and he shortly afterwards became a regular contributor to its pages. The next year he formed an acquaintance with Mr. (afterwards Sir Walter) Scott, whose daughter Sophia he subsequently married (1820). The result of this first interview was that he succeeded Scott as the writer of the historical portion of the 'Edinburgh Annual Register.' In 1819 he published what he himself calls 'a sort of mock tour in Scotland,' entitled 'Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk,' which gave rise to much angry feeling at the time. The literary portraits contained in this work are remarkable for their substantial truth and their never-failing force and vivacity. Besides, month after month, contributing some of its most biting and brilliant papers to 'Blackwood,' Mr. Lockhart published four admirable fictions, viz.: 'Valerius, a Roman Story,' 1821; 'Adam Blair, a tale,' 1822, considered the most impressive production of the author's versatile pen; 'Reginald Dalton,' a graceful and vigorous tale, 1823; and the deeply interesting chapters of 'Matthew Wald,' 1824. His translations of 'Ancient Spanish Ballads' appeared in 1823. To 'Constable's Miscellany' he contributed the 'Life of Burns,' 1828, and to 'Murray's Family Library,' the 'History of Napoleon Bonaparte,' 2 vols., 1830. While on a visit to London in 1821, having been made the subject of some severe remarks in the 'London Magazine,' a hostile correspondence ensued between him and Mr. John Scott, the editor, which ended in Mr. Lockhart's posting him. Statements on the subject were published by both parties. After Lockhart's return to Scotland, Mr. Christie, his friend, fought a duel with Mr. Scott, who was mortally wounded. In 1825 Mr. Lockhart accompanied his illustrious father-in-law in his excursion to Ireland. Up to the close of that year he resided at Edinburgh, having his summer residence at Chiefswood, in the neighbourhood of Abbotsford; but being, on the death of Mr. Gifford, appointed editor of the 'Quarterly Review,' he came to reside in Regent's Park, London. That great literary journal he continued to edit for twenty-eight years. On the death of Sir Walter Scott (1832), he became his sole literary executor, and in 1837-8, published a Life of his father-in-law, in 7 vols., which is one of the most interesting biographies in the language. His health having begun to decline, he quitted the charge of the 'Quarterly' in the summer of 1853, and spent the subsequent winter in Italy. Shortly before his death he retired from London to the quiet seclusion of Abbotsford, where he died 25 Aug., 1854.—Anderson.

LOCKMAN, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, born 1698. He became secretary to the British herring fishery, and died in London 2 Feb., 1771. Mr. Lockman had a share in compiling the General Historical Dictionary; and he also published some dramatic pieces and poems.

LOCKWOOD, JOHN, an English Catholic priest, who, being condemned to death on account of his sacerdotal character, was hanged at York 13 April, 1642, being then 87 years of age.

LODER, EDWARD J., an English musical composer, died 5 April, 1865.

LODGE, EDMUND, K.H., F.S.A., a biographer, was born in London 13 June, 1756, and served in the army for a short time, but having a distaste for the military profession, he entered the College of Arms 1782, as Bluemantle pursuivant. He was appointed Lancaster herald 1793; Norroy king-at-arms 1822; Clarenceux king-at-arms 1838; and died 16 Jan., 1839. His works are 'Illustrations of British History, Biography, and Manners, in the Reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, Elizabeth, and James I.,' 3 vols., 1791, and again 1838; the biographical notices in Chamberlaine's 'Portraits of Illustrious Persons of the Court of Henry VIII.,' 1792-1800; 'Life of Sir Julius Cæsar,' 1810 and 1827; 'Portraits of Illustrious Personages of Great Britain, with biographical and historical memoirs of their lives and actions,' a magnificent work, originally published in 4 vols. folio, 1821-34, at the price of 8*l.* 15*s.*; second edition, 12 vols. 8vo., 1835; fourth edition, 10 vols. 8vo., 1849-50. From motives of benevolence, Mr. Lodge lent his name to an annual 'Peerage,' but that work was not compiled by him.

LODGE, THOMAS, M.D., a dramatic poet, was born about 1556, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford; from whence, being a Catholic, he went to Avignon, where he took his degree of doctor of physic, and then settled in London. He died 1625. He wrote some plays, in conjunction with Robert Green, and the following works, Alarm again Usurers; History of Tribonius and Prisæria; Euphues' Golden Legacy; Treatise of the Plague; Countess of Lincoln's Nursery; Treatise in Defence of Plays. He also translated Josephus and Seneca into English. A full list of his numerous writings will be found in Bohn's edition of Lowndes.

LODGE, WILLIAM, an engraver, born 4 July, 1649, at Leeds, where he died Aug., 1689. He was educated at Cambridge.

LOFFT, CAPEL, was born in London 14 Nov., 1751. His father was a barrister, and his mother the sister of Edward Capel, the commentator on Shakspere. In 1759 he was sent to Eton, where he continued ten years, and then removed to Peterhouse, Cambridge, which he left in a short time, and was admitted a student of Lincoln's Inn. In 1775 he was called to the bar, but never distinguished himself in the legal profession, though he published 'Cases in the King's Bench;' 'Elements of Universal Law;' and Baron Gilbert's 'Law of Evidence,' with additions. He was a voluminous writer, and upon a great variety of subjects, political, poetical, theological, and critical. On the death of his uncle he succeeded to the estate of Troston, Suffolk, which he made his residence till the year 1816, when he went abroad, principally with a view to the education of his daughters, which he thought would be conducted better on the Continent than in England. Accordingly he went first to Brussels, next to the neighbourhood of Nanci, and in 1820 to Switzerland. In 1822 he removed to Turin, where he resided till the spring of 1824, when he went to Montcaller, at which place he died on 26 May of that year. His attainments were considerable, but he was pedantic and opinionative. In politics he was a zealous Whig, and in his religious sentiments a Socinian. To him the public were indebted for the appearance of 'The Farmer's Boy,' by Robert Bloomfield, which work he printed at his own expense, with a biographical preface.

LOFTUS, ADAM, D.D., a native of Yorkshire, became archbishop of Armagh 1562, whence he was translated to Dublin 8 Aug., 1567. Died 6 April, 1605, aged 72.

LOFTUS, DUDLEY, an orientalist, born 1618, at Rathfarnham, near Dublin. He was the second son of Sir Adam Loftus, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, after which he went to Oxford, where he studied the law. On his return to Ireland he was made a master in chancery, vicar-general, and judge of the Prerogative Court. He died in June, 1695. He translated the Æthiopic New Testament into Latin for Walton's Polyglott; and published, The Psalms of David, translated from the Armenian into Latin; A History of the Eastern and Western Churches; An Explication of the History of our Saviour taken from the Greek, Syriac, and other oriental authors, 1695.

LOGAN, JOHN, a divine and poet, born in 1748, at Fala, in Mid Lothian. He was educated at Edinburgh, and in 1773 became minister of South Leith. In 1779 he delivered a course of lectures at Edinburgh, on the philosophy of history, of which he published an outline in 1781, and the same year a volume of poems. He next printed the tragedy of 'Runnamede.' In 1786 he came to London, and was engaged as a writer in the 'English Review.' He also published, without his name, 'A Review of the Charges against Mr. Hastings;' for which the bookseller was prosecuted and acquitted. Died 28 Dec., 1788. His sermons were printed in 2 vols., 1790; 5th edition 1807.

LOGAU, FREDERICK, BARON VON, a German poet, born in Silesia 1604; died at Lignitz 1655.

LOGGAN, DAVID, an engraver, born at Dantzig about 1635. He came to this country before the Restoration, and died in London 1693 or 1700. His 'Oxonia Illustrata,' 1675, and 'Cantabrigia Illustrata,' will perpetuate his name.

LOK, MICHAEL, was born 1532, being the son of Sir William Lok, alderman of London. He received his education in Flanders and France, and travelled during thirty-two years through almost all the countries of Christendom, having been captain of a ship of 1,000 tons in divers voyages to the Levant. Lok was intimately connected with Frobisher in his three celebrated voyages. He advanced £6,250 for Frobisher's voyages, and expected great things of the ore which Frobisher brought home. However, it turned out in the end that in two cwt. of the ore only two particles of silver were found, which were not nearly as big as a pin's head. Lok is last heard of as a petitioner from the Fleet Prison in 1581.

LOKMAN, an Eastern fabulist, of whose history absolutely nothing is known. His 'Fables,' written in Arabic, were first printed by Erpenius 1615, and have since gone through innumerable editions.

LOLLARD, WALTER, founder of the sect of the Lollards, was, according to some, an Englishman. His opinions were first disseminated in Germany 1315, and afterwards in Piedmont and in England. He was burnt as a heretic at Cologne 1322. The followers of Lollard believed that the Sacrifice of the Mass, Baptism, and Extreme Unction, were superfluous. They renounced obedience to all magistrates, and endeavoured to persuade themselves that God would not punish faults committed on the earth.

LOMAZZO, JOHN PAUL, an Italian painter and poet, born at Milan 26 April, 1538; died after 1591. His 'Treatise on Painting' is an admirable work.

LOMBARD, JEAN LOUIS, a French military engineer and writer on gunnery, born at Strasburg 1723; died 1 April, 1794.

LOMBARD, PETER, an eminent divine, called also 'The Master of the Sentences,' was born at Novara, in Lombardy. He distinguished himself so much by his learning in the university of Paris, as to be appointed canon of Chartres, and afterwards bishop of Paris about 1159. Died 1164. His excellent work of 'The Sentences,' first printed at Venice 1477, contains an illustration of the doctrines of the church, in a collection of sentences or passages taken from the Fathers. It may, indeed, be regarded as the source and origin of scholastic divinity in the Latin Church. Commentaries upon it have been written by many celebrated men, including William of Auxerre, Albert the Great, St. Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, Okam, and Estius.

LOMBARD, PETER, D.D., an Irish Catholic prelate, was the son of a merchant in the city of Waterford. He studied for a short time in Westminster School under the famous William Camden, and then proceeded to the university of Louvain, where he took the degree of D.D., and delivered theological lectures with great success. He was preferred to the dignity of provost of Cambray, and in 1598 succeeded Edmund MacGauran as archbishop of Armagh; but owing to the troubled condition of Ireland at that period, he never visited his province, which he governed by the agency of a vicar-general. Removing to Rome, he was nominated domestic prelate to Clement VIII., and was finally entrusted with the presidency of the congregation 'De Auxiliis,' by Paul IV. He died at Rome about 1625. His works are 'Casus circa Decretum Clementis Papæ VIII., de Sacramentali Confessione et Absolutione non faciendâ in absentiâ,' 12mo., Antwerp, 1624; 'De Regno Hiberniæ, Sanctorum Insulâ, Commentarius," 4to., Louvain, 1632. The latter book was ordered to be suppressed by the English government.

LOMBARDI, ALFONSO, an Italian sculptor, born at Ferrara 1487; died 1536.

LOMBART, LAMBERT, a painter, born at Liege 1500; died 1560.

LOMBART, PETER, an engraver, resided many years in London, and died after the Restoration. He executed a number of portraits, after Vandyck.

LOMÉNIE, HENRI LOUIS DE, count de Brienne, was born 1635. He was secretary of state, which place he resigned on the death of his wife, and entered into the society of the Oratory. In 1672 he went to the court of the duke of Mecklenburg, where he fell in love with the princess, and had the boldness to avow his passion, for which he was driven out of the principality; and on his return to France shut up in an abbey, where he died 17 April, 1698. He wrote an Account of his Travels, in Latin; Recueil de Poesies, 3 vols.; Remarques sur les Règles de la Poesie Françoise.

LOMÉNIE DE BRIENNE, ÉTIENNE CHARLES, a cardinal, born at Paris 1727. He became bishop of Condom 1760, and archbishop of Toulouse 1763. In 1787 he was appointed comptroller-general of the finances, and shortly afterwards prime minister; but his conduct while holding these exalted situations was characterized by lamentable rashness, weakness, inconsistency, and blundering. The king dismissed him 1788, but gave him the archbishopric of Sens, and procured for him a cardinal's hat. At the Revolution he shamelessly declared for the new order of things, and sent his hat back to the Pope. In spite of this, however, he fell a victim to the revolution, for the soldiers sent to arrest him on 16 Feb., 1794, treated him in such a way that he was found dead in his bed the following morning.

LOMONOZOF, MICHAEL VASILOVITCH, a celebrated Russian poet and historian, born 1711; died 4 April, 1765.

LONDONDERRY, CHARLES WILLIAM STEWART VANE, third MARQUIS OF, brother of Lord Castlereagh, was born in Dublin 18 May, 1778. At the age of fifteen, as ensign of an infantry regiment, he accompanied the earl of Moira to the Netherlands, and took part in the campaign of 1794. Subsequently, while attached to the British mission at Vienna, he was severely wounded at the battle of Donauwerth. During the Irish rebellion of 1798 he commanded a regiment of dragoons, as he also did in the expedition to Egypt, under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, in the course of which he was again dangerously wounded. He next commanded a hussar brigade under Sir John Moore in Spain, and covered the retreat of the British army at Corunna with great skill and valour. After a few months' absence, he returned to the Peninsula, and until May 1813, held the post of adjutant-general under Sir Arthur Wellesley, signalizing himself at Busaco, Talavera, Fuentes d'Onoro, Badajoz, and elsewhere. During the campaign of 1814, in which he was made a lieutenant-general, he performed the duties of military commissioner of the armies of the allied sovereigns; and in the same year was appointed ambassador to Austria, having previously exercised similar functions at the court of Berlin. His participation in the congress of Vienna (1815) as one of the five British plenipotentiaries was the last act of importance of his life. In 1814 he was raised to the peerage as Lord Stewart; in 1822, on the death of his brother, he succeeded to the marquisate of Londonderry; and in 1823 he was created Earl Vane, he having in 1819 contracted a second marriage with the only daughter of Sir Harry Vane Tempest, and assumed the name of Vane. In 1837 he attained the rank of general. With the view of developing the agricultural and mineral resources of his large estates in the county of Durham, he constructed the harbour of Seaham, one of the most costly and most useful works ever undertaken by private enterprise. In politics he was an uncompromising Tory. As an author he is known by his 'Story of the Peninsular War;' and an edition of the Correspondence of his brother, Lord Castlereagh, 1848.

LONDONDERRY, ROBERT STEWART, second MARQUIS OF, was born in Ireland 18 June, 1769, being the second son of the first marquis. He was educated at Armagh, after which he became a fellow-commoner of St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1791 he was chosen into the Irish parliament for the county of Down. At first he joined the opposition, and distinguished himself as an advocate for parliamentary reform; but on obtaining a seat in the British House of Commons he took his seat in the ministerial phalanx. In 1797, being then Lord Castlereagh, he returned to the Irish parliament, and the same year became keeper of the privy seal for that kingdom, being soon afterwards appointed one of the lords of the Treasury. The next year he was nominated secretary to the viceroy; and when the union between Great Britain and Ireland was projected he supported the measure with great eloquence. In the Imperial Parliament he sat as member for the county of Down, and in 1802 was made president of the Board of Control. In 1805 he became secretary for the departments of War and the Colonies; but on vacating his seat he lost his election for the county of Down, and in consequence came in for Boroughbridge. After the death of Pitt he went out of office, but returned to the administration in 1807 as minister of War, which situation he retained until the ill-fated expedition to Walcheren, and a duel with Mr. Canning, drove him from office. In 1812 he succeeded the marquis of Wellesley as foreign secretary, which office he held during the rest of his life. The year following, when the counter-revolution broke out in Holland, Lord Castlereagh went to the Continent to assist the allied powers in negotiating a general peace. The conferences, however, terminated in the resignation of Bonaparte, and the British minister returned to London. For his services on this occasion he received the thanks of parliament, and the order of the Garter from his sovereign. On the death of his father (1821) he succeeded him as marquis of Londonderry; but as this was an Irish peerage he retained his seat in the House of Commons. After a stormy session, in which he laboured hard, his mind was observed to be very much shattered, and his physician was apprised of the circumstance by the duke of Wellington. His lordship, however, was suffered to leave London for his seat at North Cray, in Kent, where, on 12 Aug., 1824, he put an end to his life by severing the carotid artery with a penknife. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey.

LONG. See LE LONG.

LONG, EDWARD, was the son of Samuel Long,

Esq., of the island of Jamaica, and born at Roseilian, in the parish of St. Blaize, Cornwall, 23 Aug., 1734. He was brought up to the law, and on the death of his father went to the West Indies, where he became a judge of the vice-admiralty court, but returned to England 1769, and died 13 March, 1813. He wrote a 'History of Jamaica,' and some other works.

LONG, GEORGE, an English barrister, for several years one of the police magistrates for the Marylebone district, died in London 26 June, 1868. He was author of several works on questions of morals and religion.

LONG, JOHN ST. JOHN, an empiric, born in Ireland 1798. He was originally a portrait painter, but failing in that profession he settled in London as a medical practitioner, pretending that he alone possessed the secret of curing consumption. In 1830 he was charged with causing the death of one of his patients, found guilty of manslaughter, and fined £250. Died 4 July, 1834.

LONG, ROGER, D.D., a divine and astronomer, was born about 1680, and educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. In 1733 he was elected master of his college, and in 1749 Lowndes's professor of astronomy. He constructed an immense sphere in Pembroke Hall, eighteen feet diameter, and worked by machinery. Died 16 Dec., 1770. Dr. Long published 'A Treatise on Astronomy,' 2 vols.; an Answer to Dr. Gally, on the Greek accents; and some other pieces.

LONG, THOMAS, B.D., a nonjuring divine, born at Exeter 1621, and educated at Oxford. On leaving the university he obtained the vicarage of St. Lawrence Clist, near Exeter, and he subsequently obtained a prebend of Exeter, but was ejected therefrom at the Revolution. His principal works are, Calvinus Redivivus; History of the Donatists; Vindication of the Primitive Christians in Point of Obedience; History of Popish and fanatical Plots; A Vindication of King Charles's Claim to the Eikon Basilike.

LONGHI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian engraver, born at Monza, near Milan, 13 Oct., 1766; died in the latter city 2 Jan., 1831.

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS CASSIUS, a Greek writer, who, according to some, was a native of Athens, while others say he was a Syrian. In his younger years he was a great traveller, after which he fixed his residence at Athens, where he published his admirable Treatise on the Sublime. The reputation he acquired by this work induced Zenobia, queen of the East, to appoint him tutor to her two sons; but when that princess became involved in a war with Aurelian, Longinus was taken prisoner with her and put to death A.D. 273. The best editions of his work are those of Pearce, 1724; Toup, 1778; and Weiske, 1809. Dr. Smith has translated it faithfully into English.

LONGLAND, JOHN, an English prelate, was born 1473, at Henley, Oxfordshire. He received his education at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which society he became fellow. In 1514 he was made dean of Salisbury, and he was also appointed confessor to Henry VIII., who gave him the bishopric of Lincoln in 1521. He was a liberal benefactor to the university of Oxford, of which he was chancellor; and though he evinced zeal against heresy, he advocated the divorce of the king. He died May, 1547. Some of his sermons are in print.

LONGLAND, or LANGLAND, ROBERT, an old English poet, was a native of Mortimer's Cleobury, Shropshire. He was a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and a secular priest, but espoused the doctrines of Wycliffe. His 'Visions of Piers Plowman' is full of severe reflections on the clergy, and exhibits a curious picture of the times. It was completed in 1369, and has been frequently printed.

LONGLEY, CHARLES THOMAS, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Boley Hill, Rochester, 28 July, 1794, and educated at Westminster School, whence he proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, of which society he became tutor and censor. In 1827 he left the university on being inducted to the rectory of West Tytherly, Hants. He was head master of Harrow School from 1829 to 1836, when he was appointed the first bishop of the newly-created see of Ripon. He succeeded Dr. Maltby as bishop of Durham 1856; was translated to York 1860; and in 1862 was promoted to the primatial see of Canterbury, which he held till his death on 27 Oct., 1868. He published nothing but some visitation charges and sermons.

LONGOLIUS. See LONGUEIL.

LONGOMONTANUS, CHRISTIAN, an astronomer, was born at Longomontum, in Denmark, whence he had his name, 1562. He was the son of a ploughman, and was obliged to earn his bread by labour when very young, notwithstanding which he studied hard and, with the assistance of the minister of the parish, acquired a good knowledge of the mathematics. At last he became a servitor in the college of Wiburg, the professors of which university recommended him to Tycho Brahe, with whom he lived eleven years. In 1605 he was made mathematical professor at Copenhagen where he died 8 Oct., 1647. He was the author of several works, of which the principal is his 'Astronomia Danica.'

LONGUEIL, CHRISTOPHER DE, Longolius, a learned writer, born at Mechlin 1490. On visiting Rome he was made secretary to Leo X. who employed him to write against Luther. He afterwards settled at Padua, where he resided with Cardinal Pole, to whom he bequeathed his library, and who wrote his life. Died 11 Sept., 1522. Some of his orations and letters, written in Ciceronian Latin, are in print, but his commentary on Pliny the Elder is lost.

LONGUERUE, LOUIS DUFOUR, Abbé DE, a French ecclesiastic, born at Charleville 1652. He discovered uncommon powers of genius at the age of four years, and acquired afterwards great knowledge of the oriental languages. He obtained two abbeys, and died at Paris 22 Nov., 1733. Among his works are, A Discourse on Tatian; Description Historique de la France; Annales Arsacidarum; Treatise on Transubstantiation; Longuerana.

LONGUEVAL, JACQUES, a French Jesuit, author of a 'History of the Gallican Church,' was born at Santerre, in Picardy, 1680; and died at Paris 11 Jan., 1735.

LONGUS, a Greek sophist of the fourth or fifth century, of whose works nothing remains but four books of pastorals on the loves of Daphnis and Cloe. These have been translated into English.

LONSDALE, JOHN, an English prelate, was the eldest son of John Lonsdale, vicar of Darfield, near Barnsley, Yorkshire, and was born 17 Jan. 1788. He was educated at the grammar school of Heath, near Halifax, whence he proceeded to Eton. In due course he was elected to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1821 he was elected Christian advocate, and in the same year was appointed assistant-preacher at the Temple Church. His discourses preached before the university of Cambridge, while holding the former office, were 'Some Popular Objections against Christianity Considered, and the General Character of Unbelief Represented;' and 'The Testimonies of Nature, Reason, and Revelation respecting Future Judgments.' In 1822 he was selected by Dr. Manners Sutton, archbishop of Canterbury, to be one of his grace's domestic chaplains, and for a time held a similar office under his successor, Archbishop Howley. He resigned the chaplaincy on being collated by the archbishop to the rectory of Mersham, near Ashford, Kent. In 1828 Lord Lyndhurst, then lord chancellor, presented him to the metropolitan rectory of St. George's, Bloomsbury, which he held until 1835, when he was elected preacher of Lincoln's Inn. Meanwhile he had become precentor and canon residentiary of Lichfield Cathedral, and principal of King's College, London, a post which he held (during part of the time with the archdeaconry of Middlesex) until 1843, when he was consecrated bishop of Lichfield. Died 19 Oct., 1867.

LOPE DE VEGA. See VEGA.

LOPES, FERNÃO, a Portuguese chronicler, born about 1380; died 1449.

LORENZETTI, AMBROSE, an Italian painter, born at Sienna 1257; died 1340. It is said that he was a pupil of Giotto.

LORENZINI, or LAURENTINI, FRANCIS MARY, an Italian, author of poems in his native tongue, and of Sacred Dramas, in Latin, was born 1680 at Rome, where he died 14 June, 1743.

LORIT. See GLAREANUS.

LORRAIN, ROBERT LE, a French sculptor, born at Paris 1666; died 1 July, 1743.

LORRAINE, CHARLES DE, a celebrated cardinal, son of Claude de Lorraine, first duke of Guise, was born at Joinville 17 Feb., 1525. He distinguished himself by his learning and eloquence, was archbishop of Rheims and Narbonne, and minister of state. Cardinal de Lorraine declared with great zeal against the Calvinists, assisted in a distinguished manner at the colloquy of Poissy and the council of Trent, and held a provincial council at Rheims on his return 1564. He was much concerned in the government of France, established several foundations, and died at Avignon 26 Dec., 1574. Many of his works remain.

LORRAINE, CLAUDE, or Claude Gelée, an eminent painter, born at Lorraine in 1600. He served his apprenticeship to a pastrycook, and had no other instruction in drawing than what he obtained from Agostino Tassi, who taught him some of the rules of perspective, and how to prepare his colours. Nature was his guide, and he studied in the open fields from sunrise till the evening, which enabled him to mark the various appearances of the same object as viewed in different lights. Most of the figures in his pictures are by Courtois and Laura. It was a custom with Claude to sketch in a book the outline of every picture of his painting, which collection, called 'Libro di Verita,' has been engraved by Earlom. Claude etched some landscapes, and all his pictures fetch very high prices. Died 21 Nov., 1682.

LORRIS, GUILLAUME DE, a French poet of the thirteenth century, who wrote the 'Romant de la Rose,' which was translated into English by Chaucer. It was left incomplete by Lorris, and perfected by John de Meun.

LORRY, ANNE CHARLES, a French physician and medical writer, born at Crosne 10 Sept., 1726; died 18 Sept., 1783.

LORT, MICHAEL, D.D., was born in the county of Pembroke 1725. He became a member of Trinity College, Cambridge; where he obtained a fellowship, took his degrees in divinity, and was chosen professor of Greek; which chair he resigned 1771, on being preferred to the rectory of St. Matthew, Friday Street. Dr. Lort, who had been in early life librarian to Dr. Mead, was, in 1785, appointed to the same office at Lambeth, and in 1789 he obtained the rectory of Fulham. He published a short Comment on the Lord's Prayer, some poems, and sermons. Died 5 Nov., 1790.

LOTHAIRE I., emperor of Germany, son of Louis le Debonnaire, was associated with him in the empire 817, and named king of Lombardy 820. He afterwards dethroned his father, but eventually his brothers Louis and Charles joined their forces against him, and obtained a great victory at Fontenai (841). Two years later a treaty was concluded between them at Verdun, by which Lothaire obtained the empire, Italy, and some of the provinces between the Rhine and the Rhone. Died 28 Sept., 855.

LOTHAIRE II., emperor of the West and duke of Saxony, was elected king of Germany 1125; crowned at Rome 1133; died 4 Dec., 1137.

LOTHAIRE, king of France, succeeded his father Louis IV., 954; died 986.

LOTHAIRE, king of Lorraine, was the son of the Emperor Lothaire I. He died 869.

LOTICH, PETER, surnamed Secundus, was born at Schlüchtern (Hanau) 2 Nov., 1528, and studied at Wittemberg, where he contracted an intimacy with Melancthon. He became professor of medicine at Heidelberg; and died 7 Nov., 1560. His Latin poems have been often printed: the best edition is by Burmann, 2 vols., Amsterdam, 1754. His uncle, Peter Lotich, abbat of Schlüchtern, and a zealous reformer, died 23 June, 1567, leaving some polemical works, now forgotten.

LOUBÈRE, SIMON DE LA, a French writer, born 1642 at Toulouse, where he died 26 March, 1729. He wrote poems; a treatise on equations; and an account of a voyage he made to Siam in 1687. The latter has been translated into English.

LOUDON, JOHN CLAUDIUS, an esteemed writer on horticulture and agriculture, was born at Cambuslang, Lanarkshire, 8 April, 1783, and after receiving his education at the university of Edinburgh, was brought up by his father as a landscape gardener. In 1803 he came to London, and obtained ample employment. He also took a farm near the metropolis, with a view of showing the superiority of the Scotch over the English system of agriculture. In 1809 he settled at Tew Park, Oxfordshire, as tenant of a farm on the estate of General Stratton, and here he established with success, and pecuniary advantage to himself, a kind of agricultural college, in which young men were instructed in the principles of farming. He afterwards travelled through various countries on the Continent, carefully inspected the public gardens in the cities he visited; and the knowledge he thus gathered was turned to excellent account in his 'Encyclopædia of Gardening,' 1822. This work had an extensive sale, and its success induced

Mr. Loudon to engage in another one on the same plan, called 'The Encyclopædia of Agriculture,' 1825. His subsequent publications were numerous, and all of a most useful and practical description. We have only room to mention a few—'The Encyclopædia of Plants,' 1829; 'Encyclopædia of Cottage, Farm, and Villa Architecture,' 1832; 'Arboretum et Fruticetum Britannicum,' 1838. Although racked by pain and disease during a great part of his life, Mr. Loudon never paused in his literary labours, and, independently of his separate publications, he at one period conducted four periodicals at once, viz., 'The Gardener's Magazine,' 'The Magazine of Natural History,' 'The Architectural Magazine,' and 'The Suburban Gardener.' Died 14 Dec., 1843. He received valuable assistance in his literary undertakings from his wife, Mrs. Jane Loudon, who was born 1800, being the daughter of Mr. Thomas Webbe, of Ritwell House, near Birmingham. A novel published by her in 1827, entitled 'The Mummy,' excited considerable attention at the time, and particularly attracted the notice of Mr. Loudon. This circumstance led to an acquaintance between them, and he soon afterwards led her to the altar (1830). After her marriage she studied botany and other kindred subjects, and published a large number of popular works, such as 'Botany for Ladies;' 'Domestic Pets, their habits and management;' and 'Tales about Plants.' She died 13 July, 1858.—Anderson.

LOUGHBOROUGH, Lord. See Rosslyn, Earl of.

LOUIS I., surnamed le Debonnaire, or the Feeble, son of Charlemagne, was proclaimed king of France and emperor of the West 814. He was in a perpetual quarrel either with his brothers or sons until his death, which happened 840.

LOUIS II., the Young, eldest son of Lothaire I., was made king of Italy 844; succeeded to the imperial throne 855; died 875.

LOUIS III., surnamed the Blind, became emperor of the West 890, but was soon afterwards taken by his rival Berenger, who put out his eyes. Died 934.

LOUIS IV., called the Child, succeeded his father, the Emperor Arnold, 900, when he was only seven years old. His reign was a scene of civil war and desolation. Died 912.

LOUIS V. was elected emperor of Germany 1314; and after much civil discord was killed by a fall from his horse 1347.

LOUIS I., King of France. See Louis I., le Debonnaire.

LOUIS II., the Stammerer, was the son of Charles the Bald, whom he succeeded as king of France 877. He died 879.

LOUIS III., son of the preceding, shared the kingdom with his brother Carloman, with whom he lived in perfect union. Louis died 882, whereupon Carloman became sole king of France.

LOUIS IV., surnamed Transmarine, because he resided thirteen years in England, succeeded to the throne of France 936; and died 954.

LOUIS V., surnamed the Lazy, succeeded his father Lothaire 986. He was vigorously preparing to march against the Saracens, when he was poisoned by his queen, Blanche, 987. He was succeeded by Hugh Capet.

LOUIS VI., called the Big, succeeded to the throne 1108. He was disturbed by external quarrels and internal factions; but he was a wise and popular monarch, benevolent as a man, impartial as a judge. Died 1137.

LOUIS VII., the Young, son and successor of the preceding, was early engaged in a quarrel with the Sovereign Pontiff, and was excommunicated by him. He made a crusade to Palestine with an army of 80,000 men, but was defeated by the Saracens. Died 1180.

LOUIS VIII., surnamed the Lion, succeeded his father, Philip Augustus, 1223. He waged successful war against the English, and took large possessions from them. Died 1226.

LOUIS IX. (St.), son and successor of the preceding. He made two crusades, during the last of which he died at Tunis 1270. He was canonized by Boniface VIII.

LOUIS X., called Hutin, succeeded his father, Philip the Fair, 1314; died 1316.

LOUIS XI., born 1423, ascended the throne 1461. He rebelled against his father, and afterwards poisoned his brother. During his reign, rebellion and carnage were common occurrences; and he has been deservedly called the Tiberius of France. Died 1483.

LOUIS XII., surnamed the Just, ascended the throne 1498. He engaged in war with nearly all the neighbouring states, but was an amiable monarch, and greatly beloved by his subjects. Died 1515.

LOUIS XIII., surnamed the Just, ascended the throne 1610. He was guided in his conduct by the celebrated Cardinal Richelieu, who from motives of ambition kept him at war during most of his reign. Died 1643.

LOUIS XIV., surnamed the Great, was born 1638. His reign is celebrated as an era of magnificence, learning, and licentiousness in France. He died 1 Sept., 1715, leaving behind him monuments of unprecedented splendour and expense, in palaces, gardens, &c.

LOUIS XV., born 1710, ascended the throne 1715. During his reign France was almost constantly at war. The contest with England concerning the possession of Canada ended with great loss of territory to France. Died 10 May, 1774.

LOUIS XVI., born 1754, ascended the throne 1774, having married the celebrated Marie Antoinette of Austria (1770). He was a benevolent, virtuous, and amiable man, much attached to religion, and anxious to make his subjects happy. He was, however, treated by them in the vilest manner, called a tyrant and traitor, and finally beheaded by a perjured tribunal 21 Jan., 1793.

LOUIS XVII., son of the preceding, was born 1785. After the 10 Aug., 1792, he was imprisoned with his family in the Temple, where he died 8 June, 1795.

LOUIS XVIII., brother of Louis XVI., was born 1755. During the reign of Terror, and that of Bonaparte, being obliged to leave his country, he wandered from place to place, as his safety required. Finally he came to England, where he remained till 1814, when the allied powers placed him on the throne of France. On the approach of Napoleon from his retirement, Louis was obliged again to fly, but was again placed on his throne by the allies. He was a mild and amiable prince, consulting the wishes and happiness of his people. Died 16 Sept., 1824.

LOUIS PHILIPPE was born at Paris 1773, the son of Philippe Egalité, duke of Orleans. He was king of the French from 1830 to 1848; and died in exile at Claremont, near London, 26 Aug., 1850.

LOUIS I., called the Pious, king of Germany, died 876.

LOUIS II., son and successor of the preceding, defeated his uncle, Charles the Bald; and died 882.

LOUIS III., king of Germany. See LOUIS III., emperor.

LOUIS I., of Anjou, king of Hungary and Poland, succeeded Charles II. 1342, and died 1382.

LOUIS II., became king of Hungary after the death of his father, Ladislaus, 1516; and died 29 Aug., 1526.

LOUNDRES, HENRY DE, an English ecclesiastic, was appointed archdeacon of Stafford, and in 1213 consecrated archbishop of Dublin. He was a man of great capacity, employed in most important matters, both of church and state, and respected by the Pope as well as by the king. Died 1228.

LOUTHERBOURGH, PHILIP JAMES, R.A., a painter, was born at Strasburg in Nov., 1740. He was pupil of Casanova, and very early distinguished himself as a painter of battles, huntings, and landscapes. He was admitted into the Academy of Painting, at Paris, about 1763, soon after which he came to England, and Garrick, whose judgment was equal to his liberality, immediately engaged him as principal painter for his theatre, at a salary of £500, a much larger sum than had been given to any of his predecessors. He was the prince of scene painters, and contributed largely to the improvement of the stage. He died at Hammersmith 11 March, 1812.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French politician and author, born at Paris 11 June 1760; died 25 Aug., 1797. During the Revolution he was an active member of the Convention, and, although proscribed, escaped the scaffold. His chief work is a licentious novel, entitled, 'The Adventures of the Chevalier de Faublas.'

LOVAT, SIMON FRASER, LORD, a Highland chieftain, born in Rosshire 1667, and educated at King's College, Aberdeen. The principal events in his adventurous, turbulent life are connected with the rebellions of 1715 and 1745. Prior to the former he was in the confidence of the exiled court at St. Germain's, but he did not hesitate to serve his own interests by divulging their secrets to the British government, and he was rewarded by a grant of the title of Lord Lovat. On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, he sent his son with a portion of the clan to join the Pretender's army, while he himself remained quietly at home. His cunning, however, availed him nothing in this instance, for his complicity in the rebellion becoming known to the government, he was put on his trial before the House of Lords, found guilty of high treason, and beheaded on Tower Hill 9 April, 1747.

LOVE, CHRISTOPHER, a Presbyterian divine, born at Cardiff 1618. He studied at Oxford, and took orders; after which he became a bitter enemy to the church of England, and was ordained again by the hands of presbyters 1644. He was one of the commissioners for the parliament at the treaty of Uxbridge, where he behaved with such insolence as to offend his own party. He was also one of the assembly of divines, and chosen minister of St. Lawrence, Jewry; yet he signed the declaration against the murder of the king. After this he was concerned in a plot against Cromwell and the Independents, for which he was tried and beheaded 22 Aug., 1651. His works were published in 2 vols., 1805.

LOVE, JAMES, an English actor and dramatist, died 1774. His real name was Dance.

LOVE, RICHARD, D.D., a native of Cambridge, became master of Corpus Christi College in that university, and dean of Ely. He died Jan., 1660-61. There are poems by him in most or all of the collections of academical verses published during his residence in the university.

LOVELACE, RICHARD, a poet, was the son of Sir William Lovelace, of Woolwich, in Kent, and born there about 1618. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and next at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, where he was created M.A. in 1636. He was deputed by the county of Kent to deliver a petition to the House of Commons, for which he was sent to the Gate House. He expended the greater part of his estate in the royal cause, and in 1646 entered into the service of France; but, being wounded at the siege of Dunkirk, he returned to London, and was again sent to prison, where he remained till the king's death. Died 1658. His poems were published under the title of 'Lucasta,' in 2 vols. 8vo. He also wrote two plays: 'The Scholar,' a comedy, and 'The Soldier,' a tragedy. An edition of his Poems by Mr. William Carew Hazlitt was published 1864.

LOVER, SAMUEL, a novelist and poet, was born in Dublin 1797. He was the son of a member of the Stock Exchange in that city, and first won his way to fame as an artist. His early success in painting was sufficiently marked to secure his election in 1828 as an academician of the Royal Hibernian Society of Arts, of which he became secretary. Starting as a miniature painter in Dublin, he attracted to his studio the chief members of the Irish aristocracy. His roving taste, however, led him to abandon art for literature. Even whilst engaged as a painter he found leisure to contribute to a periodical a series of 'Legends and Tales illustrative of Irish Character.' Removing to London about 1837, he completed his 'Irish Sketches,' which were published in two vols., and commenced a series of contributions to magazine literature, the best known being 'Handy Andy,' a novel which appeared in Bentley's Miscellany in 1838. About this time he composed several Irish songs, and among them 'Molly Carew,' 'Rory O'More,' 'Molly Bawn,' 'The Four-leaved Shamrock,' 'The Man Dew,' &c., afterwards published in a collective shape; and his prose tales. Mr. Lover composed several pieces founded on his own works, 'Rory O'More,' 'The Happy Man,' and 'The White Horse of the Peppers,' being amongst the best known. He also published a volume of ballad poetry, and finding that his strength was beginning to suffer through his literary exertions, prepared an entertainment entitled 'Irish Evenings,' containing graphic sketches of Irish humour, and in which he embodied songs and music of his own composition. This entertainment became very popular, and the reputation which he acquired in consequence induced him to pay a visit to the United States, whence he returned to England in 1848, and proceeded to illustra-his Transatlantic experiences in a second entertainment, which was as favourably received as the first. His other works were, 'Treasure Trove,' 1844, and 'Lyrics of Ireland,' 1858. Mr. Lover was in receipt of a literary pension from government for some years previous to his death, which occurred at St. Lawrence Valley, Jersey, 6 July, 1868.

LOVIBOND, EDWARD, a poet, was the son of a gentleman who was director of the India Company, and died in 1737. The son inherited a considerable estate at Hampton, in Middlesex, and died there 27 Sept., 1775. He wrote five papers in the 'World;' and his poems have been printed in one volume, octavo.

LOW, GEORGE, a naturalist, born at Edzel, Forfarshire, 1746. He was educated at Aberdeen and St. Andrew's; after which he became minister of Birsay and Haray, in Orkney, where he died 1795. His 'Fauna Orcadensis' was published in 1813; and he left also a translation of Torfæus's History of Orkney, which remains in manuscript.

LOWE, Sir HUDSON, a lieutenant-general in the British army, was born at Galway, Ireland, 28 July, 1769, and died 10 Jan., 1844. He is chiefly remembered as having been governor of St. Helena during the time Napoleon was imprisoned on that island, and the French writers speak in very severe terms of his conduct towards the illustrious captive. A 'History of the Captivity of Napoleon at St. Helena,' extracted from Sir Hudson Lowe's letters and journals, was published in 3 vols., 1853

LOWE, PETER, a Scotchman, founder of the Faculty of physicians and surgeons of Glasgow, was born about the middle of the sixteenth century. He served as surgeon-major in the Spanish regiment at Paris, and was in several engagements; but afterwards he returned to his native country, where he died 1612. His principal work, 'The Whole Course of Chirurgerie,' first printed 1596, ran through many editions, and was translated into several foreign languages.

LOWER, RICHARD, M.D., was born about 1631, in Cornwall, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, where he became assistant to Dr. Willis in his dissections. While at Oxford he performed the experiment of transfusing the blood from one living animal to another; but though much was expected from the discovery, it was soon exploded. In 1667 he was admitted a fellow of the College of Physicians, at which time he settled in London, and obtained great practice. Died 17 Jan., 1690-1. His works are, A Defence of Dr. Willis on Fevers; Tractatus de Corde, 1669. His relation, Sir William Lower, who died 1662, published 'A Journal of the Voyage and Residence of Charles II. in Holland,' and six plays.

LOWER, RICHARD, a writer of poems in the Essex dialect, was born at Alfriston in that county 19 Sept., 1782; and died at Tunbridge 8 Sept., 1865.

LOWMAN, MOSES, a dissenting minister, born 1680, became pastor of a congregation at Clapham in 1714, and died there 3 May, 1752. He published 'Paraphrase on the Apocalypse;' 'Dissertation on the Civil Government of the Hebrews,' and other theological works.

LOWNDES, THOMAS, founder of an astronomical and geometrical professorship at Cambridge, died 3 May, 1748.

LOWNDES, WILLIAM THOMAS, the compiler of 'The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature,' died in London 31 July, 1843.

LOWRY, WILSON, F.R.S., was born at Whitehaven, Cumberland, 1701. His father was an itinerant portrait painter, and in the course of his peregrinations visited Worcester, where his son, then very young, was placed under an engraver named Ross. At the age of sixteen he left his master, and, making his way to the metropolis, obtained a subordinate situation in St. Thomas's Hospital. After this he became known to Alderman Boydell, for whom he executed some plates, the subjects of which were landscapes. About the same time he formed a connection with Mr. Blizard, the surgeon, by which means he enlarged his knowledge of anatomy; but he profited most from his intimacy with Mr. Malton, author of a work on Perspective, whose conversation led him to study practical mathematics. About 1791 he invented his ruling machine, which proved of inestimable benefit to engravers. This was followed (1798) by another discovery in the application of diamond points for etching. The next year he improved his ruling machine, and constructed a new one capable of drawing lines to a point, as well as parallel ones. In 1801 he invented an instrument for describing parts of circles, of which the radius is so large as to preclude the use of beam compasses. In 1812 he was elected F.R.S., and he was a member of the Geological Society from its commencement. He died in London 23 June, 1824.

LOWTH, ROBERT, D.D., an English bishop, second son of William Lowth, B.D., hereafter noticed, was born at Burton, Hants, 27 Nov., 1710. He was educated at Winchester School, where he wrote two poems, one entitled 'The Genealogy of Christ,' and the other, 'Catharine Hill.' He was elected to New College, Oxford, 1730, and took his master's degree 1737. Being appointed professor of poetry 1741, he struck out a new path by his admirable lectures on Hebrew poetry, printed with this title, 'De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum Prælectiones,' 1753. His first church preferment was the rectory of Ovington, Hampshire. In 1748 he accompanied Mr. Legge on his embassy to Berlin, and the following year he went to Italy, as travelling companion to Lord George and Lord Frederic Cavendish. In 1750 he obtained the archdeaconry of Winchester, and in 1753 the rectory of East Woodhay In 1754 he received the degree of D.D. from the university of Oxford, by diploma; and in 1755 he went to Ireland as chaplain to the marquis of Hartington, who nominated him to the bishopric of Limerick, which he exchanged for a prebend of Durham and the rectory of Sedgefield. In 1758 he published the 'Life of William of Wykeham,' which was followed, in 1762, by 'A Short Introduction to English Grammar.' Dr. Lowth, having been grossly treated by Warburton, in an appendix to the last volume of his 'Divine Legation,' published a letter to the bishop in 1765, which, in force of argument and wit, is unrivalled. The year following he was advanced to the bishopric of St. David's, from whence, in four months, he was translated to Oxford, and in 1777 to London. In 1778 he published his Translation of Isaiah; and the next year a sermon preached before the king on Ash-Wednesday. In a note to this discourse the bishop animadverted on the conduct of Dr. Price, for which he was rudely attacked by some republican writers. On the death of Archbishop Cornwallis the primacy was offered to Bishop Lowth, which he declined on account of his infirmities and the losses he had sustained in his family. In 1768 his eldest daughter, Mary, died; and in 1783 his second daughter, Frances, expired while presiding at the tea-table. His lordship's eldest son was also cut off suddenly in the prime of life. The bishop died at Fulham 3 Nov., 1787. Besides the works already mentioned, he printed some sermons and a few poems, particularly 'An Ode to the People of Great Britain,' and 'The Judgment of Hercules.' There is no complete edition of his works.

LOWTH, SIMON, D.D., a nonjuring divine, received his academical education at Clare Hall, Cambridge, and proceeded to his doctor's degree 1689, having the year before been nominated by James II. to the deanery of Rochester, though he was never installed, in consequence of the Revolution occurring almost immediately afterwards. At the time of his death, which took place in the beginning of July, 1720, when he was upwards of eighty years old, he held the vicarage of Cosmus-Dean, in the diocese of Canterbury. He wrote 'Catechetical Questions,' 1674; 'Of the Subject of Church Power, in whom it resides, its Force, Extent, and Execution, that it opposes not Civil Government in any one Instance of it,' 8vo., London, 1685, against Dr. Tillotson; 'Letter to Dr. Stillingfleet,' 4to., London, 1687.

LOWTH, WILLIAM, a divine, born in London 11 Sept., 1661. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and elected from thence to St. John's College, Oxford, where he proceeded to the degree of B.D. In 1696, he obtained a prebend in the church of Winchester, and in 1699 the rectory of Buriton, with the chapelry of Petersfield, in Hampshire. Died 17 May, 1732. His works are A Vindication of the Divine Authority of the Old and New Testament; Directions for the profitable reading of the Holy Scriptures; A Commentary on the Prophetical Books of the Old Testament; and several sermons and tracts.

LUBBOCK, Sir JOHN WILLIAM, Bart., F.R.S., an astronomer and physicist, was born in London 26 March, 1803, and educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1825; M.A. 1833). Though the head of a London banking firm, he devoted much attention to scientific pursuits. He was treasurer of the Royal Society for many years, and also vice-chancellor of the university of London. In 1834 the Royal Society awarded him one of their royal medals for his papers on the Tides. In 1836 he delivered the Bakerian Lecture 'On the Tides at the Port of London;' and the Astronomical Society, in 1848, gave him a testimonial for his researches on the theory of perturbations. His separate publications are 'Account of the Traité sur le flux et réflux de la Mer of Daniel Bernouilli;' and a 'Treatise on the Attraction of Ellipsoids,' 1830; 'On the Theory of the Moon and on the Perturbations of the Planets,' 1833, &c.; 'Mathematical Tracts,' 1834; 'A Treatise on Probability,' in collaboration with J. E. Drinkwater Bethune, 1835; 'On the Determination of the Distance of a Comet from the Earth, and the Elements of its Orbit,' 1835; 'Treatise on the Computation of Eclipses and Occultations,' 1835; 'Remarks on the Classification of the different branches of Human Knowledge,' 1838; 'Treatise on the Tides,' 1839; 'On the Heat of Vapours and on Astronomical Refractions,' 1840; 'On the Clearing of the London Bankers,' 1860; 'The Stars, in six Maps, on the Gnomonic Projection,' 1860. Died 20 June, 1865.

LUBIENIECKI, STANISLAUS, Lubienicius, a Socinian minister, born at Cracow, in Poland, 1623. On the banishment of his sect he went to Denmark, where it is said he was poisoned 1675. His principal work is 'Theatrum Cometicum,' 1667.

LUBIN, AUGUSTIN, an Augustinian friar, born 1624, at Paris, where he died 1695. He wrote several geographical and theological works.

LUBIN, EILHARD, a Protestant divine, born at Westersted, in the county of Oldenburg, 1556. He became professor of poetry, and afterwards of divinity, at Rostock, where he died 1 June, 1621. His principal works are 'Antiquarius, sive prisconum et minus usitatorum vocabulorum brevis et dilucida interpretatio;' 'Clavis Græcæ linguæ;' Phosphorus, or the first Cause of Sin. The latter created a great controversy.

LUCA, FERDINANDO DI, an eminent mathematician and geographer, died at Naples 12 Aug. 1869.

LUCANUS, MARCUS ANNÆUS, a Latin poet, was born at Cordova, in Spain, A.D. 38. He was the nephew of Seneca. After studying at Athens he was made quæstor, and admitted into the college of augurs: but having offended Nero by presuming to contend with him in poetical composition, he was interdicted from exhibiting any more verses in public. In consequence of this he entered into the conspiracy of Piso, for which he was condemned to die, and all the favour shown him was to choose the manner of his death. He followed the example of his uncle, and when fainting with loss of blood repeated some of his own lines. This happened A.D. 65. Of his works the 'Pharsalia' only remains, the best edition of which is that of C. F. Weber, 3 vols., Leipsic, 1821-31. It has been translated into English by Rowe.

LUCAS, FRANCIS, surnamed Brugensis, from his being a native of Bruges. He was a doctor at Louvain, and dean of the church of St. Omer. His works are, Critical Commentaries on the Old Testament; Notes on the New Testament; Concordances of the Bible. Died 1619, aged 67.

LUCAS, FREDERICK, a Catholic politician and journalist, was born 30 March, 1812, being the son Samuel Hayhurst Lucas, a corn-merchant in the city of London. His parents belonged to the Society of Friends, and he received his early education in a Quaker school at Darlington. In his seventeenth year he entered the university of London, and in 1835 he was called to the bar. The turning-point in his career was his reception into the Catholic Church, 1839, of which he was ever afterwards a most strenuous supporter. To advocate its interests he established the 'Tablet,' a weekly newspaper, the first number of which appeared in London 16 May, 1840. In 1849, however, the place of publication was changed to Dublin, the editor having zealously taken up the cause of the 'Young Ireland' party. Mr. Lucas was returned to the House of Commons for the county of Meath 1852, and died at Staines, Middlesex, 22 Oct., 1855. He was author of Two Lectures on Education delivered at the Literary and Scientific Institution at Staines; Reasons for becoming a Roman Catholic, addressed to the Society of Friends; and numerous articles in the 'Tablet' and 'Dublin Review.' Amongst other plans he once entertained the scheme of a Catholic Encyclopædia, which was to correct the Protestant errors and prejudices which, in his opinion, were contained in existing works of that nature.

LUCAS, PAUL, a traveller, born at Rouen 31 Aug., 1664. He made several voyages in the Levant, and died at Madrid 12 May, 1737. Accounts of his travels were published from his notes.

LUCAS, RICHARD, D.D., was born in Radnorshire 1648. He received his education at Oxford; after which he became master of the free school at Abergavenny, from whence he removed to London, where he was chosen vicar of St. Stephen, Coleman Street, lecturer of St. Olave, Southwark, and in 1696 prebendary of Westminster. His works are Practical Christianity; An Enquiry after Happiness; The Morality of the Gospel; Christian Thoughts for every Day in the Week; Sermons; and a Latin translation of the 'Whole Duty of Man.'

LUCAS, SAMUEL, born at Bristol 1818, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford (M.A. 1846), after which he went to the bar, though he soon abandoned law for the more congenial pursuits of literature. He founded, and conducted for a year and a half, the 'Press,' a Conservative weekly paper; edited 'Once a Week,' from 1859 to 1865; and was for some time connected with the 'Times' as literary reviewer. Died 27 Nov., 1868. He published several volumes of articles originally contributed to the 'Times;' Secularia, or Surveys on the Mainstream of History,' &c.

LUCAS VAN LEYDEN, a painter and engraver, whose real name was Lucas Jacobs. He was born at Leyden 1494, and died 1533.

LUCCHESINI, GIROLAMO, Marquis DI, a statesman and diplomatist in the service of Prussia, was born at Lucca 1752; died at Florence 19 Oct., 1825.

LUCCHESINI, JOHN VINCENT, an Italian nobleman and ecclesiastic, born at Lucca 1660. He became secretary to the pope, and canon of St. Peter's, at Rome, where he died 1744. He translated Demosthenes into Latin, and wrote a valuable History of his own Time, in the same language.

LUCIAN, a Greek writer, born at Samosata, in the reign of Trajan; died about 200. He placed under a sculptor, but left that business to study the law, which also he abandoned for the profession of philosophy and rhetoric. Marcus Aurelius made him register of Alexandria, in Egypt; but at this time he was very old. The prominent feature of his dialogues is ridicule; but with all his causticity and indelicacy he discovers a deep knowledge of human nature. The best edition of Lucian is that of Hemsterhuis, at Amsterdam, 4 vols., 1743. Lucian has been translated into English by Carr, Franklin, and Tooke.

LUCILIUS, CAIUS, a Roman poet, of the equestrian order, who served under Scipio Africanus. He wrote thirty books of satires, in a style of great severity, and died at Naples about 103 B.C. Only a few fragments of his works are extant.

LUCIUS I. succeeded Pope St. Cornelius 252; died 254.

LUCIUS II. succeeded Pope Celestine II. 1144; died 1145.

LUCIUS III. succeeded Pope Alexander III. 1181; died 1185.

LUCRETIUS, TITUS CARUS, a Latin poet, born about 96 B.C. He studied at Athens under Zeno and Phædrus, from whom he derived the principles of Epicurus and Empedocles, which he has elucidated in his celebrated work 'De Rerum Natura.' As a poet he is entitled to great praise; but his work has an atheistical tendency. It is said to have been written while the author was in a state of frenzy, produced by a philtre, which his wife or mistress administered to him out of jealousy. The best editions are those of Havercamp and Wakefield.

LUDLOW, EDMUND, a republican general, was born at Maiden Bradley, Wilts, about 1620. After taking the degree of bachelor of arts at Trinity College, Oxford, he went to the Temple, which he left on the breaking out of the civil war, and became a captain of horse in the parliamentary service. He was present at the battle of Edge Hill, and in 1644 was made prisoner at Wardour Castle, but was soon exchanged. In 1645 he succeeded his father as representative in parliament for the county of Wilts. He also sat as one of the judges at the trial of the king, and signed the death warrant; after which he concurred in voting down the House of Lords. When Cromwell became captain general of the army, he got rid of Ludlow, by sending him to Ireland, where he was lieutenant-general of the horse. He zealously opposed the usurper, on whose death he was returned to the new parliament, and he also sat in that which was called the Rump. In 1659 he resumed the command in Ireland, but his stay there was short; and finding that the king's judges were excepted out of the act of indemnity, he withdrew to Switzerland. After the Revolution he returned to appear in London, which gave such offence, that an address was presented to King William, by the House of Commons, praying his majesty to issue a proclamation for apprehending him. On this Ludlow went back to Vevay, in Switzerland, where he died 1693. His memoirs were first printed at Vevay, in 3 vols. 8vo., 1698-9. In 1691 were printed 'Three Letters from Major-General Ludlow,' which Mr. Baron Maseres republished 1813, though they are not genuine.

LUDOLPH, HENRY WILLIAM, a native of Erfurt, was born 1655. He was nephew of Job Ludolph, the orientalist, by whom he was partly educated. He became secretary to Prince George of Denmark; and while in his service visited Russia, where he attained so complete a knowledge of the language as to write a grammar of it, which was printed at Oxford 1696. He afterwards travelled into the Levant, and crossed the desert from Jerusalem to Cairo. Being much affected by the state of the Christians in the East, he undertook an edition of the New Testament in the vulgar Greek, and had it printed in London for distribution. He died in London 25 Jan., 1710. His works were published 1712, with his funeral sermon, by Mr. Boehm.

LUDOLPH, JOB, was born at Erfurt 15 June, 1624. He studied the oriental languages at Leyden; after which he became a travelling tutor. In 1649 he went to Rome on a literary commission, and while there became acquainted with some Abyssinians, from whom he acquired a perfect knowledge of the Ethiopic language. In 1652 he was made aulic counsellor to the duke of Saxe-Gotha, and governor to the young princes. He died at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 8 April, 1704. His principal works are, Historia Ethiopica; Epistolæ Samaritanæ Sichemitarum; Grammatica Amharicæ linguæ; Lexicon Amharico-Latinum; Lexicon Ethiopico-Latinum; Grammatica linguæ Ethiopicæ.

LUDWIG, CHRISTIAN THEOPHILUS, a botanist, born at Brieg, in Silesia, 30 April, 1709; became professor of medicine at Leipsic 1747; and died 7 May, 1773.

LUINI, or LOVINI, BERNARDINO, an Italian painter, was a native of Luino, on the Lago Maggiore, and is supposed to have been a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, from the closeness with which he imitated his style. The 'Christ Disputing with the Doctors,' in the National Gallery, formerly attributed to da Vinci, is now supposed to be the work of Luini, who died after 1530.

LUITPRAND, a king of the Lombards from 712 till his death in 744.

LUKIN, LIONEL, the inventor of the life-boat, was born at Dunmow, Essex, 18 May, 1742, and died at Hythe, Kent, 16 Feb., 1834.

LULLI, JOHN BAPTIST, a musician, born at Florence 1634. At ten years of age he was taken to Paris, and made page to madame de Montpensier. Having learnt to play on the violin, he procured admission into the king's band, and soon became such a favourite with the monarch as to be appointed superintendant of the music in the royal chamber. In 1686 the king fell dangerously ill, and on his recovery, Lulli was required to compose a 'Te Deum.' The performance of this piece proved fatal to the musician, who, in beating the time, struck his foot, and the blow terminating in a gangrene, he died 22 March, 1687.

LULLY, RAYMOND, a famous writer on the occult sciences, called 'Doctor Illuminatus,' or the 'Enlightened Doctor,' was born in the island of Majorca about 1235, and adopted the ecclesiastical profession. He applied himself with indefatigable diligence to the study of Arabian philosophy, chemistry, physic, and divinity, and acquired a great reputation by his writings; but going afterwards to preach the gospel in Africa, he was stoned to death in Mauritania 29 March, 1315. A collection of his works was printed at Mayence in ten folio vols., 1721.

LUMSDEN, MATTHEW, LL.D., an English orientalist, occupied with distinction for several years the professorship of Persian and Arabic in the college of Fort William at Calcutta. He resigned it 1820, and returned to this country, where he passed the remainder of his days in retirement. He died at Tooting Common, Surrey, 31 March, 1835, aged 57. Dr. Lumsden published a Persian Grammar 1805, and again 1810, 2 vols.; and an Arabic Grammar 1813.

LUNA, ALVAREZ DE. See ALVAREZ.

LUPTON, DONALD, a writer, who is known only by his works, which are, The History of Modern Protestant Divines, 1637; The Glory of their Times, or the Lives of the Fathers, 1640; London and the Country carbonadoed, 1632; Objectorum reductio, or Employment for the Soul, 1634; Emblems of Rarities; England's Command of the Seas, 1653.

LUPTON, WILLIAM, D.D., was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He became successively vicar of Richmond, Yorkshire; lecturer of St. Dunstan-in-the-West; preacher at Lincoln's Inn; and prebendary of Durham. Died 1726. He published a sermon against Archbishop Tillotson, on hell torments; and after his death a volume of his discourses was printed.

LUSANCY. See BEAUCHATEAU.

LUSHINGTON, STEPHEN RUMBOLD, D.C.L., was educated at Rugby. He was returned to the House of Commons 1807, as member for Rye, and sat for that borough, and afterwards for Canterbury, till 1837. He was for nearly fourteen years chairman of ways and means in the House of Commons, and from 1814 to 1827 was joint-secretary to the treasury. He was governor of Madras 1827-32; and was created an honorary D.C.L. by the university of Oxford 1839. Died Aug., 1868, aged 94. Dr. Lushington published the 'Life and Services of General Lord Harris,' the conqueror of Seringapatam, whose daughter he married.

LUSSAN, MARGUERITE DE, a French novelist and miscellaneous writer, born at Paris 1682; died 31 May, 1758.

LUTHER, MARTIN, the most celebrated ecclesiastical reformer since Arius, was born 10 Nov., 1483, at Eisleben, in Saxony, where his father, Hans Luther, worked in the mines. He completed his philosophical studies at Erfurt, where he took the degree of master of arts 1503. As he was walking one day in the vicinity of that city, one of his companions was killed at his side by lightning, which induced Luther to take the religious habit among the Augustinian friars at Erfurt, being at that time 22 years of age. He was ordained priest at the age of 24, and made himself very celebrated some time after by teaching philosophy in the university of Wittemberg, where he became doctor and professor of divinity. But the works of John Huss changed his sentiments, as he says himself, and inspired him with an aversion to the practices of the Catholic Church, and the scholastic divines, whose opinions he attacked by public theses from 1516. Luther began, the same year, to study Greek and Hebrew, and so highly did he esteem the latter language that he declared, in his commentary on Psalm 45, 'that he valued the knowledge of Hebrew beyond all imaginable treasures,' though he was not then very well skilled in that tongue. His change of religion did not proceed from the pretended wrong done by Leo X. to the Augustinians, in employing the Dominicans to preach in favour of indulgences, for the Augustinians had never been employed to the exclusion of other preachers. The truth is, that this Pope, having ordered indulgences to be published in Germany (1517) for building St. Peter's church at Rome, the preachers and mendicants made a most scandalous use of their authority; and Luther seized that opportunity to disseminate his opinions. He first attacked the abuse of indulgences, then the indulgences themselves, and afterwards the power of him who granted them. From the subject of indulgences he passed to that of justification, and the efficacy of the sacraments. Leo X. sent Cardinal Cajetan to oblige Luther to retract, or to seize him; but he succeeded in neither object. Luther, who enjoyed the protection of the elector of Saxony, appealed from the Pope to an œcumenical council, and was emboldened to write against purgatory, free-will, indulgences, auricular confession, the papal primacy, monastic vows, communion under one kind, and other received doctrines. Indeed he did not hesitate to separate himself from the Roman communion, and to maintain that the Pope was the Man of Sin, or Antichrist, whose appearance is foretold in the New Testament

Leo X. excommunicated him, 1520, and he was condemned by the faculties of divinity at Louvain, Cologne, and Paris; but all this only exasperated him the more. He burnt the Pope's bull, abused him grossly, exhorted all princes to cast off the papal yoke, and acknowledged no sacraments but baptism, penitence, and bread, the latter being the name he gave to the Eucharist, for he changed the term 'transubstantiation' into 'consubstantiation,' and pretended that the body and blood of Jesus Christ mingles with the bread and wine without destroying them, like the fire in a hot iron. Luther suppressed the low masses in consequence, as he said, of a conversation with the devil. Being summoned to a diet assembled at Worms (1521) by the Emperor Charles V., he was ordered to be seized, but he contrived to get away, and he afterwards composed a number of works which produced a wonderful effect in Saxony. Hundreds of monks and nuns quitted their convents, renounced their vows, and married. The Augustinian friars of Wittemberg abolished the Mass, and Carlostadt, one of Luther's followers, proposed to banish from that university all books except the Bible. Several of the German princes, about this time, declared themselves in favour of the new creed. At length Luther got over the last step, for the sake of which he had done all, and, throwing off the monastic habit (1524), publicly married, on 11 June, 1525, a nun, named Catharine Bora, or de Bohren, by whom he had three sons. In 1529 Charles V. assembled a diet at Spires, in which the Lutherans received the name of Protestants, because they protested against the decree there made, ordering them to follow the faith of the Roman Church. The following year, Luther, being under the ban of the empire, could not attend the diet held at Augsburg, but he repaired to Coburg, from which place he directed all the operations of his party. The Protestants presented at Augsburg their famous Confession of faith, which was condemned by a majority of the diet, and the Lutheran princes consequently entered into the offensive or defensive league of Smalcalde, with the hearty consent of Luther, who had, however, previously maintained that it was unlawful to take up arms in defence of the gospel. The decision given by Luther (1539), with Melancthon, and his principal disciples, in the case of Philip, landgrave of Hesse, by which he permitted that prince to marry a second wife, while his first was living, caused great scandal. During the first sittings of the Council of Trent, against which he declaimed with great bitterness, death put an end to the career of this celebrated man, who expired suddenly in his native town 18 Feb., 1546. He wrote upwards of four hundred works. The best known are his German translation of the Bible, his Catechism, his 'Table Talk,' his familiar letters, and his sermons. A complete edition of his works, in Latin and German, was published by C. F. Boerner, at Leipsic, 23 vols. fol., 1728-40.

LUTI, BENEDETTO, a painter, born at Florence 1666; died at Rome 1724.

LUTTRELL, NARCISSUS, was born in London in or about 1657, and educated under Mr. Aldrich at Sheen, in Surrey. He was admitted a fellow-commoner of St. John's College, Cambridge, 4 Feb., 1673-4, and created M.A. by royal mandate 1675. A great portion of his subsequent life was spent at Chelsea, where he employed his time in forming a remarkable collection of tracts and broadsides, and in inditing the well-known diary which first became generally known to historical students by the frequent references made to it in Macaulay's 'History of England.' It was then preserved in MS. in the library of All Souls College, Oxford, but was soon afterwards given to the world under the title of 'A Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs, from Sept., 1678 to April, 1714,' 6 vols. 8vo., Oxford, 1857. Luttrell died at Chelsea 3 Sept., 1740.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek writer, was a native of Chalcis, in Eubœa, and flourished about 284 B.C. He wrote a poem called Cassandra, on the subject of the war of Troy, but it is extremely obscure. The best edition is that of Charles G. Müller, 3 vols., Leipsic, 1812.

LYCURGUS, the legislator of Sparta, flourished about 898 years B.C. On the death of his brother, Polydectes, Lucurgus resolved to hold the sovereignty in trust, in case the widow should be delivered of a son; which proving to be the fact, the faithful guardian carefully administered the government till his nephew came of age. After this he travelled to study the laws of other countries, and, on his return, he established that system which distinguished Sparta from every state in the world. Having bound the people to observe this institution, he left Lacedæmon, and is supposed to have died in Crete.

LYCURGUS, an Athenian orator, who was the contemporary of Demosthenes, and died about 323 B.C.

LYDGATE, JOHN, an English poet, was born about 1375; died about 1461. He was a monk of the Benedictine abbey of Bury, in Suffolk. Of his works, which are numerous, that on 'The History of Troy' was the most popular. It was printed in 1513, and again in 1555.

LYDIAT, THOMAS, was born at Okerton, or Alkrington, near Banbury, Oxfordshire, 1572, and educated at Winchester School, from whence he removed to New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1609 he accompanied Archbishop Usher to Ireland, and, on his return, was presented to the rectory of Okerton. He suffered much for his loyalty, and died poor 3 April, 1646. His principal works are—Tractatus de variis annorum formis; Prælectio astronomica de natura cœli et conditionibus elementorum; De origine fontium; Examen canonum chronologiæ isagogicorum; Emendatio temporum; Solis et lunæ periodus seu annus magnus; De anni solaris mensura; Canones chronologicæ.

LYE, EDWARD, F.S.A., was born at Totnes, Devonshire, 1704. He took his degree of M.A. 1722, at Hart Hall, Oxford, after which he obtained the living of Houghton-Parva, in Northamptonshire, but exchanged it, in 1750, for the vicarage of Yardley Hastings, in the same county, where he died in 1767. He published an edition of the 'Etymologicon Anglicanum,' by Junius, with many additions, and an Anglo-Saxon Grammar prefixed; 'The Gothic Gospels,' with a Grammar of that language. After his death came out his 'Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Dictionary,' 2 vols. folio, 1772.

LYELL, CHARLES, an eminent botanist, born in Forfarshire 1767, received a liberal education at St. Andrew's and Cambridge, after which he retired to his estate at Kirriemuir. He discovered many British plants previously unknown, and published a translation of Dante's lyric poems. Died 8 Nov., 1849.

LYNCH, DOMINIC, an Irish Catholic divine, lived for many years with great reputation in Spain. He was appointed synodical judge in Seville, was gradually promoted to all the honours of that university, became first lecturer in arts and philosophy, master of the students, secondary professor of divinity, and finally was elected principal regent of the college of St. Thomas, which he governed with universal approbation until his death in 1697. His great work, entitled 'Summa Philosophiæ,' was printed at Paris, 4 vols. 4to., 1666, 1686.

LYNCH, JOHN, an Irish Catholic prelate and historian, was a native of the town of Galway. He received his education in France, and after being ordained priest, returned to his native country, where he was appointed successively archdeacon of Tuam and bishop of Killala. He was well versed in the history and antiquities of his native country, and composed the following works, all of which are extremely rare: 'Cambrensis Eversus; seu potius historica Fides in Rebus Hibernicis Giraldo Cambrensi abrogata,' &c., published under the name of Gratianus Lucius, fol., 1662, reprinted for the Celtic Society, with a translation and notes by the Rev. M. Kelly, 3 vols., Dublin, 1848-52; 'Alithinologia, sive Veridica Responsio ad invectivam, mendaciis, fallaciis, calumniis, et imposturis fætam, in plurimos Antistites, Proceres, et omnis ordinis Hibernos, a R. P. R. F. C. Congregationi de Propaganda Fide A.D. 1659 exhibitam,' 4to., 1664; 'Supplementum Alithinologiæ, quod partes invectivæ in Hibernos Cusæ in Alithinologia non oppugnata evertit,' 4to., 1667. The two last-mentioned treatises, published under the pseudonym of Eudoxius Alithinologus, were directed against Richard Ferral, an Irish Capuchin friar, who had presented a disloyal piece in MS. to the congregation De Propagandâ Fide, as a direction to them in the government of the Church in Ireland, and tending to renew the divisions between the ancient Irish and the Anglo-Irish settled in the country since the reign of Henry II. Lynch also wrote a biography of Francis Kirwan, bishop of Killala, under the title of 'Pii Antistitis Icon: sive de Vita et Morte Rev. D. Francisci Kerovanii Alladensis Episcopi,' 12mo., Maclovii, 1669. A translation of this book, by the Rev. C. P. Meehan, was published at Dublin a few years ago.

LYNCH, RICHARD, D.D., an Irishman, who joined the Society of Jesus at Compostella 1630, and was for more than a quarter of a century the admiration of the universities of Valladolid and Salamanca. He died in or about 1676. His writings are 'Cursus Philosophicus,' 3 vols. fol., Lyons, 1654; Sermons in Spanish, 1670; 'De Deo Ultimâ Fine,' 2 vols., Salamanca, 1671.—Oliver.

LYNDE, Sir HUMPHREY, was born in London about 1580, and educated at Oxford. He sat in parliament for many years, and died 8 June, 1636. Sir Humphrey was a zealous Puritan, and wrote several works against the Catholic religion.

LYNDEWODE. See LINDWOOD.

LYNDHURST, JOHN SINGLETON COPLEY, LORD, was born at Boston, in New England, 21 May, 1772, being the son of John Singleton Copley, the painter, who brought him to England about a year before the outbreak of the American revolution. He received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; and being appointed a 'Travelling Bachelor,' he was enabled, for the first and only time in his life, to revisit his native country. In 1804 he was called to the bar, and for many years subsequently he went the Midland Circuit, rising by very slow degrees to professional eminence. In 1817, having then obtained the leadership of his circuit, he first brought himself prominently into public notice by the able manner in which he aided Sir Charles Wetherell in conducting the prosecution of Watson and Thistlewood, indicted for high treason. Though previously a liberal in politics, he so favourably impressed the Tory leaders by his talents on this occasion, that he was soon employed by them on behalf of the government in several important state trials; and in 1818 was appointed chief justice of the county palatine of Chester. Thenceforth he remained for the most part an adherent of the party from which he had received his earliest promotion. Having entered parliament in 1818, he was appointed solicitor-general in the Liverpool administration in the following year, and in 1820 he took a leading part in the proceedings against Queen Caroline, avoiding, by the moderation and skill which he displayed, the censure so freely bestowed upon most of the parties to the trial. In 1824 he succeeded to the attorney-generalship. At the general election of 1826 he was returned by the university of Cambridge, in conjunction with Lord Palmerston, and a few months later he accepted the mastership of the rolls. During the early debates on Catholic Emancipation in 1827, he strenuously opposed the measure, but, to the surprise of the public, he entered the Liberal cabinet of Canning as lord chancellor, and was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Lyndhurst, 27 April, 1827. After the death of Canning, in the following August, he retained the great seal during the short-lived administration of Viscount Goderich, and in that of the duke of Wellington, retiring with his colleagues on the triumph of the Whigs in 1830. Previously to this he had given his full support to Catholic Emancipation, declaring that he felt no apprehension for the safety of the Anglican Establishment. Shortly after retiring from the chancellorship he was appointed chief baron of the exchequer, the duties of which office he discharged till 1834. Though prevented by official duties from participating largely in parliamentary proceedings, he was one of the most strenuous opponents of the Reform Bill, and upon the resignation of Earl Grey (1832) he endeavoured unsuccessfully to form a new Conservative ministry in conjunction with the duke of Wellington. He held the great seal again during the brief administration of Sir Robert Peel (1834), and after retiring from office, devoted himself for several years chiefly to the interests of his party, becoming one of the most effective leaders of the Tory opposition in the upper house. In 1841 Sir Robert Peel formed his second ministry, and Lord Lyndhurst for the third time accepted the great seal, which he retained till 1846, when he declared himself to be 'at the close of his public, almost of his natural life.' He, however, occasionally took a prominent part in the proceedings of the House of Lords, supported the Derby ministry of 1852, advocated the war with Russia, and denounced the policy adopted by Lord Clarendon in concluding the peace of 1856, as a practical capitulation on the part of England. Until the infirmities of age overcame him, his speeches, remarkable for their elegant and severely simple style, and delivered with a voice of singular sweetness and power, were listened to with unabated interest, and to the day of his death he continued to exert great influence over the Conservative party. He died in London 12 Oct., 1863.

LYNEDOCH, THOMAS GRAHAM, LORD, a distinguished general, was born as Balgowan, Perthshire, 1750, and until the mature age of forty-two he remained a private country gentleman. In 1792 he lost his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, and to alleviate his grief travelled abroad. At Gibraltar he fell into military society, and he there first conceived the possibility of obtaining some respite from his sorrows by devoting himself to the profession of arms. As a volunteer he accompanied Lord Hood to the south of France, where he displayed great bravery. On returning to Scotland he raised the first battalion of the 90th regiment, of which he was appointed colonel-commandant 1794. Shortly afterwards he was elected M.P. for Perthshire, and he continued to represent that county till 1807. For a time he served in the Austrian army (1796), taking advantage of his position to inform the English government of what was going on in that country. In 1798 he rejoined his regiment at Gibraltar, from whence he proceeded to Minorca with Sir C. Stuart. Not long after this the colonel, with the local rank of brigadier, besieged the island of Malta, having under his command the 30th and 89th regiments, and some corps embodied under his immediate direction. Aware of the prodigious strength of the place, he resorted to a blockade; but the French held out till Sept., 1800, when, after a resistance of two years' duration, they surrendered the place. Subsequently he served under Sir John Moore in Sweden and Spain; and on his return to England was made major-general (1810). In 1811 he took the command of an expedition to attack the rear of the French army that was blockading Cadiz—an operation which led to the memorable battle of Barossa. For his conduct on this occasion he received the thanks of parliament. He afterwards served under Wellington in the Peninsula, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Vittoria, the siege of San Sebastian, and the passage of the Bidassoa. In 1814 he was appointed commander of the forces in Holland, and on 3 May in the same year again received the thanks of parliament, and was raised to the peerage with a pension of 2000*l*. He attained the rank of general 1821; was made governor of Dumbarton Castle 1829; and died 18 Dec., 1843.

LYON, GEORGE FRANCIS, a traveller, born at Chichester 1795. Entering the naval service 1809, he was present at the attack on Algiers by Lord Exmouth, 1816, and in 1818 was commissioned to accompany Mr. Joseph Ritchie on his tour of exploration into Central Africa. Ritchie died at Moorzook, in Fezzan, where the travellers were detained through the want of funds, and the treacherous conduct of the bey of the province; but Lyon returned to England, after encountering many dangers and privations, and published his 'Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa,' 1821. In command of the 'Hecla,' he accompanied Capt. Parry on his third arctic expedition (1821), publishing, on his return, 'The Private Journal of Capt. G. F. Lyon,' 1824. In 1823 he made an unsuccessful attempt in the 'Griper' to enter Repulse Bay, in the arctic regions, through Sir Thomas Rowe's Welcome. Of this expedition he also published a narrative. Subsequently he passed several years in Mexico, and died on the passage to England 8 Oct., 1832. His remaining works are 'The Sketch Book of Capt. F. G. Lyon, during eighteen months' residence in Mexico,' 1827, and 'Journal of a Residence and Tour in the Republic of Mexico in 1828,' 2 vols. 8vo., 1828.

LYONNET, PETER, a Dutch naturalist and engraver, born at Maestricht 21 July, 1707; died at the Hague 10 Jan., 1789.

LYONS, EDMUND, Lord Lyons, of Christ Church, a British admiral, born at Burton, near Christ Church, Hants, 21 Nov., 1790. When only in his eighth year he accompanied Sir Richard Bickerton on a cruise to sea, and in 1801 he was placed as a volunteer on board the 'Royal Charlotte' yacht. Two years later he obtained his midshipman's warrant. He accompanied Sir John Duckworth's expedition to the Dardanelles 1804, and went to the East Indies 1807. In 1809, as lieutenant of the 'Barracouta,' he achieved his first success. He was one of the foremost in the escalade of the castle of Belgica, accomplished during a terrific storm. In this exploit Mr. Lyons displayed that skill and boldness which stamped him as a true British sailor. The noise of this little victory was received gladly in England, and scarcely had Lyons reached his twentieth year, when Admiral Drury appointed him his flag-lieutenant on board the 'Minden.' Within a twelvemonth after this he sailed by the coast of Java to await the arrival of the expedition then fitting out in India for the reduction of that island. Whilst lying off Java he received some prisoners, including an intelligent person, from whom he learnt that the Dutch expected no attack during the monsoon. Lyons immediately saw the opportunity, and with a boldness which excited astonishment and admiration put off two boats at midnight with their crews, consisting of thirty-five officers and men, to attack Fort Marrack of fifty-four guns. As the boats approached, the moon peeped out from behind a cloud and revealed the sentinels ready to challenge. All hope of surprise was gone, but it was not a moment for deliberation, and he boldly pushed on in the face of the enemy. In the midst of a heavy surf he landed his little force beneath the embrasures, and carried the lower battery, but, on reaching the hill, he found no fewer than 400 soldiers facing him. In spite of the odds against him, however, he charged the enemy, captured the fort, and succeeded in holding it. Lyons was appointed commander of the 'Rinaldo' 1812, in which vessel he escorted Louis XVIII. to France, and the allied sovereigns to England, besides affording a passage to Mr. Planta, the bearer of the treaty of Paris. In 1814 he received post-rank. The peace which ensued compelled Captain Lyons to remain for some years inactive, but at the first sound of war he was ready and eager again. In 1828 he commanded the 'Blonde,' and after blockading the port of Navarino, he co-operated with the French in the siege of the Morea Castle. His gallantry mainly contributed to the surrender of that place. In reward he received the insignia of the order of St. Louis of France, and of a knight-commander of the Greek order of the Redeemer. Lyons entered the Black Sea with the 'Blonde,' which was the first British man-of-war ever seen there. In May, 1832, whilst in command of the 'Madagascar,' he witnessed Ibrahim Pacha's bombardment of Acre, and in 1833 he escorted King Otho from Trieste to Greece. In 1835 he was knighted and made a K.C.H.; and in the same year appointed minister plenipotentiary at Athens. He afterwards filled the same high diplomatic position at Berne and Stockholm. He was created a baronet 1840, and made a civil G.C.B. 1844. His nomination as second in command of the Mediterranean fleet in Nov., 1853, brought him from his embassy at Stockholm to commence that brilliant termination of his career which gives him a conspicuous place in our naval history. In 1855 he took the chief command of the Mediterranean fleet, and his aid during the whole campaign, from the time he so admirably escorted the allied armies to the Crimea down to their final success, was most valuable and effective. His vessel, the 'Agamemnon,' was to be seen here, there, and everywhere, but always in the right place, and it was chiefly to the determination of Admiral Lyons to possess himself of Balaclava that the lives of thousands were saved. A series of victories followed the admiral everywhere. Kinburn fell, the fortress of Kertch was taken, and the attack of the fleet against the fortifications of Sebastopol was well carried out. Admiral Lyons's part in all these operations will be ever remembered. He was raised to the peerage 1856; and died at Arundel Castle, Sussex, 23 Nov., 1858.

LYONS, Israel, a Polish Jew, who was a silversmith and a teacher of the Hebrew language at Cambridge, wrote 'The Scholar's Instructor, or Hebrew Grammar,' and 'Observations and Enquiries relating to various parts of Scripture History.' Died 19 Aug., 1770.

LYONS, Israel, son of the preceding, born at Cambridge 1739, died about 1775. In early life he displayed great inclination to learning, particularly the mathematics. In 1755 he began to study botany, in which he became well versed. He had large materials for a 'Flora Cantabrigiensis.' In 1758 he published a Treatise on Fluxions, and in 1763 appeared his 'Fasciculus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam nascentium quæ post Raium observatæ fuere.' In 1764 he read a course of lectures on botany at Oxford, at the instance of Mr. (afterwards Sir Joseph) Banks, whom he first instructed in that science. In 1773 he was appointed by the Board of Longitude to proceed to the North Pole with Capt. Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave. He had 100*l.* per annum for calculating the Nautical Almanac, and frequently received presents from the Board of Longitude for his inventions. His 'Calculations in Spherical Trigonometry abridged' are in the Philosophical Transactions, and, after his death, his name appeared on the title-page of 'A Geographical Dictionary,' the astronomical portion of which was taken from his papers.

LYRA, Nicholas de, a Franciscan of the fourteenth century, was born of Jewish parents, at Lyre, in Normandy, about 1270. On embracing Christianity, he became an eminent teacher at Paris. Died 23 Oct., 1340. His Commentaries on the Bible were printed at Rome in 5 vols. folio; and at Antwerp, in 6 vols.

LYSANDER, a famous Spartan general, who defeated the Athenian fleet, and ended the Twenty-seven Years' war. He fell in battle B.C. 395.

LYSERUS, Polycarp, a Protestant divine, born at Winendeen, in Germany, 1552. He became minister of the church at Dresden, and died in 1601. His works consist chiefly of Commentaries on the Old Testament; and a Harmony of the Gospels. He is to be distinguished from John Lyserus, a divine, who wrote in favour of polygamy, and who died in 1684.

LYSIAS, an Athenian orator, who died B.C. 378, aged 80. Thirty-five of his orations are extant. The best editions of Lysias are by Taylor (1739), Förtsch (1829), and Franz (1831).

LYSIMACHUS, one of Alexander's generals, who became king of Thrace and Macedonia, was killed in battle 281 B.C.

LYSIPPUS, a celebrated Greek sculptor, who flourished in the time of Alexander the Great.

LYSONS, Daniel, D.C.L., M.D., a physician, born in Gloucestershire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, from whence he removed to a fellowship in All Souls, where he took the degree of doctor of laws in 1759; but afterwards he studied physic, and graduated in that faculty 1764. He settled in practice at Bath, and died there 1800. He published, Essay on Camphor and Calomel in Fever; Practical Essays on Intermittents, &c.; Further Considerations on the Effects of Calomel and Camphor.

LYSONS, Daniel, F.S.A., a topographer, born 1760, was son of the Rev. Samuel Lysons, rector of Rodmarton, Gloucestershire. He received his academical education at St. Mary Hall, Oxford (M.A. 1785). Taking orders, he served for some time the curacy of Putney, where he commenced his survey of the 'The Environs of London.' In this undertaking he was encouraged by Horace Walpole, who made him his chaplain. The work appeared in 4 vols. 4to., 1792-6, comprising the parishes within a circuit of twelve miles round the metropolis. In 1800 he published a separate volume containing an account of those parishes in Middlesex which were not included in the 'Environs.' He afterwards engaged with his brother in that great undertaking the 'Magna Britannia.' On the death of his uncle, Daniel Lysons, M.D. (mentioned above), he succeeded to the family estates in Gloucestershire, and in 1804 obtained the living of Rodmarton. Died 3 Jan., 1834. His MS. collections are in the British Museum.

LYSONS, Samuel, brother of the preceding, was born at Rodmarton 1763. He was educated at Bath, and afterwards entered as a student of the Middle Temple, where he was called to the bar. On the death of Mr. Astle he was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower. Died 10 April, 1819. His works are The Antiquities of Gloucestershire, folio; The Roman Remains discovered by him at Woodchester; Collection of Roman Remains in 'Magna Britannia,' in conjunction with his brother.

LYTE, Henry, a botanist, born in Somersetshire 1529. He was educated at Oxford, after which he travelled into foreign countries, and on his return formed one of the finest gardens in England on his paternal estate. He published a translation of 'Dodoens' Herbal,' 1578, and died 1607.

LYTTELTON. See Littleton.

LYTTELTON, Charles, third son of Sir Thomas and brother of the first Lord Lyttelton, was born at Hagley, Worcestershire, 1714. He was educated at Eton, and went from thence to Universit

College, Oxford, and next to the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar, which he quitted for the church, and in 1745 was created doctor of laws. In 1748 he was made dean of Exeter, and in 1762 consecrated bishop of Carlisle. He became president of the Society of Antiquaries in 1765, and died 22 Dec., 1768. He wrote several papers in the Archæologia, and a Memoir on the authenticity of a Copy of Magna Charta.

LYTTELTON, GEORGE, first Lord Lyttelton, was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Lyttelton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, and born there 1709. He was educated at Eton, and Christ Church, Oxford, after which he became a member of the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself by his opposition to Sir Robert Walpole, on whose resignation he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury. In 1747 he printed his tract 'On the Conversion of St. Paul,' for which the university of Oxford offered him the degree of doctor of laws, but he declined it. In 1751 he succeeded his father in the baronetcy; in 1754 he was made a privy councillor, and in 1755 chancellor of the Exchequer. About this time he published his 'Dialogues of the Dead.' In 1757 he was advanced to the peerage, having resigned his place some time before. In 1764 came out his principal work, the 'History of Henry II.,' 3 vols. 4to., on which he had been engaged twenty years. He died 22 Aug., 1773. The miscellaneous works of this noble author were published in 2 vols 1774. His son Thomas, the second Lord Lyttelton, was a young man of genius, but the reverse of his father in moral conduct. He died suddenly, under very mysterious circumstances, 27 Nov., 1779. The Letters and Poems published under his name are spurious.

M.

MABILLON, JEAN, one of the most learned men that have appeared in the world, was born 23 Nov., 1632, at St. Pierre-Mont, a village two leagues from Mousson, in the diocese of Rheims. He entered the order of Benedictines 1654, after which he became assistant to Father D'Acheri, who was compiling his 'Spicilegium.' He was next employed on an edition of St. Bernard, which gave so much satisfaction, that the congregation appointed him to compile 'The Acts of the Saints' of their order, which extended to nine volumes folio. His principal work, however, is entitled 'De re diplomatica,' folio, 1681, which induced Colbert to employ him in examining some titles relating to the royal family. For this purpose he travelled into Germany, of which journey he published an account. He next went to Italy, and brought back an immense collection of rare manuscripts, of which he printed a description, entitled 'Museum Italicum,' 2 vols. fol. His next work was a Latin Letter on the Worship of unknown Saints, referring to the bodies taken from the catacombs. He died in his abbey of St. Germain-des-Près 27 Dec., 1707.

MABLY, GABRIEL BONNOT, abbé DE, a political and historical writer, born at Grenoble 14 March, 1709; died at Paris 23 April, 1785. His 'Observations on the Romans,' and several of his other works, have been translated into English.

MABUSE, JOHN DE, a painter, was born at Maubeuge, in Hainault, 1470 or 1499. He resided some time at the court of Henry VII. of England, and painted the portraits of the royal family, as well as of the nobility; but his best works are an altar-piece of a Descent from the Cross, at Middleburg, and another of the Madonna and Child. Died 1562.

MACADAM, JOHN LOUDON, the inventor of the improved system of road-making which bears his name, was born in Ayr 21 Sept., 1756, and died at Moffat 26 Nov., 1836. He was a magistrate for Ayrshire when his attention was first directed to the consideration of the best and most scientific principles for the construction of roads, to the improvement of which he devoted the remainder of his life. For his services the government granted him 10,000*l.*, and offered to make him a knight, but he declined the honour, which was, however, conferred upon his son.

MAC ARDELL, JAMES, an English mezzotinto engraver, born about 1710; died 1765.

MACARIUS, St., an anchorite, was born at Alexandria about 301, and died about 391. He was a disciple of St. Anthony, and spent sixty years in retirement. His Homilies were printed at Paris in 1526, fol., and at Leipsic in 1698. He is to be distinguished from Macarius the younger, a monk of Alexandria, who was persecuted by the Arians, and banished to an island, all the inhabitants of which he converted to Christianity. He died about 404.

MACARTNEY, GEORGE, Earl Macartney, was the only son of George Macartney, Esq., in Auchinleck, in Scotland, and born in Ireland of 1737. In the early part of his life he travelled with the two sons of Lord Holland, and in 1764 was appointed envoy extraordinary to the empress of Russia. On his return he became secretary to Lord Townsend, viceroy of Ireland. In 1772 he was constituted a knight of the Bath, and in 1775 went out governor of Grenada and Tobago. He continued there till 1779, when, on the capture of those islands, he was sent to France. In 1776 he was created a peer of Ireland, and in 1780 appointed governor of Madras, where his conduct gave such satisfaction that, in 1785, he was appointed governor-general of Bengal; but this office he declined, and returned to England. In 1792 he was sent on an embassy to China, and after his return was created an earl of Great Britain. Died 31 March, 1806.

MACAULAY, or GRAHAM, CATHARINE, was born 1733, at Ollantigh, Kent, the seat of her father, John Sawbridge, Esq. In 1760 she married Dr. Macaulay, a physician in London, but soon became a widow. In 1763 she acquired some popularity by the first volume of a History of England, from the accession of James I. to that of the House of Brunswick. The work proceeded till it made eight volumes; but its credit failed as it advanced, and it is now no longer in request. Among her admirers was Dr. Wilson, rector of St. Stephen, Walbrook, in which church he placed her bust in her lifetime; but on her second marriage with one Graham, the doctor removed this monument of folly. In 1785 she went to America, purposely to see General Washington. She died at Binfield, Berks, 22 June, 1791. Besides her History, she wrote 'A Treatise on Moral Truth;' 'Letters on Education;' and some political pamphlets.

MACAULAY, THOMAS BABINGTON, Lord Ma-

caulay, the distinguished historian, poet, orator, and politician, was born at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, 25 Oct., 1800, being son of Zachary Macaulay, an African merchant, well known as a staunch advocate for the abolition of slavery. He received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained the Craven scholarship, and some of the highest academical honours. For several years he enjoyed a fellowship at Trinity College, which he obtained at the October competition of 1822. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, and was eventually (1849) made a bencher of that society. He also became a commissioner of bankrupts; but literature and politics, rather than law, were destined to be the chief sources of Macaulay's advancement and fame. He began to write early in life, his first contribution to the 'Edinburgh Review' being the brilliant article on Milton, an essay which at once fixed public attention, and showed that its author possessed abilities of a very high order. His subsequent contributions to the great Whig 'Review,' which have since been frequently printed in a collected form, under the title of 'Critical and Historical Essays,' increased his reputation as a writer. Mr. Macaulay entered parliament in 1830 as member for Calne, and soon distinguished himself on the Whig side of the House as an able and eloquent debater. Under Lord Grey's government he held the secretaryship to the Board of Control. His conduct with reference to the Negro Emancipation question was equally honourable to himself and to Lord Grey. Being unable to vote with the government, he tendered his resignation, which Lord Grey refused to accept, and at his lordship's urgent request Mr. Macaulay remained in office. In 1832 he was returned to parliament for Leeds, but on being nominated fifth member of the Supreme Council of India, and legal adviser to that body, he resigned both his seat and his office at home 1834. The tedium of the outward voyage to the East was beguiled by the composition of his remarkable essay on Lord Bacon. While in India he drew up a code of laws for the Indian empire, but it proved an utter failure. He returned to England 1838, in which year his father died. In 1839 he was appointed secretary at war, and in 1840 elected M.P. for Edinburgh, which seat he lost in 1847, in consequence of his refusal to vote for the abolition of the grant to Maynooth College. His literary fame had by this time greatly increased. His splendid essays on Clive and Hastings were the theme of general admiration, and in 1842 he published his soul-stirring 'Lays of Ancient Rome.' Mr. Macaulay was secretary at war from 1839 to 1841, and paymaster of the forces from 1846 to 1848. On his retirement from the latter office, and after being in 1848 elected lord-rector of Glasgow university, he devoted his time mainly to advancing the composition of his 'History of England from the Accession of James the Second,' the first two volumes of which appeared at the close of 1848. Their success was wholly unprecedented. They were universally read; and whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the author's impartiality and accuracy, there can be none as to the magnificence and lucidity of his style, and the interest of his narrative. The third and fourth volumes of the 'History,' published in 1855, maintained its popularity, and brought the narrative down to the peace of Ryswick (1697). Some of Mr. Macaulay's statements, however, met with earnest contradiction, and none more than his attack on William Penn. Nevertheless, this History of England will make its author rank by the side of Rapin, Hume, Lingard, and our other leading historians. Mr. Macaulay, who had been appointed professor of ancient history in the Royal Academy 1850, was raised to the peerage 10 Sept., 1857, by the title of Lord Macaulay of Rothley; but his career was then drawing to its close. His constitution had been shattered by repeated attacks of disease of the heart, and he died at his suburban house, Holly Lodge, Kensington, 28 Dec., 1859. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. A fifth volume of his 'History,' compiled from his posthumous papers, and completing the work to the death of William III., appeared in 1861, under the editorial supervision of Lady Trevelyan. The best edition of the entire work is that of 1858, in seven volumes. There have been numerous editions of his 'Essays' and 'Speeches;' and a collection of his 'Miscellaneous Writings' appeared in 2 vols., 1860, comprising his contributions to 'Knight's Quarterly Magazine;' articles in the 'Edinburgh Review,' not included in his 'Critical and Historical Essays;' biographies, written for the 'Encyclopædia Britannica;' miscellaneous poems and inscriptions.

M'BRIDE, DAVID, M.D., a distinguished physician and medical writer, was born in Antrim, Ireland, 1726, and died at Dublin 30 Dec., 1778.

MACBRIDE, JOHN DAVID, D.C.L., F.S.A., principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic in that university, died 24 Jan., 1868, æt. 90. He published a 'Diatesseron,' or 'Harmony of the Gospels,' which was at one time largely used as a text-book in the university, and also a work on Mahomedanism.

MAC CAGHWELL, HUGH, Hugo Cavellus, an Irish Catholic prelate and writer, was born in the county Down in or about 1572. He studied at Salamanca, became a Franciscan friar of the strict observance, and afterwards governed for many years the Irish college of St. Antony of Padua at Louvain, in the founding of which he had been instrumental. He was professor of divinity in the last-mentioned college, and in the convent of Ara Cœli, at Rome; also definitor-general of his order. The pope ultimately selected him as successor to Peter Lombard in the archiepiscopal see of Armagh, but he died at Rome 22 Sept., 1626, while making preparations for his journey to Ireland, and was buried in the chapel of the Irish college of St. Isidore. This learned prelate published in his native language a treatise on the sacrament of penance, entitled 'Scathan Shacra Mumtenahaithridhe, ar na chuma don bhráthair bhochd dord San Froinsias Aodh mhac Aingil, leaghthóir diadhachta a ccolaisti na mbráthair Neirionnach a lobháin,' 12mo., Louvain, 1618. He was likewise author of the following works in Latin:—'Scoti Commentaria in quatuor libros Sententiarum, cum Annotationibus Marginalibus,' to which he prefixed the life of Scotus, folio, Antwerp, 1620; 'Apologia pro Johanne Duns-Scoto adv. Abr. Bzovium;' 'Apologia Apologiæ pro Johanne Duns-Scoto, scripta adv. Nich. Jansenium,' 8vo., Paris, 1623, under the pseudonym of Hugh Magnesius; 'Questiones in Metaphysicam,' Venice, 1625.

MACCLESFIELD, THOMAS PARKER, EARL OF, was born at Leek, Derbyshire, 23 July, 1666, received his academical education at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar 1691. He became recorder of Derby, which borough returned him as one of its representatives to the parliament of 1705, and to the two following parliaments. Being attached to the Whig party, he was appointed one of the managers of the impeachment of Dr. Sacheverell 1710. For his exertions on this occasion he was made chief justice of the Queen's Bench, and in 1716 he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Parker, of Macclesfield. The great seal was presented to him 12 May, 1718, with the title of lord chancellor, and in 1721 he was created Viscount Parker and earl of Macclesfield. He resigned the chancellorship 4 Jan., 1725. Almost immediately afterwards he was charged with selling offices contrary to law, and with taking extortionate sums from the persons appointed, with the knowledge that the payment was to be defrayed out of the suitors' money. The trial lasted thirteen days, and the lords unanimously found him guilty, and fined him £30,000. Died 28 April, 1732.—Foss.

McCORMICK, CHARLES, LL.B., a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland. After having completed his classical studies, he came to London, and entered the Middle Temple, but devoted his attention more to literature than to law. His principal publications are: 'The Secret History of King Charles the Second;' 'Reign of George III.,' down to 1783; 'Continuation of Rapin's History of England;' 'British Cicero;' 'Light Reading for Leisure Hours;' 'Memoirs of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke,' 1797. He also projected a History of Ireland, but did not live to carry out the plan,—a fact not at all to be regretted, as he was wholly unqualified for such a task. Died 29 July, 1807, aged 55.

M'CRIE, THOMAS, D.D., a biographer, born at Dunse, Berwickshire, Nov., 1772. He received his education at Edinburgh, and was called to the ministry, but in 1806 he separated from the General Associate Synod, and joined with Mr. Bruce and others in founding the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. His death took place at Edinburgh 5 Aug., 1835. He published 'The Life of John Knox,' 2 vols., 1812; 'The Life of Andrew Melville,' 2 vols., 1819; and some other pieces, all of which were brought out in a collected form by his son, 4 vols. 8vo., Edinb., 1855-7.

M'CULLOCH, HORATIO, R.S.A., a distinguished Scotch landscape painter, died at his residence, St. Colm Villa, Edinburgh, 24 June, 1867, æt. 62.

MACCULLOCH, JOHN, M.D., was born in Guernsey 6 Oct., 1773, and after concluding his professional studies at Edinburgh, practised as a physician at Blackheath. In 1811, however, he gave up his practice on being employed by the government to undertake various scientific surveys in Scotland. He died at Penzance, Cornwall, 21 Aug., 1835. His works are: 'Remarks on the Art of Making Wine,' 1817; 'A Description of the Western Islands of Scotland, including the Isle of Man,' 1819, a work of merit, which, however, was violently attacked by Dr. James Brown; 'A Geological Classification of Rocks;' 'The Highlands and Western Isles of Scotland,' 1824; 'System of Geology and Theory of the Earth,' 1831; 'Proofs and Illustrations of the Attributes of God,' 1837.

M'CULLOCH, JOHN RAMSAY, political economist, was born in 1789 at Whithorn, Wigtonshire. On leaving school he was placed in the office of a writer to the Signet, but did not pursue the legal profession. He settled in Edinburgh, and attended the university classes, though he never graduated. In 1817 he became editor of the 'Scotsman,' and the following year commenced a series of articles in the 'Edinburgh Review,' and gave lectures on political economy. He left Edinburgh in 1828, on being appointed professor of political economy in University College, London; but the chair being unendowed, and the number of students attending his lectures insufficient for his remuneration, he relinquished that position. In 1838 the Whig government made him comptroller of the London Stationery Office, and he continued at the head of this department until his death 11 Nov., 1864. His works on political economy, the result of forty years of study and experience, are highly esteemed. The principal are: 'Statistical Account of the British Empire,' first published in 1837, and much enlarged in subsequent editions; 'Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navigation,' a standard work, annually reprinted and revised; 'Geographical Dictionary,' first published in 1840; an edition of Smith's 'Wealth of Nations,' 1828, &c.; 'Treatises and Essays on Economical Policy,' 1853; 'Principles of Political Economy,' 1853; and 'Principles and Practical Influence of Taxation and the Funding System,' 1855. A writer in the 'Times' remarks; 'The genius of Mr. M'Culloch was not inventive. He sifted and recast the labours of others. Statistics, rather than the principles of political economy, were his forte; but his works were generally lucid and sound.'

MACDIARMID, JOHN, was born 1779, at Weem, Perthshire, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated for the church, but relinquished that pursuit, and on coming to London became editor of the 'St. James's Chronicle.' In 1803 he published 'An Enquiry into the System of Military Defence,' 2 vols.; which was followed by 'An Enquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination.' His last work was entitled 'Lives of British Statesmen.' Died 7 April, 1808.

MAC DONALD, ALEXANDER, a Scotch Catholic prelate, was born at Bornish, in the island of Uist, 1740; nominated vicar apostolic of the Highland district 1779; consecrated bishop of Polemonium 1780; died at Salamanan 9 Sept., 1791.

MACDONALD, ARCHIBALD, a Benedictine monk, was for many years settled at Liverpool, where he published 'Moral Essays,' 2 vols.; a portion of 'Ossian's Poems,' in rhyme; and 'Companion to the Altar.' Died 29 July, 1814.

MACDONALD, ÉTIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH ALEXANDER, duke of Tarentum, marshal of France, was born at Sancerre (Berry) 17 Nov., 1765. He became general of brigade 1795, in which year he crossed the Waal on the ice, and at the head of his infantry made himself master of the Dutch fleet. As a reward for this daring exploit he received the rank of general of division. Sent into Italy (1798) as governor of the Roman States, he conquered, at Otricoli, 80,000 Neapolitans who went to attack him. Shortly afterwards he succeeded Championnet in the command of Naples, and reduced Calabria. In 1799 he obstinately disputed with Suwarrow the passage of the Trebia, with a very inferior force. The year following Moreau, commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine, intrusted Macdonald with the command of his left wing; and he succeeded, by an admirable march across the Alps, in making himself master of Splügen. Disgraced in 1804 for having defended Moreau, he retired from the service till 1809. He fought, however, at Wagram, and distinguished himself so highly, that Napoleon gave him the marshal's bâton, with the title of duke of Tarentum. In 1812 he commanded the tenth corps in Russia; he fought at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Leipsic (1813); and during the campaign of 1814 he commanded the left wing of the army, and struggled incessantly against forces far superior to his own. After Napoleon's abdication, Macdonald was nominated a member of the chamber of peers, and charged with the disbanding of the army of the Loire. He became grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour 1816, and retained that dignity till 1831. Died 24 Sept., 1840.

MACDONALD, FLORA, a native of South Uist, in Scotland, who is memorable for her noble disinterestedness in helping Prince Charles, the Young Pretender, to escape after the battle of Culloden. Having directed the prince to assume female attire, she stated that he was her maid-servant, and thus succeeded in conveying him to the isle of Skye, from whence he made good his escape to France. After parting from the prince, she was arrested and imprisoned in London, but was liberated in July, 1747, when she returned to Skye. She married one of the Macdonalds of Kingsburgh, and emigrated to America, but after his decease came back to her native land, where she died 4 March, 1790. Her 'Autobiography, edited by her Granddaughter,' 2 vols., 1870, is a worthless fabrication.

MAC DONALD, HUGH, a Scotch Catholic prelate, born at Morah, Inverness-shire, 1701, was nominated the first vicar apostolic of the newly created Highland district 12 Feb., 1731; consecrated bishop of Diana Oct., 1731; died at Glengarry, Inverness-shire, 2 March, 1773.

MAC DONALD, JOHN, a Scotch Catholic prelate, born in Argyleshire 1727. He was nominated coadjutor to Bishop Hugh Mac Donald, his maternal uncle, in Jan., 1761; consecrated bishop of Tiberiopolis 27 Sept., 1761; succeeded his uncle as vicar apostolic of the Highland district 1773; and died 9 May, 1779.

MACDONALD, JOHN, F.R.S., only son of the famous Flora Macdonald, was born at Kingsburgh, in Scotland, 1759. He engaged in the service of the East India Company, and rose to the rank of captain in the corps of engineers on the Bengal establishment. In scientific circles he became widely known by his experiments respecting the variation of the magnetic needle in India, at Bencoolen, in Sumatra, and at St. Helena. On his return to England, about 1800, he was appointed lieut.-colonel of the Royal Clan-Alpine regiment, and commandant of the Royal Edinburgh artillery. He was subsequently appointed chief engineer at Fort Marlborough, and employed for some time in Ireland. His death occurred at Exeter 16 Aug., 1831. He published some works on military tactics; a 'Treatise on Telegraphic Communication,' 1808, in which he proposed a new system of telegraphy; and a 'Telegraphic Dictionary,' 1816.

MAC DONALD, RONALD, a Scotch prelate of the Roman Church, was born at Edinburgh 1756; nominated vicar apostolic of the Highland district 1819; consecrated bishop of Arindela 1820; became the first vicar apostolic of the new western district of Scotland 1828; and died at Fort William, Inverness-shire, 20 Sept., 1832.

MAC DOUGALL, PATRICK CAMPBELL, was the son of the Rev. Hugh MacDougall, parish minister of Killin, where he was born 1806. He received his education at the High School, Edinburgh, and at the university in that city. Afterwards he went through the regular course of studies for the church, but never took licence. At this time he contributed largely to various periodicals, and later he published a collection of Essays. About 1834 he was offered the classical mastership in the Edinburgh Academy, then under the directorship of Archdeacon Williams, and in this position he continued till 1844, when, on the institution of the chair of moral philosophy in the New, or Free Church college, he was appointed the first professor. He succeeded John Wilson in the chair of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh 1852; and died 30 Dec., 1867.

MAC DOWALL, WILLIAM, a learned Scotchman, born in 1590, and educated at the university of St. Andrews. He took his degree of LL.D. at Groningen, and entered into the service of the count of Nassau, who sent him ambassador to England. Charles I. appointed him one of the council for Scotland, and Charles II. sent him ambassador to the Netherlands. He died in London, but when is not known.

MACE, THOMAS, a musician, born at Cambridge in or about 1613. He was one of the clerks of Trinity College, Cambridge, and an excellent performer on the lute. Mr. Mace invented an instrument called the dyphone, or double lute; but his fame principally rests upon his book, entitled 'Musick's Monument; or a Remembrancer of the best Practical Musick, both divine and civil, that has ever been known to have been in the world,' 4to., London, 1676. This work is known to all who are curious in the history of music, and, from its quaint language and gossiping character, is not without interest to the general reader. Mace was alive in 1690, but the date of his decease is unrecorded.—Cooper's Annals.

MACEDO, JOSEPH AUGSTINE DE, a Portuguese poet, died at Lisbon 1831.

MACFARLANE, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer, born in Scotland 1734. He received his education at Edinburgh, after which he kept a school at Walthamstow. He died of bruises received at Brentford election 8 Aug., 1804. His works are 'A History of the Reign of George III.;' 'Essay on the Authenticity of Ossian;' An Address to the People of the British Empire; a translation of Buchanan's Dialogue on the Rights of the Crown of Scotland, with two Dissertations on the Getæ and Scythians, and the Goths and Scots, &c.

MACGAURAN, EDWARD, a Catholic prelate, who succeeded Richard Creagh in the archiepiscopal see of Armagh. He arrived in Ireland 1594. Being discovered by the officers of justice, he was mortally wounded while engaged in hearing the confession of a dying man. This melancholy event occurred in 1598.

M'GEE, THOMAS D'ARCY, a politician and writer, born at Carlingford, in Ireland, 13 April, 1825. In 1843 he emigrated to the United States, and obtained a position on the Boston press. At the commencement of the 'Young Ireland' movement, in 1848, he returned to his native country, and, as one of the editorial staff of the 'Nation,' was very active in promoting the agitation. When the émeute was quelled he made good his escape to America, where he established 'The American Celt,' a newspaper in which he advocated the claims of Ireland to an independent nationality. During the 'Know-Nothing' movement of 1854-6, however, his views underwent a change, and he became an ardent royalist. He thereupon removed to Canada, where he received a hearty welcome; and in 1857 the citizens of Montreal elected him to the Canadian parliament. In 1864 he was nominated to the presidency of the executive council, and he retained that office till 1867, when he was re-elected to the parliament of the new Dominion of Canada, and appointed minister of agriculture in the new cabinet. He rendered himself very obnoxious to the Fenian Secret Society, by a member of which body, named Whelan, he was assassinated at Ottawa, 7 April, 1868. His works are, 'Historical Sketches of O'Connell and his Friends,' third edition, 1845; 'The Irish Writers of the Seventeenth Century,' 1846; 'Memoir of the Life and Conquests of Art Mac Murrogh, King of Leinster,' 1847; 'History of the Irish Settlers in North America,' second edition, 1852; 'Life of Edward Maginn, Coadjutor Bishop of Derry,' 1857; 'Canadian Ballads,' 1858; 'A Popular History of Ireland, from the earliest period to the emancipation of the Catholics,' 2 vols., 1863; 'Speeches and Addresses, chiefly on the subject of British American Union,' 1865.

MACGEOGHEGAN, the abbé JAMES, an Irish historian, born 1702; died 30 March, 1764, at Paris, where he was attached as priest to the church of St. Méry. His 'Histoire de l'Irlande ancienne et moderne,' appeared at Paris in 3 vols. 4to., 1758-63. It has been translated into English by P. O'Kelly.

MACGILLIVRAY, WILLIAM, LL.D., a naturalist, was appointed, in 1841, professor of natural history and lecturer on botany in Marischal College and University, Aberdeen; and died 4 Sept., 1852. His principal work is the 'History of British Birds, Indigenous and Migratory,' 5 vols., 1848-52.

MACHIAVELLI, NICCOLO, was born at Florence 1469. He commenced his literary career as a comic poet, and next engaged in politics, which brought him into trouble. Afterwards he was raised to some posts of importance, and, among the rest, that of secretary to the republic. He was likewise employed in embassies, notwithstanding which he died poor 22 June, 1527. His principal works are A History of Florence; The Life of Castruccio Castracani; 'Del Principe,' or The Prince. This last treatise has been considered by some as an apology for tyranny, while others have thought it was intended to expose arbitrary power. This last opinion is more ingenious than probable. All Machiavelli's works have been translated into English by Ellis Farneworth.

MACHIN, JOHN, an English astronomer, was secretary of the Royal Society, and on 16 May, 1713, was chosen professor of astronomy at Gresham College, in succession to Dr. Torriano. He is the author of a method for determining the quadrature of the circle; and by means of Dr. Halley's method he computed the ratio of the circumference of the circle to its diameter as far as one hundred places of decimals. He contributed some papers to the Philosophical Transactions, and composed a treatise on the Laws of the Moon's Motion according to Gravity, which is printed in Motte's translation of Newton's 'Principia.' Died 9 June, 1751.

MACHYN, HENRY, a citizen and merchant taylor of London, who, from 1550 to 1563, kept a 'Diary,' from which Strype the historian culled some important facts. This Diary was printed by the Camden Society 1848, under the editorship of Mr. John Gough Nichols, F.S.A.

MACK DE LEIBERICH, CHARLES, Baron VON, an Austrian general, born at Neusslingen in Franconia, 25 Aug., 1752. He was named generalissimo of the Neapolitan troops 1798; but being beaten by Macdonald and Championnet, he was sent as a prisoner on parole to Paris, from whence he made his escape. In 1805 he was entrusted with a new command in Bavaria; but having been surrounded at Ulm by Napoleon, who compelled him to surrender at discretion with 30,000 men, he was condemned to death, though the sentence was commuted to two years' imprisonment. Died 22 Oct., 1828.

M'KENNA, THEOBALD, a political writer, died at Dublin 13 Dec., 1808.

MACKENZIE, CHARLES FRAZER, an Anglican missionary, born in Peeblesshire 10 April, 1825, and educated at Cambridge. Fired with missionary zeal, he went out to Natal (1854) as archdeacon of Pieter-Maritzburg, under Bishop Colenso. There he remained till 1859, when he returned to England; but he soon went out again (1860) on a mission to Central Africa, being consecrated a bishop 1 Jan., 1861, by the metropolitan of Capetown, with the title of 'bishop of the mission to the tribes dwelling in the neighbourhood of the Lake Nyassa and River Shiré.' His labours were brought to a close by his untimely death on the island of Malo, at the confluence of the Ruo and Shiré, 31 Jan., 1862.

MACKENZIE, Sir GEORGE, was born at Dundee 1636. He studied at Aberdeen and St. Andrews, after which he went to Bourges, in France, and on his return was admitted to the bar. In 1674 he was made king's advocate, and knighted. At the Revolution he settled in England, and died in London 2 May, 1691. His works upon the laws and antiquities of Scotland are numerous and valuable. He also wrote 'Moral Essays;' and his Latin compositions are elegant, particularly the tract entitled 'Idea eloquentiæ forensis,' and his 'Characteres quorundam apud Scotos advocatorum.'

MACKENZIE, GEORGE, M.D., a Scotch biographer, practised as a physician in Edinburgh, at the commencement of the eighteenth century. He was born 10 Dec, 1669; but the date of his death is unknown. His 'Lives and Characters of the most eminent Writers of the Scots Nation' appeared in 3 vols. folio, 1708-22.

MACKENZIE, GEORGE, Viscount Tarbat, and earl of Cromarty, was born of a noble family, nearly related to that of Sir George Mackenzie. He distinguished himself by his loyalty, for which, after the Restoration, he was made a senator of the college of justice, clerk of the privy council, and justice-general. James II. raised him to the peerage, and Queen Anne made him secretary of state, and earl of Cromarty. He died at the age of 88, in 1714. He wrote 'A Vindication of Robert III., king of Scotland;' Synopsis Apocalyptica; An Account of the Conspiracies of the Earls of Gowrie and Robert Logan against James VI.

MACKENZIE, HENRY, an essayist and novelist, was the son of a physician at Edinburgh, where he was born Aug., 1745. After receiving a liberal education, he devoted himself to the law, and in 1766 became an attorney in the Court of Exchequer at Edinburgh. Ultimately his practice in that court produced him about £800 a year. He became comptroller of taxes for Scotland, with a salary of £600 a year; and altogether his annual income was upwards of £2,000. In the midst of his professional avocations he found time to cultivate polite literature. His first novel, 'The Man of Feeling,' published anonymously in 1771, excited the warmest enthusiasm in its favour. It was followed by 'The Man of the World,' 1773; and 'Julia de Roubigné,' 1777, which achieved an equally flattering success. Mr. Mackenzie also wrote several plays; but their uniform failure proved that dramatic composition was not his forte. He was a leading member of the Mirror Club, and of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and was the editor of, and chief contributor to the series of essays printed under the titles of the 'Mirror' and the 'Lounger.' Late in life he acquired a knowledge of German, and published, in 1791, a small volume containing translations from that language of some dramatic pieces, including Lessing's 'Set of Horses.' His collected Works were published in 8 vols. 1808. Died 14 Jan., 1831.

MACKENZIE, WILLIAM, M.D., a famous oculist of Glasgow, died Aug., 1868, aged 74. He was the author of several works, among which his treatises on the physiology of vision and diseases of the eye are best known.

MACKINNON, DANIEL, colonel of the Coldstream Guards, was born 1791, entered the army when very young, gained marked distinction by his bravery in the Peninsula and at Waterloo, and died 22 June, 1836. By command of King William IV. he wrote a valuable history of 'The Origin and Services of the Coldstream Guards,' 1833.

MACKINTOSH, Sir JAMES, a distinguished author and statesman, born at Aldowrie, near Inverness, 24 Oct., 1765. After having studied at Aberdeen and Edinburgh he graduated in medicine 1787, but subsequently chose the law as his profession. Previous to his call to the bar he visited the Continent, and on his return published his 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ,' 1791, in defence of the French Revolution and its English admirers against the accusations of Mr. Burke. This work produced a great sensation, and had the effect of materially checking the tide of popular opinion, which then ran in favour of Mr. Burke's sentiments. In 1799 Mackintosh delivered, in the hall of Lincoln's Inn, a course of lectures on the Law of Nature and Nations, in allusion to which Pitt said that 'he had never met with anything so able or so elegant on the subject in any language.' In 1803 Mackintosh appeared as advocate on behalf of M. Peltier, who had been indicted for a libel on the First Consul of France, and defended his client in a speech which was pronounced by Lord Ellenborough to be 'the most eloquent oration he had ever heard in Westminster Hall.' On 21 Dec., 1803, he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed recorder, or criminal judge, of Bombay, where he resided for several years, distinguished by his temperate and impartial administration of justice, and his active zeal in behalf of literature and science. In 1813 he was elected M.P. for Nairn, in Scotland, and he continued to sit in the House of Commons till his death. Whilst in parliament he supported all liberal measures; but his efforts were chiefly directed towards the amelioration of the criminal code, the rigour of which he was one of the most active in opposing. In 1822 he was elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow, and in the following year was re-elected to the same dignity. In Dec., 1830, on the formation of Earl Grey's administration, he was appointed one of the commissioners for the affairs of India. Died 30 May, 1832. His principal works are 'Vindiciæ Gallicæ,' already noticed; 'Discourse on the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations;' 'Dissertation on Ethical Philosophy;' 'History of England, B.C. 55 to A.D. 1572,' 3 vols. in Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia; 'Life of Sir Thomas More;' 'History of the Revolution in England in 1688.' His Miscellaneous Works were published in 3 vols. 8vo., 1846.

MACKLIN, CHARLES, a dramatic author and actor, born in Ireland 1 May, 1690. His family name was Maclaughlin, which, on his arrival in London, he changed to Macklin. He was originally in a menial situation in Trinity College, Dublin; and in 1716 he appeared as a performer at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was not, however, till 1741 that he established his reputation in the character of Shylock, in which he stood unrivalled. He continued on the stage till 1789, when the infirmities of old age compelled him to retire, in such poor circumstances as induced his friends to open a subscription for his support. Died 11 July, 1797. Macklin wrote two comedies, entitled 'The Man of the World,' and 'Love Alamode.'

MACKNIGHT, JAMES, D.D., was born at Irvine, in Argyleshire, 1721, and educated at Glasgow, after which he went to Leyden. In 1753 he was ordained minister of Maybole, where he continued sixteen years, and produced his 'Harmony of the Gospels,' and 'A new Translation of the Epistles.' In 1763 he published 'The Truth of the Gospel History,' for which the university of Edinburgu conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity. In 1769 he removed to the living of Jedburgh, and, three years afterwards, he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh, where he died in Jan., 1800.

MACLAINE, ARCHIBALD, was born at Monaghan, in Ireland, 1722, and educated at Glasgow. He endeavoured to get admission into the ministry of the Church of England; but being prevented by some informality, he accepted an invitation from the English congregation at the Hague, where he succeeded his uncle, Dr. Milling, in 1745, and continued there till 1794, when the invasion of Holland by the French obliged him to leave the country. He then settled at Bath, where he died 25 Nov., 1804. Dr. Maclaine is best known by his translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, 6 vols., and an 'Answer to Soame Jenyns's View of Christianity.'

MACLAURIN, COLIN, F.R.S., was born at Kilmodan, near Inverary, Feb., 1698. He was educated at Glasgow, where, in his fifteenth year, he obtained the degree of master of arts, on which occasion he defended a thesis relative to the 'power of gravity.' In 1717 he was chosen professor of mathematics in the Marischal College of Aberdeen, and two years afterwards was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1722 he travelled with the son of Lord Polwarth, and while abroad wrote his treatise on 'The Percussion of Bodies,' which gained the prize of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. On the death of his pupil he returned home, and in 1725 was elected professor of mathematics at Edinburgh. In 1734 he entered the lists against Berkeley, on the nature of fluxions, which produced his treatise on that branch of science. In the rebellion of 1745 he took so active a part in fortifying Edinburgh, that when the Pretender approached with his forces Mr. Maclaurin deemed it prudent to retire to York, where he was entertained by Archbishop Herring, in whose palace he died 14 June, 1746. Besides the works already noticed, he wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions; a treatise, entitled 'Geometria Organica;' another on 'Algebra;' and 'An Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries.'

MACLAURIN, JOHN, son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh Dec., 1734. In 1756 he was admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates, and in 1787 was raised to the bench by the title of Lord Dreghorn. Died 1796. His works are, An Essay on Literary Property; A Collection of Criminal Cases; Essay on Patronage. These, with some other pieces, were collected in 2 vols., 1799.

MACLEAY, WILLAM SHARP, an English zoologist, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1814; M.A. 1818). His writings produced quite a revolution in the opinions of zoologists as to the relations of natural objects, and their systematic classification. For several years he was engaged in Cuba in connection with the suppression of the slave trade; but he passed the latter part of his life in Australia, dying at his residence near Sydney 25 Jan., 1865. He wrote 'Horæ Entomologicæ,' and various memoirs in the Transactions of the Linnæan Society and Zoological Journal.

M'NALLY, CHARLES, D.D., consecrated Catholic bishop of Clogher 1844, died 21 Nov., 1864.

M'NALLY, LEONARD, an Irish barrister and dramatist, born 1752, at Dublin, where he died 15 Feb., 1820.

MACNISH, ROBERT, LL.D., a Scotch physician, born 15 Feb., 1802, at Glasgow, where he died 16 Jan., 1837. Besides contributing a number of articles to 'Blackwood's Magazine,' under the signature of 'The Modern Pythagorean,' he published the following works, which gained widespread popularity: 'The Anatomy of Drunkenness;' 'Philosophy of Sleep;' 'The Book of Aphorisms;' and 'Introduction to Phrenology.'

MACPHERSON, JAMES, was born at Kingcusie, in Inverness, 1738. After studying at Aberdeen he became schoolmaster of Ruthven, where he published a poem entitled 'The Highlander.' In 1760 he produced his 'Fragments of Ancient Poetry, translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language,' which were so well received that a subscription was formed to enable the author to collect more treasures of the like description. The result of this mission was 'Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem in six books,' together with several other poems, composed by Ossian, the son of Fingal, 'translated from the Gaelic language,' 1762. The next year appeared another epic, called 'Temora,' which was not so successful as the former. In 1764 Macpherson went to Pensacola, as secretary to Governor Johnstone; and on his return published 'An Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland.' His next performance was a translation of the 'Iliad,' in 2 vols.; which met with a very mortifying reception. Soon after this Macpherson rendered himself ridiculous by his correspondence with Johnson, who treated him as an impostor. In 1775 he published 'The History of Great Britain, from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover,' to which he afterwards added two more volumes of original papers. He was next employed to defend government in regard to the American war; and he was also appointed agent to the nabob of Arcot, in which capacity he published some works against the India Company. He died 17 Feb., 1796, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

MAC QUIN, ANGE DENIS, a French abbé, of Scotch descent, was born at Meaux-en-Brie 1756, and educated in the college of that city, where his extraordinary proficiency in classical learning obtained for him, at an early age, the professorship of rhetoric and belles-lettres, which he held for several years, together with an ecclesiastical benefice in the neighbourhood. Shortly after the outbreak of the French Revolution he made his escape to this country (1792), where he became attached to the College of Arms, as heraldic draughtsman, in which capacity he gained an ample subsistence. It is worthy of mention that he designed the car which bore the remains of Nelson to their last resting-place. The abbé edited several works in English, and composed also some original pieces, including the 'Tabella Cibaria,' or the 'Bill of Fare,' a Latin poem, which displays considerable ingenuity and classical learning. He died in Southwark 17 July, 1823.

MACROBIUS, AMBROSIUS AURELIUS THEODOSIUS, a Latin writer of the fourth century, who is supposed to have been a native of Greece. It is certain that he was not a Roman, and it is not clear to what religious persuasion he belonged. He held the consular dignity, and was chamberlain to Theodosius. His works are 'A Commentary on the Somnium Scipionis;' Saturnalia; De Differentiis et Societatibus Græci Latinique verbi. The best editions are the Variorum, that of Gronovius, and that of Leipsic, 1777.

MADAN, MARTIN, D.D., was born in 1726. He was bred to the bar, which he quitted for the church, and became a celebrated preacher at the Lock Chapel, till, by publishing an apology for polygamy, in a work entitled 'Thelyphthora,' he lost his popularity, and retired from the pulpit. Died May, 1790. Besides the above work, he published a Comment on the Thirty-nine Articles; and a translation of Juvenal and Persius, with notes. He was a Calvinist in doctrinal sentiments. His brother, Dr. Spencer Madan, became successively bishop of Bristol and Peterborough, and died 8 Oct., 1813.

MADDEN, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in Ireland 1687. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he introduced the scheme for promoting learning by premiums at the quarterly examinations. In 1732 he printed 'Memoirs of the Twentieth Century, or original Letters of State under George the Sixth;' but only one volume of this extraordinary work appeared. He founded a society at Dublin for the improvement of the arts, in 1740, similar to that which was afterwards established in London. In 1744 he published a poem, called 'Boulter's Monument;' and he was also the author of a play, entitled 'Themistocles.' He had a deanery in Ireland, and the living of Drummully. Died 30 Dec., 1765.

MADERNO, CHARLES, an Italian architect, born at Bissonna, in the diocese of Como, 1556; died at Rome 1629. The Maffei palace is his masterpiece.

MADISON, JAMES, fourth president of the United States, was born in Virginia 16 March, 1751, and from an early age took an active part in public affairs. He was elected in 1809 president of the United States, and re-elected in 1813. He energetically prosecuted the war against Great Britain (1812-14). He retired into private life March, 1817, and died 28 June, 1836.

MADOX, ISAAC, an English prelate, born in London 27 July, 1697. Being left an orphan, he was taken under the care of an aunt, who placed him on trial with a pastrycook; but he soon left that situation, and went to Scotland, with a view to the ministry among the Presbyterians. On his return to England he entered Queen's College, Cambridge, and was episcopally ordained, after which he rose rapidly, and in 1733 was made dean of Wells. In 1736 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph; from whence, in 1743, he was translated to Worcester, where he died 27 Sept., 1759. Bishop Madox published 'A Vindication of the Church of England,' in answer to Neal; and fourteen occasional sermons. He was a zealous promoter of hospitals, and a great encourager of trade.

MADOX, THOMAS, a legal antiquary and historiographer, who published, in 1702, 'A Collection of Charters taken from the Originals,' with the title of 'Formulare Anglicanum.' In 1711 appeared 'The History and Antiquities of the Exchequer,' folio, which was followed by his 'Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England.' The large collection of manuscripts formed by Mr. Madox is in the British Museum. Died 13 Jan., 1726-7.

MÆCENAS, CAIUS CILNIUS, the friend of Augustus, and an illustrious patron of letters, was descended from the kings of Hetruria, though his parents were only of the equestrian order. Of his early life no particulars are recorded, nor is any mention made of him till, on the death of Julius Cæsar, we find him acting as the counsellor of Octavius. He also distinguished himself at the battles of Modena and Philippi, soon after which he became the patron of Horace, who was indebted to him for the restoration of his estate. He was employed on several public occasions, insomuch that he was called Cæsar's right hand. But his greatest merit lay in the favour which he showed men of learning, of whom Virgil was the principal; and it was under the particular encouragement of Mæcenas that the poet published his Georgics and Æneid. He died in the year of Rome 745.

MÆSTLINUS, MICHAEL, an astronomer, was born in the duchy of Würtemberg about 1542. He went to Italy, where he became intimate with Galileo; and on his return to Germany he was chosen professor of mathematics at Tubingen, where he had Kepler for a pupil. He published several works. Died 1590.

MAFFEI, or MAFFÆUS, BERNARDINE, a learned cardinal, who died at Rome 16 July, 1553. He wrote a Commentary on Cæsar's Epistles, and a Treatise on Inscriptions and Medals.

MAFFEI, FRANCIS SCIPIO, an Italian marquis, born at Verona 1675. He served as a volunteer at the battle of Donawert; but he soon quitted the military life for literature. One of his first performances was a tractate against Duelling, and his next the tragedy of 'Merope,' which met with uncommon success. After this he produced a comedy called 'La Ceremonie,' which was also well received. One of his best pieces is an antiquarian work entitled 'Verona Illustrata.' He died 11 Feb., 1755; and his works have been published in 18 vols. 8vo.

MAFFEI, or MAFFÆUS, JOHN PETER, was born at Bergamo 1536. He became professor of eloquence at Genoa; but in 1565 he entered the Society of Jesus. The Portuguese government employed him in writing a History of their Conquests in the Indies. After this he obtained a place in the Vatican, for the purpose of continuing the annals of Gregory XIII. He died at Tivoli 20 Oct., 1603. The best edition of his 'Historia Indicarum' is in 2 vols. 4to., 1747. He also wrote a Life of St. Ignatius of Loyola.

MAGALHAENS, or MAGELLAN, FERNANDO, a Portuguese navigator, who served under Albuquerque, in 1510, after which he was entrusted with the command of a fleet, and sent to the Indies. In the course of this voyage he discovered the straits at the extremity of South America called by his name, and soon after took possession of the Ladrone and Philippine Islands, where he was killed by the natives 1521.

MAGALHAENS, JOHN HYACINTH DE, a descendant of the above, was born at Lisbon in 1723. He was a monk of the order of St. Augustine; but on secretly embracing the Protestant religion he came to England, where he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. He died at Islington 7 Feb., 1790. He published a work on mineralogy, and several pieces in natural philosophy and mathematics.

MAGEE, WILLIAM, an Irish prelate, entered Dublin university as a sizar, and in due course obtained a fellowship, having previously taken orders. In 1801 he published 'Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice.' This work, though more illustrative of its author's erudition than of his genius, led to his promotion in the church. In 1813 he was made dean of Cork, from which dignity he was advanced in 1819 to the see of Raphoe; and in 1822 he was translated to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin. Died 2 Aug., 1831. He rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to his Catholic fellow-countrymen, and never lost an opportunity of insulting the faith they professed.

MAGENDIE, FRANÇOIS, a physician and physiologist, born at Bordeaux 15 Oct., 1783. He studied medicine at Paris, where, at the age of 21, he was appointed demonstrator of anatomy. After graduating as doctor he abandoned surgery, and thenceforward chiefly devoted his attention to the study of medicine and physiology. He became a member of the Academy of Medicine on its formation in 1819, and two years later he was admitted into the Institute. In 1831 he was appointed professor of medicine in the College of France. He was also president of the Academy of Sciences, physician at the Hôtel Dieu, and president of the Committee of Public Health. Died 8 Oct., 1855. Magendie, as the acknowledged chief of the experimental school, exercised great influence over physiological studies. He made some important discoveries and published many able works, the principal being—'Éléments de Physiologie;' 'Mémoire sur plusieurs nouveaux organes propres aux oiseaux et aux reptiles;'

'Journal de Physiologie;' 'Leçons sur le système nerveux;' 'Recherches Physiologiques et Cliniques sur le liquide céphalorachidien, ou cérébro-spinale.' Magendie carried on vivisection to such an extent that the government had to interfere in order to check the cruel practice.

MAGINN, WILLIAM, LL.D., was born at Cork 11 Nov., 1794, being the son of a teacher of the classics. His father trained him so well, that at the early age of 10 he was qualified to enter Trinity College, Dublin, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1816. He was one of the earliest contributors to the 'Literary Gazette;' and, removing afterwards to Edinburgh, he contributed a large number of articles, overflowing with wit, humour, and classical allusion, to 'Blackwood' (1818-20). In 1823 he came to London, where he found constant employment for his fertile pen. He produced a romance entitled 'Whitehall;' contributed largely to most of the leading periodicals; and, in 1828, joined the staff of the 'Standard,' a Tory evening paper, with which he was more or less intimately connected until his death. He also wrote largely in 'Fraser's Magazine,' his contributions to which would of themselves suffice to establish his claim as an able critic and accomplished scholar. His irregular course of life involved him in pecuniary embarrassments, and he died, in reduced circumstances, at Walton-on-Thames 21 August, 1842.

MAGLIABECCHI, ANTONIO, an extraordinary character, born at Florence 28 Oct., 1633. He was placed, when a boy, as servant to a dealer in fruit, in which situation he discovered such a propensity to letters, that a bookseller took him into his employment, where his talents and memory made him so much talked of, that the grand duke appointed him his librarian. He lived in the midst of his books and spiders; nor could he be persuaded to leave his old apartment for one more commodious which the duke had provided for him. A threadbare cloak served him for a gown in the day, and a coverlid at night; and the only luxury in which he indulged was smoking. Died July 14, 1714.

MAGNOL, PIERRE, a French physician and botanist, born at Montpellier 1638; died 21 May, 1715.

MAGNUS, JOHN, archbishop of Upsal, in Sweden, was born 1488. He opposed the introduction of the Protestant religion, for which he was obliged to retire to Rome, where he died 1544. He wrote —'A History of Sweden,' and a History of the Archbishops of Upsal. His brother, Olaus Magnus, succeeded him in the archbishopric; but being persecuted for his attachment to the Catholic faith, he went to Italy, and was present at the council of Trent. He died 1568. He wrote 'A History of the Manners, Customs, and Wars of the People of the North.'

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, was born at Mecca, in Arabia, 10 Nov. A.D. 570, or 21 April, 571. He was of the noble tribe of Koreish; but being left a destitute orphan at the age of two years, the care of him devolved upon his uncle, Abu Taleb, a merchant. In his twenty-fifth year he entered the service of a rich widow, named Cadiga, who, three years afterwards, made him her husband. From the observations which he made in his trading journeys, he concluded that it would be easy to make himself master of the country if he could but institute a new religion. Animated with this notion, he began to put on the appearance of sanctity, by retiring every morning to a cave called Hira, where he continued in meditation all the day. After spending four years in this course, he ventured to promulgate the doctrines which he pretended to have received from above; but his converts, among whom was Cadiga, were at first very few. Mahomet, however, persevered in his assumed character of a prophet; and though his enemies were powerful he was protected from them by the influence of his uncle. In the mean time the impostor produced his chapters of the 'Koran,' which he said were brought to him by the angel Gabriel. This work, however, was the composition of Abdia Ebn Salon, a Persian Jew, and Sergius, a Nestorian monk. On the death of Abu Taleb, the situation of Mahomet became so critical, that he removed to Tayif, where another of his uncles resided; but after some time he returned, and, on the death of Cadiga, he took three other wives: Ayesha the daughter of Abubeker, Lewda the daughter of Zama, and Haphsa the daughter of Omar, all persons of weight at Mecca. In the twelfth year of his mission he ventured to bring forward his narrative of a pretended journey to heaven in one night; the extravagance of which story staggered his followers, and increased the number of his enemies to such a degree, that he was obliged to quit the city and take refuge at Medina, then called Yathreb, where he gave his daughter, Fatima, to Ali, and built a mosque. This removal to Medina is considered as the commencement of the Mohammedan establishment, and is therefore the era, thence called the Hegira or flight, from whence the Mussulmans compute their time. It corresponds with the 16th of July, A.D. 622. The prophet having now a town under his authority, told his followers that the religion which he came to settle must be propagated by the sword, and not by the word; and that all who would not receive it should be exterminated. Two things made this proposition acceptable; one the prospect of plunder, and the other the certainty of a voluptuous paradise. Accordingly the remainder of Mahomet's history is taken up with his wars on the hostile tribes of the Jewish persuasion. In 628 he took their city of Caibar, where a young woman, in preparing a shoulder of mutton for his supper, poisoned it, and though Mahomet on tasting it spit out again what he had taken into his mouth, he never recovered, and at the end of three years died of its effects. Before his death, however, he made himself master of Mecca, and thereby fully established Islamism in Arabia. He expired 8 June, 632, and was buried in the chamber where he died; over which a small chapel was afterwards erected.

MAHONY, CONSTANTINE, an Irish Jesuit, often called Cornelius à S. Patricio, was a native of Muskerry, co. Cork. Under the pseudonym of 'Constantinus Marullus' he published 'Disputatio Apologetica et Manifestiva de Jure Regni Hiberniæ pro Catholicis Hibernis adversos Hæreticos Anglos,' 4to., Frankfort, 1645. He was living at Lisbon 1650, being then very old.

MAHONY, FRANCIS, a journalist and littérateur, born at Cork 1805. After obtaining a thorough knowledge of Greek and Latin in a school in his native city he left Ireland, entered a Jesuit college at Paris, and subsequently prosecuted his studies at Rome. After some years he took holy orders, but his taste for literature led him to abandon his sacred calling; and, settling in London, he accepted an appointment on the staff of 'Fraser's Magazine.' His popular essays in that journal, under the nom de plume of 'Father Prout,' were published in a collected form in 1836, and again in 1860. Mr. Mahony also wrote some of the earliest and best papers in 'Bentley's Miscellany.' In 1846 he was appointed correspondent of the 'Daily News' in Rome, and, in 1849, he republished his letters, which were full of zeal for the revolutionary cause, under the title of 'Facts and Figures from Italy.' He was afterwards, for many years, the Paris correspondent of the 'Globe.' In 1864 he retired to a monastery in Paris, where he died 19 May, 1866.

MAI, ANGELO, a cardinal, and one of the ablest scholars of the nineteenth century, was born at Schilpario, near Bergamo, 7 May, 1782. At an early age he entered the noviciate in the Society of Jesus, though he eventually took orders as a secular priest. He first rose to distinction in the republic of letters in 1812, when he was appointed keeper of the Ambrosian library at Milan. In 1819 he was removed to the Vatican library at Rome, of which he became principal librarian on the decease of Cardinal Lambruschini. He was raised to the purple 1838; and died at Albano 9 Sept., 1854. Both at Milan and Rome, Mai made important discoveries of classical works in 'palimpsest' manuscripts, that is, manuscripts from which the original writing had been erased or washed out, and which had then been written on again. Of the works thus recovered by him the most important is Cicero's treatise 'De Republicâ,' which he discovered at the Vatican in a MS. which had been re-written with St. Augustine's commentary on the Psalms. He also recovered in a similar manner fragments of Cornelius Fronto, Plautus, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Eusebius, and Homer, which he published and illustrated with learned notes and commentaries. The whole of his labours were reprinted in two collections, viz., 'Classici Auctores e Vaticanis Codicibus editi,' 10 vols. 8vo., 1828-38; and 'Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio, e Vaticanis Codicibus edita,' 10 vols. 4to., 1825-38. His Eminence also prepared an edition of the famous 'Codex Vaticanus,' but died before the completion of the work, which was published by Father Vercellone 1857. Cardinal Mai's magnificent library has been added to that of the Vatican.

MAIANO, BENEDETTO DA, an Italian sculptor and architect, born at Florence 1444; died 1498.

MAIANO, GIULIANO DI NARDO DA, uncle of the preceding, was also a celebrated architect, and executed some admirable works at Florence, Naples, and Rome. He died after 1471.

MAIGNAN, EMMANUEL, a Minim friar of Toulouse, celebrated as a mathematician, was born 1601, and died 1676. His chief works are 'Perspectiva Horaria' and 'Cursus Philosophicus.'

MAILLEBOIS, JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS DESMARETS, Marquis DE, a French general, born at Paris 1682, being the son of Nicolas Desmarets, comptroller-general of the finances. He reduced Corsica to the dominion of France, for which he received a marshal's baton. Afterwards he served with reputation in Germany, but in 1746 was defeated at the battle of Placentia by Count Brown. Died 7 Feb., 1762.

MAILLEBOIS, YVES MARIE DESMARETS, Comte DE, a French general, son of the above, was born 1715. He commanded with success in Germany, and in 1784 was sent to Holland, to support the party there which was opposed to Prussia. At the commencement of the Revolution he left France; and died at Liège 14 Dec., 1791.

MAILLET, BENOÎT DE, a French writer, born at St. Mihiel 1656. He was for sixteen years consul-general in Egypt, and afterwards filled the same situation at Leghorn. Died 1738. He wrote a whimsical work on the origin of the earth, published under the anagrammatic pseudonym of Telliamed; and a Description of Egypt.

MAIMBOURG, LOUIS, a Jesuit, was born at Nancy, in Lorraine, 1610. By a decree of Pope Innocent XI. he was expelled the society for asserting the liberties of the Gallican Church against the authority of the court of Rome; but Louis XIV. made him ample amends by giving him a pension. He died at Paris 13 Aug., 1686. His works, several of which have been translated into English, are A History of Arianism; History of the Iconoclasts; History of the Crusades; History of the League; History of Lutheranism; History of Calvinism; History of the English Schism.

MAIMONIDES, MOSES, or MOSES, BEN MAIMON, a rabbi, whom the Jews call the 'eagle of the doctors,' was born at Cordova about 1131. He was a physician in Egypt, where he attended the Sultan, and had a number of disciples. Died 1204. His works are the 'Mischna Terah;' the 'More Nevochim;' and the 'Peruschim.' The first is a code of the Jewish law; the second, which was originally written in Arabic, is an explanation of obscure places in Scripture; and the last consists of commentaries on the Mishna.

MAINTENON, FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, Marchioness DE, was born 27 Nov., 1635, in the prison of Niort, where her father, Constans D'Aubigné, was confined. On his release he went with his family to Martinique, and died there in 1646, leaving his widow so poor, that she returned to Europe without this child, who was sent after her to France, and there taken under the protection of her aunt, Madame Villette, who was a Protestant. Another relation, however, who was a Catholic, forcibly removed her, and compelled her to profess the ancient religion, though not without much severe treatment; to escape from which she married the noted Scarron. On his death, in 1660, she obtained the continuance of his pension through the interest of Madame de Montespan, who also appointed her governess of the children which she had by Louis XIV. This connection brought her merits under the observation of the monarch, who increased her pension; and in 1679 changed her name to Maintenon, by giving her an estate with that title. In 1685 she was secretly married to the king; but never assumed the royal dignity. About this time she founded the religious society of St. Cyr, in the park of Versailles. The only amusement at this place was of the dramatic kind, and even that consisted of piecestaken from the Scripture; the principal of them being written by Racine. Died 15 April, 1719. Her letters have been printed in 9 vols.; and the Memoirs of her Life, in 3 vols.

MAIRE. See LEMAIRE.

MAIRE, CHRISTOPHER, was born of a respectable family in the county of Durham 6 March, 1697; entered the Society of Jesus 1715, and took the four vows 1733. After teaching humanities at St.

Omer, and philosophy and divinity at Liege, he was appointed rector of the English college at Rome, and held that office till 1750. He was an able mathematician, and made, partly in conjunction with Father Boscovich, a map of the States of the Church, published at Rome 1755. His death occurred at Ghent 22 Feb., 1767.—Oliver.

MAIRE, WILLIAM, a Catholic prelate, was consecrated bishop of Cinna, appointed coadjutor to Francis Petre, vicar apostolic of the northern district of England, 1767; and died 25 July, 1769.

MAISTRE. See LEMAISTRE.

MAISTRE, JOSEPH, comte DE, a political and religious writer, born at Chambéry, of French parents, 1 April, 1753. At a comparatively early age he became a member of the senate of Savoy, and published some political treatises, in which he predicted the French revolution, pointing out the causes which would bring about that deplorable catastrophe. His 'Considérations sur la France,' 1796, obtained a European reputation. When King Charles Emanuel was compelled to quit Piedmont, and take refuge in the island of Sardinia, De Maistre accompanied him, and was appointed his grand chancellor (1799). In 1803 he was sent ambassador to St. Petersburg, and he exercised considerable influence over the Russian court during the fourteen years he remained there. On his return his sovereign conferred upon him several exalted dignities. Died 25 Feb., 1821. Both as politician and author he was constantly occupied in opposing the principles of modern philosophy and upholding those of the Church of Rome. Of his works, which are written in a vigorous style, the best known is the treatise 'Du Pape' (1819), in which he earnestly advocates the infallibility of the Pope, against the opinions of the 'Gallican' school. By way of sequel to this work he published another 'De l'Eglise Gallicane dans ses rapports avec le Souverain Pontife.' His 'Soirées de St. Petersbourg, ou entretiens sur le gouvernement temporal de la Providence,' were published in 1821, shortly after the author's decease; and his 'Examen de la Philosophie de Bacon' did not appear till 1836.

MAISTRE, XAVIER, comte DE, brother of the preceding, was born at Chambéry 1764. He entered the service of the king of Sardinia, but when Savoy was conquered by the French he went to Russia. He distinguished himself in the war against Persia, and attained the rank of major-general, after which he devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits. His first work, a philosophical trifle entitled 'Voyage autour de ma Chambre,' 1794, became so popular, that he published a sequel to it, under the title of 'Expédition nocturne autour de ma Chambre.' In 1811 came out his 'Lépreux de la cité d'Aoste,' a pathetic tale founded on fact; which was followed by 'Le Prisonnier du Caucase,' and 'Prascovie, ou la jeune Sibérienne,' two novels containing truthful pictures of scenery and manners in the eastern and southern provinces of the Russian empire. He died at St. Petersburg 12 June, 1852.

MAITLAND. See LAUDERDALE.

MAITLAND, Sir FREDERICK LEWIS, a British admiral, born in Fifeshire 1779. He entered the navy at an early age, and greatly distinguished himself as captain, successively, of the Loire and the Emerald. When Napoleon, after the battle of Waterloo, fled to Rochefort, and there formed numerous plans for his escape by sea, they were entirely frustrated by the watchfulness of Capt. Maitland, then in command of the Bellerophon, to whom the great warrior surrendered unconditionally 15 July, 1815. Capt. Maitland became in due course a rear-admiral and commander-in-chief in the East Indies. He died at sea, near Bombay, 30 Dec., 1839.

MAITLAND, JOHN, lord of Thirlestone, was the second son of Sir Richard Maitland, and born about 1537. He succeeded his father as privy seal, of which place he was afterwards deprived for his attachment to Queen Mary. In 1581 he was made senator of the College of Justice; and in 1585 chancellor of Scotland. In 1590 he was created Lord Maitland of Thirlestone. Died 4 Oct., 1595. His works are 'Epigrammata Latina;' A Satire against Slander; An Admonition to the Regent Mar.

MAITLAND, Sir RICHARD, a Scotch poet, born 1496. He became one of the lords of session, and held that office when deprived of sight. The title assumed by him as a judge was that of Lord Lethington; and in 1562 he was appointed privy seal, which place he resigned in 1567, as he afterwards did his judicial seat. Died 20 March, 1586. His Poems were printed at Glasgow 1830, under the editorship of J. Bain.

MAITLAND, SAMUEL ROFFEY, D.D., born about 1792, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1816. Afterwards he was called to the bar; but, abandoning the legal profession, he took orders in 1821. Archbishop Howley gave him the appointment of librarian and keeper of the MSS. in Lambeth Palace, and in 1848 conferred upon him the degree of D.D., in recognition of his services. Dr. Maitland was a F.R.S. and F.S.A. He was a voluminous writer, and among his works may be mentioned, 'Two Inquiries into the grounds on which the prophetic period of Daniel and St. John has been supposed to consist of 1260 years;' 'Attempts to elucidate the Prophecies concerning Antichrist;' 'Strictures on Milner's Church History;' 'Letters in reference to the "Tracts for the Times";' a 'Series of Essays intended to illustrate the State of Religion and Literature in the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th centuries;' 'Essays connected with the Reformation in England;' 'Essays on subjects connected with the Nature, History, and Destiny of Man;' 'An Index to such printed books, printed before the year 1600, as are in the archiepiscopal library at Lambeth;' and 'An Essay on Chatterton.' Dr. Maitland died 19 Jan., 1866.

MAITLAND, WILLIAM, F.R.S., F.S.A., a topographer, born at Brechin about 1693. His original business was that of a travelling dealer in hair; but afterwards he settled in London, where he became a member of the Royal Society and that of Antiquaries. He died at Montrose 16 July, 1757. His works are A History of London, compiled from Stow, folio; A History of Edinburgh, folio; The History and Antiquities of Scotland, 2 vols. folio.

MAITTAIRE, MICHAEL, was born in London 1668. He received his education at Westminster School, from whence he removed to a studentship in Christ Church, Oxford. He took his master's degree in 1696, at which time he was second master of Westminster School, but resigned that place 1699 to devote himself to private teaching and literary pursuits. Died 7 Aug., 1747. His principal works are Græcæ Linguæ Dialecti, 8vo.;

An English Grammar; Stephanorum Historia, vitas ipsorum ac libros complectans; Annales Typographici, 5 vols.; Opera et fragmenta veterum Poetarum, 2 vols.; an edition of the Greek Testament; editions of Latin Classics; Batrachomyomachia Græce et Lat.; Miscellanea Græcorum aliquot Scriptorum Carmina, cum versione Lat.; an edition of Anacreon; Antiquæ Inscriptiones duæ; Senilia, sive Poetica.

MAIUS, or MAY, JOHN HENRY, a Lutheran divine, born at Pfortzheim, in Baden Durlach, 1653; died at Giessen 3 Sept., 1719. Among his works are a History of the Animals mentioned in Scripture; a Life of John Reuchlin; a History of the Reformation; Philological and Exegetical Dissertations.

MAJOR, or MAIR, JOHN, D.D., an historian and logician, born at Cleghorn, in the parish of North Berwick, in Scotland, 1469. He studied for a year in Christ's College, Cambridge, and in 1493 went to Paris, where he was created a doctor of the Sorbonne 1505. Returning to Scotland, he taught theology, for a time, at Glasgow; but, on account of the troubled state of the country, he soon went back to France. About 1520 he again crossed the sea, and was appointed professor of divinity, and provost of the college of t. Salvador, in the university of St. Andrews. He died soon after the year 1547. Major is now chiefly known by his work, 'De Gestis Scotorum, seu Historia Majoris Britanniæ,' published first in 1521, and reprinted in 1740. Of his other works, most of which are on logic, a collected edition was published at Lyons, 1514.—Athen. Cantab.

MAJOR, JOHN DANIEL, a physician, born at Breslau 1634; became professor at Kiel, where he founded a botanic garden; died at Stockholm 13 Aug., 1693. He wrote many works on medical and antiquarian subjects.

MAJORIANUS, JULIUS VALERIUS, was elected Emperor of the West 457. He successfully waged war against the Vandals, and was universally respected for his virtues. He was murdered 7 Aug., 461.

MALAGRIDA, GABRIEL, an Italian Jesuit, who was sent by his superiors to Lisbon, where he was regarded as a saint, till he involved himself in the conspiracy of the duke d'Aveiro, when he was sent to the prison of the Inquisition, where he pretended to visions and prophecy, for which he was burnt alive 21 Sept., 1761, at the age of 75. He published some works, which savoured strongly of madness.

MALAKOFF, Marshal PELISSIER, DUC DE, a French military commander, born 1794; died 22 May, 1804. In 1845 his name acquired a most unenviable notoriety in consequence of a fearful act of military atrocity committed by him in Algeria. One of the hostile Arab tribes, finding themselves hotly pressed by the French under Pelissier, retreated, with their families, cattle, and stores, to some immense caverns. These caverns were surrounded, and an attempt was made to smoke the tribe, 500 in number, out of their retreat by placing lighted straw at the entrances. The Arabs refusing to surrender, it was decided to destroy these poor wretches by suffocating them. This was accordingly done, and the whole tribe perished. The event excited much indignation throughout all Europe. In 1855 Pelissier was sent to the East, to take part in the Crimean war, and he soon succeeded Marshal Canrobert in the chief command. Subsequently he was created duke of Malakoff, was sent ambassador to London, and appointed governor of Algeria.

MALCOLM, JAMES PELLER, F.S.A., an artist and antiquary, was a native of America, from whence he came to London when young, in order to study painting at the Royal Academy, but failing in that line, he had recourse to engraving, and executed a number of topographical plates, chiefly for the works of Mr. Gough and Mr. Nichols. He also published 'Londinum Redivivum; or an ancient and modern Description of London,' 4 vols.; 'Letters between the Rev. James Granger and many eminent Men;' 'First Impressions, or Sketches from Art and Nature;' 'Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London;' 'Miscellaneous Anecdotes;' and 'An Historical Sketch of the Art of Caricaturing.' Died 5 April, 1815.

MALCOLM, Sir JOHN, was born 2 May, 1769, near Langholm, in Dumfries-shire, and in 1782 went out as a cadet to the East Indies. He was present at the taking of Seringapatam, and of the Cape of Good Hope; and subsequently was sent upon a diplomatic mission to the court of Persia. On his return to Calcutta he was made private secretary to the governor-general; and in June, 1805, was appointed chief agent of the governor-general, which office he held till March, 1806, having in the course of that period concluded several important treaties with the native princes. He was also employed in several important missions under Lord Minto, and on the occasion of a third visit to Persia, in 1810, the Shah made him a khan, and sepahdar of the empire. On his return to England (1812) he received the honour of knighthood, and was thanked and rewarded by the directors of the East India Company. He returned to India 1816, and remained there till 1822, having in the meantime greatly distinguished himself both by his political and military services, particularly by his conduct at the battle of Mehedpoor, for which he received the thanks of the House of Commons, and a grant of £1000 per annum from the East India Company. In 1827 he went out as governor of Bombay, where he remained till 1831. In the latter year he was returned to parliament for Launceston; but he did not succeed in procuring a seat in the House after the dissolution of 1832. He died in London 30 April, 1833. As an author, he is chiefly known by his 'History of Persia,' 2 vols., 1815. He also wrote a 'Sketch of the Sikhs;' 'Memoir of Central India;' 'Political History of India, from 1784 to 1823;' 'The Government of India;' and a Life of Lord Clive.

MALDONAT, JOHN, a Spanish Jesuit and biblical commentator, born 1534; died at Rome 5 Jan., 1583.

MALEBRANCHE, NICOLAS, a French philosopher, born at Paris 6 Aug., 1638. After studying in the Sorbonne, he became a member of the congregation of the Oratory, and devoted himself to metaphysics and the Cartesian philosophy. Died 13 Oct., 1715. His works are 'De la Recherche de la Vérité,' 1674; 'Conversations Chrétiennes;' Traité de la Nature et de la Grace; Entretien sur le Métaphysique et la Religion; Traité de l'Amour de Dieu; Entretiens d'un Philosophe Chrétien, et d'un Philosophe Chinois sur l'existence et la nature de Dieu.

MALESHERBES, CHRÉTIEN GUILLAUME DE LAMOIGNON DE, was born at Paris 6 Dec., 1721. He succeeded his father as president of the Court of Aids; besides which he had the superintendence of the press, in which office he acted with great lenity. In 1771, on the abolition of the legal constitution, Malesherbes was banished to his country seat; but he was recalled three years afterwards, and made minister of state, which post he soon resigned, and then went to Switzerland. In 1786 he was again consulted on the state of the nation; but, considering it as irretrievable, he retired to his country house, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits. From thence, however, he hastened, of his own accord, to plead the cause of his sovereign, in 1792; and he was one of the last who took leave of him before his execution. The fate of this loyal subject was now determined; but he awaited it with fortitude, and suffered on the scaffold, with his daughter and her child, 22 April, 1794. He wrote 'An Essay on Rural Economy,' and some Memoirs on the state of France.

MALHERBE, FRANÇOIS DE, a French poet, born at Caen about 1555. He was introduced at court by Cardinal du Perron, and enrolled among the pensioners of Henry IV. and of Mary de Medicis. His works are still in estimation. Died 16 Oct., 1628.

MALIBRAN, MARIA FELICITA, a highly-accomplished vocalist, was born at Paris 24 March, 1808, being the daughter of Signor Garcia, a tenor at the Italian Opera, who compelled her from infancy to practise singing. In 1825 she made her debut in London in the character of 'Rosina' in 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia,' and she next played the part of 'Felicia' in 'Le Crociato in Egitto.' Towards the close of the same year she sang at the York Musical Festival, but with little success; and in 1826 she accompanied her father to New York, where she became the wife of F. E. Malibran, a French merchant and banker of great reputed wealth, who, however, became bankrupt within a year of their marriage. A separation ensued, and Madame Malibran arrived at Paris in 1827 without any means of subsistence. On 12 Jan., 1828, she made her first bow to a French audience at the Grand Opera, as 'Sémiramide' in Rossini's opera of that name. It would be impossible to describe the enthusiasm she evoked; she was at once engaged as prima donna at the Théâtre Italien; and from that moment her professional career was a continued series of ever-increasing successes and triumphs. She appeared successively at Rome, Milan, Venice, and Naples; and in 1835 returned to London, where her performances at Drury Lane were hailed with the most unbounded applause. The next year she again visited Paris, where, her first marriage having been declared void, she married M. de Beriot, a celebrated Belgian violinist. This highly-gifted artiste was seized with illness at the musical festival at Manchester, on 14 Sept., 1836, and died on the 23rd of that month. On her arrival in London in the preceding April she had fallen from her horse, and this accident may have contributed to hasten her death. Such was the premature end of the most remarkable singer mentioned in the annals of music. She was interred with great pomp at Manchester, but her remains were eventually conveyed to Belgium, and deposited in the cemetery at Laeken.

MALINGRE, CLAUDE, a French historian, born at Sens about 1580; died about 1653.

MALLET, or MALLOCH, DAVID, was born at Crieff, Perthshire, about 1700. He became a tutor in the family of the duke of Montrose; and, having made the tour of Europe, settled in London, where he altered his name to Mallet. His first publication was the ballad of 'William and Margaret;' which was followed by 'The Excursion,' a poem; and in 1731 he produced the tragedy of 'Eurydice.' Soon after this he formed an acquaintance with Pope, who introduced him to Bolingbroke; and about the same time he was appointed under-secretary to the prince of Wales. In 1739 his play of 'Mustapha' was performed with success; and the next year he wrote, in conjunction with Thomson, the masque of 'Alfred.' On the death of Pope, Mallet was employed by Bolingbroke to vilify his memory, for which that nobleman rewarded the time-server by the bequest of his own works. This man also received a legacy of 500*l.* from the duchess of Marlborough, to write the life of her husband; but he never fulfilled the engagement; and, if anything could add to his infamy, it was that of publishing libels against Byng, while that unfortunate admiral was on his trial; for which the calumniator was rewarded with a pension and a place. He was a determined infidel, and died 21 April, 1765. Besides his plays and poems, he wrote a Life of Lord Bacon.

MALLET, PAUL HENRY, an historian, born at Geneva 1730, and, after being professor of the belles-lettres at Copenhagen, was elected to the chair of history in his native city, where he died 8 Feb., 1807. His 'Introduction to the History of Denmark' was translated by Bishop Percy, who published it under the title of 'Northern Antiquities,' 2 vols., 1770; 1 vol., 1847. Mallet also wrote histories of Denmark, of Hesse, of the House of Brunswick, of Switzerland, and of the Hanseatic League.

MALLET DU PAN. See DU PAN.

MALMESBURY, JAMES HARRIS, EARL OF, was the son of the author of 'Hermes,' and born at Salisbury 9 April, 1746. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he was created doctor of civil law 1793. He began his diplomatic career at the court of Spain, and in 1772 went as envoy to Berlin. In 1776 he was appointed minister at St. Petersburg, and in 1779 received the order of the Bath. In 1784 he was sworn a member of the privy council, and the same year went as ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Hague. In 1788 he was created Baron Malmesbury, and in 1795 he concluded the marriage of the prince of Wales and the princess of Brunswick, whom he accompanied to England. The year following he was appointed to negotiate with the ministers of the French republic at Lisle, but without effect. He was raised to the earldom in 1800, and in 1807 was made lord lieutenant of Hampshire, and governor of the Isle of Wight. He died 21 Nov., 1820. His lordship published Introduction to the 'History of the Dutch Republic;' 'The works of James Harris,' esq., with Memoirs of his Life, 2 vols. His Diaries and Correspondence were published 1844.

MALMESBURY, WILLIAM OF, an English historian, was born in Somersetshire about 1095, and educated at Oxford; after which he entered the abbey of Malmesbury. He wrote a work entitled 'Gesta Regum Anglorum,' from 449 to 1143, published with a church history of England, in Savile's Collection, 1596; and again by Sir T. D. Hardy, 2 vols., 1840. He was likewise the author of the 'Antiquities of Glastonbury,' printed by Gale; and of the 'Life of St. Aldhelm,' published by Wharton. Died about 1143.

MALONE, EDMUND, the son of an Irish judge, was born at Dublin 4 Oct., 1741. He was educated at the university of his native city, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and in 1767 was called to the bar; but being possessed of an independent fortune, he retired from the profession, and devoted himself to literature. In 1780 he published two supplementary volumes to Steevens's Shakspeare, and a detection of Chatterton's forgeries. In 1790 appeared his edition of Shakspeare, and in 1795 he exposed the imposture of the Irelands. In 1797 he published the life of Sir Joshua Reynolds; in 1800 that of Dryden, prefixed to an edition of his prose works; and in 1808 he printed the Life and Tracts of William Gerard Hamilton; and in 1811 a Biographical Sketch of the Right. Hon. William Windham. Died 25 May, 1812.

MALONE, WILLIAM, a Jesuit, was a native of Dublin, and died at Seville Aug., 1656, æt. 70. He wrote 'A Reply to Mr. James Usher his Answere,' 1627.

MALOUIN, PAUL JACQUES, a French physician and chemist, born at Caen 1701; died 1778.

MALPIGHI, MARCELLUS, a physician, born at Crevalcuore, near Bologna, 10 March, 1628, was professor of medicine successively at Bologna, Pisa, and Messina; but in 1691, on being appointed physician to Pope Innocent XII., he removed to Rome, where he died 29 Nov., 1694. All his works, physiological, anatomical, and botanical, were printed at London, 2 vols., 1686; and again at Amsterdam, 1687; and another edition, more complete, at Venice, 1733.

MALTBY, EDWARD, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Norwich 1770, and studied under Dr. Parr in the grammar school of his native city, where he laid the foundation of those accomplishments which made him one of the best scholars of his day. He was next sent to Winchester School, and from thence to Pembroke College, Cambridge, where his academical career was most brilliant. Soon after taking orders he was appointed chaplain to Bishop Pretyman, of Lincoln, and from 1824 to 1833 he was preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He was made bishop of Chichester 1831; translated to Durham 1836; resigned the latter see and retired into private life on a pension of 4500*l.* a year 1856; and died 3 July, 1859. Bishop Maltby published 'Illustrations of the Truth of the Christian Religion,' 1802; an edition of Morell's 'Thesaurus,' or, as he termed it, 'Lexicon Græco-Prosodiacum,' 1815; 'A New and Complete Greek Gradus,' 1830; and some volumes of Sermons.

MALTE-BRUN, CONRAD, a French geographer, was born 12 Aug., 1775, at Thisted, in Jutland, and died 14 Dec., 1826, at Paris, where he had spent the last thirty years of his life, being highly distinguished for his geographical learning and literary abilities. Having given offence by his political writings, he was banished from his native country (1796), whence he repaired to Sweden, and subsequently to France. He published, 'Géographie Mathématique, Physique, et Politique,' in collaboration with Mentelle, 16 vols., 1803-5; 'Tableau de la Pologne ancienne et moderne;' 'Précis de la Géographie Universelle,' 7 vols., 1820-27, which has been translated into English; besides various political works and poems. He was also a contributor to the 'Biographie Universelle.'

MALTHUS, THOMAS ROBERT, a political economist, born at Albury, Surrey, 1766. He graduated with distinction at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship and took holy orders. In 1798 he published anonymously his 'Treatise on Population,' but put his name to a fourth edition of the work, which appeared in 1803. In 1804 he was appointed professor of history and political economy at Haileybury College, and held that situation till his death, which took place at Bath 29 Dec., 1834. In addition to the above-mentioned work, Mr. Malthus was the author of various pieces relating to political economy, but his Treatise on Population is that by which he will be chiefly remembered. The title of the 6th and last revision is 'An Essay on the Principle of Population, or a View of its past and present Effects on Human Happiness, with an Inquiry into our Prospects respecting the future Removal or Mitigation of the Evils which it occasions,' 1826. The doctrine which he there lays down, of refusing assistance to poverty, for the purpose of preventing over-population, which he insists upon as the cause of all the evil and misery that is apparent, has not been without advocates; but it has met with a greater number of opponents, and among them some of the ablest writers on the subject.

MALUS, ÉTIENNE LOUIS, a mathematician, born at Paris 23 June, 1775. He became a professor in the military school at Metz after which he served as an engineer in the army, and went to Egypt, where he discovered a new branch of the Nile. He also drew a map of the country, on which he wrote a memoir, inserted in the 'Décade Egyptienne.' After distinguishing himself in several actions, he returned to Europe, and in 1811 obtained the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society, for his discoveries and experiments on double refraction. He was director of the Polytechnic school, a major of engineers, and superintendent of the fortifications. Died 23 Feb., 1812.

MALVEZZI, VIRGILIO, an Italian marquis and scholar, who was sent to London as ambassador from Philip IV. of Spain. He wrote 'Discourses upon Tacitus,' and several other works, which have been translated into English. Born at Bologna 1599; died 11 Aug., 1654.

MAMBRUN, PIERRE, a French Jesuit and Latin poet, born 1581 died 31 Oct., 1661.

MAN, CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch painter, born at Delft 1621; died 1706.

MANARA, PROSPERO, Marquis DI, an Italian poet and statesman, born at Taro, in the duchy of Parma, 14 April, 1714; died at Parma 2 Feb., 1800.

MANBY, Captain GEORGE WILLIAM, F.R.S., the inventor of several kinds of apparatus for saving the lives of shipwrecked mariners, was born at Hilgay, Norfolk, 28 Nov., 1765, and died at Southtown, near Great Yarmouth, 18 Nov., 1854. For his humane inventions he received from government sums amounting in the aggregate to about 7,000*l.* Captain Manby must also be numbered among our topographical writers, he having published in 1801 'The History and Antiquities of the Parish of St. David, South Wales.' His other publications are, 'Sketches of the History and Natural Beauties of Clifton,' 1802; 'Guide from Clifton, through the counties of Monmouth, Glamorgan, and Brecknock,' 1802; 'On the Preservation of Shipwrecked Persons,' 1812; and 'Journal of a Voyage to Greenland in 1821,' 4to., 1822, and again 1823.

MANBY, PETER, dean of Derry, in Ireland, turned Catholic in the reign of James II., and published several pieces in defence of his adopted faith. Died 1697.

MANCINELLI, ANTONIO, an Italian grammarian and poet, born at Veletri 1452; died at Rome about 1506. The story of his having had his hands cut off and his tongue plucked out by order of Pope Alexander VI. is a fiction.

MANCINI, LAURA BEATRICE, a Neapolitan lady, the wife of Pasquale Stanislao Mancini, died 1869. A volume of her poems was published in 1861, and she was also the author of 'Ines de Castro,' a tragedy.

MANDEVILE, Sir JOHN, an English traveller, born at St. Alban's about 1300. He left his native country 1322, and did not return till 1356, to the surprise of his friends, who thought he had been long dead. He went abroad again soon afterwards, and died at Liege 17 Nov., 1371. His travels in Tartary, the Holy Land, and India, were published in 1568, 4to., and again in 1727, 8vo. The narrative is entertaining, but full of romantic stories.

MANDEVILLE, BERNARD DE, M.D., was born in Holland about 1670. He came to England at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and obtained notice by some works which indicated considerable ingenuity, mixed with much extravagance. They are: 'The Virgin unmasked,' 1709; 'A Treatise on the Hypochondriac and Hysteric Passions;' 'The Grumbling Hive, or Knaves turned honest,' afterwards entitled, 'The Fable of the Bees,' 1723; 'Free Thoughts on Religion;' An Inquiry into the Origin of Honour, and usefulness of Christianity in War. His 'Fable of the Bees' was attacked by several writers, particularly Bishop Berkeley, in his 'Alciphron,' to whom Mandeville replied. Died 21 Jan., 1733.

MANES, the founder of a sect about the year 267. He obtained the tenets which made his name famous from the books of Scythianus, an Arabian, who maintained two co-eternal principles, one good and the other evil. Upon this stock Manes set up as an hæresiarch, blending with the philosophy of Scythianus, or rather of Empedocles, some notions partly Christian and partly heathen. He also pretended to the gift of healing; but failing to cure the son of the king of Persia, he was flayed alive, after which his body was given to the dogs, A.D. 278.

MANETHO, an Egyptian historian, who was high priest of Heliopolis, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote the history of his country in Greek, and pretended to have taken it from the sacred inscriptions on the pillars of Hermes Trismegistus.

MANFRED, or MAINFROI, prince of Tarentum, and king of the Two Sicilies by usurpation, was born about 1231, being an illegitimate son of the Emperor Frederick II. On the death of his brother Conrad (1254) he was charged with the administration of the kingdom during the minority of Conradin, and he availed himself of this position to assume the sovereignty. Excommunicated by Urban IV., who preached a crusade against him, he fell at the battle of Grandella, near Benevento, 26 Feb., 1266, where his army was vanquished by Charles, count of Anjou, who succeeded him.

MANFREDI, EUSTACHIO, an astronomer, born at Bologna 20 Sept., 1674; died there 15 Feb., 1739.

MANGEY, THOMAS, D.D., a divine, was born at Leeds 1684, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1707; M.A. 1711; LL.D. 1719; D.D. 1725). He was successively rector of St. Nicholas, Guildford, and St. Mildred, Bread Street, London, preacher at Lincoln's Inn, prebendary of Durham, and vicar of Ealing, Middlesex. Died 6 March, 1755. His principal works are, Discourses on the Lord's Prayer; Remarks on Toland's Nazarenus; and an edition of Philo Judæus, 2 vols. fol.

MANILIUS, MARCUS, a Latin poet, whose age is uncertain, some placing him in the time of Augustus, and others, with more probability, in the reign of Theodosius the Great. His poem, entitled 'Astronomicon,' was first published at Bologna in 1474.

MANIN, DANIELE, an Italian politician and revolutionary leader, born at Venice 1804. He became an advocate, and was highly popular among the opponents of the Austrian domination. At the time of the outbreak of the French revolution he was in prison at Venice, having been arbitrarily arrested by the Austrian police; but the people rose and set him at liberty, whereupon he, with Tomaseo, put himself at the head of the national movement, proclaimed the republic of Venice, and drove out the Austrians, who subsequently besieged the city, which gallantly held out against them from Aug., 1848, to Aug., 1849. On the termination of this memorable siege, Manin withdrew to Paris, where he gained a livelihood by teaching Italian. He died at Paris 22 Sept., 1857.

MANLEY, Mrs. MARY, was born at Guernsey, of which island her father, Sir Roger Manley, was governor. He wrote 'Commentarii de Rebellione Anglicana,' 1686; and a History of the War of Denmark. The daughter was left by her parents in the care of a cousin, who seduced, and then abandoned her. She now had recourse to her pen for a support, and in 1696 produced a tragedy, called 'The Royal Mischief,' which brought her into notice. After this she published a work, entitled 'The New Atalantis,' in which she satirised many persons of rank, and was in consequence brought before the privy-council, but escaped punishment. She next assisted Swift in writing the 'Examiner,' and in 1717 brought out another tragedy, called 'Lucius.' In the latter part of her life she became the mistress of Alderman Barber, and died 11 July, 1724.

MANNERS, JOHN, an English Jesuit, born in London 1609; died after 1676. He wrote 'The Unwearied Searcher,' a controversial work, 8vo., Lond., 1670.

MANNERS, JOHN, Marquis of Granby. See GRANBY.

MANNERT, CONRAD, a German historical and geographical writer, born 17 April, 1756, at Altdorf; died 27 Sept., 1834, at Munich, where he was professor of history. One of the best-known of his numerous works is an excellent 'Geography of the Greeks and Romans,' written in collaboration with Uckert.

MANNI, DOMENICO MARIA, a celebrated printer, grammarian, and antiquary, born 8 April, 1690, at Florence, where he died 30 Nov., 1788.

MANNING, OWEN, was born at Orlingbury, Northamptonshire, 11 Aug., 1721. He received his education at Queen's College, Cambridge, of which society he became fellow. He took the degree of B.D. in 1753, and in 1760 obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. In 1763 he was presented to the vicarage of Godalming, Surrey, and, in 1769, to the rectory of Pepperharrow, in the same county. Died 9 Sept., 1801. Mr. Manning published the Saxon Dictionary, begun by Mr. Edward Lye; also Illustrations of the Will of Alfred; and two sermons. After his death appeared his History and Antiquities of the County of Surrey, completed by Mr. Bray, in 3 vols. fol.

MANNING, ROBERT, a Catholic divine, received his education in the English college at Douay, where he was some time professor of humanity and philosophy. Afterwards he returned to this country on the mission, and died in Essex 4 March, 1730-1. He wrote 'Modern Controversy; or, a plain and rational account of the Catholick Faith,' 1720; 'England's Conversion and Reformation compared,' 1725; 'A Single Combat; or, a personal dispute between Mr. Trapp and his anonymous Antagonist.'

MANNOCK, JOHN, an English Benedictine, called in religion Father Anselm, resided for many years at Foxcote, in Warwickshire, where he was chaplain to the Canning family. He died 30 Nov., 1764. His 'Poor Man's Catechism' appeared first in 1752, and has since passed through numerous editions in England, Ireland, and America. He likewise wrote 'The Poor Man's Controversy.' Several of his MS. volumes are preserved at the college of Downside, near Bath.

MANNYNG, or DE BRUNNE, ROBERT, the first English poet who occurs in the fourteenth century, was probably born before 1270, as he was received into the order of Black Canons at Brunne about 1288. His first work was a metrical paraphrase of the 'Manuel Pecche,' by Grostete, bishop of Lincoln; but his most important performance is a metrical chronicle of England, the second part of which was published by Tom Hearne.

MANSART, FRANÇOIS, a French architect, born 1598; died Sept., 1666. His nephew, Jules Hardouin Mansart (b. 1645; d. 1708), was also an excellent architect, and the superintendent of the royal buildings.

MANSFELD, PETER ERNEST, COUNT DE, a German statesman and soldier, born 1517. He was made prisoner in 1552 at Ivoy, which place he governed. He afterwards became governor of Luxembourg, where he maintained tranquillity, while the rest of the Low Countries was in a state of civil war. He had afterwards the entire command of Brabant. Died 22 May, 1604. His natural son, Ernest de Mansfeld, was born at Mechlin 1585, and served with such distinction in the army, that the Emperor Rodolph II. declared him legitimate. Being disappointed of his father's places and possessions, he joined the Protestant party, and ravaged several of the provinces belonging to the house of Austria. He died 20 Nov., 1626.

MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, EARL OF, was the fourth son of David, earl of Stormont, and born 2 March, 1705, at Perth. He was educated at Westminster School, and elected from thence to Christ Church, Oxford. He next entered as a student in Lincoln's Inn, and in due course was called to the bar. In 1742 he was made solicitor-general; but in 1753 the charge of Jacobitism was brought against him, which he repelled with indignation. In 1754 he became attorney-general; and two years afterwards was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, when he was created baron of Mansfield. During the unsettled state of the ministry in 1757 his lordship accepted the office of chancellor of the exchequer, in which situation he effected a coalition of parties. At the commencement of the reign of George III., he was assailed with the utmost virulence by the self-called patriots of the day, particularly in the affair of Wilkes; and Junius poured upon him a torrent of sarcasm. In 1776 he was created an earl of Great Britain, with remainder to the issue of Louisa, Viscountess Stormont. The disgraceful 'No Popery' riots of 1780 proved a great calamity to his lordship, and more so to posterity, in the destruction of his town house, with its library and manuscript collections. On this occasion, also, he showed his disinterestedness by refusing all compensation for his loss. He retired from office 1788, and died 20 March, 1793.

MANSI, JOHN DOMINIC, archbishop of Lucca, was born there 16 Feb., 1692, and died 27 Sept., 1769. He edited Baronius's Annals, 30 vols.; a Collection of Councils, 30 vols.; and Fabricius's 'Bibliotheca Latina mediæ et infimæ ætatis,' 6 vols.

MANT, RICHARD, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born 12 Feb., 1776, at Southampton, where his father, Dr. Richard Mant, was rector of the church of All Saints. He received a sound education at Winchester School, and afterwards became a commoner of Trinity College, Oxford, from which he was elected a fellow of Oriel 1798 (M.A. 1800; D.D. 1815). In 1810 he was presented to the vicarage of Great Coggeshall, Essex; in 1813 he became chaplain to Dr. Manners-Sutton, archbishop of Canterbury; in 1815 rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate; and in 1818 rector of East Horsley, Surrey. He was consecrated bishop of Killaloe and Kilfenora 1820, and translated to the see of Down and Connor 1823. The care of the diocese of Dromore also devolved upon him in 1842, under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act, on the death of the last bishop, Dr. Saurin. Dr. Mant owed his advancement in the Church to his professional authorship, and particularly to his sermons preached at the Bampton lecture (1812), on which occasion he made a masterly vindication of the established clergy from the accusations of those who professed a greater purity of principles. This introduced him to the patronage of Archbishop Manners-Sutton, under whose auspices he was engaged, in conjunction with the Rev. George D'Oyly, D.D., to prepare an edition of the Bible, with a selection of notes from the best commentators and preachers of the Church of England. This was performed in 1817 at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, by whom 'D'Oyly and Mant' Bible' has been frequently reprinted. Dr. Mant published many other works, a list of which is given in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' N.S., xxx. 90. We have only room to mention 'Miscellaneous Poems,' 1806; 'The Book of Common Prayer with notes, explanatory, practical, and historical from approved writers of the Church of England' 1820; 'History of the Church of Ireland;' and some tracts against the Church of Rome. Dr. Mant died at the rectory house, Ballymoney, co. Antrim, 2 Nov., 1848.

MANT, WALTER BISHOP, eldest son of the above, was born at Buryton, Hants, 25 June, 1807, an educated at Oriel College, Oxford (B.A. 1827; M.A. 1830). In 1834 he was appointed archdeacon of Down, and rector of Hillsborough, where he died 6 April, 1869. He published Memoirs of his father, the Bishop, 1857; 'Christophoros and other poems,' 1861; and some sermons.

MANTEGNA, Andrea, a painter and engraver, born at Padua 1431; died 1505. His chief residence was at Mantua.

MANTELL, Gideon Algernon, LL.D., F.R.S., an eminent geologist and palæontologist, was born 1790 at Lewes, Sussex, and bred to the medical profession, which, after being admitted a surgeon, he practised in his native town. At an early period his attention was directed to the study of geology, and during nine years he devoted every moment he could spare from his professional duties to an examination of the chalk formation of the county of Sussex, and laid the foundation of his valuable collection, now in the British Museum. In 1835 he removed to Brighton, and in 1839 to London, where he spent the remainder of his industrious life. He received his doctor's degree of LL.D. from an American university, and the government granted him a pension shortly before his death, which occurred 10 Nov., 1852. Dr. Mantell must be placed in the first rank of geologists, he having in the course of his researches discovered four out of five of the genera of the extinct dinosaurian reptiles, viz., the iguanodon, the hylæsaurus, the pelorosaurus, and the regnosaurus. His greatest work, 'The Fossils of the South Downs, or Illustrations of the Geology of Sussex,' made its appearance in 1822. Among his other publications we may mention 'The Wonders of Geology,' 2 vols., 1838; and 'The Medals of Creation; or First Lessons in the Study of Organic Remains,' 2 vols., 1844.

MANTELL, Joshua, a writer on horticulture, was brother of the preceding. He adopted the medical profession, but his brain becoming affected, he was sent to a lunatic asylum at Ticehurst, Sussex, where he died in 1865, after nearly thirty years' confinement. He wrote 'Mantell's Floriculture;' and was principal editor of 'Baxter's Library of Agriculture and Floriculture,' and the 'Farmer's Annual.'

MANTON, Thomas, D.D., a nonconformist divine, was born at Lawrence Lydiard, Somersetshire, 1620, and educated at Oxford. About 1643 he obtained the living of Stoke Newington, which he quitted for that of St. Paul, Covent Garden. At the Restoration he was made chaplain to the king. He was also offered the deanery of Rochester, but declined it, and was deprived of his rectory by the act of conformity. Died 18 Oct., 1677. His works are in 5 vols. folio.

MANTUAN, Baptist, a Latin poet, born at Mantua 1448; died 20 March, 1516. His real name was Spagnoli.

MANTUANO, Marco. See Benavidius.

MANUEL I., Comnenus, emperor of the East, was born about 1120; became emperor 1143; died 24 Sept., 1180.

MANUEL II., Palæologus, emperor of the East, was born 1348; succeeded his father, John Palæologus, 1391; died 1425.

MANUEL, Jacques Antoine, an eloquent French senator, distinguished for his opposition to the ministry after the restoration of the Bourbons. Though forbidden to practise his profession of an advocate, he was elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and became so formidable an opponent of the government, that he was once arrested by an armed force in the chamber. Born 19 Dec., 1775; died 27 Aug., 1827.

MANUTIUS, Aldus, a celebrated printer, born 1499, at Bassiano, in the duchy of Sermonetta. He received a liberal education, and on the completion of his studies became preceptor to the prince of Carpi, nephew of Picus of Mirandola. In 1488 he set up a printing office at Venice, and the first book that issued from his press was the Greek poem of Musæus, with a Latin version in 4to. This was followed by a number of valuable works, and the house of Aldus was the resort of learned men from all parts of Europe, among whom was Erasmus, who resided there a considerable time, while publishing his 'Adagia.' Aldus died 3 Feb., 1515. He was the author of a Latin grammar; a treatise, 'De Metris Horatianis;' and a Greek dictionary.

MANUTIUS, Paul, son of the preceding, was born at Venice 1511. Owing to some law-suits in his family, he did not succeed to his father's business till 1540, when he carried it on with spirit. Paul likewise engaged in education, and brought up some able scholars. He was offered a professorship at Venice, and also at Padua, but declined both, on account of his avocations. He took an active part in founding an academy at Venice, and had the care of the printing-office attached to it; but in 1562 this institution was abolished by the government. About this time Paul accepted an invitation to settle at Rome, where he was employed in printing the Scriptures, and the works of the Fathers. He died there 6 April, 1574. The most esteemed of his writings are his Letters, Commentaries on Cicero, and a treatise, 'De Curia Romana.' His son, Aldus Manutius, was born 1547. At the age of eleven he published 'A Collection of Latin and Tuscan Phrases;' and he soon became an able assistant to his father, whom he succeeded 1574. Three years afterwards he was appointed professor of the belles lettres in the school of the Venetian chancery, and, in 1585, he accepted the chair of rhetoric at Bologna, where he printed the 'Life of Cosmo de Medici.' Soon after this he became professor of polite literature at Pisa. In 1588 he obtained a professorship at Rome, and died there 28 Oct., 1597. With him ended the Aldine press. He wrote Commentaries on Cicero, 10 vols.; and Letters, published 1592.

MAPES, or MAP, Walter, a Latin poet, one of the ornaments of the court of Henry II., who esteemed him for his extensive learning and for his courtly manners. He was a native of the borders of Wales, probably of Gloucestershire or Herefordshire, and pursued his studies in the university of Paris. Soon after 1160 he appears to have been at the court and in the favour of the king of England. He was also familiar in the household of Thomas à Becket, before that great man was raised to the see of Canterbury. Mapes was sent on a mission to the court of Louis le Jeune, king of France; and attended the council called by Pope Alexander III. at Rome. He obtained various ecclesiastical dignities, being canon of the churches of Salisbury and London, precentor of Lincoln, incumbent of Westbury, Gloucestershire, with many other benefices, and, finally, archdeacon of Oxford 1197. His death is supposed to have occurred about 1210. Among the many poems ascribed to Mapes is the famous drinking song,

'Mihi sit propositum in tabernâ mori,' but the common notion that he was a 'jovial toper' must be placed in the long list of vulgar errors. All the information which can be gathered respecting him shows him to have been a wit, and a man endowed with a marked taste for light and elegant literature. He is well known to the lovers of middle age romance as the composer of an important portion of the cycle of King Arthur's knights; but he was above all things remarkable for his bitter enmity to the Cistercian order of monks. 'The Latin Poems commonly attributed to Walter Mapes' were published by the Camden Society in 1841, under the editorship of Mr. Thomas Wright. The only prose writings now known which go under Mapes's name are a treatise 'De Nugis Curialium,' also edited by Mr. Wright for the Camden Society, 1850; and a tract entitled 'Valerius ad Rufinam de non ducenda Uxore.' The treatise 'De Nugis Curialium' is the book in which this remarkable man put down his own sentiments on the passing events of the day, along with the popular gossip of the courtiers with whom he mixed. It is one mass of contemporary anecdote, romance, and popular legend, interesting equally by its curiosity and by its novelty.

MAPHÆUS, Vegius, a modern Latin poet, born at Lodi 1406. He became professor of law and poetry at Pavia, but afterwards went to Rome, where he was appointed secretary of the Apostolic briefs. He died there 1458. Among his writings are a valuable treatise on the Education of Children; a poem on the death of Astyanax; and a supplemental book to the Æneid. This last has been translated into English by Moses Mendez, and burlesqued by John Ellis.

MAPLETOFT, John, M.D., D.D., was born at Margaret-Inge, Huntingdonshire, June, 1631. He was educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After travelling with the son of the earl of Northumberland, he took his degree of M.D. at Cambridge, and then settled in London. In 1675 he was chosen professor of physic in Gresham College, which place he resigned in 1679, and entered into orders. In 1685 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Lawrence Jewry, and, in 1689, took the degree of D.D. at Cambridge. Died 10 Nov., 1721. Dr. Mapletoft translated Sydenham's Medical Observations into Latin; and published 'The Principles and Duties of the Christian Religion.' He is to be distinguished from Dr. Robert Mapletoft, dean of Ely, and master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, who was a native of Lincolnshire, and died 20 Aug., 1677.

MAR, Robert Cochrane, Earl of, an architect in Scotland, who was employed by James III. in building several great structures. That monarch created him earl of Mar, and distinguished him by so many marks of his favour, that the other nobles rose, seized the favourite in the royal presence, and hanged him on the bridge of Lauder in 1484.

MARA, Gertrude Elizabeth, a vocalist, was born in Cassel 1749, being the daughter of a German named Schmäling. She appeared in London as a player on the violin in her tenth year, and afterwards became a celebrated singer on the Continent. In 1774 she married a violoncello-player named Mara; and, in 1784, she returned to this country, where she was received with the greatest enthusiasm. She was particularly famous as a singer of Handel's music; but could execute with equal facility the sprightly and serious, and knew how to give the proper expression to both. She died at Revel 20 January, 1833.

MARACCI, Louis, an Italian orientalist, born at Lucca 1612; died 5 Feb., 1700. He was professor of Arabic at Rome, and acquired distinction by his edition of the Koran.

MARALDI, Jacques Philippe, an astronomer, born at Perinaldo (Nice) 21 Aug., 1665; died 1 Dec., 1729.

MARANA, John Paul, was born near Genoa about 1642. After suffering imprisonment, for being concerned in a conspiracy to give up Genoa to the duke of Savoy, he went to Monaco, where he wrote an account of that plot. He next visited Paris, and there published 'The Turkish Spy,' which became very popular. He returned to Italy, and died there in Dec., 1693.

MARAT, Jean Paul, a sanguinary demagogue during the progress of the French revolution, was born at Baudry, in Neufchâtel, Switzerland, 1744, and in the early part of his life practised medicine at Paris. Renouncing, at length, his professional pursuits for politics, he found a vent for his sentiments in a work conducted by him, entitled 'L'Ami du Peuple,' in which he used the most inflammatory language against the nobility, the king, and the government. Having stirred up the people to a pitch of fury, he encouraged and eulogised their most ferocious acts, particularly in the riots of the 10th August, 1792, and the massacre in the prisons, which followed in the beginning of September. After having acted as president of the terrible committee of the Commune, and escaped the consequences of two decrees of accusation, he was appointed deputy from Paris to the National Convention, where his conduct and behaviour corresponded with his previous character, exhibiting a strange mixture of absurdity, violence, and cruelty. On 21 March, 1793, he denounced all the generals as traitors, and all the French armies as incapable of resisting the enemy; when one of the deputies demanded that Marat should be declared to be in a state of insanity. Accused by the party of the Girondists, he was tried and acquitted, when he triumphantly resumed his place in the Convention. His career was brief; on the 13th of July, 1793, he was stabbed by Charlotte Corday, and instantly expired; enthusiasm of disposition, excited by a deep sense of the miseries of her country, having prompted a young female thus to deliver the world from one of the most sanguinary monsters that ever persecuted the human race.

MARATTI, Carlo, an eminent painter, born 1625, at Camerino, in the march of Ancona. He studied under Andrea Sacchi, and chiefly excelled in painting female saints and Madonnas. Pope Clement XI. gave him a pension and the honour of knighthood. Died 1713.

MARBRES. See Canon.

MARCELLINUS succeeded Pope St. Caius 295, and died 16 March, 304.

MARCELLO, Benedetto, an Italian nobleman, born at Venice 24 July, 1686; died at Brescia 17 July, 1739. He was a celebrated composer, and published some able works on the science of music.

MARCELLUS I., Pope, succeeded St. Marcellinus 304, and died 16 Jan., 310.

MARCELLUS II., succeeded Pope Julius III. 9 April, 1555, and died 24 days after his election.

MARCET, ALEXANDER, M.D., was born at Geneva 1770, and after graduating in the university of Edinburgh, practised as a physician in London, where he died 19 Oct., 1822. He was a man of considerable scientific attainments and the author of several books, the principal being 'An Essay on the Chemical History and Medical Treatment of Calculous Disorders,' 1819.

MARCET, JANE, widow of the above, died in London 28 June, 1858, at the great age of 89. She published 'Conversations on Chemistry,' 'Conversations on Political Economy,' and a number of other popular works tending to render the study of science attractive to youthful minds; also 'Stories for very Little Children,' 'Mary's Grammar,' &c.

MARCHAND, PROSPER, a French writer, born at Guise, in Picardy, about 1675; died at the Hague 14 June, 1756. He edited several valuable works, and was himself author of a History of Printing, and of an Historical Dictionary.

MARCHETTI, ALEXANDER, was born at Pontormo, in Tuscany, 17 March, 1633; became professor of mathematics at Pisa; and died 6 Sept., 1714. His works consist of poems; philosophical and mathematical treatises; and Italian translations of Anacreon and Lucretius.

MARCIANUS, a Thracian, who obtained the imperial throne on the death of Theodosius II. 450. He died 457, aged 69.

MARCION, a heretic of the second century, was born at Sinope, in Paphlagonia, where his father was bishop. His life was far from being regular, and his own father excommunicated him for seducing a young lady. Upon this he became a disciple of Cerdo, to whose opinions he added others, and particularly that of two principles, one of good, and the other of evil. He was living at Rome in 140.

MARCO POLO. See POLO.

MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS, a Roman emperor, surnamed the Philosopher, was born at Rome 26 April, 121. He was adopted and associated in the empire with Lucius Verus, his brother, by Antoninus Pius. On the death of that prince, the senate decreed the empire to Marcus Aurelius alone 7 March, 161, without mentioning Lucius Verus, but he associated him in the empire the same year. This is the earliest instance of two Roman emperors reigning together. The two brothers governed in perfect harmony, for Marcus Aurelius possessed every great quality requisite to make a nation happy, while Lucius Verus, an effeminate man, who had little merit, submitted to his brother's judgment and direction in everything. The two emperors having gained a triumph for their success in the Parthian war in 166, afterwards turned their arms against the Germans. On the death of Verus (169) Marcus Aurelius possessed the sole authority, which he exercised with great glory. He continued to prosecute the German war with vigour. In 174 an extraordinary event took place which has given rise to much controversy. The army of Marcus Aurelius being blocked up in a narrow pass by the Quadi, was in danger of perishing for the want of water, when suddenly the sky became overcast, and there fell a vast quantity of rain. While the soldiers were refreshing themselves, the enemy attacked them with such fury, that they must have been defeated, had it not been for a shower of hail, with thunder and lightning, which dispirited the barbarians, and turned the victory in favour of the Romans. The truth of this story is attested by Pagan and Christian writers, but the former ascribe the deliverance to magic, or to the interposition of Jupiter Tonans; while the latter affirm that the miracle was an answer to the prayers of the twelfth legion, which consisted entirely of Christians, and which was afterwards styled the 'Thundering Legion.' In 175 Avidius Cassius, governor of Syria, revolted against the emperor, but the insurrection was soon suppressed. Marcus Aurelius associated his son in the empire 176, and died at Vienna while engaged in a war against the Marcomanni 17 March, 180. He was generally a mild and excellent prince, but through a blind devotion to Paganism he allowed the persecution of Christians during his reign. His twelve books of 'Meditations' consist of instructive philosophical maxims and observations, relating to morals and the conduct of life, and exhibiting the practical principles of the Stoics. There are several English translations of this work, but none of them are worthy of the original.

MARGARET, ST., virgin and martyr, is supposed to have suffered death at Antioch for the Christian faith about 275.

MARGARET, ST., Queen of Scotland, was born about 1047, being the daughter of Edmund Ironside and sister of Edgar Atheling. She married Malcolm III., and was crowned Queen of Scotland 1070. Died 16 Nov., 1093.

MARGARET OF ANJOU, daughter of René d'Anjou, king of Naples, and wife of Henry VI. of England, was born at Pont-à-Mousson, in Lorraine, 23 March, 1429. Intrepid in the field, she signalised herself by heading her troops in several battles against the house of York; and if she had not been the instrument of her husband's misfortunes by putting to death the duke of Gloucester, his uncle, her name would have been immortalized for the fortitude, activity, and policy with which she supported the rights of her husband and son, till the fatal defeat at Tewkesbury (4 May, 1471), which put an end to all her enterprises; the king being taken prisoner, and her only son, Prince Edward, basely murdered by Richard duke of York. Margaret was ransomed by Louis XI. for 50,000 crowns in 1475; and died at the château of Dampierre 25 Aug., 1481.

MARGARET BEAUFORT, countess of Richmond. See BEAUFORT.

MARGARET OF FRANCE, queen of Navarre, daughter of Henry II., was born 1552, and married Henry IV., but unhappily disgraced herself by her licentiousness. She was divorced 1599; and died 27 March, 1615.

MARGARET OF VALOIS, queen of Navarre, was born at Angoulême 1492. She was the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angoulême, and of Louisa of Savoy. In 1509 she married Charles duke of Alençon, who died at Lyons in 1525. Her next husband was Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Joan d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. She died a Protestant 21 Dec., 1549. She wrote 'Le Miroir de l'ame pécheresse,' which was condemned as heretical by the Sorbonne, who afterwards reversed the sentence; but her most popular work is entitled 'Heptameron, or Novels.'

MARGARET MARY (St.). See ALACOQUE.

MARGARITONE D'AREZZO, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect; born about 1215, at Arezzo, where he died at the age of 77.

MARGETSON, JAMES, D.D., was born 1600, and educated at Cambridge. He was advanced to the archbishopric of Dublin 1660-1; translated to Armagh 1663; died Aug., 1678.

MARGGRAF, ANDREW SIGISMOND, a chemist, born at Berlin 1709. After studying under his father, who was an apothecary, and assessor of the College of Medicine, he attended the lectures of Neumann, and next became a pupil of Haller. In 1738 he was chosen a member of the Berlin Academy, and in 1760 was appointed director of the class of experimental philosophy, besides which he had the care of the laboratory. He made several important discoveries, particularly in the phosphoric acid. Died 7 Aug., 1782.

MARIA LOUISA, eldest daughter of the Emperor Francis I., was born at Vienna 1791. In 1810 she became the second wife of Napoleon I., to whom she bore a son in the following year; but after his abdication she retired to her native country, and contracted a morganatic marriage with her chamberlain, Count Albert Adam, of Neipperg, by whom she had several children. Died 18 Dec., 1847.

MARIA THERESA, archduchess of Austria, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, and empress of Germany, was born at Vienna 13 May, 1717, being the eldest daughter of the Emperor Charles VI. She married (1736) Francis Stephen of Lorraine, afterwards grand duke of Tuscany, and eventually emperor, under the name of Francis I. (1745). Her reign began with a war, in which all the neighbouring nations were engaged, and Maria was near losing her throne. After the war had continued eight years, a peace was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle, and Maria immediately devoted herself to repairing the ravages which her subjects had suffered during the commotion. She built hospitals, encouraged commerce and science, and did everything which humanity and munificence could devise to render her infirm soldiers comfortable. The king of Prussia again declared war against her; but in the terrible struggle which ensued the empress maintained her position, and peace was established. After a long reign, during which she displayed heroism, virtue, and charity to a degree which endeared her to her subjects, she died at Vienna 29 Nov., 1780.

MARIANA, JOHN, a Spanish historian, born at Talavera, in Castille, 1537. He entered the order of Jesuits, and became a professor in several colleges of that society; after which he retired to Toledo, where he published his treatise 'De rege et regis institutione,' in which he attempted to justify the assassination of Henry III. The work, however, which does credit to his memory, is the 'History of Spain,' written originally in Latin, and translated by himself into his native language. It was first printed at Toledo 1592. The author afterwards continued it to the year 1621. Mariana also wrote some commentaries on the Scriptures, and died at Toledo 17 Feb., 1624.

MARIANUS SCOTUS, a learned Scotch monk, who died 1086, aged 58. He was a relation of the Venerable Bede, and wrote a Chronicle from Jesus Christ to 1083. It was continued by another hand to 1200.

MARIE AMÉLIE DE BOURBON, queen of the French. She was the daughter of Ferdinand the Fourth of Naples, Third of Sicily, and First of the United Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Her mother was Marie Caroline, archduchess of Austria, the imperious daughter of Maria Theresa, and sister of Marie Antoinette and of the emperors Joseph and Leopold. Marie Amélie was one of five sisters, who were most carefully educated under the care of Madame d'Ambrosio. She early displayed the germs of those amiable qualities which distinguished her in after life. 'We three sisters,' said, on one occasion, the widow of Charles Felix, king of Sardinia, to M. Donnet, archbishop of Bordeaux,—'we three sisters were called respectively La Bella, La Dotta, and La Santa. La Santa was Marie Amélie.' On 25 Nov., 1809, she was married, at Palermo to Louis Philippe, duke of Orleans, afterwards king of the French. Their marriage was purely one of affection. Amid all the political misfortunes which afterwards overtook them, their domestic happiness was never for a moment disturbed, and their household virtues became proverbial in Europe. When the king fled from Paris, she accompanied him as far as Evreux, where she separated from him for safety. She afterwards rejoined him at Honfleur, and shared the difficulties of his passage to England. In the quiet seclusion of Claremont she devoted herself to the task of soothing the regrets of the king. He died in 1850; but she survived him sixteen years, dying 24 March, 1866, æt. 83. Her remains were interred on the 3rd of April, in the Catholic chapel at Weybridge.

MARIE ANTOINETTE DE LORRAINE, JOSEPHE-JEANNE, archduchess of Austria, and queen of France, born at Vienna 2 Nov., 1755, was daughter of the Emperor Francis I. and Maria Theresa. In 1770 she was married at Versailles to the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. It was subsequently remarked that immediately after the ceremony a fearful thunder-storm threw Versailles and all the surrounding country into the greatest terror. Anxious minds indulged in yet more fearful forebodings, when, at the festivity which the city of Paris prepared for the celebration of the marriage, a great number of people were pressed or trodden to death in the crowd, fifty-three persons being found dead, and about three hundred seriously injured. When Marie Antoinette, after the death of Louis XV., became queen, she imitated the example of Louis XII. An officer of the life-guards, who had formerly displeased her, and now was about to resign, she ordered to remain at his post, and forget the past. 'Heaven forbid that the queen should avenge the injuries of the dauphiness!' Thus she gained the affections of the people by mildness and generosity; in particular she took the most energetic measures to relieve the sufferers in the dreadful winter of 1788. But about this time she drew upon herself the hatred of the court party, who used every means to make her odious to the nation. She was accused, in pamphlets, of continually contriving plots; and though none of the accusations could be proved, and many of them were wholly improbable, yet it must be confessed that the young and inexperienced queen gave cause for them. Her lively imagination often gave her the appearance of levity, and sometimes of dissimulation. A natural restlessness led her to change, to new fashions, to a continual varying of her diversions. Great sums of money were by this means taken from more important objects. It was still more to her disadvantage that she injured her dignity by neglecting the strict formality of court manners; besides, she expressed herself with pettishness, in reply to the censures that were passed upon her. Her enemies now spread abroad a report that she was still an Austrian at heart, and a natural enemy to the French, to whose happiness she could no longer contribute. An extraordinary occurrence added fuel to the flame of calumny, while it subjected the name of the queen to a disgraceful law-suit. Two jewellers demanded the payment of an immense price for a necklace, which had been purchased in the name of the queen. In the examination which she demanded it was proved that she had never ordered the purchase. A lady of her size and complexion had impudently passed herself off for the queen, and at midnight had a meeting with a cardinal in the park of Versailles. Notwithstanding this, the enemies of the queen succeeded in throwing a dark shade over her conduct. When Calonne reported a very great deficiency in the finances, the cause was blindly charged to the queen's extravagance. At length, when the embarrassed circumstances of the government rendered it necessary to summon a meeting of the States-General, the queen was present at the opening of their first session; but from that moment her tranquillity was gone. Events soon followed which put her courage to the test. She appeared, with her husband, at the banquet which the body-guards gave at Versailles, 1st Oct., to the officers of the troops of the line, where, soon after the departure of the court, the national cockade was trampled on. This excited the Parisians still more against the queen. They regarded her as the soul of the party which at that time was collecting an army against Paris and against the National Assembly. On the 5th the Parisians rushed violently to Versailles. Early on the 6th they broke into the castle, murdered several of the body-guards, and uttered against the queen the most furious threats. In the middle of the night a clergyman wrote to her, 'Take measures for your preservation. Early in the morning, at six o'clock, you are to be murdered.' She remained tranquil, and concealed the letter. The infuriated mob rushed into her chamber; she fled to the king. To put a stop to the scene of outrage, the king and queen showed themselves, with both their children, in the balcony. This spectacle made a momentary impression on the enraged people; but soon the cry resounded from every mouth, 'No children! The queen, the queen alone!' She instantly put her son and daughter into the arms of the king, and returned to the balcony. This unexpected courage disarmed the mob; their threats were followed by shouts of approbation. The same day she was obliged to view a most fearful spectacle for six hours, on her way to Paris. Before her carriage were borne on spikes the heads of two guards. Overheated patriots surrounded her with the most horrid imprecations. When she was asked about the scene that had just ended by the officers of justice, who desired to punish the guilty, she replied, 'Never will I accuse one of the king's subjects;' and when the question was repeated, 'I have seen all, I have heard all, I have forgotten all,' was her answer. The first month after her arrival in Paris, she expended 300,000 livres in redeeming clothes pledged by the poor to the pawnbrokers; but all her benefits were insufficient to appease their exasperated minds. In 1791, when Louis XVI. determined on flight, she followed her husband. From Varennes, she was brought back to the Tuileries, and when the committee of the Constituent Assembly demanded an explanation, she answered, 'As the king wished to depart with his children, nothing in the world could hinder me from accompanying him. I have given sufficient proof, for these two years, that I would never desert him. What made me more decided on that point was the firm conviction that the king would never leave France. If he had wished to do so I should have employed every effort to restrain him.' This tempest was followed by a momentary calm. In the meantime came on the 20th June, and the 10th August, 1792. Prepared for whatever might happen on the latter of these days, the queen exerted all her power to excite her husband to meet death sword in hand. Led to the Legislative Assembly, she heard his deposition announced, together with the appointment of his judges, and then went with him to the Temple. None of her female attendants were suffered to accompany her. Here she occupied the only comfortable chamber, with her daughter and the Princess Elizabeth. Close bars of iron secured the window, admitting only a glimmering light. She now exhibited the full strength of her character; invariably calm in the circle of her friends, she urged them to disregard sickness and suffering. When the king informed her of his condemnation she congratulated him on the approaching termination of an existence so painful, and the unperishing reward that was to crown it. On 4 July, 1793, she was separated from her son. She felt that this separation was for ever, yet her firmness was unchanged. On the 5th of August, at midnight, she was removed to the keeper's house. A dark and damp dungeon here was her last abode. On the 3rd of Oct. the Convention ordered her to be brought before the revolutionary tribunal. She was charged with having dissipated the finances, exhausted the public treasury, given large sums out of it to the emperor; with having corresponded with foreign enemies, and favoured domestic tumults. But, notwithstanding the multitude of witnesses examined, no evidence could be brought against her. Bailly, then mayor of Paris, who was summoned as a witness, had the courage to take the queen into his protection without hesitation, and to censure, with the greatest severity, her bloodthirsty accuser, Fouquier-Tinville, for his testimony. The queen herself replied to all inquiries with firmness and decision. When Herbert accused her of corrupting the morals of her own son, she answered, with the deepest indignation, 'I appeal to every mother here whether such a crime be possible!' She heard her sentence of death with calmness, and was carried back to her prison. The next day, at eleven o'clock, she ascended the cart which conveyed her to the scaffold. A deep silence reigned. Grief had distorted her features, and, in the damp, unhealthy prison, she had almost lost one of her eyes. Her look seemed to fill the people with awe. At twelve o'clock the cart arrived at the palace of Louis XV. She cast back a long look at the Tuileries, and then ascended the scaffold. When she came to the top, she threw herself on her knees, and exclaimed, 'O God, enlighten and affect my executioners! Farewell, my children, for ever! I go to your father!' Thus died the queen of France, 16 Oct., 1793.

MARINI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian poet, born at Naples 1569; died 25 March, 1625.

MARINUS. See MARTIN.

MARIOTTE, EDME, a French ecclesiastic and experimental philosopher, was a native of Dijon. He became a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris 1666, and died 12 May, 1684. He was a great experimentalist on the motion of fluids, the nature of vision, and the constitution of the air. His works were printed in 2 vols., 1717.

MARISCO, ADAM DE. See ADAM.

MARIUS, CAIUS, a celebrated Roman, who was seven times consul. He was born at Arpinum about 157 B.C., and entering the army, served as lieutenant under Scipio and Metellus. He first obtained the consulship B.C. 107, and the next year ended the war with Jugurtha, whom he conducted in triumph to Rome. After this he served against the Cimbri and other barbarous nations who had invaded Italy. With a very inferior force he completely routed them, for which a pyramid was erected to his honour; but he tarnished the glory of his victories by the basest cruelties to the vanquished. In his sixth consulate he had for his rival Sylla, who marched to Rome with his army, and obliged Marius to quit the city. After wandering for some time he was recalled to Rome by Cinna, with whom he was again chosen consul B.C. 86, in which year he died.

MARIVAUX, PIERRE CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE, a French writer, born at Paris 1688. He came of a good family, and inherited a considerable fortune, which he employed in benevolent purposes. He died 12 Feb., 1763. His works are—Pièces de Theatre, 5 vols.; Homère travestie; Le Spectateur François, 2 vols.; Le Philosophe Indigent; Vie de Marianne, 4 vols.; Le Paysan Parvenu; Pharsamon.

MARK, ST., a Roman, succeeded Pope Sylvester I. Jan., 336, and died on 6 Oct. following.

MARKHAM, GERVASE, a hack author, was a native of Gotham, Notts. He served as a captain in the royal army during the civil wars, at which time he must have been in the decline of life, as some of his works were printed in the reign of Elizabeth. The time of his death is unknown. His principal works are on husbandry, horsemanship, fowling, and the diseases of cattle. He also composed some poems, and (conjointly with William Sampson) a tragedy, entitled 'Herod and Antipater.'

MARKHAM, WILLIAM, archbishop of York, was born at Kinsale, in Ireland, 1720, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to a scholarship at Christ Church, Oxford (M.A. 1745; D.C.L. 1752). In 1765 he obtained the deanery of Rochester, which he vacated in 1767 for that of Christ Church. In 1771 he was nominated bishop of Chester, and the same year was appointed tutor to the prince of Wales, which situation he held till 1776. He was translated to York Dec., 1776, and died 3 Nov., 1807. Specimens of his Latin poetry are in the 'Carmina Quadragesimalia' and the 'Musæ Anglicanæ.' He also published a few detached sermons.

MARKLAND, ABRAHAM, D.D., was born in London 1645; educated at Oxford; appointed prebendary of Winchester 1679; master of the Hospital of St. Cross 1694; died about 1730. He wrote a poem on the birth and restoration of Charles II.; another, entitled 'Ptery-plegia, or the Art of Shooting Flying;' and 2 vols. of Sermons, 1729.

MARKLAND, JAMES HEYWOOD, D.C.L., F.R.S., F.S.A., born at Manchester 1788: died at Bath 28 Dec., 1864. He was called to the bar, and practised his profession till 1839, though his leisure moments were devoted to literary and antiquarian pursuits. Among his works may be mentioned 'Remarks on English Churches;' 'Prayers and Life of Bishop Ken;' 'The Offertory;' and 'Chester Mysteries.'

MARKLAND, JEREMIAH, M.A., a celebrated critic, was born 29 Oct., 1693, at Childwall, in Lancashire. He was brought up at Christ's Hospital, whence he removed to Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1717, and held it till his death on 7 July, 1776. He never took orders, but led a retired life, partly at college as a tutor, and lastly at Dorking, Surrey. He published a few poems; a Latin Epistle to Bishop Hare, on some passages of Horace; an edition of the Sylvæ of Statius; Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus; a Dissertation on four Orations ascribed to Cicero; a tract entitled 'De Græcorum quintâ declinatione imparisyllabica, et inde formatâ Latinorum tertia, quæstio Grammatica;' an edition of Euripides's 'Supplices Mulieres;' and another of the 'Two Iphigeniæ' of the same writer. Many of his notes on the New Testament are in Bowyer's Conjectures.

MARLBOROUGH, JOHN CHURCHILL, DUKE OF, prince of the holy Roman empire, was born at Ashe, in Devonshire, 1650, being the eldest son of Sir Winston Churchill, who has been already noticed in this work. He was educated at St. Paul's School, where he is said to have read Vegetius de Re Militari. At the age of twelve years, however, his father took him to court, where he became page to the duke of York, and in 1666 obtained a pair of colours in the Guards. His first service was at the siege of Tangier; and in 1672 he was captain of grenadiers under the duke of Monmouth, with whom he served in the Low Countries, and distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Nimeguen as to attract the notice of the great Turenne, who called him the handsome Englishman. For his conduct at the siege of Maestricht, he received the thanks of the French king at the head of the line. On his return to England he was made lieutenant-colonel, also gentleman of the bed-chamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended to the Netherlands in 1679, as he afterwards did to Scotland. In 1681 he married Miss Sarah Jennings, who waited on the Princess Anne, by which match he greatly strengthened his interest at court. In 1682 he was shipwrecked with the duke of York, in their passage to Scotland, on which occasion his royal highness expressed the utmost anxiety to save the colonel, who in the same year was made baron of Eymouth. He still continued to be a favourite after the accession of James, who sent him ambassador, on that occasion, to France. In 1685 he was created Lord Churchill of Sandridge, and the same year he suppressed Monmouth's rebellion. He continued to serve King James with great fidelity, till the arrival of the prince of Orange, and then left him, or which he has been severely stigmatised by several writers. After the revolution he was created earl of Marlborough, and appointed commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, where he reduced Cork, with other strong places. Notwithstanding these services, in 1692 he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower on a charge of treason, but soon obtained his release. After the death of Queen Mary he was restored to favour, and appointed governor to the young duke of Gloucester. In 1700 he was made commander-in-chief of the English forces in Holland, where also he held the charge of ambassador. At the beginning of the next reign he received the order of the Garter, and was declared captain-general of all the forces in England and abroad. The states-general also gave him the supreme command of the Dutch troops; and in the campaign of 1702 he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liege, for which he received the thanks of both houses, and was created duke of Marlborough. In 1704 he joined Prince Eugene, with whom he gained the battle of Hochstet, taking Marshal Tallard prisoner. Just before this he had been created a prince of the empire. In the winter he returned to England, and again received the thanks of parliament, with the grant of the manor of Woodstock and the hundred of Wotton. On the 12 May, 1706, he fought the battle of Ramillies, which victory accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places. He arrived in England in Nov., and received fresh honours and grants from the queen and parliament. A bill was passed to settle his honours upon the male and female issue of his daughters; and Blenheim House was ordered to be built, to perpetuate his exploits, besides all which he had a pension of 5,000*l.* a-year out of the post-office. The following campaign was inactive; but the ensuing one was pushed with such vigour, that the French king was glad to enter into a negotiation for peace, which had no effect. In 1709 he defeated Marshal Villars at Malplaquet, for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnised. In the winter of 1710 he returned to England, and soon after was dismissed from his employments, and even a prosecution was commenced against him for applying the public money to his private purposes. Stung by this ingratitude, he went abroad till 1714, when he returned and landed at Dover, amidst the acclamations of the people. Queen Anne was just dead, and her successor restored the duke to his military appointments; but his infirmities increasing, he retired from public employments, and died at Windsor Lodge, having survived his intellectual faculties, June 16, 1722, and his remains were interred with great solemnity in Westminster Abbey. The duke had four daughters, who married into the first families of the kingdom. His duchess died Oct. 18, 1744. She was a woman of boundless ambition and avarice, having amassed more money than many sovereign princes. In 1742 she gave 5,000*l.* to Mr. Hooke, to write a book entitled 'An Account of the conduct of the Dowager Duchess of Marlborough.' A selection of curious papers was published in 1788, by Lord Hailes, with this title, 'The Opinions of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough.'

MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER, a dramatist, was the son of a shoemaker at Canterbury, where he was born about Feb., 1563-4. After a preliminary training at the king's school in his native city, he was sent to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge (B.A. 1583; M.A. 1587). Having commenced dramatic author, he came to London, and at one period, like his great contemporary, Shakspere, appeared upon the stage as an actor. Recklessly squandering the proceeds of his pen, and when all was spent, labouring in a garret to complete a new play—such appears to have been the life of Marlowe, who is represented as outdoing all his companions in blasphemy and obscenity. His death took place in a drunken brawl at Deptford 1 June, 1593. Of his plays the 'Jew of Malta' is reckoned the best, and he is the reputed author of 'Tamburlaine the Great,' believed to be the earliest English play composed in blank verse. Marlowe also wrote the exquisite song 'Come live with me, and be my love;' and several poems. The best edition of his works is that by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, 3 vols. 12mo., Lond., 1850; 1 vol. 8vo., 1858.—Athen. Cantab.

MARMION, SHAKERLEY, was born at Aynhoe, Northamptonshire, Jan., 1602. He took his master's degree at Wadham College, Oxford, 1624, after which he squandered away his estate, and then entered the army. Died 1639. He wrote four comedies, called Holland's Leaguer; A fine Companion; The Antiquary; The Crafty Merchant. He was also the author of 'Cupid and Psiche,' a poem.

MARMONT, AUGUSTE FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS VIESSE DE, duke of Ragusa, a marshal of the French empire, born at Châtillon-sur-Seine 20 July, 1774; died at Venice 2 March, 1852. He obtained his title for his successful defence of Ragusa against a greatly superior force of Russians and Montenegrins 30 Sept., 1806.

MARMONTEL, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French writer, was born 11 July, 1723, at Bort, in the Limousin. He studied in the Jesuits' College at Mauriac, after which he went to Toulouse, and next to Paris, where his tragedy of 'Dionysius' procured him the situation of secretary to the royal buildings. Soon afterwards he became connected with D'Alembert and Diderot, in the Encyclopédie. He also had a share in the 'Mercure François,' in which his Tales first appeared; but having written a satire on the Duc D'Aumont, he was sent to the Bastile. His confinement, however, was short; and in 1763 he obtained a place in the Academy, of which he afterwards became perpetual secretary. Died 31 Dec., 1799. Besides his 'Tales,' he wrote 'Epitre aux poëtes;' the romance of 'Belisarius;' and the 'History of the Incas.' The best edition of his works is that of Paris, 18 vols., 1819.

MARNIX, PHILIP VAN, seigneur du Mont, Sainte Aldegonde, was born at Brussels 1538. He was a zealous Calvinist, and, being appointed consul at Antwerp, defended that city bravely against the duke of Parma 1584. Died 15 Dec., 1598. Among other works, he wrote one called 'The Bee-Hive of the Romish Church,' which was translated into English by Gilpin 1578.

MAROCHETTI, PIETRO CARLO GIOVANNI BATTISTA, BARON, an eminent sculptor, born at Turin 1805. He received his education in Paris, at the Lycée Napoleon, after leaving which he was placed with Bosio, a Parisian sculptor of some eminence. While studying in his atelier he obtained honourable mention from the École des Beaux Arts, but was not awarded any other distinction, and his journey to Italy to complete his studies was undertaken at his own expense. In 1827 he returned to France, and in the same year exhibited a group, 'A Girl playing with a Dog,' for which a medal was awarded him. This group he presented to the king of Sardinia. In 1831 he exhibited his 'Fallen Angel,' and somewhat later he executed for the Academy of Arts of Turin a statue of Monsignor Mossi. He presented to the capital of Sardinia an equestrian statue of Emanuel Philibert, which is by many esteemed his chef-d'œuvre, and which was his sole contribution to the French Exposition of 1855. Many of his works are well known in Paris, and among them are one of the bas-reliefs on the Arc de l'Etoile; the tomb of Bellini at Père la Chaise; a maître d'autel in the church of the Madeleine; three equestrian statues of the duke of Orleans; a St. Michel; and a statue of the emperor. Shortly after the revolution of Feb., 1848, Marochetti came to England, where he soon became known in art circles. In 1851 he contributed the model of a colossal equestrian statue of Richard Cœur de Lion to the Great Exhibition, but being dissatisfied with the position allotted to it inside the building, he set it up at some distance from the western entrance to the great glass palace. The position of the figure and its spirited attitude attracted no small share of public attention; and this model was the means of bringing the sculptor into very general notice. The statue was afterwards executed in bronze, and placed close to the palace at Westminster, the cost being defrayed by a national subscription. The people of Glasgow commissioned him to execute for them an equestrian statue of Queen Victoria, which was inaugurated in 1854. In that year he exhibited at the Royal Academy 'Love Playing with a Hare.' In 1856 he executed the granite monument to the memory of the English soldiers slain in the Crimea; and a year later the mausoleum of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I. He also executed a statue of the duke of Wellington, which surmounts a huge monolith erected to his memory at Strathfieldsaye. One of his latest works was a monument to Lord Clyde, which stands in Waterloo Place. Marochetti was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honour 1839; and died at Paris 28 Dec., 1867.

MAROT, Jean, a poet, born near Caen, in Normandy, 1463; died in 1523. Princess Anne, of Bretagne, gave him a pension, and called him her poet. His son, Clément Marot, born at Cahors 1495, far exceeded his father in poetical talent. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia. On his release he went to Piedmont, where he professed the Protestant faith. He died at Turin 1544. He gave a new grace to French poetry, and obtained great credit by his translation of the Psalms. Paul Lacroix published a good edition of his works, 3 vols., 1824.

MARPURG, Frederick William, author of fourteen valuable treatises in German on the theory of music, was born at Sechausen, in Prussia, 1718, and died 22 May, 1795.

MARRYAT, Frederick, captain R.N., an English novelist, born in London 10 July, 1792. Entering the navy at an early age, he saw much service under Lord Cochrane, and gained a high reputation among his comrades for his bravery. He was promoted to be lieutenant 1812, and commander 1815. For his services in the Burmese war he received the decoration of C.B. Capt. Marryat published in 1837 a 'Code of Signals for the use of Vessels employed in the Merchant Service;' and he afterwards had the satisfaction of seeing his admirable invention adopted in the royal and mercantile services, not only of this country, but of foreign nations. He twice received the public thanks of the Shipowners' Society for it, and upon his treatise being translated into French (1840) he was complimented by Louis Philippe with the cross of the legion of honour. Captain Marryat's chief claim to remembrance, however, is founded on the productions of his facile pen. He was one of the most pleasing of our romance writers, and especially excelled in naval stories. He was editor of the 'Metropolitan Magazine' from 1832 to 1836, during which period some of his most popular novels were first published in its pages. His death took place at Langham, Norfolk, 2 Aug., 1848. Subjoined is a list of his works—'Frank Mildmay,' 1829; 'King's Own,' 1830; 'Newton Forster,' 1832; 'Peter Simple,' 1833; 'Jacob Faithful,' 1835; 'Pacha of Many Tales,' 1835; 'Japhet in Search of a Father,' 1836; 'Midshipman Easy,' 1836; 'Pirate and Three Cutters,' 1836; 'Snarley Yow, or the Dog-Fiend,' 1837; 'Phantom Ship,' 1839; 'Diary in America,' 1839, a work which gave great offence to our thin-skinned Transatlantic brethren; 'Olla Podrida,' 1840; 'Poor Jack,' 1840; 'Joseph Rushbrook,' 1841; 'Masterman Ready,' 1841; 'Percival Keene,' 1842; 'Travels and Adventures of Monsieur Violet,' 1843; 'Privateer's Man,' 1844; 'Settlers in Canada,' 1844; 'Mission, or Scenes in Africa,' 1845; 'Children of the New Forest,' 1847; 'Little Savage,' 1847; 'Valerie,' 1849.

MARS, Anne Françoise Hippolyte Boutet, a French comic actress, born at Paris 9 Feb., 1778; died 20 March, 1847.

MARSDEN, William, D.C.L., F.R.S., an orientalist, born at Dublin 16 Nov., 1754. He early entered the civil service of the East India Company, and was stationed for some years at Bencoollen, in Sumatra, where he assiduously studied the native languages and antiquities. After his return to England in 1779 he continued his philological researches, was elected a member of several learned societies, and honoured with the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford 1786. He was appointed under-secretary to the Admiralty 1795, and afterwards chief secretary; but in 1807 he retired from public life. He died at Aldenham, Hertfordshire, 6 Oct., 1836. Dr. Marsden presented his valuable collection of coins and medals to the British Museum, and his extensive library to King's College, London. His works are—'The History of Sumatra,' 1782; 'Catalogue of Dictionaries, Vocabularies, Grammars and Alphabets,' 1796; 'A Dictionary of the Malayan language; to which is prefixed a Grammar, with an Introduction and Praxis,' 1812; a translation of the Travels of Marco Polo, 1817; 'Numismata Orientalia Illustrata,' 2 vols., 1823-5; 'Miscellaneous Works,' 1834; and an autobiographical memoir, 1838.

MARSH, Francis, born in Gloucestershire 1627, and educated at Cambridge, became bishop of Limerick, Ardfert, and Aghadoe 1667, bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh 1672, archbishop of Dublin 1682, and died 16 Nov., 1693.

MARSH, Herbert, D.D., an Anglican prelate, born 10 Dec., 1757, at Faversham, Kent, of which parish his father was vicar. After graduating at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, he resided for several years at Göttingen, and acquired a perfect knowledge of German, a language with which few of his countrymen were at that period acquainted. He also transmitted important political information to Mr. Pitt, who subsequently rewarded him with a pension. Resuming his academical pursuits, he took his degrees in divinity, and after being appointed Margaret professor in that faculty delivered several series of lectures, which being in English instead of in Latin—the language employed by all his predecessors—attracted large audiences. He was promoted to the bishopric of Llandaff 1816, and translated to Peterborough 1819. His attempts to repress Calvinism in the latter diocese rendered him obnoxious to the evangelical portion of the clergy, and several publications appeared on the subject, which was ultimately brought before the House of Lords, but without any material result. Dr. Marsh was the author of numerous works, he having been mixed up in various controversies which have now fallen into oblivion. His earliest and most important literary production was a translation (4 vols., 1792-1801) of the 'Introduction to the New Testament,' by J. D. Michaelis, whose daughter he subsequently married. Among his other works we may specify—'An Essay on the Usefulness and Necessity of Theological Learning to those who are designed for Holy Orders,' 1792; 'A Course of Lectures, containing a description and systematic arrangement of the several branches of Divinity,' 1810; 'Horæ Pelasgicæ,' 1813; and 'A Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome,' 1814. Died 1 May, 1839.

MARSH, Narcissus, an Anglican prelate, born at Hannington, Wiltshire, 1638. He became fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, where he took his doctor's degree. In 1673 he was appointed principal of St. Alban Hall; but in 1678 he went to Ireland, and was made provost of Trinity College, Dublin, to which he presented a valuable library. In 1682 he was promoted to the bishopric of Leighlin and Ferns; in 1690 translated to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel; removed to that of Dublin 1694; and to the primatial see of Armagh 1702-3. Died 2 Nov., 1713. His works are—'Manuductio ad Logicam;' 'Institutiones Logicæ;' 'Essay on the Doctrine of Sounds;' A Charge to the Clergy of Dublin. His MS. diary of his life, beginning 20 Dec., 1690, remains in his library at Dublin.

MARSH, William, D.D., an English divine, was born in July, 1775, and educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford. He held, in succession, several benefices, among them St. Mary's, Leamington, and the rectory of Beddington, Surrey. He was also an hon. canon of Worcester. Died 24 Aug., 1864. Among his publications were 'Plain Letters on Prophecy,' and 'Sermons on Justification by Faith.'

MARSHAL, Andrew, M.D., an anatomist and physician, born in Fifeshire 1742; died in London 2 April, 1813. His chief work is on 'The Morbid Anatomy of the Brain in Mania and Hydrophobia.'

MARSHALL, or MARTIAL, John, D.D., a native of Darlysford, Worcestershire, received his education at Winchester School, and New College, Oxford, of which he was admitted a fellow 1551. About five years later he proceeded B.C.L., and soon afterwards became second master of Winchester School; but, on Queen Elizabeth's accession, he forsook all his preferments, and, retiring to Louvain, applied himself to divinity, and became doctor in that faculty. In 1568 he was invited to Douay by William Allen (afterwards cardinal), and was one of the first six engaged in establishing the English college in that university. Dr. Marshall was subsequently appointed a canon of Lisle; and died 3 April, 1597. He wrote 'A Treatise of the Crosse gathered out of the Scriptures, Councells, and auncient Fathers of the Primitive Church,' 8vo., Antwerp, 1564; and 'A Replie to Mr. Calfhill's blasphemous Answer, made against the Treatise of the Crosse,' 4to., Louvain, 1566.

MARSHALL, John, an American jurist, born in Fauquier County, Virginia, 24 Sept., 1755; died at Philadelphia 6 July, 1835. He had some classical instruction, but was never at a college. A soldier in the war, he reached the rank of captain, and fought in various battles. As a lawyer he soon rose to distinction. In 1800 he was appointed secretary of war, and afterwards secretary of state; and, in the following year, made chief justice of the United States, which exalted office he held with increasing reputation and unsullied dignity till his death. He wrote a Life of Washington.

MARSHALL, Nathaniel, D.D., was educated at Cambridge, became rector of St. Vedast and St. Michael-le-Querne, London, and prebendary of Windsor; and died about 1729, leaving a translation of St. Cyprian's works; A Defence of the English Constitution; and A Treatise on the Discipline of the Primitive Church.

MARSHALL, Thomas, D.D., was born at Barkby, Leicestershire, about 1621, and educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, of which he became rector 1672. He obtained the deanery of Gloucester 1681; and died 1685. He published 'Observationes in Evangeliorum versiones perantiquas duas, Gothicas sc. et Anglo-Saxonicus;' and an explanation of the Catechism. He also completed Parr's Life of Usher.

MARSHAM, Sir John, was born in London 23 Aug., 1602. He went from Westminster School to St. John's College, Oxford, and afterwards entered the Middle Temple. In 1638 he became one of the six clerks in Chancery, which place he lost in the Rebellion, besides having his estate plundered for his loyalty. At the Restoration he recovered his situation in the Chancery, and was made a baronet. Died 25 May, 1685. He published—'Diatriba Chronologica;' 'Canon Chronicus, Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus, Græcus, et Disquisitiones,' 1672, printed at Leipsic 1676. Sir John also wrote the preface to Dugdale's Monasticon; and left some learned dissertations in MS.

MARSHMAN, Joshua, D.D., a missionary and orientalist, born at Westbury Leigh about 1767. He was one of the missionaries dispatched to India by the Baptists to preach the gospel to the Hindoos. He arrived in India 1799, and settled at Serampore, where he died 5 Dec., 1837, having survived all his companions. Dr. Marshman applied himself diligently to the study of Bengalee, Sanscrit, and Chinese, and translated into the latter tongue various portions of the Holy Scriptures. He published, besides, 'A Dissertation on the Characters and Sounds of the Chinese Language,' 1809; 'The Works of Confucius, containing the Original Text, with a translation,' 1809; 'Clavis Sinica, or Elements of Chinese Grammar,' 1814; and 'A Defence of the Deity and Atonement of Jesus Christ,' 1822.

MARSIGLI, Luigi Ferdinando, an Italian count, famous in letters and in arms, was born 10 July, 1658, at Bologna, where he died 1 Nov., 1730. He was the founder of the academy of arts and sciences, called the Institute, in his native city, and author of 'Danubius Pannonico-Mysicus;' 'The Military State of Turkey,' &c.

MARSOLLIER, Jacques, a French historian and biographer, was born at Paris 1647, and became archdeacon of Uzès, where he died 1724.

MARSTON, John, a dramatic poet, born about 1570; died about 1634. He was a student of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and afterwards a member of the Middle Temple; to which society he was appointed lecturer 1593. He was an associate of Ben Jonson, who afterwards quarrelled with him and Decker. In 1633 he collected six of his plays into one volume; besides which he wrote three books of satires, entitled 'The Scourge of Villainy,' published first 1599, and reprinted 1764. A collection of his 'Works, Dramatic and Satirical,' was published in 3 vols., 1856, under the editorship of Mr. Halliwell.

MARSY, François Marie de, a poet and miscellaneous writer, born at Paris 1714; died 1763. His best works are two Latin poems, one on painting, the other on tragedy.

MARTEL, Charles. See Charles.

MARTELLI, Peter James, an Italian poet, born at Bologna 1665; died 10 May, 1727.

MARTÈNE, Edmond, a French Benedictine, author of numerous works of great historical value, was born 22 Dec., 1654; and died 20 June, 1739.

MARTENS, George Frederick von, a German diplomatist and publicist, born at Hamburg 22 Feb., 1756. After holding the professorship of jurisprudence at Göttingen, he was appointed a member of the council of state of the kingdom of Westphalia (1809), and, not long afterwards appointed president of the finance department. In 1816 he was sent to the German diet as minister of the king of Hanover, and he acted in that capacity till his death, which took place at Frankfort-on-the-Main 21 Feb., 1821. His works are absolutely indispensable to all who make diplomacy a study. The most important are 'Précis du Droit des Gens de l'Europe Moderne;' and his 'Recueil de Traités;' the latter of which, with the continuations by the other writers, includes treaties concluded between 1761 and 1854.

MARTIAL, John. See Marshall.

MARTIALIS, Marcus Valerius, the epigrammatist, was a native of Spain, but resided long at Rome, where he paid particular court to Domitian, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. After the death of that emperor he returned to his native country, and married a woman of fortune. Died about A.D. 104. His works were printed first at Venice 1470.

MARTIN, St., was born about 316, at Sabaria, in Pannonia; consecrated bishop of Tours, in France, about 374; died 8 Nov., 397, or, according to some writers, 11 Nov., 400. He is regarded as the Apostle of Gaul.

MARTIN I., Pope, succeeded Theodore 649; died 16 Sept., 655.

MARTIN II., or MARINUS I., succeeded Pope John VIII. 882; died Feb., 884.

MARTIN III., or MARINUS II., succeeded Pope Stephen VIII. 943; died 4 Aug., 946.

MARTIN IV., a Frenchman, elected Pope 1281; died 28 March, 1285.

MARTIN V., a Roman, succeeded Pope Gregory XII. 1417; died 20 Feb., 1431, aged 63.

MARTIN, Benjamin, a mathematician, born at Worplesdon, Surrey, 1704. He worked as a common labourer in the early part of life, but, by diligence, attained so much knowledge, as qualified him to be a schoolmaster at Chichester. After this he travelled the kingdom as a lecturer in experimental philosophy. By this means he was enabled to commence the business of an optician, in Fleet Street, where he lived in good reputation many years; but at last, owing to the misconduct of his son, he fell into decay, and was made a bankrupt, which had such an effect upon his spirits that he attempted to destroy himself; and though the wound did not prove immediately mortal, it hastened his death, 9 Feb., 1782. His works are numerous, and many of them valuable, particularly his Philosophical Grammar; and Treatises on Decimal Arithmetic, Optics, and Trigonometry. He for some time conducted a scientific magazine, part of which consisted of 'Lives of Philosophers and Mathematicians.'

MARTIN, Claude, was born at Lyons 1732. He went to India as a common soldier; but being illused in the French service, he entered into that of the English company, and rose to the rank of Colonel. He became a great favourite of the nabob of Oude, and by that means realised an immense property, the greater part of which devolved to his relations in France. He built a magnificent palace at Lucknow, furnished with a museum, a botanical garden, and an observatory. Died 13 Sept., 1800.

MARTIN, David, a French Protestant minister and theological writer, born at Revel, in Languedoc, 1639; died at Utrecht 9 Sept., 1721.

MARTIN, Frederick, a Church of England divine, educated at Cambridge, wrote 'Notes on the Gospels and Acts,' Lond., 1838 (anon.); and 'Genealogies illustrative of Sacred History.' Died 6 Dec., 1864.

MARTIN, Gregory, a Catholic divine, was born at Maxfield, Sussex, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford (M.A. 1564). He was for some time tutor in the family of the duke of Norfolk; but in 1570 he went to Douay, and in 1573 was ordained priest. Eventually he settled at Rheims, where he died 28 Oct., 1582. Gregory Martin will be ever remembered as the author of the 'Rheims' and 'Douay' version of the Holy Scriptures, which is still in use among all English-speaking Catholics. The New Testament was printed at Rheims, 4to., 1582, and the Old Testament at Douay, 2 vols. 4to., 1609-10. In translating the Bible from the Vulgate, he was assisted by Drs. Allen, Bristow, Reynolds, and others, but the work may be entirely ascribed to Mr. Martin, the others being only revisors. His other works are: A Treatise of Schism, showing that all Catholicks ought to abstain altogether from Heretical Conventicles, viz., Prayers, Sermons, &c., 1578; A Discovery of the manifest Corruptions of the Holy Scriptures, 1582; Letters to certain of his Friends, 1583; Treatise of the Love of the Soul; A Treatise of Peregrination and Relicks, 1583; and some translations from the Latin and Italian.

MARTIN, Jacques, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, celebrated as an historian and antiquary, was born at Fanjaux, Languedoc, 11 May, 1684; died at Paris 5 Sept., 1751.

MARTIN, JOHN, a painter, born near Hexham, Northumberland, 19 July, 1789. He early evinced an inclination for artistic pursuits, and was accordingly apprenticed, at the age of 14, to a coachbuilder at Newcastle; but at the end of a year he quarrelled with his master, and got his indentures cancelled. He next studied under an Italian artist of great merit and some reputation in Newcastle, named Boniface Musso, the father of the celebrated enamel painter, Charles Musso, or Muss, by whom Mr. Martin was, after his removal to London (1806), employed to paint on china and glass. From this source, and the proceeds he derived from teaching, and the sale of water-colour drawings, he was enabled to support himself without assistance from his parents, who were in humble circumstances. At the age of 19 he married, and thenceforward made increased efforts to secure fame and fortune. In 1812 he painted his first picture, 'Sadak in search of the Waters of Oblivion,' which, to his intense delight, fetched fifty guineas. It was followed by the pictures of 'Paradise,' 'The Expulsion,' 'Clytie,' and 'Joshua;' after which he produced (1819-28) a series of works conceived in a novel and sensational style, which was extremely popular. The principal of these were, 'The Fall of Babylon;' 'Macbeth;' 'Belshazzar's Feast;' 'Destruction of Herculaneum;' 'The Seventh Plague;' 'The Paphian Bower;' 'The Creation;' 'The Deluge;' and 'The Fall of Nineveh.' Subsequently he abandoned the easel, and was engaged for several years in executing a series of illustrations of Milton, for which he received 2,000 guineas, and in devising schemes for the improvement of the metropolis. About 1838, however, he again took up his brush, and worked assiduously till a few weeks before his death, which occurred at Douglas, in the Isle of Man, 9 Feb., 1854. His last productions, which he considered his masterpieces, were three large and showy pictures of 'The Last Judgment;' 'The Day of Wrath;' and 'The Plains of Heaven.

MARTIN, LOUIS AIMÉ, a French writer and critic, born at Lyons 1781; died at Paris 22 June, 1847.

MARTIN, SARAH, a philanthropist, who directed her labours to the amelioration of the condition of the inmates of our prisons, was born at Caistor, near Great Yarmouth, 1791, and died in the latter town 15 Oct., 1843.

MARTIN, THOMAS, D.C.L., a native of Cerne, Dorsetshire, was educated at Winchester School, and New College, Oxford, of which he was admitted a fellow 1539, though he took his doctor's degree at Bourges. Being nominated chancellor of the diocese of Winchester, he was joined in the commission with Dr. Story when Cranmer was brought to his trial at Oxford. This drew great odium upon him, and he retired to Ilfield, Sussex, where he died 1584. He was author of 'A Treatise proving that the Marriage of Priests and Professed Persons, is no Marriage, but altogether unlawful,' 1554; A Confutation of Dr. John Poynet's Book, intituled, 'A Defence of the Marriage of Priests,' 1555; 'Vita Gulielmi Wiccami Wintoniensis Episcopi,' 1597, and again 1690.

MARTIN, THOMAS, an antiquary, was born at Thetford, Suffolk, 8 March, 1697. He became clerk to his brother, who was an attorney at Thetford; but about 1723 he settled at Palgrave, where he died 7 March, 1771. He was familiarly called 'Honest Tom Martin of Palgrave;' and is known by a 'History of the Town of Thetford,' published 1779. He collected a mass of materials in illustration of the history and topography of Suffolk.

MARTIN, WILLIAM, a naturalist, born at Marsfield, Notts, 1767; died 31 May, 1810. In early life he trod the stage, which, however, he soon quitted, and established himself as a drawing-master, first at Burton-upon-Trent, next at Buxton, and finally at Macclesfield. He published 'Outlines of an Attempt to establish a Knowledge of Extraneous Fossils on Scientific Principles,' 1809; 'Petrificata Derbiensia, or Figures and Descriptions of Petrifactions collected in Derbyshire,' 1809; and some papers in the Transactions of various learned societies. His son, William Charles Linnæus Martin, who died at Lee, Kent, 15 Feb., 1864, aged 66, was for some years scientific officer to the Zoological Society of London. He published some esteemed works on natural history.

MARTIN, WILLIAM, an English writer of books for youth under the nom de plume of Peter Parley, died at his residence, Holly Lodge, Woodbridge, Suffolk, 22 Oct., 1867. He edited 'Peter Parley's Annual' for twenty-eight years.

MARTINE, GEORGE, M.D., a writer on anatomy, born in Scotland 1702; died in America 1743.

MARTINI, JOHN-BAPTIST, commonly called Padre Martini, was born at Bologna 1706. He belonged to the order of Friars Minor, and wrote a History of Music in Italian; 'Exemplare o Sia Saggio di Contrapunto;' and 'Compendio della Theoria de numeri per uso del Musico.' Died 4 Aug., 1784.

MARTINI, MARTIN, a Jesuit missionary, who wrote several Latin works illustrating the geography and history of China. He was born at Trent 1614, and died at Hang-Tcheou 6 June, 1661.

MARTINIÈRE, ANTOINE AUGUSTIN BRUZEN DE LA, an industrious French compiler, born at Dieppe 1684; died at the Hague 19 June, 1749. His chief work, the 'Dictionnaire Géographique, Historique, et Critique,' was first published at the Hague, 10 vols., 1726-30, and has been often reprinted.

MARTIUS, KARL FRIEDRICH PHILIP VON, a naturalist, was born 1794 at Erlangen, in Bavaria, and educated in the university there, being subsequently attached to the scientific expedition sent to Brazil by the Austrian and Bavarian governments (1817-20). On his return he was appointed professor of botany, and director of the botanical garden at Munich. In 1842 he became secretary of the mathematical and physical section of the Academy of Sciences of Munich, and president of the Botanical Society of Ratisbon. He died at Munich 13 Dec., 1868. Von Martius wrote a large number of works on natural history, the greater part of which had reference to his Brazilian voyage; but the most important of his publications is his monograph on Palms, entitled 'Genera et Species Palmarum,' 3 vols., 1823-45.

MARTOS, IVAN PETROVITCH, a Russian sculptor, born at Itchnia about 1755; died at St. Petersburg 17 April, 1835.

MARTYN, FRANCIS, an English divine of the Roman communion, was born in the county of Norfolk Feb., 1782, and educated first at Sedgley Park School, and next at St. Mary's College, Oscott. He was ordained priest 1805, and was stationed successively at Lowth, Lincolnshire, at Bloxwich, near Walsall, and finally at Walsall. Died 18 July, 1838. Mr. Martyn published 'Homilies on the Book of Tobias, being a detailed History and familiar Explication of the Virtues of that Holy Servant of God,' 8vo., York, 1817; 'A Series of Lectures on the Sacrament and Sacrifice of the Holy Eucharist,' 12mo., Lond. [1827 ?]; 'A Sermon preached at the opening of the Chapel of the Holy Family at Houghton Hall, Yorkshire,' 8vo., Walsall, 1829.

MARTYN, HENRY, a missionary, born at Truro, Cornwall, 18 Feb., 1781. His father was a labourer in the mines, till by indefatigable application he acquired knowledge enough to qualify himself for a clerkship in the counting-house of an eminent merchant at Truro. The son was bred in the grammar-school of that town, and in 1797 went to St. John's College, Cambridge, of which society he was chosen fellow 1802. The year following he took orders, obtained the degree of B.D., and in 1805 went to India as a chaplain to the company. In the East he soon displayed his rare talent for the acquisition of languages by becoming master of the Sanscrit. He translated the Common Prayer into Hindustani, and he performed all the service publicly in that tongue. From India he went to Shiraz, in Persia, where he resided ten months, and translated the Psalms and New Testament into that language. He also held conferences with learned Mahommedans, and converted some to Christianity. Died 16 Oct., 1812.

MARTYN, JOHN, F.R.S., a botanist, born in London 12 Sept., 1699. He was intended for the mercantile profession; but quitted the counting-house to follow his inclination for the study of natural history and physic. In 1720 he published a translation of Tournefort's History of Plants growing about Paris, which work brought him acquainted with Dillenius, in conjunction with whom he formed a botanical society, of which he became secretary. In 1724 he was chosen a follow of the Royal Society; and about this time he commenced lecturer in his favourite science. In 1730 he entered at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he was elected professor of botany in 1733, which place he resigned in 1761 in favour of his son. He died at Chelsea 29 Jan., 1768. Besides the work already mentioned, he published: 'Tabulæ Synopticæ;' Methodus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam nascentium; Historia Plantarum rariorum; The Grub-Street Journal, 2 vols.; an edition of Virgil's Georgics, with a translation and notes. He was also engaged in an abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, and translated some scientific works from the French. After his death appeared his 'Dissertations and Remarks on the Æneid of Virgil.'

MARTYN, THOMAS, F.R.S., son of the preceding, was born at Chelsea 1735, and educated at Cambridge, where in 1761 he succeeded his father in the botanical chair. In 1771 he was presented to the living of Ludgershall, Bucks, and in 1776 to that of Little Marlow, in the same county; but the former preferment he resigned on becoming rector of Pertonhall, Beds, where he died 3 June, 1825. His principal works are: 'Plantæ Cantabrigienses;' 'Catalogus Horti Cantabrigiensis;' Elements of Natural History; a translation of Rousseau's Letters on Botany, with large additions; Sketch of a Tour through France, Switzerland, and Italy; another Tour in Italy, with catalogues of curiosities in the principal cities of that country; Flora Rustica, 2 vols.; Language of Botany; and a new and enlarged edition of Miller's Gardener's and Botanist's Dictionary, 4 vols. folio.

MARTYR, PETER, was born 8 Sept., 1500, at Florence, his family name being Vermigli. He took the habit of a canon regular of St. Augustine, at the monastry of Fiesole, became head of his community, and was so eloquent in the pulpit as to be esteemed one of the best Italian preachers. A perusal of the works of Zwingle and Bucer led him to adopt the opinions of those reformers, to which he converted Tremellius, Zanchias, and others. He afterwards went to Zurich, then to Basle, and afterwards to Strasburg, where he taught publicly, and married a young nun named Catharine Merande. His increasing reputation occasioned him to be invited to this country, where he arrived with his wife 1549, and was professor at Oxford till 1553, when he returned to Strasburg. He taught afterwards at Zurich, where he died 12 Nov., 1562. Peter Martyr had attended the conference of Poissy in the preceding year, and left a daughter, whom the senate of Zurich maintained out of respect to her father's memory. He wrote Commentaries on the Bible, and a great many other works in support of his theological tenets.

MARVELL, ANDREW, was born 1620 at Kingston-upon-Hull, of which place his father was minister. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; on leaving which he spent some years in travelling. In 1657 he became assistant to Milton, as Latin secretary. At the Restoration he was elected into parliament for his native place, with a salary from his constituents. In 1672 he attacked Dr. Samuel Parker, in a piece entitled 'The Rehearsal transprosed;' which was followed by some others full of wit and argument. A few years after this, under the name of Andreas Rivetus, he encountered Dr. Turner, master of St. John's College, Cambridge, who had answered Bishop Croft's 'Naked Truth, or the true State of the Primitive Church.' Marvell next published 'An Account of the Growth of Popery, and arbitrary Government in England;' on which a reward was offered for a discovery of the writer and printer. But though Marvell was obnoxious to the ministry, he was somewhat of a favourite with the king, who took great delight in his conversation. One day, Lord Danby was sent to find out his lodgings, which were up two pair of stairs in a court in the Strand, and when his lordship opened the door, the patriot, in a surprise, told him, 'he believed he had mistaken his way:' Danby replied, 'not now I have found Mr. Marvell;' telling him, that he came from the king to know what his majesty could do to serve him? To which Marvell answered, that 'it was not in his majesty's power to serve him.' Lord Danby finding that no argument could prevail upon him to accept a place, concluded by saying, that the king had ordered him a thousand pounds, which he hoped he would receive. This he also refused; though, when the courtier was gone, he was obliged to borrow a guinea of a friend. He died 29 July, 1678, and was buried in the church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields. An edition of his poems was published

In 1726, in 2 vols. 12mo.; and a complete one of all his works in 1776, in 3 vols. 4to.

MARY I., Queen of England, eldest daughter of Henry VIII., by Catharine of Arragon, was born at Greenwich 18 Feb., 1517; succeeded to the throne 1553; married Philip of Spain, eldest son of Charles V., 1554; died 7 Nov., 1558.

MARY II., Queen of England, was born 30 April, 1662, being the daughter of the duke of York, afterwards James II., by Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon. At the age of fifteen she was married to William, Prince of Orange, whom she followed to England in 1689. The same year parliament having declared the crown vacant by the abdication of James, conferred it upon William and Mary. She died 28 Dec., 1694.

MARY STUART, Queen of Scotland, was born in the palace of Linlithgow 7 Dec., 1542. She was the daughter and heiress of James V., by Mary of Lorraine, and was only eight days old at the death of her father, on which a great contest took place among the nobility about the guardianship, which at last was entrusted to the earl of Arran. At the age of six years she was taken to France, where, in 1558, she was married to the dauphin Francis, who left her a widow two years afterwards, without issue, on which she returned to Scotland. In 1565 she espoused Henry Darnley, who had been previously created earl of Ross and duke of Rothsay. By him Mary had one son, who was afterwards James VI. of Scotland, and the first of England. In February, 1567, Henry Darnley was murdered; and in May following, Mary was married forcibly to John Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, a man of infamous character, and the actual perpetrator of that horrible deed. Bothwell, however, was soon afterwards obliged to leave the kingdom; and the queen was sent prisoner to the castle of Lochleven, from whence, after a confinement of eleven months, she escaped to Hamilton Castle. An open war now ensued between her and the regent, Murray; but Mary's forces, being undisciplined, were soon defeated, and she threw herself on the protection of Queen Elizabeth, who, after keeping her in custody eighteen years, caused her to be tried for conspiracy; and she was executed in the castle of Fotheringay 8 Feb., 1586-7. Her remains were interred in the cathedral of Peterborough; but James I., at his accession, caused the body of his unhappy parent to be removed to Westminster Abbey. She wrote poems in the Latin, French, Italian, and Scotch languages; and was a complete mistress of music. Several of her letters have been printed, and a greater number remain in manuscript. She was a firm believer in the Roman Catholic faith, and to that circumstance her death must be ascribed.

MASACCIO, or TOMASO DA SAN GIOVANNI, an Italian painter, born at San Giovanni, in Val d'Arno, 1401; died 1443.

MASCAGNI, PAUL, a celebrated Italian anatomist, born at Castelleto, near Sienna, 1752. He was professor at Sienna, Pisa, and Florence, where he died 19 Oct., 1815. The principal work of Mascagni, who made some important anatomical discoveries, is entitled 'Vasorum Lymphaticorum Corporis Humani Historia et Iconographia,' 1787.

MASCARON, JULES, an eloquent French preacher, was born at Marseilles 1634; entered the congregation of the Oratory 1650; became bishop of Tulle 1671; was translated to Agen 1679, and died 16 Nov., 1703. Five of his Funeral Orations are in print.

MASCHERONI, LAURENCE, a mathematician, the well-known author of 'The Geometry of the Compass,' was born at Castagneta, near Bergamo, 14 May, 1750. He became professor of mathematics at Pavia, and was employed by the Academy of Bologna in their experiments to ascertain the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. He assisted Fontana in drawing up the constitution of the Cisalpine Republic; and died at Paris 14 July, 1800.

MASCLEF, FRANÇOIS, a Hebraist, born at Amiens 1663, became a canon of the cathedral there, and died 14 Nov., 1728. He devised a method of reading Hebrew without vowel points, and explained it in his 'Grammatica Hebraica, à Punctis aliisque Inventis Massorethicis libera,' 1716.

MASDEU, JOHN FRANCIS, a Spanish Jesuit, celebrated as the author of a general History of Spain, published at Madrid in 20 vols. 4to., 1783-1800, under the title of 'Historia Critica de España, y de la Cultura Española en todo genere.' He was born at Barcelona 1740, and died at Valencia 11 April, 1817.

MASENIUS, JAMES, a Jesuit, born at Dalen, in the duchy of Juliers, 1606; died at Cologne 27 Sept., 1681. His principal work is a Latin poem, called 'Sarcothea, or the fall of Man;' which Lauder brought into notice by pretending that Milton was indebted to it for part of his Paradise Lost.

MASERES, FRANCIS, F.R.S., a mathematician and judge, born in London 15 Dec., 1731, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. After being called to the bar he was appointed attorney-general of Quebec, and in 1773 cursitor-baron of the Exchequer. He was also for some years deputy-recorder of London, and senior judge of the sheriff's court. Died 19 May, 1824. His scientific attainments were considerable, and he made himself favourably known by the publication of 'A Dissertation on the Negative Sign in Algebra;' 'The Elements of Plane Trigonometry;' 'The Canadian Freeholder;' 'Principles of the Doctrine of Life Annuities;' 'Scriptores Logarithmici,' 6 vols.; 'Occasional Essays on Various Subjects;' besides several scarce old works, illustrative of English history. He was also at the expense of printing Donna Agnesi's Analytical Institutions, and her other mathematical treatises.

MASHAM, DAMARIS, LADY, daughter of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, master of Christ's College, Cambridge, was born at Cambridge 1658. She was educated under the care of her father, and was early distinguished for her uncommon learning and piety. She became the second wife of Sir Francis Masham of Oates, in the county of Essex, bart., in whose house Mr. Locke resided for many years, and where he died. Lady Masham published in 1696, 'A Discourse concerning the Love of God,' and in 1705, 'Thoughts in reference to a Virtuous or Christian Life.' She also wrote the account of Mr. Locke in the Great Historical Dictionary. Died 20 April, 1708.

MASKELYNE, NEVIL, D.D., F.R.S., was born in London in 1732, and educated at Westminster School, whence he removed to Catharine Hall, and next to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship (B.A. 1754; M.A. 1757; B.D. 1768; D.D. 1777). In 1761 he was appointed by the Royal Society to go to St. Helena to observe the transit of Venus; in which voyage he determined the method of finding the longitude at sea by lunar observations. In 1763 he undertook another voyage to Barbadoes, to ascertain the longitude of that island, as well as to prove the accuracy of Harrison's time-keeper, with other objects of practical science. On his return he succeeded Mr. Bliss as royal astronomer; and in 1767 he published that useful work, 'The Nautical Almanack;' with the auxiliary volume, known by the name of 'The Requisite Tables.' In 1774 he printed the first volume of his 'Astronomical Observations;' and the same year he went to ascertain the lateral attraction of the hill of Shehallien in Perthshire; for his paper on which subject he received the Copleyan medal. Died 9 Feb., 1811. Besides the works already noticed, and his papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he published 'The British Mariner's Guide,' 1763.

MASON, Francis, B.D., was born in the county of Durham 1566. He became fellow of Merton College, Oxford; chaplain to James I.; rector of Orford, Suffolk; and archdeacon of Norfolk. Died Dec., 1621. He wrote, 'A Vindication of the Church of England, concerning the consecration and ordination of the Bishops, &c., as also of the ordination of Priests and Deacons,' 1613, which was ably answered by Dr. Anthony Champney.

MASON, George, an English writer, born about 1735; died 4 Nov., 1806. He published 'An Essay on Design in Gardening,' 1795; 'Life of Richard, Earl Howe,' 1803, &c.

MASON, Henry Joseph Monck, LL.D., an Irish barrister, died at the Dargle, co. Wicklow, 14 April, 1858, aged 79. He wrote an Essay on the antiquity and constitution of Parliaments in Ireland, 1820; Primitive Christianity in Ireland, 1836; Grammar of the Irish Language, 1839; Life of Bishop Bedell, 1843.

MASON, John, a dissenting minister, was the grandson of John Mason, rector of Water Stratford in Buckinghamshire, who, in 1693, collected a number of followers under the persuasion that the Millennium was about to commence. One of the sons of this fanatic became a dissenting minister at Dunmow, where the subject of this article was born in 1706. He was ordained, in 1730, pastor of a congregation at Dorking, in Surrey, from whence he removed to Cheshunt, where he died in 1763. His works are a 'Plea for Christianity,' which procured him the degree of M.A. from Edinburgh; a valuable Treatise on Self-Knowledge; The Lord's Day Evening Entertainment, a set of Sermons for families, 2 vols.; Fifteen Discourses; Christian Morals, 2 vols.; The Student and Pastor; Essays on the Power of Numbers, and the Principles of Harmony; and another on Elocution.

MASON John Monck, a privy councillor of Ireland, and a commissioner of revenue for that kingdom, died at Dublin 1809. He published the Dramatic Works of John Massinger, with notes critical and explanatory, 4 vols., 1779-94; Comments on Reed's edition of Shakspere 1785; Comments on the Plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, with an appendix containing some further Observations on Shakspere, extended to the late edition of Malone, by Steevens, 1788; and an Oration commemorative of the late Major-Gen. Hamilton, 1804.

MASON, Richard. See Angelus à Sancto Francisco.

MASON, William, a famous stenographer, of whose personal history little is known. He taught shorthand in London, and devoted his life to the improvement of his art, which he carried to a higher degree of perfection than any of his predecessors. His earliest publication, 'A Pen Pluckt from an Eagle's Wing,' 1672, contains a modification of Jeremiah Rich's method. He further developed the system in his 'Arts Advancement,' 1682; 3rd edition, 1699. At the latter date Mason was residing at 'the Writing School, The Hand and Pen, in Scalding Alley, over against the Stocks Market, London.' Still striving after perfection he brought out, in 1707, his best work, 'La Plume Volante.' This describes a method of shorthand writing, which was afterwards appropriated, without acknowledgment, by Thomas Gurney, and is now known as Gurney's system. See Gurney.

MASON, William, a divine and poet, born 1725, at Trinity Hall, Yorkshire; of which parish his father was vicar. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterwards obtained a fellowship in Pembroke Hall. In 1748 he wrote 'Isis,' a poem against the university of Oxford; which was replied to by Thomas Warton in his 'Triumph of Isis.' In 1752 Mason produced his 'Elfrida,' a dramatic poem, which was well received, though the attempt to establish it on the stage proved abortive. On entering into orders he was presented to the living of Aston, and appointed one of the king's chaplains. In 1759 he published the drama of 'Caractacus,' written, like the former, on the Greek model. In 1762 he obtained the precentorship of York, with a canonry annexed. In 1767 he lost his wife, who died of a consumption at Bristol, where she lies buried in the cathedral, with a monument to her memory, and an exquisite epitaph written by her husband. On the commencement of the American war, Mr. Mason took so decided a part in politics, that he was deprived of his chaplainship; but some years before his death the ardour of his zeal for liberty abated. Died 7 April, 1797. His other works are: Miscellaneous Poems, 1764; The English Garden, a poem in four books; Ode to the Naval Officers of Great Britain; Memoirs of Gray, prefixed to his works; Life of William Whitehead; Translation of Du Fresnoy's poem on Painting, with Sir Joshua Reynolds's Notes; Ode to Mr. Pitt; Ode in Commemoration of the Revolution of 1688; Essay on Church Music. He was likewise the author of the 'Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers,' and the other pieces published under the name of M'Gregor.

MASSANIELLO, the name commonly given to Tomas Aniello, a fisherman of Naples, who was born 1623, when that kingdom was subject to the house of Austria, and governed by a viceroy. The people had borne the foreign yoke with great patience till 1646, in which year a new and oppressive tax upon all kinds of fruit being imposed much discontent arose. Though the archbishop interested himself on behalf of the distressed populace, nothing was done for their relief, as the farmers of the taxes had art enough to persuade the governor that the clamour only proceeded from the rabble. At this time Massaniello, who was in his 24th year, earned his livelihood by fishing, and observing the murmurings which prevailed, he began to entertain some idea of redressing the grievance. Having imparted his design to the banditto Perone and his companions, they laughed at him; but when he assured them that he was in earnest, they readily promised him their assistance. Shortly after this, the fish of Massaniello being seized for the tax, he went among the fruiterers, and advised them not to make any more purchases of the country dealers till the impost had been taken off, which they promised. In the meantime he collected a number of idle boys, to each of whom he gave a small cane, and taught them certain cries suited to the object which he had in view. The shopkeepers, agreeable to the instructions they had received, refused to trade with the country people, and a riot ensuing, the regent sent an officer, named Anaclero, to quell the tumult. The multitude, however, grew more incensed at his appearance, and he was glad to save his life by a precipitate retreat. The populace now gathered in great numbers, and Massaniello, by his harangues, inflamed them to acts of more daring violence. After burning the toll-houses, they marched to the viceroy's palace, which they entered and rifled. The governor himself escaped with difficulty, and the prince of Bisignano, to whom the people were much attached, quitted the city. Thus left without a head, the multitude chose Massaniello for their leader, and the banditto Perone as his assistant. A stage was erected in the market-place, where this new ruler sat to give audience and to minister justice, which he did with equal gravity and impartiality. One hundred and fifty thousand men obeyed his orders, and an incredible number of women, armed like Amazons, were enrolled in the same cause. In this state of things the viceroy applied to the archbishop, whose mild persuasions had nearly succeeded in restoring order, when an attempt being made to assassinate Massaniello, the negotiation was broken off and the rage of the people burst forth with redoubled fury. In this exigency the viceroy had recourse once more to the archbishop, who prevailed upon Massaniello to renew the treaty and to visit the palace, which he did with uncommon pomp, on horseback, dressed in cloth of silver, a plume of feathers in his hat, and a drawn sword in his hand, attended by fifty thousand armed followers. On the Sunday following the terms were ratified at the cathedral church, and everything had an auspicious appearance, when, unfortunately for Massaniello, ambition induced him to violate his engagement, and to hold a power which he did not know how to direct. His conduct became capricious, and so tyrannical, that four persons took an opportunity of despatching him. The last words he uttered were, 'Ungrateful traitors!' His head was thrown into one ditch, and his body into another.

MASSARI, Lucio, an historical painter, born at Bologna 1569; died 1633.

MASSÉNA, André, prince of Essling, duke of Rivoli, and a marshal of France, was born at Nice 6 May, 1758. After serving three years at sea he entered the French army (1775), and became successively colonel and general of brigade. In the revolutionary war he greatly distinguished himself, particularly in Italy, where he acquired the name of 'the favoured Child of Victory.' In 1799 he conducted as general-in-chief the memorable campaign of Switzerland, which was distinguished by the battle of Zurich. Seventy thousand prisoners were the fruits of this campaign, where he had to contend with the Archduke Charles and Marshal Suwarrow. In 1805 he commanded again in Italy and penetrated into the German States. He was afterwards charged with the conquest of Naples, and subsequently went to Poland, whence he returned after the treaty of Tilsit. In 1809 the war recalled him to Germany, where, after severe combats, he received the title of Prince for saving the French army on the plains of Essling. He afterwards distinguished himself no less at the battle of Wagram. His military career closed in Spain and Portugal, where he had to contend with the superior genius of Wellington. Died at Paris 4 April, 1817.

MASSEY, John, a native of Wiltshire, received his education at Oxford. He embraced the Catholic religion in the reign of James II., and in 1686 was installed dean of Christ Church, where he fitted up a chapel for the celebration of Mass. On the landing of William of Orange he retired to France, took holy orders, and became confessor to the Conception nuns at Paris, where he died 11 Aug., 1715.

MASSEY, William, a schoolmaster, born Jan., 1691. He was for many years master of a boarding-school at Wandsworth, Surrey; and died about 1764. He published 'The Origin and Progress of Letters,' 1763, containing biographical notices of English writing-masters; 'Corruptæ Latinitatis Index, or a Collection of Barbarous Words and Phrases,' 1755; and 'Remarks upon Milton's Paradise Lost,' 1761. He also left a number of translations and other pieces in MS.

MASSILLON, Jean Baptiste, a French divine, was born 24 June, 1663, at Hières, in Provence. He entered the congregation of the Oratory, and became so celebrated for his eloquence, that the general of his order called him to Paris, where he drew crowds of hearers. Louis XIV. paid him this compliment: 'When I hear other preachers I go away much pleased with them; but when I hear you I go away displeased with myself.' In 1717 he was made bishop of Clermont. Died 18 Sept., 1742. His discourses have been published in 14 vols. 8vo.

MASSINGER, Philip, a dramatic poet, born at Salisbury 1584. He became a commoner of Alban Hall, Oxford; but left the university without a degree, owing, as is supposed, to his turning Catholic. After this he resided near the theatre, in Southwark, where he died 17 March, 1639-40. Of his works, which rank him next to Shakspere, the best edition is that by Gifford, 4 vols., 1813.

MASSON, Francis, a gardener and botanist, born at Aberdeen 1741. He was sent in 1771 to the Cape of Good Hope, to collect plants for the royal gardens; after which he went to the Canary Islands and the West Indies with the same object. He next visited Portugal and Madeira, and returned to the Cape in 1786, where he remained till 1795; and on his return made a voyage to North America. He died at Montreal about Christmas, 1805. He published a splendid volume on the genus 'Staphelia' 1796.

MASSON, John, a French Protestant minister, who settled in England, and was employed as tutor in Bishop Burnet's family. He died in Holland about 1750. His best work is 'Vitæ Horatii, Ovidii, et Plinii junioris.'

MASSUET, René, a French Benedictine, editor of Irenæus, was born 1665, and died 1716.

MASTER, Thomas, a poet, born at Cote, Gloucestershire, and educated at Winchester

School, from whence he was elected to New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He died in the winter of 1643-4. His works are, 'Mensa Lubrica,' a poem, describing the game of shovel-board; a Greek Pindaric on the Crucifixion, which has been translated by Cowley; Latin poems. He assisted Lord Herbert in his Life of Henry VIII.

MASTERS, ROBERT, was born in London 1713. He received his education at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship and took his degree of B.D. In 1756 he was presented to the college living of Landbeach, Cambridgeshire; to which was afterwards added that of Linton; but this he exchanged for Waterbeach. Died 5 July, 1798. His works are, History of Corpus Christi College; Memoirs of Thomas Baker; Catalogue of the Pictures in the University of Cambridge; Account of the Parish of Waterbeach; papers in the Archæologia.

MASUDI, ABOUL HASSAN ALI, a distinguished Arabian writer, died at Cairo 956.

MATHER, COTTON, D.D., F.R.S., son of Increase Mather, was born at Boston 12 Feb., 1663. He received his education at Harvard College; and in 1684 was appointed minister at Boston, where he was consulted on all public affairs. It is to be regretted, however, that a man of so much worth should have been concerned in the prosecution of a number of persons on the charge of witchcraft. Notwithstanding this the university of Glasgow sent him his degree of doctor of divinity; and the Royal Society of London elected him a member. Died 13 Feb., 1728. His principal works are, An Ecclesiastical History of New England; The Christian Philosopher; Psalterium Americanum; The Wonders of the Invisible World, or the Trials of Witches.

MATHER, INCREASE, brother of Samuel Mather, was born in New England 1635. He studied at Harvard College, and next at Dublin, where he took his master's degree in 1658. Soon after this he became minister of Torrington, Devonshire; from whence he removed to Guernsey; but at the Restoration he returned to New England, and was chosen minister of the New Church at Boston. When James II. published his Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, Mr. Mather came to England with an address of thanks to the king; but before his return the Revolution occurred, and he obtained from William a new charter for the colony of Massachusetts. He died president of Harvard College 23 Aug., 1723. He wrote, 'A History of the War with the Indians;' an Essay on remarkable Providences; a Discourse on Comets; a Discourse on Earthquakes.

MATHER, SAMUEL, a Puritan divine, born in Lancashire 1626. He went with his father, Richard Mather, a minister, to New England, where he was educated at Harvard College. In 1650 he returned to his native country, and became chaplain to Henry Cromwell, whom he accompanied to Ireland, where he was made fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. He was silenced at the Restoration; and died 26 Oct., 1671. His principal work is entitled 'The Figures and Types of the Old Testament explained.'

MATHEW, THEOBALD, D.D., an Irish clergyman, better known as 'Father Mathew,' the Apostle of Temperance, was born at Thomastown, co. Tipperary, 10 Oct., 1790. At the age of thirteen he was sent to the lay academy of Kilkenny, from whence, being destined for the priesthood, he was transferred in his twentieth year to the college of Maynooth. He was ordained priest 1814, and associating himself soon afterwards with the Capuchin friars at Cork, he devoted all his time to the temporal and spiritual wants of the poor. It was at the suggestion of a Quaker that Father Mathew first directed his attention to the suppression of the vice of intoxication, to which the Irish people were at that period so generally addicted. He acted upon the suggestion with all the energy of his character, preached a crusade against the ruinous vice, and ere long succeeded in enrolling some of the most obdurate drunkards in Cork in his Total Abstinence Association. This encouraged him to extend his mission, and he visited most of the towns in Ireland, being everywhere received with the wildest enthusiasm. It is said that at Nenagh 20,000 persons took the pledge in one day; 100,000 at Galway in two days; in Loughrea 80,000 in two days; between that and Portumna from 180,000 to 200,000; and in Dublin about 70,000 during five days. He afterwards carried on his operations in Liverpool, Manchester, London, and other English towns, and even made a temperance tour through the United States. In furthering the object he had so much at heart Father Mathew, who notwithstanding his vows had obtained from the Holy See a dispensation enabling him to hold property, dissipated the whole of his private fortune; but the Government granted him a pension of £300 as an acknowledgment of the important services he had rendered to the nation. This benevolent priest died at Queenstown 8 December, 1856. A statue of him has since been erected in the city of Cork; and a Life of him by Mr. John Francis Maguire, M.P., was published in 1863.

MATHEW, TOBIE, an English prelate, born at Bristol 1546. He became a student of Christ Church, Oxford; and in 1569 was chosen university orator. In 1570 he obtained a canonry of Christ Church, and the archdeaconry of Bath. In 1572 he was elected president of St. John's College; in 1583 made dean of Durham, and in 1595 was consecrated bishop of that diocese, from whence he was translated to York in 1606. Died 29 March, 1628. There is nothing of his in print, except one Latin sermon against Campian the Jesuit.

MATHEW, Sir TOBIE, son of the above, was born at Oxford 1578, and became a student of Christ Church; but after taking his degrees in arts he went abroad, changed his religion, and entered the Society of Jesus. Notwithstanding this he received (1623) the honour of knighthood from James I. He died at Ghent 13 Oct., 1655. His published works are, the Life of St. Teresa; a translation of St. Augustine's Confessions; Life of Troilo Savelli; Letters; and a translation into Italian of Bacon's Essays.

MATHEWS, CHARLES, a celebrated comedian, was born in London 28 June, 1776, and after receiving a sound education at Merchant Taylor's School, was apprenticed to his father, who kept a bookseller's shop in the Strand. To the horror of his family, who were rigid Methodists, he showed a decided inclination for the stage, and after appearing as an amateur at several provincial theatres obtained an engagement at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. His histrionic reputation, however, was built up some years later on the York circuit, he having joined the company of the well-known Tate Wilkinson. On 16 May, 1803, he made his first appearance on the London boards at the Haymarket Theatre, as 'Jubal' in 'The Jew,' and he continued to act there during several seasons with considerable success. In 1804 he was engaged at Drury Lane, and in 1812 at Covent Garden, having risen to the highest rank among the professors of the mimic art. Among the characters in which he mostly excelled were, 'Mawworm,' 'Sir Fretful Plagiary,' 'Morbleu,' 'Monsieur Mallet,' 'Dick Cypher,' and 'Multiple' in the 'Actor of All Work.' In 1818 he abandoned the regular drama and commenced a species of entertainment in the form of a monologue, which, under the name of 'Mathews at Home,' proved highly successful, and drew large audiences not only in the metropolis, but in almost every theatre in the kingdom, and also in the United States which he twice visited. The result of his first voyage across the Atlantic suggested the materials for a new entertainment called 'A Trip to America.' Mr. Mathews died at Plymouth 28 June, 1835.

MATHIAS, Maria di, born in Italy about 1804, founded the order of the Sisters of the Most Precious Blood. She died 20 Aug., 1866, having seen the establishment of upwards of fifty convents of her order in Italy. It is said that the first time it became necessary for her to communicate with the ecclesiastical authorities of her diocese, being unable to write, she knelt down, pen in hand, before the crucifix, and was miraculously enabled to form the letters, and find the fitting expressions for conveying her meaning to the bishop. A branch of the Sisterhood of the Most Precious Blood is established in London.

MATHIAS, Thomas James, F.R.S., F.S.A., was born about 1750, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship. He devoted his life to the profession of literature, and in 1794 published anonymously the first dialogue of his best known work, 'The Pursuits of Literature,' a satirical poem. Three other dialogues subsequently appeared (1796-7), and the entire work reached its 16th edition in 1812. It attracted universal attention, chiefly on account of the notes, which abound in deep and discriminating criticism on public men and opinions. In 1814 with finances very limited, Mr. Mathias quitted his native country for Naples, where he resided till his death in 1835. Among his other works are 'Runic Odes, imitated in the Norse Tongue in the Manner of Mr. Gray,' 1781; 'Essay on the Evidence relating to the Poems attributed to Rowley,' 1783; 'Odes, English and Latin,' 1798; an edition of Gray's Works, 2 vols., 1815; to say nothing of various publications in Italian, of which language he was a complete master.

MATSYS, Quintin, a painter, born at Antwerp 1460. He was originally a blacksmith, which business he quitted on falling in love with the daughter of a painter, and by diligent application became such an excellent artist, that Sir Joshua Reynolds says some of his heads are not inferior to those of Raphael. One of his principal pictures is that of the 'Two Misers,' at Windsor. Died 1529.

MATTEI, Paolo da, a Neapolitan painter, died 1728, aged 67.

MATTHESON, John, a German composer and writer on music, born 28 Sept., 1681, at Hamburg, where he died 17 April, 1764.

MATTHEW OF WESTMINSTER, an English historian in the fourteenth century. He was a Benedictine of the Abbey of Westminster, and compiled a work entitled 'Flores Historiarum ab exordio mundi, ad ann. 1307,' published at London in 1567, and at Frankfort in 1601. An English translation by C. D. Yonge was published at London, in 2 vols., 1853.

MATTHEWS, Eugene or Owen, a Catholic divine, appointed bishop of Clogher 1609, and archbishop of Dublin 1611. He died in the Netherlands 1623.

MATTHEWS, Thomas, an English admiral, was a native of Glamorganshire. He commanded in the Mediterranean 1744, and fought an obstinate but indecisive battle off Toulon with the combined fleets. Owing to his not being supported by Lestock, his second in command, Admiral Matthews failed in gaining a complete victory; and yet for this he was dismissed the service, and Lestock acquitted. Died 1751.

MATTHIÆ, Augustus Henry, a German Hellenist, born at Göttingen 25 Dec., 1769; died at Altenburg 6 Jan., 1835. Blomfield's translation of his Greek Grammar has gone through several editions; and his 'Manual of the History of Greek and Roman literature' has also been rendered into English.

MATTHIAS CORVINUS, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was born 1443; and elected to the throne of Hungary 1458. He engaged in a successful war against the Bohemian heretics, the Turks, and the Emperor Frederick IV., from whom he took Vienna and Nieustadt, with a great part of Austria. Died 6 April, 1490.

MATTHIAS, son of Maximilian II., was elected emperor of Germany 1612, in succession to Rudolphus II. He made peace with the Turks 1615; and died at Vienna 20 March, 1619, aged 63.

MATTHIEU, Pierre, a French historian, born 1583; died 12 Oct., 1621.

MATTHIOLUS, Peter Andrew, a physician and naturalist, born at Sienna 23 March, 1500; died at Trent 1577. His Commentary on Dioscorides, published both in Italian and Latin, is an immense repertory of all the botanico-medical erudition of that epoch.

MATTHISSON, Frederick Von, a German lyric poet, born near Magdeburg 23 Jan., 1761; died at Wörlitz, near Dessau, 12 March, 1831.

MATTI, Emanuel, a Spanish poet, born 1663; died 1737.

MATTOCKS, Isabella, an English actress, born 1746; died 26 June, 1826. She played tragedy and comedy with equal success, and was the chief favourite at Covent Garden for nearly twenty years. Her maiden name was Hallan.

MATURIN, Charles Robert, an Irish clergyman of the Established Church, born at Dublin 1782, and educated at Trinity College. On taking orders he obtained the curacy of St. Peter's Church, in his native city, but though much followed and admired as a preacher he never gained any higher preferment, owing probably to the eccentricity of his manners, which were little suited to his profession. Died 30 Oct., 1824. Mr. Maturin published some novels of no ordinary merit; a volume of impassioned sermons; and a tragedy called 'Bertram, or the Castle of St. Aldobrand,' which was performed at Drury Lane with considerable success.

MATY, Matthew, M.D., was born in Holland 1718. After taking his degree at Leyden, he came to England, and in 1750 commenced the 'Journal Britannique,' which procured him many friends. In 1753 he was appointed one of the keepers of the British Museum, and in 1772 he became principal librarian of that institution. He was also secretary to the Royal Society, and died 2 Aug., 1776. Dr. Maty wrote the life of Lord Chesterfield, prefixed to his Miscellaneous Works, in 2 vols., 1777-8.

MATY, Paul Henry, son of the preceding, was born in 1745. He was elected from Westminster School to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a travelling fellowship. After entering into orders he seceded from the church, and devoted himself to literature. He became assistant librarian at the Museum, and one of the secretaries of the Royal Society, which last situation he resigned, on a quarrel with Sir Joseph Banks. In 1782 he began a review, which continued four years, and was then dropped. Died 16 Jan., 1787. He translated Riesbeck's Travels into English, and into French the accounts of the gems in the 'Gemmæ Marlburienses.' After his death appeared a volume of his sermons; in which collection were inserted by mistake two or three of Archbishop Secker's.

MAUCROIX, François de, a French translator and biographer, born at Noyon 7 Jan., 1619; died at Rheims 9 Aug., 1708.

MAUDUIT, Israel, the son of Isaac Mauduit, a dissenting minister of Exeter, was born at Bermondsey 1708. He was a merchant, and distinguished himself by some very able pamphlets, particularly one entitled 'Considerations on the German War in 1760.' He was afterwards customer of Southampton, and agent for the province of Massachusetts. Died 14 May, 1787.

MAUNDER, Samuel, a literary compiler, born about 1790; died at his house in Gibson Street, Islington, 30 April, 1849. He was brother-in-law to William Pinnock, whose name is on the title-pages of the well-known 'Catechisms,' although Maunder had the chief hand in their compilation. Of Mr. Maunder's numerous publications we may mention the 'Treasury of Useful Knowledge;' 'Treasury of History;' 'Scientific and Literary Treasury;' 'Treasury of Natural History;' and 'Biographical Treasury.'

MAUPERTUIS, Pierre Louis Moreau de, a mathematician, was born at St. Malo 17 July, 1698. He studied in the college of La Marche, at Paris; and in 1723 was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, the memoirs of which institution abound with his communications. In 1736 he was sent on an expedition to the polar circle, to ascertain the figure of the earth. In 1740 he was invited to Berlin by the king of Prussia, whom he followed to the field, and was present at the battle of Molwitz, where he was made prisoner and carried to Vienna. On regaining his liberty, he married a lady of fortune at Berlin, and was appointed president of the Royal Academy of Sciences. In this situation he became involved in a quarrel with Voltaire, who for his conduct was ordered to quit the Court. Maupertuis died of a consumption at Basle 27 July, 1759. His mathematical and philosophical works were printed in 4 vols. 8vo. at Lyons 1756.

MAUR, St., a celebrated disciple of St. Benedict, died 5 Jan., 584. There was established in France a congregation of Benedictines which bore his name, and which was a reform of the order, approved by Pope Gregory XV. 1621. This congregation has produced many learned men.

MAUREPAS, Jean Frédéric Phelippeaux, comte de, a French statesman, born 1701. In 1738 he was appointed minister of state; but was exiled in 1749, at the instigation of a lady at the court. In 1774 he was recalled to the ministry; and it was by his advice that France took part in the disputes between England and America. Died 21 Nov., 1781. His memoirs have been published.

MAURICE, count of Nassau, and prince of Orange, was born 14 Nov., 1567, being the second surviving son of William I., prince of Orange, surnamed the Silent, whom he succeeded in the government of the Low Countries. He added to his dominions by conquest, and was considered the ablest general of his time. His death took place at the Hague 23 April, 1625.

MAURICE, Charles, a Parisian journalist, died Sept., 1869, aged 87. He was at one time editor of the 'Courrier des Théâtres;' and published 'Histoire Anecdotique du Théâtre et de la Littérature.'

MAURICE, Godfrey. See Jones, John.

MAURICE, Thomas, was born at Hertford 25 Sept., 1754, and having completed his studies at Oxford was ordained to the curacy of Woodford, Essex, where he resided till 1785, when he removed to Epping. In 1804 he was presented to the vicarage of Cudham, Kent. He also obtained the pension which had been bestowed on the poet Cowper, and was appointed one of the librarians in the British Museum. Died 30 March, 1824. In addition to some poems and sermons Mr. Maurice published 'Indian Antiquities,' 7 vols., 1793-1800; 'History of Hindostan,' 2 vols., 1795-98; 'Modern History of Hindostan,' 2 vols., 1802-10; and 'Memoirs,' 1819.

MAURICEAU, François, a French surgeon and writer on midwifery, died at Paris 17 Oct., 1709.

MAURITIUS, Tiberius, emperor of the East, was born in Cappadocia 539; and reigned from 582 to 602, when he was put to death by Phocas.

MAUROLICO, Francis, a mathematician and astrologer, born at Messina 16 Sept., 1494; became abbat of St. Maria del Porto in Sicily; and died 21 July, 1575.

MAURY, Jean Siffrein, a French cardinal, born 1746. On entering into orders he became a celebrated preacher at Paris, where he was elected a member of the academy and obtained an abbey. When the revolution broke out he became one of the representatives of the clergy in the States-General, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence in behalf of his order, as he afterwards did in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the constituent assembly he went to Italy, where he was nominated bishop of Nicæa, and a cardinal. In 1807 he made his submission to Bonaparte, who in 1810 appointed him archbishop of Paris; but when the usurper fell the cardinal was obliged to leave France. He died at Rome 11 May, 1817. He published several works, the best of which is 'An Essay on Eloquence.'

MAVOR, William Fordyce, LL.D., a compiler of educational works, was born in the parish of New Deer, Aberdeenshire, 1 Aug., 1758. At an early age he quitted his native country, and when only seventeen officiated in a school at Burford, Oxfordshire. Subsequently he started a school at Woodstock. Having contrived to get a title for holy orders, he was presented to the vicarage of Hurley, Berks. He was also rector of Stonesfield, Oxfordshire, and of Bladon-with-Woodstock, at which latter place he died 29 Dec., 1837. Many of his educational manuals—particularly his 'Spelling Book'—formerly enjoyed a high reputation, though they have been superseded by works more adapted to the requirements of the age. We can only afford space to mention his 'Universal Stenography,' 1779, a faulty system of short-hand, now little used; 'Dictionary of Natural History;' 'Poems,' 1793; 'Historical Account of Voyages and Travels;' 'The British Nepos, or Lives of Illustrious Britons;' 'Elements of Natural History;' 'The English Spelling Book,' 1801; 'Universal History,' 25 vols.; Histories of Greece, Rome, and England; and 'The Mother's Catechism, or First Principles of Knowledge.'

MAWE, JOHN, a mineralogist, born in Derbyshire 1764. He went early in life to Rio de la Plata and Brazil, and was charged by Don Pedro to make a scientific tour through the latter country. The result of his observations was given to the public under the title of 'Travels in the interior of Brazil, particularly in the gold and diamond districts of that country, by authority of the Prince Regent of Portugal; including a Voyage to the Rio de la Plata, and an Historical Sketch of the Revolution of Buenos Ayres,' 1812; a work which received so large a share of the public favour that it passed through several editions, both here and in America. Settling in London, Mr. Mawe opened a shop for the sale of minerals in the Strand, where he died 26 Oct. 1829. His 'Mineralogy of Derbyshire;' 'Treatise on Diamonds;' 'Introduction to the Study of Conchology;' and other works on cognate subjects, possess great merit.

MAWE, JOHN SAINT, an English writer, was educated at St. Paul's School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He died July, 1820, and in the following year a volume of Selections from his Papers was printed for private circulation.

MAWE, LEONARD, an English prelate, received his education at Peterhouse, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. Subsequently he was appointed master of Trinity College in that university; chaplain to Prince Charles, whom he attended when he went to Spain, to pay his addresses to the Infanta; and at length, in 1628, bishop of Bath and Wells. He enjoyed the latter dignity but a short time, dying at Chiswick, Middlesex, 2 Sept., 1629.

MAWSON, MATTHIAS, an English prelate, was son of a brewer at Chiswick, and after a preliminary education at St. Paul's School, removed to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he was elected master 1724. He became bishop of Llandaff 1738; was translated to Chichester about two years afterwards; and in 1754 succeeded Dr. Gooch in the see of Ely. Died Nov., 1770, aged 87.

MAXENTIUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS, son of Maximianus Hercules, declared himself emperor of Rome 306. He was defeated by Constantine, and drowned in the Tiber 312.

MAXIMIANUS, GALERIUS VALERIUS, originally a shepherd, was raised to the Roman throne by Diocletian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. Died 311.

MAXIMIANUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS HERCULES, a Roman emperor, who rose to that dignity from the rank of a common soldier. He was put to death by order of Constantine, his son-in-law, 310.

MAXIMILIAN I., archduke of Austria, son of Frederick III., was born 1459. He was elected king of the Romans, and afterwards emperor. He was unsteady in his attachments, and little to be depended upon in political affairs. Died 12 Jan., 1519.

MAXIMILIAN II., son of Ferdinand I., was born 1527. He was elected king of the Romans 1582, and two years later succeeded his father as king of Hungary and Bohemia, and emperor of Germany. Died 1576.

MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH, nephew of Charles Theodore, duke of Bavaria, was born 1756, and succeeded his uncle 1799. He was at first an ally of Napoleon's, and gave his daughter in marriage to Eugène Beauharnais 1806, in which year his duchy was transformed into a kingdom. In 1813, however, he entered into the league formed against France. Died 1825.

MAXIMINUS, CAIUS JULIUS VERUS, son of a peasant, rose by his valour to be emperor of Rome 235. He was a tyrant, and fell by assassination 238.

MAXIMUS, TYRIUS, a philosopher of the second century of the Christian era. He resided chiefly in Greece, and left forty-one dissertations upon different subjects, which were first published by Stephens in 1557.

MAXWELL, WILLIAM HAMILTON, a novelist and miscellaneous writer, was born at Newry, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1820 he was collated to the prebend and rectory of Ballagh, in Connaught, but as there was not a single Protestant in the parish he devoted his whole time to literature and field sports. Among his works may be cited, 'Stories of Waterloo;' 'Wild Sports of the West;' 'The Dark Lady of Doona;' 'Hector O'Halloran;' and other dashing novels; a Life of Wellington, in 3 vols.; 'Rambling Recollections of a Soldier of Fortune;' 'Wanderings in the Highlands;' 'Peninsular Sketches;' and 'History of the Rebellion in Ireland in 1798, with Memoirs of the Union, and of Emmett's Insurrection in 1803.' Died 29 Dec., 1850, aged 56.

MAY, THOMAS, was born at Mayfield, Sussex, 1594. He became a commoner of Sidney College, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Gray's Inn, but did not make the law his profession. He was a favourite with Charles I., and during his residence at court produced five plays, besides a translation of Lucan's 'Pharsalia,' to which poem he added a supplement. He also wrote, by the royal command, two poems on the reigns of Henry II. and Edward III. Notwithstanding this, May turned against the king in the civil war, and was appointed secretary and historiographer to the parliament. He died 13 Nov., 1650, and was buried in Westminster Abbey; but at the Restoration his body was taken up, and interred in St. Margaret's churchyard. Besides the above works, he wrote 'The History of the Parliament of England, which began in 1640,' folio. May also published an abstract of this history.

MAYER, JOHN FREDERICK, a Lutheran minister and writer on theology, born at Leipsic 1650; died 1712.

MAYER, or MAYR, JOHN SIMON, a German musical composer, born at Mendorf, in Bavaria, 14 June, 1763; died at Bergamo 2 Dec. 1845.

MAYER, TOBIAS, an astronomer, was born at Maspach (Würtemberg) 17 Feb., 1723. Though he was self-taught, the university of Gottingen elected him to the mathematical professorship. Died 20 Feb., 1762. His widow received £3000 from the English parliament for his Theory of the Moon, and Astronomical Tables and Precepts. The other works of Mayer are 'A new and general Method of resolving Geometrical problems;' A Mathematical Atlas; Account of a Lunar Globe.

MAYERNE, Sir THEODORE, a physician, born at Geneva 1573. Going to Paris, he became physician to Henry IV.; but on the death of that monarch he came to England, and was appointed physician to James I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He continued in the same favour with Charles I., to whom he adhered in the Rebellion. He died at Chelsea 15 March, 1655. His works were published 1701.

MAYHEW, EDWARD, an English monk of the Benedictine order, died at Cambray 14 Sept., 1625, leaving Notes upon the Sarum Manual; A Treatise of the Grounds of the Old and New Religion; An Answer to Mr. Field's Exceptions; A Paradise of Prayers, from several authors; 'Congregationis Anglicanæ Ordinis S. Benedicti Trophæa,' Rheims, 1619.

MAYNARD, FRANÇOIS, a French poet, born at Toulouse, 1582; died 1646.

MAYNARD, Sir JOHN, serjeant-at-law, was born at Tavistock, Devonshire, about 1602. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, on leaving which he became a student of the Middle Temple. In the Long Parliament he distinguished himself as one of the prosecutors of Strafford and Laud; but afterwards he opposed the violent proceedings of the army, and the usurpation of Cromwell, for which he was twice sent to the Tower. After the Restoration he was knighted, but refused the honour of being a judge. At the Revolution he displayed great talents in the conference between the Lords and Commons, on the question of the abdication of the throne by James II. When William III. paid him a compliment on his age by saying that he must have outlived all the men of the law in his time, Sir John answered that he should have outlived the law too, if his highness had not come over. In 1689 Serjeant Maynard was one of the commissioners of the great seal. Died 9 Oct. 1690.

MAYNE, JASPER, D.D., was born at Hatherleigh, Devonshire, 1604. He was elected from Westminster School to Christ Church, Oxford, where he obtained a studentship and proceeded to his doctor's degree. He suffered considerably for his loyalty in the civil wars, but lived to be restored to his place in the college, and to receive a canonry of Christ Church, with the archdeaconry of Chichester. Died 6 Dec., 1672. The doctor published a translation of part of Lucian, two comedies and some sermons.

MAYNWARING, ARTHUR, was born at Ightfield, Shropshire, 1668. He was educated at Shrewsbury School and Christ Church Oxford, after which he entered one of the inns of court, but never followed the law. In the reign of William he was made one of the commissioners of the customs, and in that of Anne, auditor of the imprests. Died 13 Nov., 1712. He wrote several pieces in prose and verse; and in 1715 a volume was published, entitled 'The Life and Posthumous Works of Arthur Maynwaring, Esq.'

MAYO, HERBERT, M.D., F.R.S., an English surgeon, who, for some time, was lecturer at King's College, London, and surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital. He subsequently, however, forsook the legitimate path of his profession, and became a mesmerist and a hydropath, on both of which subjects he wrote extensively. He died at Bad-Weilback, near Mayence, 15 Aug, 1852. His 'Outlines of Human Physiology' is an able work.

MAYOW, JOHN, D.C.L., a chemist, born in Cornwall 1645. He was at first a scholar of Wadham College, and next probationer fellow of All Souls, where he took his degrees in law, though he afterwards applied to the study of physic. He died in London Sept., 1679. He wrote 'Tractatus quinque medico-physici; 1. De sale nitro, et spiritu nitro-ærio; 2. De Respiratione; 3. De Respiratione fœtus in utero et ovo; 4. De motu musculari et spiritibus animalibus; 5. De Rachitide,' published at Oxford, in 1 vol., 1674. It appears from these tracts that the chemical discoveries claimed by Priestley and Scheele were known to Mayow.

MAZARIN, JULIUS, a cardinal and statesman, born at Piscina in Italy 14 July, 1602. He studied at Alcala, in Spain, after which he went to Rome and became attached to the service of Cardinal Sacchetti, whom he accompanied on his mission into Lombardy. While in that country Mazarin effected a peace between the French and Spaniards, which procured him the esteem of the cardinals Richelieu and Barberini, by the latter of whom he was recommended to the pope, who sent him as nuncio-extraordinary to the court of France. In 1641 he was made a cardinal, and on the death of Richelieu, succeeded him as prime minister. At first he was rather popular, but in a short time cabals were formed against him with such effect that he was dismissed from the royal presence, and compelled to leave the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, Mazarin contrived to dispel the storm, and he even returned to court with increased power. After this he continued in the administration of affairs till his death, 9 March, 1661. His letters have been printed in 2 vols.

MAZZINGHI, JOSEPH, Count, a musical composer, was born in England 25 Dec., 1765, his father being an Italian, who cultivated his son's musical talent to such purpose that at the age of nineteen he was qualified to hold the important post of director at the Opera House. When the building was burnt down (1789) and all the music of Paesiello's opera of 'La Locanda' lost, Mazzinghi wrote down from memory all the orchestral parts. Among the operas which he composed for Covent Garden and Drury Lane were 'The Blind Girl,' 'The Exile,' 'Chains of the Heart,' 'Ramah Droog,' 'Free Knights,' 'Paul and Virginia,' and 'The Turnpike Gate.' Many of his songs obtained an extraordinary popularity. His death occurred at the Catholic College at Downside, near Bath, 15 Jan., 1844, and he was buried in the Catholic chapel at Chelsea on the 25th of that month. In recording the fact the 'Gentleman's Magazine' mentions that 'his remains had been attended in solemn procession, on the previous evening, from his residence in Cadogan Place, with all the imposing ceremonies of the Church of Rome (torches lighted, priest in his pontifical robes, &c)—a sight, it is believed, rarely witnessed in this country, in the public thoroughfares, since the epoch of the Reformation.'

MAZZOCCHI, ALEXIS SYMMACHUS, an Italian antiquary, was born near Capua 1684, and became professor of Greek and Hebrew at Naples, where he died 1771.

MAZZUCHELLI, JOHN MARY, Count DE, a biographer, born at Brescia 28 Oct., 1707; died 19 Nov., 1765. His great work on the Writers of Italy ('Gli Scrittori d'Italia') was published in 6 folio vols., 1753-63.

MAZZUOLI. See PARMEGIANO.

MEAD, JOHN. See ALMEIDA.

MEAD, MATTHEW, a nonconformist divine, born in Buckinghamshire 1629. He became minister of Shadwell, from which place he was ejected at the Restoration; and then went to Holland, but returned in 1674 and erected a large meeting-house at Stepney, where he died 16 Oct., 1699. He published some religious works, the principal of which are, 'The almost Christian tried and cast,' and sermons on 'Ezechiel's Wheels.' Among the MSS. in the British Museum (Addit. 10,600, 10,601) are seventeen sermons preached at Stepney by Matthew Mead, transcribed from short-hand notes written after him by James Andrews, in 1703 and 1710.

MEAD, RICHARD, M.D., F.R.S., son of the preceding, was born at Stepney 11 Aug., 1673. He studied at Utrecht and Leyden, and from thence went to Padua, where he took his doctor's degree, in which he was incorporated at Oxford on his return to England; and appointed physician to St. Thomas's Hospital. He was also admitted a fellow of the Royal Society, and of the College of Physicians. In 1719 he was consulted by government on the means of preventing contagion; and the advice which he gave respecting quarantine laws was adopted. He also contributed to the introduction of the practice of inoculation for the small-pox, and a new method of treating that disorder. He became principal physician to George II., and had his two sons-in-law, Drs. Wilmot and Nichols, for his associates. In the midst of his professional engagements he cultivated polite literature, and encouraged the arts. His library and museum were open to all men of science; many of whom were assisted in their labours by his liberality. Dr. Mead died full of honours 16 Feb., 1754. His works have been published in one volume, 4to., 1762.

MEADOWCOURT, RICHARD, was born in Staffordshire 1697, and educated at Oxford. In 1732 he was promoted to a canonry of Worcester, and died there 1769. He wrote 'A Critical Dissertation, with Notes, upon Milton's Paradise Regained.'

MEADOWS, DRINKWATER, an English comedian, died at Barnes, Surrey, June, 1869.

MÉCHAIN, PIERRE FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ, a French astronomer, born at Laon 16 Aug., 1744; died in Spain 20 Sept., 1805.

MECHERINO. See BECCAFUMI.

MEDE, JOSEPH, B.D., was born 1586, at Berden, Essex. He became a commoner of Christ's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He was also chosen reader of the Greek lecture. Died 1 Oct., 1638. His works, of which the best known is his 'Clavis Apocalyptica,' were published in folio, 1672.

MEDICI, COSMO DE', a citizen of Florence, called the 'Father of his Country,' was born in 1389. He was the son of John de' Medici, who died in 1428; at which time Cosmo had acquired distinction as a merchant and statesman. In 1433 the party of Rinaldo d'Albizi banished him from the republic, on which he went to Venice; but in about a year he returned, and Rinaldo was obliged to quit Florence. Cosmo now became the first man in the state; and employed his wealth in promoting literature, particularly the study of the Greek language, and the Platonic philosophy; for which purpose he founded an academy, and collected from the east an immense number of manuscripts. Died 1 Aug., 1464.

MEDICI, LORENZO DE', grandson of the preceding, was born 1448, and succeeded his father, Peter as the head of the republic in 1469. While engaged in the advancement of literature, a conspiracy was formed against the house of Medici, by the family of the Pazzi; but after assassinating the brother of Lorenzo, they were defeated and banished. Lorenzo, on terminating a contest with the Pope, devoted himself to the cultivation of learning and the arts. He restored the academy of Pisa; founded another at Florence; and formed a noble gallery and library. On the surrender of Constantinople to the Turks, he employed the fugitive Greek scholars in collecting manuscripts, and thus proved the reviver of learning in Europe. Well, therefore, did he merit the title of 'Lorenzo the Magnificent,' which posterity, as well as his contemporaries, have unanimously concurred in giving him. He wrote several pieces of Italian poetry; and died 8 April, 1492. His life by William Roscoe is a highly interesting work.

MEDINA, Sir JOHN, a portrait painter, born at Brussels 1659. He came to England in 1686; and after painting a great number of pictures, went to Scotland, where he was knighted by the duke of Queensberry, lord high commissioner. He died there 1711. His grandson, John Medina, who died at Edinburgh 1796, was also a painter.

MEDWIN, THOMAS, cousin and biographer of the poet Shelley, died at Horsham, Sussex, 2 Aug., 1869, aged 80.

MEEN, HENRY, was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. (B.D. 1776). He afterwards became minor canon and lecturer of St. Paul's Cathedral, the chapter of which presented him to the rectory of Cole Abbey and the prebend of Twyford. Died 3 Jan., 1817, aged 72. Mr. Meen completed Fawkes's translation of the Argonautics of Appolonius Rhodius; and published 'Remarks on the Cassandra of Lycophron.' He was also the author of 'Successiva Opera; or Selections from ancient Authors, sacred and profane;' and a poetical piece entitled 'Happiness.'

MEERMAN, GERARD, a Dutch civilian and writer on topographical antiquities, was born at Leyden 1722; became pensionary of Rotterdam; and died 15 Dec., 1771.

MEERMAN, JOHN, son of the preceding, wrote some able historical and legal works, and greatly augmented his father's library, which he generously bequeathed to the town of the Hague. While Louis Bonaparte was king of Holland Meerman was director of the Fine Arts and of Public Instruction; and after the country was united to France he became a count of the empire and a senator. Born 1753; died 19 Aug., 1815.

MEHEGAN, GUILLAUME ALEXANDRE, a French writer, was born of an Irish family at Salle, in the diocese of Alais, 1721; died at Paris 1766. His chief work, 'A View of Universal Modern History,' was translated into English by Henry Fox, 3 vols., 1779.

MEHEMET ALI, Pasha of Egypt, one of the most remarkable men of his age, was born at Kavala, in Roumelia, about 1769, and commenced life as a tobacconist there, but subsequently volunteered into the army. In his new career he soon obtained high favour with the governor of Kavala by his efficient assistance in quelling a rebellion and dispersing a band of pirates; and on the death of his commanding officer he was appointed to succeed him. Afterwards in various engagements with the French he distinguished himself by his skill and valour. He rapidly rose in rank and gained a strong ascendancy over the minds of his soldiers. After the expulsion of the French a civil war broke out between the Turks and the Mamelukes, in which Mehemet Ali took an active part. In 1803 the Albanians in the service of the pasha revolted because they could not get their pay, and, after several conflicts in Cairo, they became masters of the city under the direction of Mehemet Ali. A long and confused struggle now ensued between various factions, the result being that in 1805 Mehemet Ali was invested with the supreme authority by the principal inhabitants of Cairo as the only man capable of restoring order. The sultan confirmed his elevation, and, in 1806, he was installed in the pashalic of Egypt on condition that he should send to the sultan a tribute of about £240,000 sterling. The pashalic of Egypt was then commonly called the pashalic of Cairo, and extended only to Middle Egypt and the Delta, but a few months after the installation of Mehemet Ali the Porte consented to give him also the pashalic of Alexandria as a reward for the services he had rendered to the Ottoman empire on the occasion of the evacuation of Lower Egypt and the city of Alexandria by the English. In 1808 Mehemet Ali received orders from the Porte to attack the Wahabees, a fanatical sect of the Mohammedan religion who had pillaged the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. Before engaging in this war the viceroy determined upon putting an end to the power of his old allies the Mamelukes. Accordingly, on 1 March, 1811, the Mamelukes were invited in a body to the citadel at Cairo to attend at the investiture of the viceroy's son Toussoon, as chief of the expedition against the Wahabees. When the ceremony was over the Mamelukes mounted their horses, but on reaching the citadel gates, found them closed, and a sudden discharge of musketry from soldiers posted on the walls completely annihilated them. A great many Mamelukes were put to death at the same time in the provinces. It is computed that 470, with their chief, Ibrahim Bey, perished in the citadel; and in the city and throughout the country no fewer than 1200 were killed. Thus ended the power of these formidable chiefs, who had kept Egypt in a state of anarchy and warfare ever since the year 1382. Mehemet Ali now made himself master of Upper Egypt; and the Wahabees were vanquished after a protracted struggle, which was brought to a close by his son Ibrahim Pasha. He assisted the sultan in quelling the Greek insurrection against the Porte (1824); and on 16 July his fleet, consisting of 163 vessels, sailed for the Morea under the command of Ibrahim Pasha, who for three years kept the country in subjection, though he was obliged to retire after the battle of Navarino (20 Oct., 1827). In 1830 the Porte conferred upon Mehemet Ali the administration of the island of Candia. The following year he sent into Syria a powerful army under the command of Ibrahim Pasha, who in a few months reduced the whole of the country to submission. Mehemet Ali was thereupon declared a rebel by the sultan, who sent an army to regain possession of the country, but his forces were uniformly worsted. The European powers, however, intervened, and peace was concluded in 1833, Syria and the district of Adana being ceded to Mehemet Ali, in conjunction with the pashalic of Egypt, on his acknowledging himself a vassal of the sultan, and engaging to remit to the Porte the same tribute as the former pashas of Syria. In 1839 Sultan Mahmoud made an attempt to drive the Egyptians from the country, but the Turkish armies had to retreat. England, Austria, Russia, and Prussia then, in conjunction with the Porte, signed a treaty (15 July, 1840), and afterwards finding that the viceroy would not evacuate Syria by fair means, determined upon driving him out by force. The first engagement took place 10 Oct., 1840, near Beyrout, when the Egyptian army was completely routed, and the town taken. Caiffa and Saida were bombarded in the same month; Tripoli and Tarsous soon followed; and, on 3 Nov., the bombardment and capture of Acre, in the short space of four hours, convinced Mehemet Ali that further resistance would be useless. The town of Alexandria was blockaded by an English squadron, and Mehemet Ali, finding that he could no longer temporise, acceded to the terms proposed, the hereditary pashalic of Egypt in his own family being secured to him. The Porte also granted to him, without hereditary succession, the provinces of Nubia, Darfour, Sennaar, and Cordofan. From this period Mehemet Ali devoted himself, with much success, to developing the resources of Egypt and promoting agriculture, commerce, and learning. Advanced age having produced mental incapacity, his son Ibrahim Pasha was appointed viceroy (1848), but on his death very shortly afterwards the sovereignty was assumed by the next eldest heir male, Abbas Pasha, son of Mehemet's second son Toussoon. Died 2 Aug., 1849.

MÉHUL, Étienne Henri, a French musical composer, born at Givet 1763; died at Paris 18 Oct., 1817.

MEIBOMIUS, John Henry, a physician, born at Helmstadt 1590; died at Lubeck 1655. He wrote some medical works, and a Life of Mæcenas. His son, Henry Meibomius, born at Lubeck 1638, became professor of medicine, history, and poetry, at Helmstadt, where he died 26 March, 1700. He published 'Scriptores Rerum Germanicorum,' 3 vols., 1688. Mark Meibomius, a learned critic of the same family, was born at Tonningen (Schleswig) about 1630, and died at Utrecht 1711, leaving an edition of the Greek Mythologists; Corrections for an edition of the Bible in Hebrew, &c.

MEINERS, Christopher, a German historian and philosopher, was born at Warstade (Hanover) 1747; became professor of philosophy and prorector at Göttingen; and died 1 May, 1810. His 'History of the Female Sex' has been translated into English.

MELA, Pomponius, a Latin writer on geography, born in Spain in the first century of the Christian era. His 'Cosmographia,' or 'De Situ Orbis,' has gone through several editions: the best is by Tzschucke, 3 vols., Leipsic, 1807.

MELANCTHON, Philip, was born at Bretheim, in the palatinate of the Rhine, 16 Feb., 1497. His family name was Schwarzerdt, or 'Black Earth,' which he exchanged for the Greek term of Melancthon. After a domestic education he went to Pfortsheim, where Reuchlin assisted him in his studies. He next removed to Heidelberg; and in 1512 to Tubingen, where he read lectures on the classics and the sciences. In 1513 he received the degree of doctor in philosophy; and in 1518 the elector of Saxony appointed him professor of Greek at Wittenberg. Here he became acquainted with Luther, whom he accompanied to Leipsic, and joined in the dispute with Eckius. In 1527 Melancthon was empowered to visit the churches in Saxony; after which he was appointed, in conjunction with Luther, to draw up a code of ecclesiastical laws for the reformed states. He was also employed in framing the confession of Augsburg. The moderation of Melancthon exhibited a striking contrast to the violence of Luther, while his learning contributed much to the progress of the reformation. He was invited to France and England by the monarchs of those kingdoms, but never went out of Germany. He died at Wittenberg 19 April, 1560. Melancthon left two daughters; one of whom became the wife of George Sabinus, and the other of Gaspar Peucer. His works were published in 4 vols. folio, 1601.

MELBOURNE, William Lamb, Viscount, an English statesman, was born in London 15 March, 1779, being the second son of the first Lord Melbourne. In 1805 the borough of Leominster returned him to the House of Commons, and he sat in that assembly as representative of various constituencies, until his father's death in 1828 transferred him to the Upper House. He entered parliament as a Whig, but afterwards adhered to the Tory party. Under Canning's administration he was appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland (1827), but he did not acquire much distinction in the House of Commons, though in the hereditary chamber he ascended to the rank of a political chieftain. On Earl Grey's coming into power after the resignation of the duke of Wellington (1830), Lord Melbourne accepted the seals of the Home Office, but he was not equal to the undertaking, and fortunately for the department his administration of its affairs did not continue much beyond three years. When the Grey government resigned, after the secession of the Conservative Whigs, Viscount Melbourne was commanded by the king to form an administration (July, 1834). This he did; but in the following Nov. the death of Earl Spencer having called from the House of Commons Lord Althorpe, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the principal strength of the ministry, the king abruptly dismissed Lord Melbourne from office, and even requested him to be the bearer of the letter to his successor, Sir Robert Peel, who by the advice of the duke of Wellington was at once summoned home from Italy, formed an administration, and made a determined stand against any further encroachments on our institutions; but parliament decided against the Conservative administration, and in April, 1835, Lord Melbourne resumed his position as prime minister, which he retained until the second accession of Sir Robert Peel to power in Sept., 1841. Died 24 Nov., 1848.

MELCOMBE, George Bubb Dodington, Lord, was born 1691, being the son of an apothecary in Dorsetshire. He was educated at New College, Oxford, and on the death of his maternal uncle succeeded to his name and estate. At this time he was connected with Sir Robert Walpole, who appointed him a lord of the treasury, and gave him the place of clerk of the pells in Ireland. Some time afterwards he joined the opponents of that minister, for which he lost his seat at the treasury board; but when his new friends came into office he was made treasurer of the navy, which post he resigned, and attached himself to the interests of Frederick, prince of Wales. He was made a peer on the accession of George III., and died 28 July, 1762. He wrote some poems and political tracts, but is best known by his 'Diary,' which contains much information respecting his life and times.

MELDOLA, Dr. Raphael, a Jewish theologian and philosopher, born at Leghorn 1754. He was appointed in 1805 high rabbi of the ancient and chief synagogue in England, and died in London 1 June, 1828. Dr. Meldola published 'Korban Minhà,' a literary comment on, and explanation of, the service of high priest, which is read at every synagogue throughout the world on the feast-day of Kipoor; a rabbinical work of great importance, entitled 'Hupat Hatanim;' and some sermons in English.

MELEAGER, a Greek poet, born in the territory of Gadara, in Syria, B.C. 96. His epigrams are printed in the Greek Anthologia.

MELETIUS, bishop of Lycopolis, in Thebais, was the founder of a sect called by his name. Having apostatised in the Dioclesian persecution, he was degraded from the episcopal function by Peter, archbishop of Alexandria, on which he formed a schism about the year 301. His followers united with the Arians, and justified apostacy on the ground of self-preservation. They were condemned by the first council of Nice.

MELISSUS, a Greek philosopher of the Eleatic sect, lived about 440 B.C. He held the eternity of matter, and that the changes it undergoes are merely illusory.

MELITO (St.), bishop of Sardis, presented in 171 a petition to Marcus Antoninus, in behalf of the persecuted Christians, part of which only is extant. He died before A.D. 197.

MELLAN, Claude, a French designer and engraver, born at Abbeville 1601; died at Paris 9 Sept., 1688.

MELLON, Alfred, an English musical composer, and manager of popular concerts in London, died at Chelsea 27 March, 1867, aged 46.

MELLON, Harriet. See St. Albans.

MELMOTH, William, a barrister, born 1666. He became a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and, in conjunction with Peere Williams, published Vernon's Reports. But the work which does most honour to his name is the 'Great Importance of a Religious Life,' one of the best known practical books of piety in our language. An edition of it by Mr. Charles Purton Cooper, comprising a life of the author, and four valuable appendices, was printed at London 1849. Melmoth died 6 April, 1743.

MELMOTH, William, son of the above, was born 1710. He also was bred to the law, and in 1756 was made a commissioner of bankrupts. He died at Bath 15 March, 1799. His works are—Letters, under the name of Fitzosborne; a translation of Pliny's Epistles, 2 vols.; The Letters of Cicero, with remarks, 3 vols.; translations of Cicero 'De Senectute,' and 'De Amicitia;' Memoirs of his Father; and some poems in Dodsley's collection.

MELVILLE, Henry Dundas, Viscount, son of Robert Dundas, Lord Arniston, was born 1740, and educated at Edinburgh. In 1763 he was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates; in 1773 appointed solicitor-general; in 1775 lord advocate; and in 1777 joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1782 he was sworn of the privy council, and made treasurer of the navy; but when the coalition administration came into power he lost his places. This, however, was but for a short time, and when that party fell he resumed his station at the navy board, on which he relinquished that of lord advocate. The board of control for East India Affairs being established, Mr. Dundas was appointed its first president, and in 1791 he became secretary of state for the home department, which he exchanged for the war office 1794. He continued in active employment till 1801, when he resigned his places, and was created Viscount Melville. On the return of Mr. Pitt to power, his lordship was made first lord of the Admiralty, and continued so till he was impeached in 1805 of high crimes and misdemeanors in his former office of treasurer of the navy. Of all the charges brought against him, however, he was acquitted, and afterwards resumed his seat in the privy council, though he never returned to public business. Died 29 May, 1811.

MELVILLE, Sir James, was born at Halhill, Fifeshire, 1530. He was page to Queen Mary, who permitted him to enter the service of the duke of Montmorenci; after which he was employed by the elector Palatine, and on several embassies. In 1561 he returned to Scotland, and was made gentleman of the queen's bed-chamber. James VI. appointed him a privy councillor, and gave him a situation about his person. Died 1606. His 'Memoirs' were printed in 1683. The best edition of this excellent historical work is that printed by the Bannatyne Club 1827, and reprinted by the Maitland Club 1833.

MELVILLE, Robert, a British general, born 12 Oct., 1723, at Monimail, Fifeshire. In 1744 he entered the army, and served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748). In 1756 he was made major of the 38th regiment, then in Antigua, and soon afterwards he was employed in active service, particularly in the invasion of Guadaloupe, for which he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and in 1760 appointed governor of the island. Not long after he proceeded, as second in command, with Lord Rollo to the capture of Dominica. In 1762 Martinico was taken, chiefly through his exertions, and the fall of that important colony was followed by the surrender of other French islands. He was now made brigadier-general, and governor-in-chief of all the captured possessions in the West Indies. These settlements, particularly Tobago, he greatly improved without enriching himself. After the general peace he travelled over Europe, and made numerous observations to ascertain the passage of Hannibal over the Alps. In his researches into antiquities he was peculiarly sagacious, and among other discoveries solved the long-contested question as to the manner of placing the oars and rowers in the galleys. He also traced the sites of many Roman camps in Britain, and he applied his knowledge of antiquity to the improvement of the modern art of war in several inventions. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and had the degree of LL.D. conferred upon him by the university of Edinburgh. He was appointed a full general 1798, and died 29 Aug., 1809.

MEMLING, Hans. See Hemling.

MENAGE, Gilles, a French writer, born at Angers 15 Aug., 1613. He was bred to the law, but became disgusted with that profession, and entered the church. Though he obtained some ecclesiastical preferments, particularly the deanery of St. Peter, at Angers, he devoted himself solely to literary pursuits, and published several works, the chief of which are, 'Origines de la langue Françoise;' 'Miscellanea,' in Greek, Latin, and French; an edition of Diogenes Laertius; 'Poemata;' 'Origine della Lingua Italiana;' 'Juris Civilis amœnitates;' 'Observations sur la langue Françoise;' 'Historia Mulierum Philosopharum.' Menage died 23 July, 1692.

MENANDER, a Greek poet, born at Athens about 342 B.C. He began to write comedies at the age of twenty; but though he produced eighty, only a few fragments exist. Terence is supposed to have translated most of his plays from Menander, who was drowned accidentally about B.C. 293.

MENANDRINO, Marsilio, a celebrated jurist, commonly called Marsilius of Padua, died 1328.

MENASSEH-BEN-ISRAEL, a celebrated Jewish rabbi, born in Spain or Portugal about 1604, and educated in Holland. At the age of 18 he succeeded his tutor, Rabbi Isaac Usiel, as preacher and expounder of the Talmud in the synagogue at Amsterdam; and soon afterwards he commenced the work entitled 'Conciliador,' on which his reputation, as one of the most learned and accurate of Jewish theologians, chiefly rests. He came over to England in the time of the Commonwealth, and negotiated with the Protector for the settlement of the Jews in England. Several writers assert that, in order to gain his end, he offered Cromwell £200,000, but on condition that the Jews should have St. Paul's Cathedral appropriated to their use. Cromwell thought that the cause of the Jews was the cause of God, and that their establishment here would be the means of their conversion, because Christianity in its purity was to be found in England, particularly among the Independents. The proposal, however, met with the strongest opposition from the clergy and the people generally. Being unsuccessful in his mission, Menasseh-Ben-Israel withdrew to the Continent, and died at Amsterdam about 1659. His principal works are, 'Conciliador nel Pentateucho,' in which he reconciles those passages of Scripture which apparently contradict one another; 'De Resurrectione Mortuorum;' 'De Creatione Problemata XXX.;' 'De Termino Vitæ;' 'Spes Israelis;' 'A Defence of the Jews in England;' and an edition of the Hebrew Bible. A life of him, by Pocock, is prefixed to the English translation of his treatise, 'De Termino Vitæ,' 12mo., London, 1699.

MENCKE, Otto, was born at Oldenburg, in Westphalia, 22 March, 1644, and became professor of morals at Leipsic, where he died 29 Jan., 1707. He published several learned works, and projected the 'Acta Eruditorum' of Leipsic, of which 30 vols. were completed at the date of his decease. His son, John Burcard Mencke (b. 1674; d. 1 April, 1732), became professor of history at Leipsic, and published a collection of the works of German historians, and 33 vols. of the 'Acta Eruditorum.'

MENDELSSOHN, Moses, a Jewish writer, born at Dessau, in Anhalt, 1729. Being very poor he went to Berlin, at the age of fourteen, and was employed by a rabbi as a transcriber of manuscripts. In this situation he acquired a considerable knowledge of the languages and sciences, which he cultivated by an acquaintance with some other literary Jews, and afterwards with Lessing, whom he defended from the charge of atheism. Died 4 Jan., 1786. His principal works are, 'Jerusalem,' a treatise in which he asserts that Judaism is only a civil institution; 'Phædon, a Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul,' which procured him the name of the 'Jewish Socrates;' Commentary on Part of the Old Testament; Letters on the Sensation of the Beautiful.

MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY, FELIX, a German musical composer of great celebrity, was born at Berlin 3 Feb., 1809, being the great-grandson of Moses Mendelssohn, mentioned above. His musical talents manifested themselves at an early age, and, thanks to the wealth of his parents, they were cultivated to such purpose that, at the age of eight, he played the piano in a masterly style. At the age of nine he played for the first time in public in his native town. The year following he went to Paris with his family; and at this period he had in his portfolio a great number of original compositions, some of which were published in 1824. The success they met with decided the elder Mendelssohn to allow his precocious son to follow the bent of his inclination, and to adopt the musical profession. In 1827 his opera, 'Die Hochzeit des Gamacho,' was brought out at Berlin, but with indifferent success. Subsequently he visited England, France, and Italy; and it was during this tour that he brought out at Paris his overture to Shakspere's 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which he had composed at the age of 17, and which became very popular. On returning to his own country, he gave a series of concerts, the profits of which were devoted to the relief of the poor; and he endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, to found a theatre at Düsseldorf. He afterwards paid several professional visits to this country, where his oratorios of 'St. Paul' and 'Elijah,' usually considered his masterpieces, were performed amidst rapturous applause. In 1835 he was appointed director of the concerts at Leipsic, where he spent most of the remainder of his life. Frederick William IV., king of Prussia, appointed him his chapel-master (1841) and lavished on him the most flattering encouragement. He died at Leipsic 4 Nov., 1847. This composer, who is classed by his countrymen immediately after Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, had thoroughly studied the works of Sebastian Bach and Handel, but was deficient in enthusiasm and perhaps in imagination. Indeed it has been said he would have been the greatest musician who ever lived, if music were merely a science.

MENDEZ, MOSES, an English poet, born in London of Jewish parentage. He received a liberal education, and was created M.A. at Oxford, 1750. He wrote some very popular musical entertainments, and several poems, which were published in one volume. He was the intimate friend of Thomson, and died worth £100,000 in 1758.

MENDEZ-PINTO, FERDINAND, a traveller, born in Portugal about 1509. He departed for the Indies 1537, and on the voyage the ship was taken by the Moors, who carried her to Moca, where Ferdinand was sold for a slave; but after some adventures he arrived at Ormus, from whence he pursued his original object, and in 1558 returned to his native country, where he published a romantic relation of his voyages, which has been translated into English. Died 8 July, 1583.

MENDOZA, DIEGO HURTADO, a Spanish statesman, general, and writer, born at Granada 1503; died at Valladolid 1575. His History of the War against the Moors, first published in 1610, is the best specimen of the historical style in the Spanish language.

MENDOZA, GONZALES PETER DE, a Spanish cardinal, born 1428. He became an eminent statesman and archbishop of Toledo, and died 11 Jan., 1495.

MENDOZA, JOHN GONZALES, a Spanish friar, born about 1540, was sent ambassador to the emperor of China 1584; and on his return became successively bishop of Lipari, in Italy; of Chiapi, in New Spain; and of Propajan, in the West Indies. He wrote 'A History of China,' of which an English translation was published 1588, and reprinted by the Hakluyt Society, 2 vols., 1853-4.

MENEDEMUS, a Greek philosopher, was a native of the island of Eubœa. He became a disciple of Plato and Xenocrates, but afterwards joined the Cyrenaic sect. Died B.C. 284, aged 83. There was a Cynic philosopher of the same name, who flourished in the reign of Antigonus, king of Macedon, and who brought his sect into disrepute by the extravagance of his conduct.

MENESTRIER, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, a French Jesuit, historian, and writer on heraldry, born at Lyons 1631; died 21 Jan., 1705.

MENESTRIER, JEAN BAPTISTE LE, a French numismatist, born at Dijon 1564; died 1634.

MENGS, ANTHONY RAPHAEL, a painter, born at Aussig, in Bohemia, 1726. He studied under his father, who was painter to Augustus III., king of Poland, after which he went to Rome, where he was patronized by Charles III., king of Spain, for whom he executed a number of pictures. He died at Rome 29 June, 1779. The best of his pieces in England is an altar-piece at All Souls College, Oxford. Mengs wrote some works on his art, which have been translated into English.

MENINSKI, FRANÇOIS, De Mesgnien, an orientalist, born in Lorraine 1623; died at Vienna 1698. His valuable 'Thesaurus Linguarum Orientalium' was published at Vienna, in 5 vols. folio, 1680-7.

MENNES, Sir JOHN, a seaman and poet, was born at Sandwich, Kent, 1 March, 1598, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In the reign of Charles I. he was made comptroller of the Navy Office, and knighted. About this time he had the command of a ship of war, but was deprived of it by the republicans. At the Restoration he was made governor of Dover Castle, comptroller of the navy, and an admiral. He wrote some poems in a collection called 'Musarum Deliciæ, or the Muses' Recreation,' 1656. Died 18 Feb., 1670-1.

MENNO, SIMON, the founder of a sect called by his name, was born in Friesland 1505, and received orders in the church of Rome; but being of a profligate character he apostatized, and formed a new society of Anabaptists in the duchy of Holstein, where he died 1561.

MENOCHIUS, JAMES, a famous civilian, born at Pavia 1532; died at Milan 10 Aug., 1607. His son, John Stephen Menochius, born 1576, became a Jesuit, and died at Rome 4 Feb., 1656, leaving some esteemed theological works in Latin.

MENTSCHIKOFF, Alexander Danilovitch, a Russian prince, born at Moscow 1674. He was originally a pastrycook, in which situation he was noticed by the Czar Peter, who took him into his service, and raised him to the rank of major-general in the army and a prince of the empire. On the death of the emperor Mentschikoff secured the succession to Catharine, who caused Peter II. to marry his daughter. But these honours ruined the favourite; for becoming equally offensive, by his haughty deportment, to the emperor and the nobility, he was at last disgraced and sent into Siberia, where he died 2 Nov., 1729.

MENTSCHIKOFF, Prince Alexander Sergeewitsch, a Russian general and diplomatist, born 1789. His fame as a soldier mainly rests on the stubborn defence he made during the war with Turkey, France, and England, when he was invested with the chief civil and military command in the Crimea. In the battle of the Alma (20 Sept., 1854) he met with a disastrous defeat; but he exhibited great resolution and readiness of resource in preventing, at that critical moment, the fall of Sebastopol. He was recalled immediately after the death of the Emperor Nicholas, when the command was given to Prince Gortschakoff. Died 1869.

MENTZEL, Christian, a German physician and botanist, born at Fürstenwalde (Brandenburg) 1622; died at Berlin 17 Jan., 1701.

MENZINI, Benedict, an Italian poet, born at Florence 1646. He became canon of St. Angelo, in Piscina, at Rome, and a member of the society of Arcadi, as also of the Academy Della Crusca. Died 1704. His works were published in 4 vols. 8vo. His 'Art of Poetry' has been translated into English.

MERCATI, Michael, a naturalist, born at San Miniato, in Tuscany, 1541; became superintendent of the botanic garden at Rome, and physician to the Pope; and died 1593. He is principally known by his description of the objects of natural history, particularly of mineralogy, contained in the museum of the Vatican.

MERCATOR, Gerard, a mathematician, born 1512 at Roermond, in the Netherlands. He made a number of maps, globes, and mathematical instruments; besides which he published a Chronology, and some works in philosophy and theology. Died 1594. He is to be distinguished from Nicholas Mercator, who was born in Holstein 1640, and died in Feb., 1687. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and laid claim to a method of sailing which had been published many years before he was born by our countryman Edward Wright. Mercator was, however, an able mathematician, and the author of some valuable works on astronomy and geography.

MERCIER. See Le Mercier.

MERCIER, Barthélemi, a French bibliographer, born at Lyons 4 April, 1734; became abbat of St. Leger, at Soissons; and died 1799.

MERCIER, Louis Sébastien, a French writer, remarkable for the singularity of his literary fancies, was born at Paris 6 June, 1740. He commenced his literary career by the publication of some heroic verses, but afterwards became the avowed enemy of poetry, and the persevering detractor of some of the greatest poets of his country. In 1771 he produced 'L'An 2440,' a declamatory work which was prohibited by authority, and ten years later commenced his 'Tableau de Paris,' in which he sharply criticised the social and political condition of France. After the outbreak of the Revolution he published, in concert with Carra, the 'Annales Patriotiques,' and the 'Chronique du Mois,' journals characterized by courage and moderation of sentiment. Afterwards he was appointed professor of history in the École Centrale, and a member of the Institute. Died 25 April, 1814.

MERCURIALE, Jerome, an Italian physician and medical writer, born at Forli 30 Sept., 1530; died at Pisa 13 Nov., 1606.

MEREDITH, Edward, son of Edward Meredith, rector of Landulph, Cornwall, was born in that county in or about 1649, and educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford. Afterwards going with Sir William Godolphin, as secretary of the embassy to Spain, both he and his master were converted to the Catholic faith. Mr. Meredith returned to this country, but finally quitted it soon after the revolution of 1688, and died, it is said, in Italy. He published 'Some Remarques upon a popular piece of nonsence (by Sam. Johnson) called Julian the Apostate &c. together with a vindication of the Duke of York,' 1682; 'Account of a Conference between Dr. Stillingfleet, and Peter Goodin, a Catholic clergyman,' 1687; 'Remarks on a Conference between Dr. Tenison and Andrew Pulton, Jesuit,' 1687; 'Farther Remarks on Dr. Tenison's Account of the Conference with Andrew Pulton,' 1687.

MERIAN, John Bernard, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, was born at Leichstal, near Basle, 27 Sept., 1723. In 1750 he was invited to Berlin, on the recommendation of Maupertuis, and died there 12 Feb., 1807. The best known of his works are French translations of Claudian and of Hume's Essays.

MERIAN, Matthew, a Swiss designer and engraver, born at Basle 1593; died at Schwalbach 1651.

MERIAN, Matthew, an historical and portrait painter, son of the preceding, was born at Basle 1621, and died at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1687.

MERIAN, Maria Sibylla, daughter of the preceding, was born at Frankfort 1647, studied painting under Abraham Mignon, and married John Andriez Graff, an architect and painter of Nuremberg. After this she made a voyage to Surinam, and took drawings of the natural productions of the country. She died at Amsterdam 13 Jan., 1717. She wrote a work on the origin of Caterpillars, and another on the insects found in Surinam, both of which were translated into French, and published together under the title of 'Hist. des Insectes de l'Europe et de l'Amerique.' Many of this lady's drawings are in the British Museum.

MERIVALE, John Herman, F.S.A., was born at Exeter 5 Aug., 1799, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, after which he practised at the Chancery bar. In 1825 and 1826 he was employed on the Chancery Commission, of which memorable essay in legal reform he had been a warm advocate. Lord Eldon afterwards appointed him a commissioner of bankruptcy, and he continued to hold the post till his death 25 April, 1844. His chief works are, 'Orlando in Roncesvalles, a Poem,' 1814; 'Reports of Cases in Chancery 1815-17;' 'The Minstrel, book III.,' in continuation of Dr. Beattie's poem; 'Poems, Original and Translated,' in 3 vols. (1836-44), the last of which, containing a translation of Schiller's poems, is very scarce.

MERRET, CHRISTOPHER, M.D., F.R.S., was born at Winchcombe, Gloucestershire, Feb., 1614. He took his doctor's degree at Oriel College, Oxford, and then practised as a physician in London. Died 10 Aug., 1695. His publications are, Collection of Acts, Charters, &c. concerning the College of Physicians; A View of the Frauds, and Abuses committed by Apothecaries; Pinax rerum naturalium Britannicarum.

MERRICK, JAMES, a divine and poet, born at Reading 8 Jan., 1720, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He died at Reading 5 Jan., 1769. His principal works are, 'Messiah, a divine Essay;' Dissertation on the ninth chapter of Proverbs; 'Poems on Sacred Subjects;' Letter on the Composition of Greek Indexes; Annotations on the Gospel of St. John; a metrical Version of the Psalms; Annotations on the Psalms; a translation of Tryphiodorus. Some of his poems are in Dodsley's Collection.

MERRY, ROBERT, a dramatist, born in London April, 1755. He received his education at Harrow, and next at Christ's College, Cambridge, after which he entered at Lincoln's Inn; but instead of being called to the bar, he bought a commission in the Guards, which service he also quitted, and went abroad. While at Florence he became a member of the Academy Della Crusca, which name he affixed as a signature to a number of poems that appeared in the newspapers. In 1791 he married Miss Brunton, an actress, with whom he went to America, where he died 24 Dec., 1798. His plays are, 'Ambitious Vengeance;' 'Lorenzo;' 'The Magician no Conjurer;' and 'Fenelon,' none of which had any great success.

MERSENNE, MARIN, a French philosopher, born at Oizé, in the province of Maine, 1588. Having assumed the monastic habit in the society of Minims, he became an eminent teacher of philosophy and theology in the convent of Nevers. He died at Paris 1 Sept., 1648. Father Mersenne was warmly attached to Des Cartes, and corresponded with most of the scientific characters of his time. He invented the cycloid, and published Quæstiones celeberrimæ in Genesim; Harmonicorum Libri; De Sonorum natura, causis et effectibus; Cogitata Physico-Mathematica; La verité des Sciences; Les Questions Monies.

MERTON, WALTER DE, founder of the college which bears his name at Oxford, was born at Merton, in Surrey, and educated at the convent of that place. He was an ecclesiastic, and, after obtaining several preferments, became lord chancellor in 1258, but was deprived of the seal the same year by the barons, restored to it in 1261, and in 1274 consecrated bishop of Rochester. He died 27 Oct., 1277. He began his college in 1264, and completed it in 1274.

MÉRY, JOSEPH, a French poet, novelist, and journalist, born at Marseilles in or about 1799. His first essay in literature was a satire in verse, published in 1820, on a priest against whom he had some private grievance. It brought him into notice less from the talent it evinced, than from the consequences to the writer, for he was prosecuted for libel, and sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment. When the term of his punishment had expired he turned journalist, in conjunction with Alphonse Rabbe, a barrister at Aix, an ardent liberal, and author of some historical works which had a certain vogue in their day. Removing to Paris, he became associated with Victor Hugo, Armand Carrel, the poet Barthélémy, and other noted writers. After an active career as journalist Méry paid a visit to Italy, and on his return to Paris published a dozen romances or novels in the course of seven years. In 1840 he came to this country and recorded his impressions de voyage in a work entitled 'Les Nuits de Londres.' He subsequently produced a large number of romances, and next tried his hand at dramatic composition, producing a great many pieces, some of which were represented with success. He died in penury at Paris 18 June, 1866.

MESMER, FRIEDRICH ANTON, a German physician, the originator of the doctrine of animal magnetism, was born at Meersburg (Baden) 1734. After publishing a treatise on the subject he commenced his operations at Vienna; but meeting with no success, he removed to Paris, where he succeeded in making some converts, but failed in attracting the notice he desired until he paid a visit to Spa, when a subscription was set on foot in the French metropolis to induce him to return and reveal the principles of his professed discovery. He consequently went there, gained a number of proselytes, among whom was La Fayette, and pocketed 340,000 livres. Government at length appointed a committee of physicians and members of the Academy of Sciences to investigate the pretensions of Mesmer, and the result of their inquiries appeared in an admirable memoir, drawn up by M. Bailly, which completely exposed the futility of animal magnetism, and the quackery of its author. He afterwards resided for some time in England under a feigned name; but eventually he returned to Germany, and died at Meersburg 5 March, 1815.

MESMES, CLAUDE DE, count d'Avaux, an eminent French statesman, born 1595; died at Paris 9 Nov., 1650. His 'Memoirs' have been published.

MESSIER, CHARLES, an astronomer, born at Badonvilliers, in Lorraine, in 1730. At an early age he became a pupil of Delisle, who employed him to watch the return of the comet predicted by Halley; but when Messier discovered it his preceptor took the credit to himself. Messier, however, was not discouraged; and almost all the succeeding comets being first discovered by him, procured him admission into several societies. In 1770 he was chosen member of the French Academy; but in the Revolution he lost all his property. He was afterwards elected a member of the National Institute, and had a seat at the Board of Longitude. He became blind before his death, which happened in 1817. He communicated numerous papers on astronomical subjects to the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

MESTON, WILLIAM, a burlesque poet, born at Midmar, Aberdeenshire, about 1688. He was educated at Aberdeen, after which he became a schoolmaster in that city, and next professor of philosophy in Marischal College, which situation he lost in 1715 by joining the Pretender. Died 1745. Meston wrote poems, called 'Mother Grim's Tales,' and some Latin pieces of no great merit.

METASTASIO, PIETRO, an Italian poet, whose real name was Trapassi, was born at Rome 6 Jan., 1698. At the age of ten years his extemporary verses procured him the patronage of Gravina, who undertook his education with a view to his own profession of the law. At fourteen Metastasio produced his tragedy of 'Giustino,' which so pleased Gravina, that he took him to Naples to contend with the most celebrated improvisatori of Italy. However, he still continued to study the law, and he also assumed the minor order of priesthood. In 1718 he lost his patron, who left him all his property; after which he principally applied himself to dramatic composition. In 1730 he went to reside at Vienna, where he became imperial laureate, and died there, full of honours, 12 April, 1782. He wrote a number of operas, oratorios, and musical pieces, besides miscellaneous poetry and an analysis of Aristotle's Art of Poetry.

METCALFE, CHARLES THEOPHILUS, baron Metcalfe, was born at Calcutta 30 Jan., 1785, being the second son of Major Thomas Metcalfe of the Bengal army, who was made a baronet 1802. He received a classical education at Eton, and in 1800 obtained an appointment as a writer in the service of the East India Company. Having displayed great diplomatic talent, he was intrusted, in 1808, with a mission to the court of Lahore, with the object of securing the Sikh states between the Sutlej and Jumna rivers from the grasp of Runjeet Singh. In this difficult undertaking he met with complete success. After filling various important offices, he received, in 1819, the appointment of secretary in the secret and political department, along with that of private secretary to the governor-general. In 1820 he was appointed resident at the court of the Nizam; and in 1822 he succeeded to the baronetcy. He received the appointment of resident and civil commissioner in the Delhi territories 1825; became a member of the supreme council 1827; president of the board of revenue 1828; vice-president and deputy-governor of Fort William 1830; and was intrusted with the presidency of Agra 1834. On the resignation of Lord William Bentinck, in Feb., 1835, Sir Charles Metcalfe was provisionally appointed governor-general, which office he held till 28 March, 1836, being the interval between the departure of Lord W. Bentinck and the arrival of Lord Auckland. During this period he originated or adopted several valuable measures, one of the most important being the liberation of the press from all restrictions. This, however, gave umbrage to the court of directors, and was the eventual cause of his resignation and return to Europe 1838. The following year he was selected by the ministry to be governor of Jamaica, where he succeeded in soothing the irritation, and reconciling the differences caused by the Negro Emancipation Act, then recently passed, and gave satisfaction both to the colonists and the Home Government. Ill-health compelled him to resign in 1842; but early in the following year he was induced to accept the governorship of Canada. He held this responsible position till 1845, when he returned to England, after having been raised to the dignity of the peerage. He died at Malshanger, near Basingstoke, 12 Sept., 1846.

METIUS, JAMES, a native and schoolmaster of Alkmaar, in Holland, who is said to have invented the refracting telescope, about 1609. His brother, Adrian Metius, was born 9 Dec., 1571, at Alkmaar, and died 26 Sept., 1635, at Franeker, where he was professor of mathematics. He published several mathematical works.

METKERKE, Sir ADOLPHUS, was born at Bruges 1528. He was sent by the revolted states of the Low Countries on an embassy to Queen Elizabeth, and died in London 4 Nov., 1591. He published an edition of Bion and Moschus, 1565; a Latin translation of the Epigrams of Theocritus; 'De veteri et recta Pronunciatione Linguæ Græcæ Commentarius;' 'Collection of the Proceedings at the Peace of Cologne in 1579.'

METON, a chronologer of Athens, who lived 432 B.C. He invented the cycle of nineteen years, to adjust the course of the sun and moon, so as to make the solar and lunar years begin at the same time. This is now called the Golden Number.

METTERNICH, CLEMENS WENZEL NEPOMUK LOTHAR, PRINCE, an Austrian statesman, born at Coblentz 15 May, 1773. He studied history at Strasburg, under the celebrated Koch, adopted the profession of diplomacy, and in 1795 married the granddaughter and heiress of the diplomatist Kaunitz, whose large domains he inherited. He represented the Westphalian nobility at the congress of Rastadt (1797-99), after which he accompanied Count Stadion to St. Petersburg, and subsequently officiated as ambassador at Dresden, Berlin, and Paris (1806). He managed affairs at the French court with so much ability that, when the war broke out in 1809, and he had to return to the Austrian court, which was seeking refuge in the fortress of Comorn, he was appointed to the ministry of foreign affairs as successor to Count Stadion. It was during this tenure of office that he struck out the idea of a marriage with Napoleon and an Austrian archduchess as a means of purchasing a respite for the empire. He conducted the negotiations with Champagny. Napoleon was divorced from Josephine; and Metternich escorted Marie Louise to Paris. This settlement was not a permanent one, and in 1813, after the great French catastrophe in Russia, war was again declared by Austria against France. In the autumn of that year the grand alliance was signed at Töplitz; and on the field of Leipsic Metternich was raised to the dignity of a prince of the empire. In the subsequent conferences and treaties the newly-created prince took a very prominent part, and he signed the treaty of Paris on behalf of Austria. He afterwards paid a visit to this country, and received the honour of a doctor's hood from the university of Oxford. When the congress of Vienna was opened Prince Metternich was unanimously chosen to preside over its deliberations; and from that time till the revolution of 1848 he wielded great influence over the affairs of Europe. The continental statesmen, terrified at the fearful consequences of the French Revolution, formed themselves into a coalition to prevent the occurrence of any similar calamity. They set themselves vigorously to repress all popular institutions, to crush freedom of speech and act, and to establish a despotism in every country that would submit to it. Such were the objects of that Holy Alliance, which has been the subject of merited obloquy, and which had Metternich for its presiding genius. In the revolution of 1848 he was driven from Vienna, and came to England; but in 1851 he ventured to return to Austria. He was afterwards consulted often on state affairs, but never held his office, nor regained the immense influence he once possessed. His death took place at Vienna 11 June, 1859.

METTRIE, JULIEN OFFRAY DE LA, a French writer, born at St. Malo 25 Dec., 1709. He was a surgeon in the French Guards, and in that situation wrote an infamous book, called, 'The Natural History of the Soul,' for which he narrowly escaped prosecution. His next work was a satire against the faculty, under the title of 'Penelope, or the Machiavel in Medicine,' for which he was obliged to remove to Holland, where he created new enemies by a book, called 'L'Homme Machine.' He then went to Berlin, where he died 11 Nov., 1751.

METZU, GABRIEL, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden 1615; died after 1661.

MEULEN, ANTHONY FRANCIS VAN DER, a painter, born at Brussels 1634. He excelled in battle-pieces, and was employed by Louis XIV. in painting the scenes of his military campaigns and huntings. He died at Paris 1690.

MEUN, JOHN DE, also called Clopinel, a French poet, born about 1250; died about 1318. He continued the Romance of the Rose, and wrote some other pieces.

MEURSIUS, JOHN, a learned critic, was born at Loudun, in Holland, in 1579. He studied at Leyden, where, at sixteen, he wrote a Commentary on Lycophron. On leaving the university he was employed by Barnevelt, as tutor to his children, whom he also attended on their travels. In 1610 he became professor of history at Leyden, and the year following was appointed historiographer to the United States. In 1625 he removed to the professorship of history and politics at Sora, in Denmark, where also he was appointed historiographer royal. Died 20 Sept., 1639. His works were published together in 1743, at Florence, in 12 vols. folio. The scandalous book printed under the name of Meursius, entitled 'De Elegantiis Latinæ Linguæ,' was the production of Nicholas Chorier.

MEYER, or MEYERS, JEREMIAH, a miniature painter, was born at Tubingen 1735; came to England 1749; was appointed painter in enamel to King George III. 1764; and died at Kew 20 Jan., 1789.

MEYERBEER, GIACOMO, a celebrated composer, was the son of James Beer, a wealthy Jewish banker, and was born at Berlin 5 Sept., 1794. He studied in the famous musical school of the Abbé Vogler, at Darmstadt; but two years after the commencement of Meyerbeer's residence Vogler closed his establishment, and the two travelled together in Germany for about a twelvemonth. At Munich, under Vogel's auspices, he produced his first work, 'Jephtha's Daughter.' Afterwards he wrote his 'Two Caliphs,' at the request of the court of Vienna; but in consequence of its not being in the Italian style, which was then in high favour, it failed of success. During a subsequent visit to Italy his style became modified, and he was charmed with the Italian style, in which he wrote his first great opera, the 'Crociato in Egitto,' which established his fame. From this period he produced a series of works which achieved the highest success. His 'Robert le Diable,' the 'Huguenots,' the 'Prophète,' the 'Étoile du Nord,' 'Dinorah,' and 'L'Africaine' (which was brought out in London in 1865, after the author's death), are known all over Europe. Besides his operas, he wrote a 'Stabat Mater,' a 'Miserere,' a 'Te Deum,' twelve psalms, several cantatas, an oratorio, and a great number of melodies to Italian, French, and German airs. In 1842 he received the appointment of chapel-master to the king of Prussia. He was also a member of the Academy of Fine Arts at Berlin, an associate of the French Institute, and an officer of the Legion of Honour. He resided chiefly in Paris, where he died 1 May, 1864.

MEYRICK, Sir SAMUEL RUSH, LL.D., F.S.A., was educated at Oxford, and afterwards practised for many years as an advocate in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty courts; but his real study and pursuit was that of antiquities and archæology; and in his residence, Goodrich Court, Herefordshire, he gradually accumulated a very large collection of armour, which is now deposited in the South Kensington Museum. His two great works, which are standard authorities on the subject they treat of, are, 'A Critical Inquiry into Antient Armour, as it existed in Europe, but particularly in England from the Norman Conquest to the reign of Charles II.; with a Glossary of Military Terms of the Middle Ages,' 3 vols. 4to., 1824, and again 1844; and the letter-press portion of Joseph Skelton's 'Engraved Illustrations of Ancient Arms and Armour' in his collection, 2 vols. 4to, 1830, and again 1854. Sir Samuel also published 'The History and Antiquities of the County of Cardigan,' and edited Lewis Dunn's 'Heraldic Visitations of Wales.' Died 2 April, 1848, aged 65.

MEZERAI, FRANÇOIS EUDES DE, a French historian, born near Argentau, in Normandy, 1610. He was educated at Caen, and, at the age of twenty-six, commenced 'The History of France;' the first volume of which appeared in 1643, and the last in 1658. For this work he obtained a pension. In 1668 he published an abridgment of the History, in 3 vols. 4to.; and reprinted it in 1672, in 6 vols. 12mo. In this last edition, however, he made so free with the administration, that he was deprived of his pension. In 1675 he was chosen perpetual secretary of the French Academy. Died 10 July, 1683. His other works are, 'A History of the Turks;' 'L'Origine des François;' Les Vanités de la Cour; a translation of 'Grotius de Veritate.'

MEZZOFANTI, GIUSEPPE GASPARDO, a cardinal, and the most remarkable linguist ever known, was born at Bologna 17 Sept., 1774. He was ordained priest 1797, and appointed, the same year, professor of Arabic in his native city. He was removed from that post in consequence of his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the Cisalpine republic, but after the conclusion of the concordat between Pius VII. and Napoleon he was restored to the university and appointed to the chair of oriental languages. In 1812 he was made assistant-librarian, and, in 1815, head-librarian of the university of Bologna. Pope Gregory XVI., hearing of Mezzofanti's marvellous linguistic attainments, invited him to Rome, and gave him a prebend in the church of St. John Lateran, and a canonry of St. Peter's. In 1833 he succeeded the famous Angelo Mai as chief keeper of the Vatican library, which office he held till 1838, when he was created a cardinal. At the time of his death, which took place 18 March, 1849, this remarkable man is said to have been acquainted with no fewer than one hundred and fourteen languages and dialects, most of which he spoke with astonishing accuracy and fluency. At the Propaganda, which entertains and trains missionaries from and for all parts of the world, he used to converse with each man in his own idiom, passing from one to another with a readiness almost incredible. Lord Byron has placed on record the following sketch of the cardinal:—"I don't remember a man among them [i.e., literary men] whom I ever wished to see twice, except, perhaps, Mezzofanti, who is a monster of languages, the Briareus of parts of speech, a walking polyglot, and more;—who ought to have existed at the time of the Tower of Babel, as universal interpreter. He is indeed a marvel—unassuming also. I tried him in all the tongues in which I knew a single oath or adjuration to the gods, against post-boys, savages, Tartars, boatmen, sailors, pilots, gondoliers, muleteers, camel-drivers, vetturini, postmasters, post-horses, post-everything; and, egad! he astounded me—even to my English." Mezzofanti's only published work is a panegyrical memoir of Father Emanuel da Ponte. His Life, by Dr. Charles William Russell, president of Maynooth College, was published in 1858, and reprinted 1863.

MICHAEL ANGELO BUONARROTTI, an illustrious artist, born of a noble family at Caprese, in Tuscany, 1474. Having discovered an early turn for painting, he was placed in the school of Ghirlandaio, and while with him had an opportunity of studying sculpture in the garden of Lorenzo de' Medici, who, observing a specimen of his genius in that line, became his patron, and made him one of his family. Here he formed an acquaintance with Politiano, by whose advice he executed a basso-relievo on the subject of the Centaurs. From Florence he removed to Bologna, where he executed some fine statues; and on his return to the former city finished a group of David and Goliah for Soderini, the chief magistrate. While thus engaged in sculpture he did not neglect painting, but was employed in representing a battle-scene for the ducal palace. On the accession of Julius II. to the papacy, he went to Rome, where he received orders to construct a mausoleum for his Holiness, who directed him to fix upon a spot in St. Peter's for the reception of it. The difficulty attending this, as the church was very old, induced the Pope to form the resolution of building a new cathedral on a magnificent scale, under the direction of Michael Angelo. The work was begun, but it had not proceeded far, before some umbrage was taken by the architect, who suddenly left Rome and set off for Florence. After some time a reconciliation was effected, and Michael Angelo returned to the Pope, who now employed him in painting the Sistine Chapel. In 1513 Julius died, and was succeeded by Leo X., who employed our artist in various works which ill suited his inclination, particularly in the construction of a road from the marble quarries to the sea. Under succeeding pontiffs his merits were equally neglected, though he was constantly engaged in works of architecture, and at one time upon fortification. After completing the lesser monument for Julius II., in executing which he met with many interruptions, he commenced his great painting of the Last Judgment, which was finished in 1541, and the Sistine Chapel opened on Christmas Day, with great pomp, by Pope Paul III., who gave him a pension of six hundred a year. His next engagement was in painting two pictures of the Martyrdom of St. Peter, and the Conversion of St. Paul, for the Vatican. In 1546 he was appointed architect of St. Peter's on the death of San Gallo, and on this work he was occupied during the rest of his life. He died 17 Feb., 1563, having almost completed his eighty-ninth year. He was buried first in the church of St. Apostoli at Rome, but afterwards the body was removed to Florence, and interred in the church of Santa Croce.

MICHAEL ANGELO DI BATTAGLIE. See CERQUOZZI.

MICHAELIS, JOHN BENJAMIN, a German poet, born at Zittau 31 Dec., 1746; died 30 Sept., 1772.

MICHAELIS, JOHN DAVID, nephew of John Henry Michaelis, was born at Halle 27 Feb., 1717. After going through his studies at his native place he visited England, where he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Lowth, and became preacher at the German chapel, in St. James's Palace. On his return to his native country, he accepted the professorship of theology and oriental languages at Göttingen; where he also became librarian, and lastly director of the Royal Society. In 1775 the king of Sweden conferred on him the order of the Polar Star, and in 1786 he was made a privy councillor of Hanover. Died 22 Aug., 1791. His principal works, which are numerous, are Spicilegium Geographiæ Hebræorum exteræ, 2 vols.; Grammatica Chaldaica; Supplementa ad Lexicon Hebr., 6 vols.; Grammatica Syriaca; an edition of Bishop Lowth's Prælectiones; Introduction to the New Testament, 2 vols.; Translation of the Old Testament, 13 vols.; Interpretation of the Laws of Moses, 6 vols.; Oriental and Exegetical Library; Introduction to the Old Testament; Translation of the New Testament, 2 vols. Two of these have been translated into English, viz., The Introduction to the New Testament, by Bishop Marsh, 6 vols. 8vo.; and the Commentaries on the Laws of Moses, by Dr. Alexander Smith, in 4 vols.

MICHAELIS, JOHN HENRY, was born at Kettenberg, in Hohenstein, 1668. He was educated at Leipsic, and next at Halle, where he taught Greek and Hebrew. In 1699 he succeeded Francke in the Greek professorship, and, in 1707, was made librarian of the university. He afterwards became professor of divinity and the oriental languages. Died 18 March, 1738. He published a Hebrew Bible, with various readings; 'Conamina brevioris manuductionis ad doctrinam de accentibus Hebræorum Prosaicis;' 'Epicrisis Philologica.'

MICHAUD, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS, a French writer, was born 19 June, 1767, at a village in La Bresse, and educated at Bourg, proceeding afterwards to Paris, where he edited several royalist journals. After the fall of the throne he co-operated in founding 'La Quotidienne,' a newspaper which continued for a long period to oppose the revolutionary party. At the Restoration he was appointed censor-general of the journals and reader to the king. Later he was elected to the chamber of deputies, and became a member of the Academy. His 'History of the Crusades' constitutes his chief title to literary fame. Died 30 Sept., 1839.

MICHELI, PETER ANTHONY, a botanist, born 1679, at Florence, where he died 2 Jan., 1737.

MICHELI DU CRÊT, JACQUES BARTHÉLEMI, a mathematician, born at Geneva 1690; died at Zofingen 1766. He constructed a number of charts, and invented a new thermometer.

MICKIEWICZ, ADAM, a celebrated Polish poet, born at Nowogrodek, in Lithuania, 1798; died at Constantinople 26 Nov., 1855.

MICKLE, WILLIAM JULIUS, was born at Langholm, in Dumfries, 29 Sept., 1734. He was educated at Edinburgh, after which he engaged in a brewery; but the business failed, and he came to London. In 1765 he obtained the situation of corrector of the university press at Oxford, where he printed a poem, in Spenser's manner, under the title of 'The Concubine,' which he afterwards altered to that of 'Sir Martyn.' In 1772 he was employed as editor of the collection of poems which goes by the name of the publisher, Pearch. But the work on which the reputation of Mickle rests is the translation of the 'Lusiad' of Camöens, published by subscription 1775, and reprinted 1778. Soon after the appearance of this last edition he went to Lisbon, as secretary to Commodore Johnson, and, while there, he received many marks of respect from the Portuguese literati. Having realised a tolerable competency, he retired to Forest Hill, in Oxfordshire, where he died 28 Oct., 1788. His poetical works were printed in 3 vols., 1806.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, D.D., was born at York 2 Aug., 1683. He received his education under his father, who was a clergyman, and next at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and distinguished himself by his enmity to the master, Dr. Bentley; with whom he had afterwards a lawsuit about fees, on taking his degree of D.D. He likewise printed Strictures on Bentley's Proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, and thereby prevented its publication, to the great injury of biblical learning. In 1724 Middleton went to Italy, and on his return attacked the faculty in a Latin tract, tending to prove that the medical profession was looked upon with contempt by the ancient Romans. He was answered by Dr. Ward, professor of rhetoric at Gresham College. In 1729 Dr. Middleton published his Letter from Rome, showing the uniformity between Catholicism and Paganism. This was ably answered by Bishop Challoner. In 1731 he printed, but without his name, a Letter to Dr. Waterland, on his 'Scripture Vindicated;' which produced a controversy between Middleton and Pearce. While this dispute was going on, our author was appointed Woodwardian professor of mineralogy, which situation he resigned in 1734, on being elected librarian of the university. The year following he published 'A Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England;' but his greatest work is the 'Life of Cicero;' which came out by subscription in 1741. In 1747 he raised a sharp controversy, by an attempt to overthrow the credibility of the miracles said to have been wrought in the primitive ages of the church. About this time, also, he made an attack on Bishop Sherlock's Discourses concerning Prophecy; particularly in regard to the Mosaic account of the fall of man, which, according to Middleton, is nothing more than an allegory. He died 28 July, 1750, without having had any other preferment than the living of Hascomb, in Surrey. His miscellaneous works were published after his death, in 2 vols. 4to.

MIDDLETON, Erasmus, received his education at Oxford, but was expelled from that university, together with five other youths, under circumstances which gave rise to Macgowan's satire of 'The Shaver.' He was presented to the rectory of Turvey, Beds, 1764, and died 25 April, 1805. He was a sympathiser with the Methodists, and is known as an author by his 'Biographia Evangelica: or an historical account of the lives and deaths of the most eminent Evangelical Authors or Preachers, both British and Foreign, in the several denominations of Protestants,' 4 vols. 8vo., 1779-86.

MIDDLETON, Sir Hugh, was a native of Denbigh. He became a goldsmith in London, and in 1606 undertook to supply the city with water from two springs, one in the parish of Amwell, and the other near Ware, in Hertfordshire. After many difficulties he effected this object, and brought the water to the cistern at Islington in 1613. He then received letters patent, by virtue of which a company was created, called the governor and company of the New River. The projector was created a baronet 1622, and died 1631.

MIDDLETON, Thomas, a dramatic poet, was born about 1570, most likely in London, and studied law at Gray's Inn. Scarcely anything is known of his subsequent career, which ended in 1627, as appears from the parish register of Newington Butts, Surrey, which records his burial on the 4th of July in that year. His works have been carefully edited by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, 5 vols. 8vo., 1840.

MIDDLETON, Thomas Fanshaw, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was born at Kedleston, Derbyshire, 26 Jan., 1769, and educated at Christ's Hospital, and at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He took orders 1792, as curate of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, where he wrote 'The Country Spectator,' a periodical paper, of which thirty-three numbers were published. His reputation as a divine and scholar procured him the patronage of Dr. Pretyman, archdeacon of Lincoln, who entrusted to his care the education of his two sons. He now removed to Norwich, and in 1795 was presented by the doctor to the rectory of Tansor, Northamptonshire. In 1802 he was presented by his patron to the consolidated rectory of Great and Castle Bytham, which he held together with Tansor, where he fixed his residence. In 1808 appeared his erudite work on 'The Doctrine of the Greek Article, applied to the Criticism and the Illustration of the New Testament.' The following year he was collated to a stall in the cathedral of Lincoln; and in 1811 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Pancras, Middlesex, and the rectory of Puttenham, Herts. In 1812 the bishop of Lincoln collated him to the archdeaconry of Huntingdon. On Calcutta being erected into an episcopal see, the government selected Dr. Middleton to be its first bishop. He was accordingly consecrated at Lambeth 8 May, 1814, and on the 28th of November arrived at Calcutta, where he died 8 July, 1822. Some of his sermons, charges, and tracts were published in 1824 by Dr. H. K. Bonney; and his life has been written by the Rev C. W. Le Bas, 2 vols., 1831.

MIEL, Jan, a Flemish painter, born 1599; died 1664.

MIEREVELD, Michael Janson, a Dutch painter, born 1568, at Delft, where he died 27 Aug., 1641.

MIERIS, Francis, called the Old, was born at Leyden 1635. He was a disciple of Gerard Dow, whose style he imitated with great success. His pictures are very scarce and valuable. He died 12 March, 1681. His son William, called the Young Mieris, was born at Leyden 1662, and died 24 Jan., 1747. He painted historical subjects, animals, and landscapes. His son, Francis, was also an artist, but not equal to his father or grandfather. He was born at Leyden 24 Dec., 1689, and died there 22 Oct., 1763.

MIGLIARA, Giovanni, an Italian painter, born at Alessandria, in Piedmont, 15 Oct., 1785; died at Milan, 18 April, 1837.

MIGNARD, Pierre, an historical and portrait painter, born at Troyes, in Champagne, 1610. He studied at Rome with Du Fresnoy, and during his residence there of twenty-two years enjoyed great favour from the popes. At length Louis XIV. sent for him home, and appointed him his principal painter, and director of the manufactories of Seve and the Gobelins. He was also ennobled. Died 13 March, 1695.

MIGNON, Abraham, a painter, of Frankfort, born 1639; died 1679. He excelled in the representation of flowers, insects, and still life.

MIGNOT, Étienne, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Paris 17 March, 1698; died 23 July, 1771. Among his numerous works is a History of the Quarrels between Henry II. and St. Thomas of Canterbury.

MIGNOT, Vincent, a French historian, nephew of Voltaire, was born at Paris about 1725, and died Sept., 1791. His best work is a History of the Ottoman Empire.

MILBOURNE, Luke, was a native of Wroxhall, Warwickshire. He was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, after which he became rector of St. Ethelburga, in London, and lecturer of Shoreditch. Died 15 April, 1720. He wrote a metrical Version of the Psalms; Animadversions on Dryden's Virgil; and some sermons.

MILDMAY, Sir Walter, a statesman, was born at Chelmsford, in or about 1522, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. He received the honour of knighthood 22 Feb., 1546-7. He was employed in the management of the royal revenues; and in 1566 he was appointed chancellor of the Exchequer. Died 31 May, 1589. Sir Walter was the founder of Emanuel College, Cambridge. Some of his Latin poems were printed after his death; but they seem to be now unknown.—Athen. Cantab.

MILL, James, historian and philosopher, was born at Logie Pert, Forfarshire, 6 April, 1773, and after studying at Edinburgh was licensed as a preacher in the Scotch church. Coming to London, however, as a tutor in the family of Sir John Stuart, he permanently fixed his residence in the English metropolis, and devoting himself to literary pursuits, he became editor of the 'Literary Journal,' and an occasional contributor to the 'Edinburgh Review.' The great merit of his 'History of British India' (3 vols. 4to., 1818; 5th edit., 10 vols. 8vo., 1858) led to his being appointed by the East India Company to conduct the department in the India Office of correspondence with India in the revenue branch of administration, and he eventually rose to be head of the department. His principal other works are 'The Elements of Political Economy,' 1821; 'Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind,' 1829; and articles in the Supplement to the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' on Government, Jurisprudence, Liberty of the Press, Prisons and Prison Discipline, Colonies, Law of Nations, and Education.

MILL, John, D.D., was born at Shap, Westmoreland, about 1645. He became a servitor of Queen's College, Oxford, of which society he was chosen fellow and tutor. In 1676 he obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Exeter, and, in 1681, the rectory of Blechingdon, in Oxfordshire. The same year he took his doctor's degree, and in 1685 was elected principal of St. Edmund Hall. In 1704 he was collated to a prebend in the church of Canterbury. His edition of the Greek Testament was completed at the press only fourteen days before his death, which occurred 23 June, 1707.

MILL, William Hodge, D.D., regius professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, canon of Ely, and rector of Brasted, died 25 Dec., 1853, aged 61. He published the Life of Christ in Sanscrit, with which language he was well acquainted; an Arabic translation of Bridge's Algebra; and some works on theology.

MILLAR, John, was born at Shotts, in Lanarkshire, 1735. He was educated at Glasgow, where, by the interest of Lord Kames, in whose family he had been a tutor, he obtained, in 1761, the professorship of law. Died 30 May, 1801. His publications are 'On the Origin of the Distinction of Ranks in Society;' and 'An Historical View of the English Government.' After his death two volumes of his dissertations were published.

MILLER, Edward, Mus.D., was the son of a pavior at Norwich, and bred to the same business; but having a dislike to it he absconded, and became a pupil of Dr. Burney, then resident at Lynn. In 1756 he became organist of the church of Doncaster, where he continued the rest of his life. In 1786 he obtained his degree of doctor of music at Cambridge, and died at Doncaster 12 Sept., 1807. Dr. Miller published 'Institutes of Music;' 'The Elements of Thorough-Bass and Composition;' 'The Psalms of David' set to music and arranged for every Sunday in the year; 'The History and Antiquities of Doncaster.'

MILLER, Hugh, an eminent geologist, born at Cromarty, in Scotland, 10 Oct., 1802. In early life he worked as a labourer in the sandstone quarries of his native district, and afterwards as a stonemason in different parts of Scotland. In a work published in 1854, 'My Schools and Schoolmasters, or the Story of my Education,' he gives a most interesting account of his early history, and of the training and self-culture by which he rose to honourable rank in literature and science. After being engaged in manual labour for about fifteen years, he was for some time manager of a bank in his native town. While in this position a pamphlet he published on the ecclesiastical controversies which then distracted Scotland, attracted the attention of the leaders of the party who afterwards formed the Free Church, and they invited him to become editor of the 'Witness' newspaper, then about to be established for the advocacy of their principles. Mr. Miller had already published a volume of 'Legendary Tales of Cromarty,' which showed that he was master of a pure and nervous English style. The ability displayed by him as editor of the 'Witness,' and the influence exerted by him on ecclesiastical and educational events in Scotland were very marked. He did not, however, confine his newspaper to topics of local or passing interest, but published in its columns his geological observations and researches. Indeed most of his works first appeared in the form of articles in that journal. It was in 1840, the year in which the autobiographical memoir closes, that the name of Hugh Miller became widely known beyond his own country. At the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, held that year at Glasgow, Mr. (afterwards Sir Roderick) Murchison gave an account of the striking discoveries recently made in the Old Red Sandstone of Scotland; and M. Agassiz, after pointing out the peculiarities and importance of those discoveries, proposed to associate the name of Mr. Miller with them by means of the wonderful fossil, the Pterichthys Milleri, specimens of which were then under the notice of the section. Dr. Buckland, following M. Agassiz, said, 'I have never been so much astonished in my life by the powers of any man as I have been by the geological descriptions of Mr. Miller. He described these objects with a felicity which made me ashamed of the comparative meagreness and poverty of my own descriptions in the "Bridgewater Treatise," which had cost me hours and days of labour. I would give my left hand to possess such powers of description as this man; and if it pleases Providence to spare his useful life, he, if any, will certainly render the science attractive and popular, and do equal service to theology and geology.' The publication of the volume on the 'Old Red Sandstone,' with the details of the author's discoveries and researches, more than justified all the anticipations which had been formed. It was received with the highest approbation, not by men of science alone for the interest of its facts, but by men of letters for the beauty of its style. In 1847 appeared 'First Impressions of England and its People,' the result of a tour made during the previous year. Some parts of this book, especially the account of the pilgrimages to Stratford-on-Avon and the Leasowes, and Olney, and other places memorable for their literary associations, are as fine pieces of descriptive writing as the English language possesses. This magic of style characterises all his works, whether of a more popular kind or his scientific treatises, such as 'The Old Red Sandstone' and the 'Footprints of the Creator,' a volume suggested by the 'Vestiges of Creation,' and subversive of the fallacies of that superficial and plausible book. Mr. Miller shot himself with a pistol during a fit of insanity 24 Dec., 1856. At the time of his death he had just completed his 'Testimony of the Rocks,' in which he discusses the biblical bearings of geology. This was published shortly afterwards, as was likewise 'The Cruise of the Betsy,' containing narratives of his scientific wanderings in the Hebrides and other parts of Scotland. Many of his 'Leading Articles' were published in a collected form in 1870.

MILLER, JAMES, was born in Dorsetshire 1703, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford. While at the university he wrote a satiric piece, called 'The Humours of Oxford,' which created him many enemies, and hindered his preferment. He, however, took orders, and at length obtained the living of Upcerne, in Dorsetshire. He published several political pamphlets against Sir Robert Walpole, and also some plays, the principal of which is the tragedy of 'Mahomet.' He was likewise concerned in a translation of Molière. Died 23 April, 1744.

MILLER, JAMES, professor of surgery at Edinburgh, died at Pinkhill, near that city, 17 June, 1864. He wrote 'The Principles and Practice of Surgery;' 'The Surgical Experiences of Chloroform;' the article 'Surgery' in the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' &c.

MILLER, JOE, an English actor, born 1684; died in London 13 Aug., 1738. The celebrated jests which pass under his name were in reality collected by John Mottley, who is hereinafter noticed. The first edition of Joe Miller's Jests appeared in 1739. It has recently been reproduced in facsimile by Mr. John Camden Hotten.

MILLER, PHILIP, F.R.S., was born 1691. He succeeded his father as gardener to the Company of Apothecaries at Chelsea; and soon distinguished himself by his knowledge of plants. He communicated some papers to the Royal Society, and in 1730 published 'A Catalogue of Trees, Shrubs, Plants, and Flowers, in the Gardens near London, folio. This was followed by his 'Gardener's Dictionary.' In 1755 appeared 'Figures of Plants,' adapted to the dictionary, in 2 vols. folio. His other works are 'The Gardener's Kalendar,' and 'The Gardener's and Florist's Dictionary.' Mr. Miller died at Chelsea 18 Dec., 1771.

MILLES, JEREMIAH, D.D., nephew of the bishop of Waterford, was born 1714. He was educated at Eton, and next at Queen's College, Oxford. He married a daughter of Archbishop Potter, by whose interest he obtained the rectory of St. Edmund the King, London, which he held with the livings of Merstham, Surrey, and West Terring, Sussex. In 1762 he became dean of Exeter, and in 1765 was elected president of the Society of Antiquaries. He was also a fellow of the Royal Society, and died 13 Feb., 1784. Dean Milles has some papers in the Archæologia; and he incurred much ridicule by an edition of the pretended poems of Rowley, 1782.

MILLES, THOMAS, was the son of Isaac Milles, rector of High Clear, in Hampshire, and educated at Wadham College, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.D. in 1704. In 1706 he was appointed Greek professor; but the year following he went to Ireland with the earl of Pembroke, and was promoted to the bishopric of Waterford, where he died 13 May, 1740. He published a few controversial tracts, but is best known by his valuable edition of the works of St. Cyril, folio, Oxford, 1703.

MILLEVOYE, CHARLES HUBERT, a French poet, born at Abbeville 24 Dec., 1782; died at Paris 26 August, 1816. Among his poems we may notice 'L'Indépendance de l'Homme de Lettres;' 'Le Voyageur;' 'La Mort de Rotrou;' 'Belzunce;' 'Le Poète Mourant;' 'La Chute des Feuilles;' and 'Priez pour moi.'

MILLHOUSE, ROBERT, a weaver of Nottingham, author of some poems which possess considerable merit, was born 17 Oct., 1788, and died 13 April, 1839.

MILLIN, AUBIN LOUIS, a French antiquary and naturalist, born at Paris 9 July, 1759. He was one of the founders of the Linnæan Society, and in 1794 succeeded Barthélemy as keeper of the cabinet of medals. His principal works are 'Antiquités Nationales;' 'Monuments Antiques, Inédits;' 'Voyage dans le midi de la France;' 'Minéralogie Homérique;' 'Galerie Mythologique;' and 'Histoire Métallique de la Révolution Française.' His 'Medallic History of Napoleon,' left incomplete, was published in English by J. Millinger 1819. M. Millin edited the 'Magasin Encyclopédique' from 1792 to 1816.

MILLINGEN, JAMES, F.S.A., a classical archæologist, was born in London 1774, and educated at Westminster School. He passed most of his life on the Continent, and died at Florence 1 Oct., 1845. His works are, 'Recueil de quelques Medailles Grecques Inédites, 1812; 'Peintures Antiques et Inédites de Vases Grecs, tirées de diverses Collections,' 1813; 'Peintures Antiques des Vases Grecs, de la Collection de Sir John Coghill,' 1817; 'The Medallic History of Napoleon,' with supplement, 1819-21; 'Ancient Unedited Monuments, comprising Painted Greek Vases, Statues, Busts, Bas-Reliefs, and other Remains of Grecian Art,' 1822; 'Ancient Unedited Coins of Greek Cities and Kings,' 1837; 'Considerations sur la Numismatique de l'ancienne Italie, principalement sous le rapport de monumens historiques et philologiques,' 1841.

MILLINGTON, WILLIAM, D.D., one of the most learned men of his day, was a native of Pocklington, Yorkshire, and was ordained priest 8 March, 1420. He took his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and is said to have been a member of Clare Hall, in that university; but, however that may be, certain it is that in 1443 he was appointed the first provost of King's College. This important situation, however, he voluntarily resigned in 1446, on a point of conscience. The oft-repeated statement that he was deprived of the provostship for unduly favouring natives of Yorkshire is without foundation. It is said that on leaving King's he retired to Clare Hall, and dying in May, 1466, was buried in St. Edward's Church, Cambridge. An interesting memoir of Dr. Millington, by George Williams, B.D., was communicated to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society in 1858.

MILLOT, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS XAVIER, a French ecclesiastic and historian, born at Ornans (Franche-Comté) 1726; died 21 March, 1785.

MILLS, CHARLES, an historical writer, born at Greenwich 1788; died at Southampton 9 Oct., 1826. He was articled to an attorney, but abandoned law for literature. His works are a 'History of Muhammedanism;' 'History of the Crusades;' a work of fiction, entitled 'The Travels of Theodore Ducas in various countries of Europe, on the revival of letters and arts;' and a 'History of Chivalry.'

MILMAN, Sir FRANCIS, B.D., M.D., F.R.S., a physician, born in Devonshire 1746, and educated at Oxford. He became physician to the king, and to the royal household, which procured his elevation to the baronetage. Died 24 June, 1821. He published 'Animadversiones de Natura Hydropis ejusque Curatione,' 1779; 'A Treatise on the Source of the Scurvy and Putrid Fever,' 1782.

MILMAN, HENRY HART, D.D., was born 10 Feb., 1791, being the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman, physician to George III. He was educated at Dr. Burney's school at Greenwich, and then proceeded to Eton, where he passed through the usual course, and entered at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1813, being first class in classics. Prior to taking his degree he gained, in 1812, the Newdigate prize for an English poem, 'Apollo Belvedere,' and in 1813 the chancellor's prize for his Latin poem, 'Alexander tumulum Achillis invisens.' In 1816 he was ordained deacon by Dr. Howley, bishop of London, and in 1817 priest, by Dr. Legge, bishop of Oxford. In the following year he was presented by Lord Chancellor Eldon to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Reading. He had already published the tragedy of 'Fazio,' which was acted with some success at Covent Garden Theatre, where Miss O'Neill sustained the character of the heroine. In the early part of 1818 appeared his 'Samor,' an heroic poem, in 12 books. In 1820 he published another poem, the 'Fall of Jerusalem,' founded on the narrative of Josephus. In 1821 he was elected to the professorship of poetry in the university of Oxford, and he held it the full term of ten years, when he was succeeded by John Keble, the author of the 'Christian Year.' In 1827 he was Bampton lecturer. In 1835 he was nominated by the crown, on the recommendation of Viscount Melbourne, then prime minister, to a canonry residentiary in Westminster Abbey, with the rectory of St. Margaret's annexed; and these he held until 1849, when, on the death of Bishop Coplestone, he was nominated by the crown to the deanery of St. Paul's. Died 24 Sept., 1868. In addition to the works above enumerated, Dr. Milman wrote, in prose, a 'History of Latin Christianity;' a 'History of the Jews;' Notes and Illustrations to Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall;' the 'Martyr of Antioch;' 'Anne Boleyn;' 'Belshazzar;' and other works. His 'History of St. Paul's' appeared soon after his death.

MILNE, COLIN, LL.D., was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal College there, under his uncle, Dr. Campbell. From thence he removed to Edinburgh, after which, on becoming tutor to Lord Algernon Percy, he took orders in the church of England, and was presented to the rectory of North Chapel, in Essex. He was also chosen lecturer of Deptford. Died 1815. He published 'A Botanical Dictionary;' Linnæi Institutiones Botanicæ; Indigenous Botany, or the Habitats of English Plants; and a volume of sermons.

MILNE, JOSHUA, actuary of the Sun Life Assurance Company, and author of a well-known 'Treatise on Annuities and Assurances,' died at Upper Clapton 4 Jan., 1851, aged 75.

MILNER, ISAAC, D.D., younger brother of Joseph Milner, was born 1751, and brought up to the weaving business; but even while at the loom his mind was intent upon study, and all the time he could obtain from labour was devoted to the classics and mathematics. Such was his progress that his brother took him for an assistant in the grammar-school, and afterwards sent him to Queen's College, Cambridge, where, in 1774, he was senior wrangler, and gained the first mathematical prize. He also became a tutor in that science, and, among other pupils, had Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Pitt, with whom he made a tour on the Continent. In 1783 Mr. Milner was appointed professor of natural philosophy, and in 1788 elected master of his college. The same year he was made dean of Carlisle; in 1792 he served the office of vice-chancellor; and in 1798 he succeeded Waring as Lucasian professor of mathematics. Died 1 April, 1820. His publications are Animadversions on Hawker's Church History; a continuation of his brother's Ecclesiastical History; Strictures on the publications of Dr. Marsh, respecting the Bible Society; Life of Joseph Milner, prefixed to his sermons.

MILNER, JOHN, was born at Skircoat, near Halifax, Yorkshire, Feb., 1627-28. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, after which he took orders, but was obliged to live retired till the Restoration, when he obtained the curacy of Beeston, and in 1673 was elected vicar of Leeds. In 1681 he was chosen prebendary of Ripon; but on refusing the oaths at the Revolution, he quitted his preferments, and went to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he died 16 Feb., 1702. His works are Conjectanea in Isaiam ix. 1 2; The Church History of Palestine; Dissertation on the four last Kings of Judah; De Nethinim sive Nethinæis; Defence of Archbishop Usher against Dr. Cary and Is. Vossius; Discourse of Conscience; View of the Dissertation of Dr. Bentley on the Epistles of Phalaris, &c.; Account of Mr. Locke's Religion; Animadversions on Le Clerc's Reflections upon our Saviour and his Apostles, &c.

MILNER, JOHN, D.D., F.S.A., an English prelate of the Roman communion, was born in London

14 Oct., 1752. From a school at Edgbaston, near Birmingham, he was sent to Sedgley Park, and next to the English college at Douay. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and returning at once to his native land, he laboured in London till 1779, when he was stationed at Winchester. The circumstance which first called forth the zeal and energies of this remarkable man was the spirit of resistance to ecclesiastical authority which followed the first relaxation of the penal code against the Catholics. In 1782 five persons were appointed to be 'a committee for five years, to promote and attend to the affairs of the Roman Catholic body in England;' and the time for its existence being expired, in 1787 another committee was nominated. Of these committees Mr. Charles Butler, the eminent conveyancer, was secretary. One of their measures was the proposal of a new oath, which gave rise to a strong contention, in which Dr. Milner took a very prominent part. The oath was condemned by the Vicars-Apostolic, who issued an encyclical letter declaring that it could not be lawfully taken. This so incensed the committee that they went so far as to protest against the present and all future decisions of the bishops, 'as encroaching on their natural, civil, and religious rights.' The prelates subsequently issued a second encyclical, condemning the appellation of 'Protesting Catholic Dissenters,' assumed by the committee; and the final result of the struggle was that the cause so ardently advocated by Milner obtained a complete victory. In 1803, on the death of Dr. Stapleton, he was appointed Vicar-Apostolic of the Midland District, being consecrated on the 1st of March, in that year, Bishop of Castabala, in partibus. He now took up his residence at Wolverhampton, and devoted himself heart and soul to the duties of his new and exalted position. An uncompromising champion of the Church of Rome, his pen and tongue were incessantly urging her claims. In particular he waged war à outrance against the proposed government veto on the appointment of Catholic bishops. He died 19 April, 1826. Bishop Milner's abilities, both as a theologian and an antiquary, are strikingly exemplified in his numerous works, of which we can only find room to specify a few, viz., 'An Historical and Critical Inquiry into the Existence and Character of St. George;' 'The History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester,' 1799; and edit. 1809, a performance which will always keep its place among the standard works on English topography; 'Letters to a Prebendary; being an answer to Reflections on Popery by the Rev. J. Sturges, LL.D.,' 1800; 'Inquiry into certain Vulgar Opinions concerning the Catholic Inhabitants and Antiquities of Ireland,' 1808; 'A Serious Expostulation with the Rev. Joseph Berington on his theological errors concerning Miracles,' 1808; 'Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England,' 1811; 'Supplementary Memoirs of English Catholics, addressed to Charles Butler;' 'The End of Religious Controversy; or a Friendly Correspondence between a religious Society of Protestants and a Roman Catholic divine,' 1818; and papers in the 'Archæologia.' A Life of Bishop Milner, by Dr. Husenbeth, was published at Dublin, 1862.

MILNER, JOSEPH, a pious divine, was the son of a poor weaver at Leeds, and born there 2 Jan., 1744. He was educated at the free grammar-school of his native place, and next at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1766, and obtained one of the chancellor's medals. On entering into orders he became master of the grammar-school at Hull, where he was also chosen afternoon lecturer. He was afterwards presented to the vicarage of North Ferriby, and latterly to that of the Holy Trinity Church in Hull. Died 15 Nov., 1797. His works are The Life of William Howard; Answer to Gibbon's Attack on Christianity; Essays on the Influence of the Holy Spirit; History of the Church of Christ, 4 vols.; and two volumes of sermons.

MILTON, JOHN, was born in Bread Street, Cheapside, 9 Dec., 1608. His father, who was a scrivener, instructed him in the rudiments of learning, and afterwards sent him to St. Paul's School, from whence, in 1625, he was removed to Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took both his degrees in arts, and then retired to Horton, Bucks, at which place his father was then settled. Here he wrote his 'Comus' and 'Lycidas.' The former of these pieces was acted before the earl of Bridgewater at Ludlow Castle; and the latter was composed on the death of Edward King, fellow of Christ's College. It is also probable that the two poems of 'L'Allegro,' and 'Il Penseroso,' were written at Horton. In 1638 Milton went through France to Italy, and was about to extend his travels into Greece; but on hearing of the disturbed state of his native country, he resolved to return home, where he arrived after an absence of fifteen months. He now became a schoolmaster, first in St. Bride's Churchyard, and next in Aldersgate Street; but while thus employed he engaged in the contentions of the times, and wrote some furious tracts against the hierarchy. In 1643 he married the daughter of Mr. Powell, a justice of peace in Oxfordshire; but the lady, from some disgust, left her husband about a month after the nuptials, and refused to return. On this Milton determined to repudiate her without any legal proceeding; as a preparative to which strange act, he published some treatises on 'The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce,' in which he attempted to show that a man may put away his wife for bad temper and other impediments to happiness, besides adultery. This position was so offensive to the assembly of divines at Westminster, that they presented a complaint to the lords on the subject, but nothing was done against the author, who became as bitter an enemy to the Presbyterian clergy as he had before been to the Episcopalians. Having now convinced himself that his principle of divorce was warranted, he resolved to carry it into practice, and accordingly paid his addresses to another woman, which gave such alarm to the friends of his wife, that they set about effecting a reconciliation, and succeeded. Milton was now in great favour with the ruling party, to whom he recommended himself by vindicating the murder of Charles I. in a piece called 'The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.' For this publication he was made Latin secretary to the commonwealth; and he had scarcely entered upon the office before he was called upon to reply to the 'Icon Basiliké, or the Portraiture of his sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings.' The treatise of Milton was called 'Iconoclastes,' or the Image Breaker, in which he calumniated the king for having made use of a prayer taken from Sidney's Arcadia. He was next employed to answer the treatise of Salmasius, entitled 'Defensio Regia,' or a Defence of the late King. The reply of Milton had for its title 'Defensio pro populo Anglicano;' and it was observed by Hobbes, in regard to the two disputants, that he did not know whose style was best, or whose arguments were worst. In one respect Milton had the advantage, for while Salmasius obtained only one hundred pounds as a remuneration for his labour, his more powerful antagonist received one thousand. Milton's sight, which had long been in a state of decay, now left him entirely; yet he continued in his office, having for an assistant Andrew Marvell. In 1652 he lost his wife, who left him three children; and soon after he married a second time, but became a widower again within a few months. At the Restoration he absconded, and caused reports to be circulated of his death, to corroborate which a sham funeral was also celebrated. When the danger was over he made his appearance again, and married a third wife. He now employed himself in writing his 'Paradise Lost,' which was first published in ten books in 1667. For this immortal poem he received five pounds, with a contingent agreement that he should be paid double that sum more on the sale of two thousand copies. His widow subsequently sold the whole of the copyright for eight pounds. In 1671 he published 'Paradise Regained,' which he wrote on a hint given him by Elwood, the Quaker, who observed, 'Thou hast said much upon Paradise Lost; but what hast thou to say to Paradise Found?' Though this poem is not to be compared in any degree to the former, it was preferred to the Paradise Lost by the author. About the same time came out his 'Samson Agonistes,' a dramatic poem, constructed upon the Grecian model; and in 1672 he published a collection of his miscellaneous poems, to which was subjoined 'A Letter on Education.' He died 8 Nov., 1674, and was buried in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, where Mr. Whitbread placed a bust to his memory. A monument in honour of Milton was erected by William Benson, in Westminster Abbey, 1737. In 1750 the masque of 'Comus' was performed for the benefit of one of his grand-daughters, named Foster. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote 'The History of England,' to the Conquest, and several tracts, which have been collected in 3 vols. folio, and 7 vols. 8vo. The best edition of his poetical works is that of Mr. Todd, in 6 vols. 8vo., with the life of Milton in one volume. His Latin 'Treatise on Christian Doctrine' was first edited in 1825, by Bishop Sumner, of Winchester, from a MS. discovered in the State Paper Office. Bishop Sumner also published an English translation of it.

MIMNERMUS, a Greek elegiac poet, who flourished about 590 B.C.

MINA, Francisco Espoz y, a Spanish general, born in Navarre 1784. He became a guerilla chief at the time of the French invasion (1809), and, after obtaining several victories over the French generals, was promoted to the rank of field-marshal. When Ferdinand violated the constitution (1814) Mina quitted Spain, to which country he returned on the proclamation of the Cortes (1820). Appointed captain-general of Galicia he made himself master of Catalonia, and for a long time offered a gallant resistance at Moncey, but being eventually vanquished by force of numbers he signed a capitulation (1823) and retired to England. In 1834 he again returned to Spain to oppose Don Carlos, and died 24 Dec., 1836, of the wounds he received at Barcelona.

MINOT, Laurence, an English poet in the fourteenth century, whose works lay in obscurity, as well as his name, till accident discovered them to Mr. Tyrwhitt, while he was preparing his edition of Chaucer. A complete edition of them was published by Ritson in 1794.

MINUCIUS FELIX, Marcus, a Christian writer of the third century, who is said to have been a native of Africa, and a lawyer by profession. He lived at Rome, where he wrote a dialogue in defence of Christianity, entitled 'Octavius,' which was long ascribed to Arnobius till Baudouin discovered the real author in 1560. It has been translated into English by Reeves, and also by Lord Hailes.

MIRABAUD, Jean Baptiste de, a French writer who is chiefly known by his translations of Tasso's Jerusalem and of Ariosto's Orlando. Born 1675; died 24 June, 1760.

MIRABEAU, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti comte de, a French nobleman, born 1749. His father, Victor Riquetti, marquis of Mirabeau, published 'L'Ami des Hommes,' and several other works on political economy; but many of his principles are very dangerous. He died 13 July, 1789. His son, the subject of the present article, led a dissipated life in his youth, and was oftentimes imprisoned. He went to Berlin towards the close of the reign of Frederic, and was there when the French revolution commenced, on which he returned home, and was elected a member of the states-general; and, in January, 1791, he became president of the national assembly; but died of a fever, on the second of April following. The best edition of his works is that by Mérilhou, 9 vols. 8vo., Paris, 1825-27.

MIRANDA, Francisco, a Spanish American patriot and French general, born at Caracas, in Venezuela, about 1750. He quitted his native country after having organized a conspiracy against the viceroy, and, in 1791, went to Paris, where he formed an intimacy with Dumouriez, and entered the French army. After the defection of that general he was tried by the revolutionary tribunal and acquitted, but being afterwards accused of complicity with the Girondins he was exiled, and fled to England. In 1803 he returned to France, but Bonaparte ordered him to leave that country, whereupon he went back to South America. In 1811 he established a republican government at Caracas, which, with the assistance of England and the United States, he maintained during the year 1812, but being afterwards captured by the Spaniards he was cast into prison at Cadiz, where he died 1816.

MIRANDOLA, Giovanni Pico della, count, and prince of Concordia, an Italian scholar, born at Mirandola (Modena) 24 Feb., 1463, being the youngest son of John Francis Pico, prince of Mirandola. He lost his father at an early age, but his mother took care of his education, in which he made such progress as to be sent at fourteen to study canon law in the university of Bologna. After this he visited most of the colleges in Italy and France. In 1482, he built a villa called Fratta on his estate, in praise of which he wrote a poem. He now applied himself to the Greek language at Florence, where he wrote a panegyric on the poems of Lorenzo de' Medici. On leaving Florence he studied the oriental languages, particularly Hebrew and Arabic. In 1486 he was at Rome, where he published a challenge, offering to dispute on nine hundred propositions in different subjects. Instead, however, of being answered, as he expected, a charge of heresy was brought against him, for which he was indebted to his own vanity, in setting himself up as superior to all the learned of his day. He was in consequence obliged to leave Rome, and return to Florence, where he wrote an apology for his conduct and opinions. In 1488 he settled on an estate near Florence, given to him by Lorenzo de' Medici, and there he wrote several works, particularly his treatise 'De Ente et Uno.' On the death of his friend Lorenzo, he removed to Ferrara, previous to which he sold his estate of Mirandola to his nephew. He now devoted himself wholly to theological studies, and wrote several disquisitions, the chief of which was the 'Hexaplus; or Explanation of the Six Days' Work of Creation.' He died at Florence 17 Nov., 1494, and his works were printed together at Bologna in 1496; but the best edition is that of 1601.

MIRANDOLA, Giovanni Francesco Pico della, nephew of the preceding, was born about 1469. He wrote several theological works in Latin; also the life of Jerome Savonarola; and poems. He was assassinated in his castle, together with his son, by his nephew Galeoti Pico, 1533.

MIRBEL, Charles François Brisseau de, a French naturalist, born at Paris 27 March, 1776; died 12 Sept., 1854.

MIREVELT. See Mierevelt.

MISSON, François Maximilien, a French lawyer, who retired to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He became a travelling tutor; in which capacity he published 'A new Voyage to Italy,' of which Addison speaks favourably. Misson afterwards fell into the reveries of the French prophets; and died at London 16 Jan., 1721.

MITCHELL, Sir Andrew, K.B., a British admiral, born in Scotland about 1757; died at Bermuda 26 Feb., 1806.

MITCHELL, John Mitchell, born 1789, and educated at Edinburgh. For nearly fifty years he was in business as a merchant of Leith, and for a great part of that time acted as Belgian consul-general. His leisure, however, was devoted to literature and archæology. He published a treatise on the Runic literature of Scandinavia, and an elaborate work on 'The Herring: its natural history and national importance.' Shortly before his death, which occurred 24 April, 1865, the king of the Belgians sent him the gold medal of the Order of Leopold.

MITCHELL, Joseph, a dramatic poet, born in Scotland about 1684; died 6 Feb., 1738.

MITCHELL, Thomas, was born in London 30 May, 1783, and educated at Christ's Hospital, and next at Pembroke College, Cambridge (B.A. 1806; M.A. 1809), but he afterwards migrated to Sidney College, where he obtained a fellowship which he eventually resigned in consequence of his unwillingness to take orders, and thenceforward devoted himself to private tuition and literary work. He translated Aristophanes into English verse, 2 vols., 1820-22; superintended the publication of the Greek works which issued from time to time from the Clarendon press; edited five of the plays of Aristophanes, and three of those of Sophocles; and published useful indices to the Greek orators and Plato. Mr. Mitchell died at Steeple Aston, near Woodstock, 4 May, 1845.

MITCHELL, Sir Thomas Livingstone, a geographical discoverer and miscellaneous writer, was born in Scotland 1792, and at an early age entered the army. For some years he was aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington, and was on the quartermaster-general's staff till the end of the Peninsular war, when he was sent back on a special mission to Spain and Portugal, under Sir Henry Torrens, to make a survey of the fields of battle and the positions of the English and French armies. Subsequently he was appointed surveyor-general of New South Wales, and it was owing to his exertions that the overland route to Victoria and South Australia was first regularly surveyed, and Mount Byng discovered. He was knighted 1839, and died at his residence, Park Hall, Victoria, New South Wales, 5 Oct., 1855. He published a beautiful trigonometrical survey of Port Jackson; a translation of the Lusiad of Camoens; 'Travels in Australia;' and some elementary works on military science.

MITFORD, John, author of 'Johnny Newcome in the Navy,' and other poetical effusions, was originally a lieutenant in the navy, but was dismissed in consequence of some disgraceful forgery of letters, connected with Queen Caroline. He then turned author, and edited the 'Scourge' and 'Bon Ton Magazine,' but his principal work is the one first mentioned, which he is said to have composed in the fields at Bayswater, sleeping out every night in a gravel pit, until he had finished his task, which he completed in forty-three days. He was so dissipated and low in his habits that his relatives refused to notice him, and he died in St. Giles's Workhouse, London, in Dec., 1831.

MITFORD, John, was born at Richmond, Surrey, 13 Aug., 1781, and educated at Tunbridge School, and Oriel College, Oxford. He obtained the living of Benhall, Suffolk, 1810. In 1815 he was appointed domestic chaplain to his relative Lord Redesdale, and presented to the rectory of Weston St. Peter's; and in 1817 to that of Stratford St. Andrew, both in Suffolk. He died at Benhall 27 April, 1856. This accomplished scholar was for many years editor of the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' and the principal writer in it from 1834-50. He also wrote some poetical works, and edited Grey, Spenser, Milton, Dryden, Butler, Prior, Swift, Young, Parnell, Goldsmith, Falconer, and Vincent Bourne.

MITFORD, John Freeman, Lord Redesdale. See Redesdale.

MITFORD, Mary Russell, was born at Alresford, Hampshire, 16 Dec., 1787. Her father, a physician practising at Reading, was a thoroughly selfish man, reckless and extravagant beyond belief, and to the end of his days a dead weight, dragging his wife and daughter to the ground. With his wife, Mary Russell, he received £28,000 in money besides houses and property in land, but in eight or nine years he had gambled, squandered, or otherwise fooled away all this fortune, except £3,500 in the funds, which was settled on his wife. He had to sell his furniture and library, and removed from one place to another, till in 1795 or 1796 his art of sinking brought him to the bottom of the sea of troubles, and we find him living with his wife and child on the Surrey side of Blackfriars Bridge, and taking refuge from his creditors within the rules of the King's Bench. A prize of £20,000 which he drew in the lottery, gave him an opportunity of starting again on the road to ruin. This he speedily did, for he took a house at Reading, and divided his time between field sports and the London card clubs. When the £20,000 was run through, there came another favourable turn of Fortune's wheel. His daughter, who had received an excellent education at a school in Chelsea, began to earn money by her pen, at first in small sums, afterwards in larger. The hard-earned guineas were received by her father with as little conscience as if they had been his rents, and for thirty years Miss Mitford maintained him in his idleness and dissipation, breaking her health and spirits in the labour; and all this time there never dawned upon her the suspicion that he was other than the best of men. As early as 1806 Miss Mitford produced three volumes of verse, one of which was severely castigated by the 'Quarterly Review.' Her passion as an anthoress was dramatic composition, and her principal works which made their way to the public stage were 'Julian' 1823, 'Foscari' 1826, 'Rienzi' 1828, and 'Charles the First.' To the magazines, annuals, and other periodicals, her contributions were numerous. At length in the sketches of 'Our Village,' originally published in the 'Ladies' Magazine,' about 1819, she hit upon the vein most profitable in its direct advantages, and most favourable for her literary reputation. The general verdict of the public approved 'Our Village'—which in reality was Three Mile Cross near Reading—as presenting truthful sketches of rural life; and the work will always retain its charm as a piece of unaffected, natural, and simple writing. Four other volumes of sketches were added, the fifth and last in 1832. For her work entitled 'Belford Regis; or Sketches of a County Town,' the neighbouring borough of Reading supplied the materials. Numerous other tales followed, all of which met with a flattering reception. In 1852 Miss Mitford published her 'Recollections of a Literary Life; or Books, Places, and People;' her last work being 'Atherton and other Tales' 1854. She died at her residence, Swallowfield Cottage, near Reading, 10 Jan., 1855. A Life of Miss Mitford, with copious extracts from her correspondence, appeared at London in 3 vols., 1869, under the editorship of the Rev. A. G. L'Estrange.

MITFORD, WILLIAM, an historian, brother of Lord Redesdale, was born in London 10 Feb., 1744, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He afterwards entered the Middle Temple, but never practised the law. He was colonel of the South Hampshire militia; and a member of Parliament from 1785 to 1818. He likewise held for some years the professorship of ancient history at the Royal Academy. His principal work, 'The History of Greece,' originally appeared in 5 vols. 4to., 1784-1818. Mr. Mitford also wrote 'An Essay upon Harmony in Language, intended principally to illustrate that of the English Language;' and 'Observations on the History and Doctrine of Christianity.' Died 18 Feb., 1827.

MOCQUARD, CONSTANTINE, a French politician and man of letters, was born at Bordeaux 1791, and died at Paris 9 Dec., 1864. He was for many years Napoleon III.'s private secretary.

MOELLENDORF, RICHARD JOACHIM HENRY, a Prussian field-marshal, born 1724; died 28 Jan., 1816.

MOIR, DAVID MACBETH, a poet and littérateur, was born at Musselburgh, co. Edinburgh, 5 Jan., 1798, at which place, after passing through the medical classes of the university of Edinburgh, he practised as a surgeon with great success. At an early period of life he distinguished himself by his contributions to Blackwood's Magazine under the signature of 'Delta.' Two volumes of poems which first appeared in the pages of that miscellany, viz., 'The Legend of Geneviève' and 'Domestic Verses' were afterwards published separately, as was also his humorous novel entitled 'The Life of Mansie Waugh.' His chief contribution to professional literature was his 'Outlines of the Ancient History of Medicine.' He died 6 July 1851, and in the following year a selection of his 'Poetical Works' was published by T. Aird.

MOITTE, JEAN GUILLAUME, a French sculptor, born 1747, at Paris, where he died 2 May, 1810.

MOIVRE. See DE MOIVRE.

MOLA, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian landscape painter, died 1661.

MOLA, PETER FRANCIS, an historical and landscape painter born at Lugano, in the Milanese territory, 1609; died 1665.

MOLAI, JACQUES DE, the last grand-master of the order of Templars. The prodigious wealth of the knights having excited the envy and hatred of the great, particularly of Philip the Fair, king of France, it was resolved to suppress the order. Accordingly a violent persecution broke out against the knights on charges the most absurd and abominable. Molai was tried, condemned, and burnt alive near Paris 11 March, 1314. He endured his sufferings with the greatest fortitude, and vindicated the innocence of his order to the last.

MOLE, JOHN, a self-taught mathematician, celebrated for his skill and knowledge in the science of algebra, was born at Old Newton, Suffolk, 10 March, 1743, and died at Nacton, in the same county, 27 Sept., 1827. He published 'Elements of Algebra,' 1788; and 'A Treatise on Algebra, for Schools,' 1809.

MOLESWORTH, ROBERT, Viscount Molesworth, was born at Dublin 1656, and educated in Trinity College. When James II. landed in Ireland, he caused his estate to be sequestrated; but on the settlement of the new government he was made a privy councillor, and sent ambassador to Copenhagen, where he had a dispute with the king, which induced him to return home abruptly. He then published 'An Account of Denmark' which was answered by Dr. King. In 1714 he was made a commissioner of trade and plantations; and two years afterwards raised to the Irish peerage. Died 22 May, 1725. His lordship published some tracts on agriculture, a letter on the bill of peerage, and a translation of 'The Franco-Gallia' of Hottoman.

MOLESWORTH, Sir WILLIAM, was born in London 23 May, 1810, being son of Sir A. O. Molesworth, Bart. He succeeded to the baronetcy at the age of thirteen, and was subsequently entered as a student at Cambridge, but was rusticated for sending a challenge to his tutor. Afterwards he studied at Edinburgh and at one of the German universities. In 1832 he obtained a seat in Parliament for East Cornwall. He afterwards represented other constituencies, and sat for Southwark, in the liberal interest, from 1845 till his death, which occurred 22 Oct., 1855. It was Sir W. Molesworth who first aroused the attention of Parliament to the importance of our remote dependencies, and explained with incomparable clearness and force the principles of colonial self-government. He was at one time the proprietor and editor of the Westminster Review; and he edited and reprinted at great expense the works of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury.

MOLIÈRE, Jean Baptiste Poquelin, the greatest of the comic dramatists of France, was born at Paris, where he was baptized 15 Jan., 1622. His real name was Poquelin. His father, who was 'tapissier valet de chambre' to Louis XIII., sent him to the Jesuit College at Clermont, where he made a rapid progress in his studies; but he soon quitted that seminary to attend the Court. It is said that he afterwards studied the law, and was admitted an advocate, but this is doubtful. A strong turn for the stage led him to join a company of comedians, when he altered his name to Molière. In 1653 he produced, at Lyons, his first comedy, called 'L'Etourdi,' or the Blunderer, the principal character of which was performed by himself. From thence he removed with his company to Beziers in Languedoc, where he was patronized by the prince of Conti, who offered to make him his secretary; which honour he declined. After acting in various provinces, he went to Paris, where his company was taken into the king's service in 1665. His last comedy, 'Le Malade Imaginaire,' was performed, the fourth time, 17 Feb., 1673; but while personating the sick man, Molière was seized with a convulsion, which, being followed by a vomiting of blood, carried him off in a few hours. There are numerous editions of his works.

MOLIERES, Joseph Privat de, a French mathematician born at Tarascon, 1677; died 12 May, 1742.

MOLINA, Louis de, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Cuença, 1535. He became professor of theology at Ebora; and died at Madrid 12 Oct., 1601. His principal work, 'The Agreement of Grace and Free Will,' 1588, occasioned some fierce disputes between the Jesuits and Dominicans; to terminate which Pope Paul V. issued a decree in 1607.

MOLINET, Claude du, an ecclesiastical antiquary, was born at Châlons-sur-Marne 1620; and died 2 Sept, 1687. He was canon and procurator-general of the congregation of St. Geneviève, at Paris.

MOLINOS, Michael, a Spanish divine, born at Saragossa, 1627. He resided chiefly at Rome, where, in 1675, he published 'The Spiritual Guide,' which was well received at first; but on its being reprinted in 1681, an alarm was taken at the principles it contained, and the author was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. Died 29 Dec., 1696. The followers of Molinos, of whom Madame Guyon was the principal, were called Mystics and Quietists, because they maintained that religion consists in an abstraction of the mind from external and finite objects.

MOLIQUE, Bernard, a musician and composer, born at Nuremburg 7 Oct., 1803; died at Canstatt, Wurtemburg, 10 May, 1869. He settled in London 1849, and resided here several years.

MOLLOY, Charles, a dramatic writer, was a native of Dublin, and educated in the college of that city. He afterwards became a student of the Middle Temple, and was the editor of a political paper, called Common Sense. His plays are 'The Perplexed Couple;' 'The Coquet;' and 'Half-Pay Officers.' Died 16 July, 1767.

MOLYNEUX, William, LL.D., F.R.S., a mathematician, born at Dublin 17 April, 1656. After taking his bachelor's degree in Trinity College, he studied the law in the Middle Temple. In 1678 he returned to Ireland, where he formed a philosophical society, of which he became secretary. In 1684 he was appointed a surveyor of the public works, and chief engineer. During the confusion of the times at the Revolution, he retired to Chester, where he finished his 'Dioptrics,' which came out in 1692. The same year he returned to Dublin, and became a member of Parliament. He died 11 Oct., 1698, having just before published a piece, entitled 'The case of Ireland stated, in relation to its being bound by English acts of parliament.' His other works are—'Sciothericum Telescopicum;' and several papers in the Philosophical Transactions. His son, Samuel Molyneux, was born at Chester July, 1689. He became secretary to George II., when prince of Wales; and afterwards was made a commissioner of the Admiralty; but died young. He made several improvements in the construction of telescopes. Thomas Molyneux, brother of William, became professor of physic in Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1730 was created a baronet. He died 19 Oct., 1733. Several of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions; and he also published 'Letters to Mr. Locke,' 1708.

MONBODDO, Lord. James Burnett, commonly known by his legal designation of Lord Monboddo, was born at the family seat of Monboddo, in Scotland, in Oct. or Nov., 1714. He was educated at Laurencekirk, next at Aberdeen, and afterwards at Groningen, where he studied the civil law. On his return to Scotland, in 1738, he was admitted an advocate and obtained considerable practice. On the death of his relation, Lord Milton, in 1767, he was promoted to the judicial bench, by the title of Lord Monboddo. He died at Edinburgh 26 May, 1799. His lordship was deeply read in ancient Greek literature, his love of which he carried so far as to despise all modern learning; yet his works may be read to great advantage, notwithstanding the paradoxes which abound in them respecting the history of man in his natural and civil state. His Origin and Progress of Language appeared in 1773; and the first part of his Ancient Metaphysics in 1778. This last work extended to six volumes.

MONCEY, Bon Adrien Jeannot de, duke de Conegliano, a marshal of France, was born at Besançon 31 July, 1754; and died at Paris 20 April, 1842.

MONCRIEFF, Sir Henry Wellwood, Bart., D.D., a celebrated divine of the church of Scotland; born 1750. He became minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, 1775; moderator of the General Assembly 1785; and died 9 Aug., 1827. His 'Sermons' were published in 3 vols. 1829-31. He was also author of 'Discourses on the Evidences of the Jewish and Christian Revelations;' and an 'Account of the Life and Writings of John Erskine, D.D.'

MONCRIEFF, William Thomas, a dramatist, was a native of London. In early life he was employed as clerk by Mr. Willoughby, one of the six attorneys permitted to practise in the old Palace Court, Westminster. While thus engaged he gave indications of a talent for poetical and dramatic composition, and produced 'The Diamond Arrow,' 'Rochester,' 'All at Coventry,' and other pieces, which met with such success that his future vocation was decided. His greatest hit was the operatic extravaganza of 'Tom and Jerry,' produced at the Adelphi Theatre 1823. It created a perfect furore. Afterwards Mr. Moncrieff took a printing business at the corner of Clare Court, Drury Lane, in conjunction with the elder Oxberry. The speculation being unsuccessful he next accepted the situation of stage-manager at the Coburg Theatre, and, at a still later date, was employed in the production of 'horse pieces' at Astley's. At this period of his career (1837) his eyesight gradually failed, and he ultimately became totally blind. His necessities compelled him to make several appeals to the Literary Fund, through whose instrumentality he eventually obtained a presentation to the Charterhouse, where he passed the remainder of his life. Died 1857, aged 63.

MONGE, GASPARD, comte de Peluse, a celebrated French mathematician, born at Beaune 1746, and educated among the Fathers of the Oratory at that place, and at Lyons. He succeeded Nollet as professor of physics in the military school at Mezières, and on being admitted into the Academy of Sciences (1780) he removed to Paris and assisted Bossut in a course of lectures on hydrodynamics at the Louvre. He subsequently held the posts of examiner and minister of the marine; and signed the order for the death of Louis XVI. as a member of the executive council of government. Soon afterwards he resigned his functions, and was employed with other men of science in various places for augmenting the military resources of his country. He assisted in the formation of the Normal and Polytechnic Schools, and was one of those sent to Italy for the purpose of making collections for the galleries and halls of the Louvre. The attachment which he on various occasions manifested to Bonaparte led to his being nominated a member of the senate on the first formation of that body. The Emperor further bestowed upon him the title of Count of Peluse, the senatorial lordship of Liege, made him grand cordon of the Legion of Honour, and gave him an estate in Westphalia, and, a little while before he set out on his Russian expedition, a present of 200,000 francs. The fall of his benefactor involved Monge in misfortunes. He was expelled from the Institute in 1816; one of his sons-in-law was exiled; and he was deprived of all his employments. His faculties became disordered and he died 28 July, 1818. It was Monge who laid the foundation of a new and important branch of science, to which he gave the name of 'descriptive geometry.' His principle works are a Treatise on Statics; 'Géométrie Descriptive;' 'Description de l'Art de fabriquer les Canons;' 'Application de l'Analyse à la Géométrie des Surfaces.' He likewise wrote a multitude of memoirs on mathematical and physical science.

MONICA (ST.), mother of St. Augustine, was born 332, of Christian parents, and married to Patricius, a citizen of Tagasta, in Numidia, by whom she had two sons and a daughter. She converted her husband, who was a Pagan, and after having, by her prayers and tears, obtained the conversion of St. Augustine, her eldest son, who had been entangled in the pleasures of the age, and the errors of Manichæism, died at Ostia, as she was returning to Africa in 387.

MONK, GEORGE, duke of Albemarle, was descended from the Plantagenets, and born at Potheridge, the seat of his father, Sir Thomas Monk, in Devonshire, 6 Dec., 1608. At the age of seventeen he served under his relation, Sir Richard Grenville, in an expedition against Spain; and, in 1620, he went as an ensign to the Low Countries, where he obtained a captain's commission. In 1639 he attended Charles I. to Scotland, and was made lieutenant-colonel; afterwards he went to Ireland, and for his services in the Rebellion was appointed governor of Dublin. On his return to England with his regiment (1643) he was made major-general in the Irish brigade, then employed in the siege of Nantwich, Cheshire, where he was taken prisoner, and sent to the Tower. After remaining in confinement about three years, he was induced to accept a commission under the parliament against the Irish rebels; in which service he performed several great exploits, but at last fell under censure, for concluding a treaty with Owen Roe O'Neil. Upon this he gave up the command, and retired to his estate; but was soon called to serve with Cromwell in Scotland, where he bore a part in the battle of Dunbar; after which he was left in the command of the English forces in that kingdom. In 1653 he was joined with Blake and Dean in the naval service against the Dutch fleet, commanded by Van Trump, with whom two desperate battles were fought that year, in both of which the English were victorious. Peace being soon after concluded, Monk returned to Scotland, where he remained during the usurpation of Cromwell, who regarded him with jealousy, and even imparted to him, in a letter, the suspicions which he entertained of his design to restore the king. Monk took no notice of this, but watched his opportunity; and when the authority of Richard Cromwell declined, he began his movements, and conducted them with so much judgment as to bring about that important event without bloodshed or confusion. After this he was created duke of Albemarle, and knight of the garter. The remainder of his life was not spent inactively, for when hostilities broke out with the Dutch he again commanded the fleet, and fought De Ruyter and Van Trump, in a tremendous battle, which lasted three days. The duke had scarcely returned into port before he was called to London, in consequence of the dreadful fire which laid the greatest part of the capital in ashes; and so dear was he to the people, that when he passed along, they cried out, 'If his Grace had been there the city would not have been burned.' He died 3 January, 1669-70, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. By his duchess, who survived him but a few months, he had one son, Christopher, who died governor of Jamaica, without issue, in 1688. In 1671 was published a treatise, composed by General Monk, in the Tower, with this title, 'Observations upon Military and Political Affairs.'

MONK, JAMES HENRY, D.D., an Anglican prelate, born at Buntingford, Herts, 1784. From the Charterhouse he was transferred to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship, 1805. Two years later he became assistant-tutor of the college, when he commenced his classical lectures, and such was the effect produced on the minds of his pupils that, during the fifteen years of his tutorship, they carried off the greater part of the higher classical honours at Cambridge. In 1809 he was nominated Greek professor in succession to the celebrated Porson, and he retained this chair till 1822, when he was installed dean of Peterborough. He was promoted to the see of Gloucester and Bristol 1830; and died 6 June, 1856. He published editions of the 'Hippolytus' and 'Alcestes' of Euripides, and wrote an admirable 'Life of Bentley,' 2 vols. 4to., 1831. In conjunction with C. J. Blomfield, afterwards Bishop of London, he edited Porson's 'Adversaria,' and also the 'Museum Criticum, or Cambridge Classical Researches.'

MONMOUTH, GEOFFREY OF. See GEOFFREY.

MONMOUTH, HENRY CAREY, EARL OF, eldest son of Robert the first earl, was born 1596. He took his bachelor's degree at Exeter College, Oxford, after which he went abroad. He was made a knight of the Bath 1616; and died 13 June, 1661. His publications are 'Romulus and Tarquin; or De Principe et Tyranno,' a translation from Malvezzi; Speech in the House of Peers, 30 Jan., 1641; 'Historical Relations of the United Provinces and of Flanders,' translated from Bentivoglio; 'History of the Wars in Flanders,' from the same author; 'Advertisement from Parnassus,' translated from Boccalini; 'Politic Discourses,' from Paul Feruta; 'History of Venice,' from the same; 'The Use of Passions,' from the French of Senault; 'Man become guilty; or the corruption of his nature by sin,' from the same author; 'The History of the late Wars of Christendom,' which Walpole thinks is the same work as his translation of Sir Francis Biondi's 'History of the Civil Wars of England.' His lordship began also to translate Priorato's 'History of France,' but died before he could finish it. It was completed by William Brent, and printed in 1677.

MONMOUTH, JAMES FITZROY, DUKE OF, a natural son of Charles II., king of England, by Lucy Walters, one of his mistresses, was born at Rotterdam 1649. At the Restoration he was created earl of Orkney, and afterwards duke of Monmouth, and K.G. For some time he was in the service of France with an English regiment and signalised himself against the Dutch, for which he was made lieutenant-general. On his return to England he was sent to quell an insurrection in Scotland. After this he joined the disaffected party, who were in favour of excluding the duke of York from the throne. He was also concerned in a plot against his father, for which he was pardoned, and then went to Holland, from whence he returned at the accession of James II., and, having landed in Dorsetshire, obtained many followers, who were decisively defeated at Sedgmoor, in Somersetshire, 6 July, 1685. The duke was taken in a corn field and sent to London, where he was tried and beheaded on Tower Hill 15 July, 1685.

MONMOUTH, ROBERT CAREY, EARL OF, died 1639. His 'Memoirs,' containing some curious particulars of secret history of the Elizabethan period, were published in 1759 from a MS. in the possession of the earl of Cork and Orrery.

MONNET, ANTOINE GRIMOALD, a French chemist and mineralogist, born at Champeix (Auvergne) 1734; died 23 May, 1817.

MONNOYER, JOHN BAPTIST, a Flemish painter, born at Lisle 1635. He was at first an historical painter, but afterwards applied himself to flower-painting. In the reign of William III. he came to England, and was employed in decorating Kensington Palace, Montague House, and other edifices. He died in London 16 Feb., 1699. His son, Anthony, painted in the same line with his father.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, M.D., an eminent anatomist, was born in London, of Scotch parents, Sept., 1697. After studying under Cheselden he went to Paris and Leyden. In 1719 he was appointed professor and demonstrator of anatomy to the Company of Surgeons at Edinburgh, where, soon after, he instituted that course of instruction which made the university the first medical school in the world. This was followed by the foundation of an hospital, where clinical lectures were commenced by Dr. Monro, who also formed a society for collecting and publishing professional papers, the result of which appeared in six volumes of 'Medical Essays,' and two more on 'Physical and Literary subjects.' Besides the papers contained in these volumes, the doctor published a work entitled 'Osteology, or a Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones;' and an 'Account of the Success of Inoculation in Scotland.' These, with other tracts left behind him in manuscript, were printed together in 1 vol. 4to., in 1781. Dr. Monro died 10 July, 1767. He left two sons: Dr. Alexander Monro, born at Edinburgh 1732. He succeeded his father, and died in 1817, having published numerous works on anatomical subjects. Dr. Donald Monro, the second son of the first professor, died in July, 1802, aged 71. He wrote 'Observations on the Means of preserving the Health of Soldiers;' Treatise on Medical and Pharmaceutical Chemistry, 4 vols.; and Memoirs of his Father, prefixed to his works.

MONRO, JOHN, M.D., was born at Greenwich 16 Nov., 1715. His grandfather was principal of the university of Edinburgh, and was nominated to the bishopric of the Orkneys by James II., but did not obtain possession of it on account of the abolition of episcopacy in Scotland at the Revolution. He then settled in London, where his only son became physician to the hospitals of Bridewell and Bethlehem, and died 1752. He was succeeded by his son, the subject of this article, who was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, which university conferred the degree of doctor of physic on him, by diploma, in 1747. He published 'Remarks on Dr. Battie's Treatise on Madness;' and died 27 Dec., 1791.

MONROE, JAMES, fifth president of the United States of America, was born in Virginia 28 April, 1758. On the breaking out of the disputes between England and America he resigned his seat in Congress to enter the army, in which he continued until the conclusion of the war, having risen to the rank of colonel. He then resumed his original profession of a barrister, and was sent as ambassador to Paris and London, and employed in various important missions. At length, in March, 1817, he succeeded Mr. Madison as president of the United States. Died 4 July, 1831.

MONSON, Sir WILLIAM, was born at South Carlton, Lincolnshire, 1569. He received an academical education at Balliol College, Oxford, after which he entered the naval service, and was knighted by the earl of Essex for his conduct in the expedition to Cadiz. In the reign of James I. he distinguished himself against the Dutch, and died in Feb., 1642-3. Sir William wrote 'Naval Tracts,' printed in Churchill's 'Collection of Voyages.'

MONSTRELET, ENGUERRAND DE, a French historian, of whom nothing more is known than that he was first collector of taxes, next governor of Cambray, and lastly bailiff of Wallaincourt. He died 1453. His Chronicles begin where Froissart ends, and have been printed in 3 vols. folio. There is an English translation by Col. Thomas Johnes, of Hafod, with a biographical preface.

MONTAGU, ANTHONY BROWN, VISCOUNT, K.G., son of Sir Anthony Brown, being a zealous maintainer of the old religion, was created Viscount Montagu in the first year of Queen Mary's reign, 2 Sept., 1554. He was employed on several honourable occasions, especially when the queen and parliament sent him to Rome to tender their submission on account of the schism, and at the same time to sue for a reconciliation with the Catholic Church. He was one of the commanders at the battle of St. Quintin's, where he displayed great bravery. Among the temporal lords who opposed the Reformation, in the first year of Elizabeth's reign none spoke with more freedom than Viscount Montague; and yet he behaved himself so prudently afterwards as never to be out of favour with her. Indeed she employed him on several occasions, both in civil and military matters. He died at Horsley, Surrey, 19 Oct., 1592.

MONTAGU, Earls of Sandwich. See SANDWICH.

MONTAGU, BASIL, Q.C., was born in London 24 April, 1770, being the natural son of the earl of Sandwich, by Miss Wray, who was shot in Covent Garden (1779) by the Rev. Mr. Hackman, a frantic admirer. He received his education at Christ's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1790; M.A., 1793), and was afterwards called to the bar at Gray's Inn. Mr. Montague acquired an extensive and lucrative practice in cases of bankruptcy, to which he chiefly devoted his attention. He formed an intimacy with that literary society of which Coleridge was a leader, and became a convert to the political theories of Godwin, under whose influence he meditated abandoning his profession, as being injurious to society, but was dissuaded from doing so by Sir. J. Mackintosh. In 1806 Lord Chancellor Erskine appointed him a commissioner of bankruptcy, his experience in which office so impressed him with the evils of the law administered in his court, that, by publishing a yearly detail of its pernicious results, and giving evidence against it before a committee of the House of Commons, he ultimately effected its reform. Under the new law he was appointed accountant-general, in which capacity he compelled the Bank of England to pay interest (never before demanded) on the moneys that had been deposited there by his court; and thus recovered nearly £20,000 for the bankrupt fund. He also distinguished himself by his exertions for the abolition of capital punishment, in advocacy of which he published several works. Mr. Montagu was a very voluminous author and editor, having published forty volumes, and left behind him one hundred volumes in MS. His principal professional work is 'A Digest of the Bankrupt Laws.' Of his editorial works the most important is his edition of 'The Works of Francis Bacon, Lord Chancellor of England' (16 vols. 8vo., London, 1825-34), the last volume of which contains a 'Life of Bacon,' by the editor. Died at Boulogne 27 Nov., 1851.

MONTAGU, EDWARD WORTLEY, son of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, was born Oct., 1713. He was placed at Westminster School, from whence he ran away three times, which induced his father, at last to engage a private tutor for him, under whom he acquired some regularity. In 1747 he was elected into parliament; but in 1751 he went to France, where he was imprisoned on account of some gambling transactions. In 1759 he published 'Reflections on the rise and fall of the Ancient Republics.' On the death of his father he became possessed of one thousand a year, with an additional thousand at the demise of his mother. He then left the kingdom, and went to Italy, where he turned Catholic. After this he travelled in Arabia and Egypt, and became a Mohammedan. He died at Padua 2 May, 1776. Some of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions.

MONTAGU, ELIZABETH, an ingenious lady, was the daughter of Matthew Robinson, Esq., and born at York in 1720. She received a liberal education under Dr. Conyers Middleton, and in 1742 married Edward Montagu, Esq., grandson of the first earl of Sandwich, by whom she had no issue. She died 25 Aug., 1800. Mrs. Montagu entertained at her house a literary society called 'The Blue Stocking Club,' from the circumstance of one of the members being distinguished by that dress. This lady was also celebrated by her annual dinner, on May-day, to the chimney-sweepers. She wrote 'Three Dialogues of the Dead,' printed with those of Lord Lyttleton; but her principal performance is 'An Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakspeare.' Since her death have appeared four volumes of her letters.

MONTAGU, GEORGE, an English gentleman, distinguished by his acquirements as a naturalist, was a member of an old Wiltshire family and for many years colonel of the militia of that county. His 'Ornithological Dictionary,' and 'Testacea Britannica: or Natural History of British Shells,' are esteemed works. Col. Montagu died at Knowle House, Devon, 28 Aug., 1815, aged 68.

MONTAGU, Lady MARY WORTLEY, the eldest daughter of Evelyn, duke of Kingston, was born about 1690. She made a great proficiency in the Latin and Greek languages, under the superintendence of Bishop Burnet. In 1712 she married Mr. Edward Wortley Montagu, whom she accompanied to Constantinople, in 1716, and while there caused her son to be inoculated for the small-pox, in consequence of which the practice was introduced into England. In 1718 she returned home, and settled at Twickenham, where, for some time, she lived on terms of intimacy with Pope; but their friendship was at last converted into hatred. In 1739 Lady Mary went to reside in Italy, on account of her health; but in 1761 she revisited England, and died 21 Aug., 1762. The year after her death appeared a surreptitious edition of her letters, in 3 vols. 12mo.; but a more correct and full collection of her correspondence and poems was printed in 1803, in 5 vols. 12mo., with a biographical memoir prefixed.

MONTAGU, RICHARD, bishop of Chichester and Norwich. See MOUNTAGUE.

MONTAGU, WALTER, a Catholic divine, son of Sir Henry Montagu, afterwards earl of Manchester, was born in London 1604, and educated at Sidney College, Cambridge, after which he travelled abroad, and became favourably impressed by the Catholic religion, which he eventually adopted. On his return he was taken particular notice of by Queen Henrietta Maria, who appointed him her confessor, and sent him on a confidential mission to Rome, where he was very graciously received by Pope Urban VIII. Soon after the breaking out of the civil war he was committed to the Tower (1643), and it appears he remained in confinement for some years. On being released he retired to France, and was made abbat of the Benedictine monastery at Nanteuil. Afterwards he obtained the rich abbey of St. Martin's near Pontoise. At the Restoration the queen mother of England appointed him master of St. Katharine's Hospital; and he retained that post till his death, which happened at Paris 1677. The Abbé Montagu published 'The Shepherd's Paradise, a Pastoral Comedy;' 'Miscellanea Spiritualia, or Devout Essaies,' 2 parts, 1648-54; a Letter from Paris to his father, justifying his joining the Church of Rome, printed with Lord Falkland's 'Discourse of Infallibility,' 1651; and an English translation of Bossuet's 'Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholique Church,' 1672.

MONTAGUE, CHARLES, earl of Halifax. See HALIFAX.

MONTAIGNE, MICHEL, Sieur DE, a French writer, born at the castle of Montaigne (Périgord), 28 Feb., 1533. Uncommon care was taken of his education; and he was taught Latin by constantly conversing in it with his tutor. He finished his studies at the college of Bordeaux, after which he applied himself to the law, though he did not follow that profession. He was twice mayor of Bordeaux, and in 1588, took an active part in the assembly of the states of Blois. During one of his visits at court, Charles IX. conferred on him the order of St. Michael. Died 13 Sept., 1592. His 'Essays have been often printed, and were translated into English by Cotton. In 1774 appeared 'Memoirs of a Journey into Italy, by M. Montaigne.'

MONTALEMBERT, CHARLES FORBES DE TYRON COMTE DE, a French statesman and author, born 29 May, 1810, in London, where his grandfather and his father had settled during the earlier days of the French Revolution. At the restoration of the Bourbons his father, who had served in the English army, returned to his native land, and was created a peer. (He died 1831.) At an early age young Montalembert formed an intimate acquaintance with the Abbé Lamennais, then the ardent advocate of an alliance between Catholicism and Democracy. A journal called the 'Avenir,' was started as their organ; but the vehemence of its animadversion soon brought it into trouble, and Montalembert being charged with having opened a school without the permission of the Minister, was convicted and condemned to pay a small fine. On attaining the legal age, he took his seat as a peer of France (1835). The visionary scheme of a union of Catholicism and Democracy, which Lamennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert defended with so much energy, found but little favour at Rome, and the friends resolved to proceed thither and plead their cause in person. After some delay their doctrines were reprobated by Gregory XVI., in the encyclical of June, 1835, as they had been three years previously. Lacordaire and Montalembert submitted to the Pope; but Lamennais revolted, and from that day all intercourse ceased between him and his two former associates. Montalembert now betook himself to study the ideas and manners of the Middle Ages, and, in 1836 brought out his first important work, 'The Life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary.' The following year he made his three famous speeches in the Chamber of Peers, against a bill introduced by M. Villemain, then a member of the cabinet, on the liberty of the church, the liberty of instruction, and the liberty of the monastic orders. He therein declared himself the defender of the Society of Jesus; and in his last speech on this occasion he uttered the memorable words so often quoted afterwards, 'We are the sons of the Crusaders; and the sons of the Crusaders will never give way before the sons of Voltaire.' After the revolution of 1848 he was returned as a deputy for the department of the Doubs, and took his place with the majority, though he voted against the decree banishing the Orleans family. After the Coup d'Etat he protested against the arrest and imprisonment of the representatives. He gave his support to the Government for some time; but becoming indignant at the decree confiscating the property of the Orleans princes, he went into opposition (1852). In the same year he was elected a member of the French Academy. At the general election of 1857 M. de Montalembert, who was now regarded as the declared adversary of the Empire, was defeated in his own department of the Doubs. This defeat closed his parliamentary career. His exclusion from an arena for which he was so preeminently fitted, and the tame submission of men who, not long before, were reckless agitators, aroused in him a bitterness of feeling which he rarely restrained. The laws affecting the press prevented him from openly criticising the government; but his feelings found vent in an article published in the 'Correspondant,' on the Indian debates in the English parliament. For this he was sentenced to fine and imprisonment; but all the penalties were at once remitted by the Emperor. During his latter years M. de Montalembert was afflicted with a painful malady, which proved fatal 13 March, 1870. His most important works are 'Du Catholicisme et du Vandalisme dans l'Art,' 1829; 'La Vie de Sainte Elisabeth de Hongrie,' 1830; 'L'Avenir Politique de l'Angleterre, 1855;' 'Pie IX. et Lord Palmerston,' 1856; a biographical sketch of Lacordaire; and 'Les Moines de l'Occident depuis Saint Benoît jusqu'à Saint Bernard,' of which five volumes have appeared. He was also an assiduous contributor to the 'Encyclopédie Catholique' and the 'Correspondant.'

MONTALEMBERT, MARC RENÉ, marquis DE, a French general, born 16 July, 1714; died 22 March, 1800. He served with much distinction in the Seven Years' War, and, in spite of the opposition of the military engineers of the period, succeeded in introducing important improvements in the art of fortification. He published a work on Fortification; three volumes of correspondence on military subjects, &c.

MONTANUS, a heretic of the second century. He was a native of Phrygia; and having deceived two rich ladies, named Priscilla and Maximilla, by his pretended sanctity, they set up claims to the gift of Prophecy; and asserted it as an article of faith, that the fulness of the spirit was imparted to these three chosen vessels to complete the mystery of eternal redemption.

MONTANUS, BENEDICT ARIAS, a Spanish Benedictine, born at Fregenal, in Estramadura, 1527; died 1598. He edited a polyglott Bible, 8 vols. folio, 1569-72; and published some works on divinity.

MONTANUS, 'JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian physician, born at Verona about 1498; died 6 May, 1551.

MONTBELIARD, PHILIBERT GUENEAU, a French naturalist, born at Semur-en-Auxois 1720; died 28 Nov., 1785. He was associated with Buffon in the composition of his Natural History.

MONTCALM DE SAINT-VERAN, LOUIS JOSEPH, Marquis DE, a French general, born at Candiac, near Nimes, 1712. In 1756 he became a field marshal, and was appointed to the command of the French army in Canada, where he opposed Lord Loudun with considerable skill and success. He afterwards defeated Abercromby the successor of his lordship; but in the battle fought under the walls of Quebec 12 Sept., 1759, he received a mortal wound, as did likewise the English general Wolf. Montcalm died on the 14th.

MONTCALVO. See CACCIA.

MONTEBELLO, JEAN LANNES, duc DE, a marshal of France, born at Lectoure (Guienne) 1769, being the son of a groom. He commenced life as a dyer, and then enrolled himself as a volunteer (1792). He rose rapidly in the army, and greatly distinguished himself in the first Italian campaign. He accompanied Bonaparte into Egypt, and, having returned with him, rendered him valuable support on the 18th Brumaire. He followed his master into Italy (1800) and covered himself with glory at Montebello (1804). His reputation was still further increased by his gallant conduct at the battles of Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, and Friedland. He died of wounds received at the battle of Essling 13 May, 1809.

MONTECUCULLI, RAYMOND, a celebrated general, was born 1608, in the territory of Modena. He served under his uncle, who was a general in the Imperial troops; and in 1637 he defeated Razolzi, prince of Transylvania. In 1664 he gained a victory over the Turks at St. Gothard; and in 1673 he had to contend with Turenne, whose death he greatly lamented. He was next opposed to Condé; and he congratulated himself in not having been defeated by two such commanders. Died 16 Oct., 1680. His memoirs were printed at Strasburg 1735.

MONTEMAYOR, GEORGE DE, a Spanish poet, born at Montemor, near Coimbra, in Portugal, about 1520. After serving in the army he was employed at the court of Philip II. Subsequently he held an honourable employment in the court of his own sovereign, and died at Lisbon 26 Feb., 1562. He wrote 'Diana,' a pastoral romance, which was continued by Gaspar Polo.

MONTEN, DIETRICH, a German artist, born at Düsseldorf 1799; died at Munich 13 Dec., 1843. He excelled in the painting of battle scenes.

MONTESPAN, FRANÇOISE ATHÉNAÏS DE ROCHECHOUART DE MORTEMART, marquise DE, a celebrated French lady, who was wife of the marquis of that title and mistress of Louis XIV., over whom she gained a complete ascendency, which she maintained until that monarch became attached to Madame de Maintenon. Madame de Montespan had children by the king, one of whom became duke of Maine, and two daughters, who were nobly married. Born 1641; died 28 May, 1707.

MONTESQUIEU, CHARLES DE SECONDAT, baron DE LA BRÈDE ET DE, was born in the castle of Brede, in Guienne, 18 Jan., 1689. He became a counsellor of the parliament of Bordeaux in 1714; and two years afterwards succeeded his uncle as president à mortier. His first appearance as an author was in the publication of the 'Persian Letters,' a work of considerable ingenuity, though mixed with some free opinions in religion. In 1728 Montesquieu was admitted a member of the academy, on which occasion he delivered an eloquent discourse. Having given up his civil employments he went on his travels, and remained in England three years. After his return he retired to his estate, and there completed his work 'On the Causes of the Grandeur and Declension of the Romans,' 1734. His greatest performance, however, is the 'Spirit of Laws,' 1748, which though attacked by some writers, secured its ground in the estimation of the literary world. The author died 10 Feb., 1755. His other works are—'The Temple of Gnidus;' a piece called 'Lysimachus;' and an 'Essay on Taste.'

MONTFAUCON, BERNARD DE, a learned antiquary, was born at Soulage, in Languedoc, 17 Jan., 1655. He served in the army under Turenne; but in 1675 he entered into the congregation of St. Maur. In 1688 he published 'Analecta Græca, sive varia Opuscula;' and in 1690 a small volume, entitled 'La Verité de l'Histoire de Judith.' His next publication was an edition of Athanasius, 3 vols. 1698. The same year he went to Italy, and after his return, in 1702, published his 'Diarium Italicum,' of which an English translation appeared 1725. In 1706 he gave to the world his 'Collectio nova Patrum,' in 2 vols.; and in 1708 came out his 'Palæographia Græca, sive de ortu et progressu Literarum Græcarum;' which was followed, the next year, by a translation of the book of Philo Judæus, on the contemplative life; which occasioned a controversy between Montfaucon and the president Bouhier. In 1713 this indefatigable scholar published an edition of the remains of the Hexapla of Origen, 2 vols.; and in 1718 he commenced a very fine one of St. Chrysostom, which was completed in 13 vols. folio. But the work on which his fame is principally established, is 'L'Antiquité expliquée et representée en Figures,' 5 vols. folio; to which was afterwards added a supplement in the same number of volumes. The last production of Montfaucon was printed in 1739, with this title, 'Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum,' 2 vols. He died in the abbey of St. Germain des Prés 21 Dec, 1741.

MONTFORT, SIMON Comte DE, a French general who, in 1209, conducted the crusade against the Albigenses, on which occasion he tarnished his reputation by his cruelties. In 1213 he gained a complete victory over Peter, king of Arragon. He was slain at the siege of Toulouse 1218. His younger son came to England, and was created Earl of Leicester.

MONTGOLFIER, JACQUES 'ETIENNE, the discoverer of aerostation, was born at Annonay, near Lyons, 7 Jan., 1745. He was originally a papermaker; and in 1782 made his first public experiment, by sending up an air balloon at Avignon. The year following he exhibited one on a magnificent scale before the royal family at Versailles; for which he was rewarded with the order of St. Michael, and a pension. Died 2 Aug., 1799. His brother, Joseph Michel, who was associated with him in all his experiments, was born 1740; and died 26 June, 1810.

MONTGOMERY, ALEXANDER, a Scotch poet, was a native of Ayrshire. His chief work, 'The Cherrie and the Slaye,' appeared in 1607, and it is conjectured that he died soon afterwards. A complete edition of his works was published by David Irving, LL.D. in 1821.

MONTGOMERY, JAMES, a minor poet, born at Irvine, Ayrshire, 4 Nov., 1771. His father was a Moravian missionary, who, leaving his son in Yorkshire to be educated, went to the West Indies, where he and the poet's mother both died. When only twelve years old the bent of the boy's mind was shown by the production of various small poems. His first occupation was as an assistant in a general shop. From this he came to London, where he was employed by a bookseller. After eight months, however, he returned to Yorkshire, and, in 1782, he obtained a situation in the establishment of Mr. Gales, a bookseller of Sheffield, who had started a newspaper called 'The Sheffield Register.' On this paper Montgomery worked con amore; and when his master had to flee from England to avoid his imprisonment for printing libellous articles the young poet became the editor and publisher of the paper, the name of which he changed to 'The Sheffield Iris.' In the columns of this journal he advocated the cause of political and religious freedom. Like his predecessor he incurred the censures of government, and underwent two terms of imprisonment, for three months and six months respectively. Mr. Montgomery contributed largely to the magazines, and established his right to rank as a poet. He died at Sheffield 30 April, 1854. His chief works are 'Prison Amusements,' 1797; 'The Ocean,' 1805; 'The Wanderer in Switzerland and other poems,' 1806; 'The West Indies,' 1809; 'The World before the Flood,' 1812; 'Greenland,' 1819; 'The Pelican Island and other poems,' 1828; 'Original Hymns,' 1853. A complete edition of his poetical works appeared in 4 vols., London, 1855.

MONTGOMERY, ROBERT, an English clergyman and versifier, was born at Bath 1807. His father was one Gomery, a theatrical clown, but the son extended his patronymic, in order to give it a more aristocratic appearance. In 1828 he gained immense popularity by the publication of a poem entitled 'The Omnipresence of the Deity,' which was hailed with delight by the so-called 'religious world,' although the critics, and all persons of judgment, spoke of it with the contempt it merited. The work is chiefly known to readers of the present day in consequence of the sarcastic notice of it contributed to the Edinburgh Review by Lord Macaulay, and reprinted in the 'Essays' of that brilliant writer. Of Montgomery's subsequent productions, which are all in a pietistic vein, the principal are—'The Messiah,' a Poem in six books; and 'Satan, or Intellect without God,' a work which procured for its author the sobriquet of 'Satan Montgomery.' The profits derived from his writings and the liberality of his admirers, enabled Mr. Montgomery to enter Lincoln College, Oxford. He was ordained in 1835, and, after officiating as minister of an episcopal chapel at Glasgow, was appointed in 1843 minister of Percy Chapel, St. Pancras, London. His death occurred at Brighton 3 Dec., 1855.

MONTHOLON, CHARLES TRISTAN, marquis DE, a French general, born at Paris 1782. He was warmly attached to Bonaparte, and distinguished himself by his bravery in the Italian, German, and Polish campaigns. He was appointed chamberlain to the emperor 1809, and brigadier-general 1814. He was employed on several diplomatic missions, and shared the captivity of his fallen master at St. Helena, where he wrote down from his dictation several volumes of 'Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de France.' Subsequently he displayed an equal degree of attachment to Louis Napoleon, whom he accompanied in the memorable expedition to Boulogne. During his imprisonment at Ham he wrote 'Histoire de la captivité de Ste. Hélène,' 1846. He was released at the end of a few years; and died 21 Aug., 1853.

MONTI, VINCENZO, an Italian poet, born at Fusignano, near Ferrara, 19 Feb., 1754. After studying at the university of the latter city he went to Rome, where he became secretary to one of the nephews of Pope Pius VI., and was admitted into the Arcadian Society. The satires and epigrams which he now wrote raised him many enemies, so that he willingly abandoned this species of composition for a higher walk of literature, and produced his two celebrated tragedies of 'Galeotti Manfredi' and 'Aristodemo.' When the French entered Italy Monti repaired to Milan, and was appointed secretary to the Directory of the Cisalpine Republic. On the invasion of Italy by Suwarrow he retired to Paris, whence he returned after the battle of Marengo (1800). At this period he published his celebrated poem on the death of the mathematician Mascheroni. He was successively appointed professor of the belles lettres and of rhetoric in the university of Padua; and, after the creation of the kingdom of Italy (1805) he was constituted historiographer of that state. He preserved his place and pension under the new government; and died at Milan 13 Oct., 1828. Monti was a knight of the Legion of Honour and of the Iron Crown, and a member of many learned societies. Besides the above-mentioned works he was author of three poems, entitled respectively 'Bassviliana,' 'Musogonia,' and 'Leconiade;' a translation of Homer's Iliad and Juvenal's Satires; 'Bardo della Selva nera;' and Proposals for some corrections of and additions to the Vocabulary of the Academia della Crusca.

MONTMORENCY, MATTHIEU DE, constable of France, who distinguished himself in the crusade against the Albigenses, and afterwards in the wars with the English, from whom he took several strong places. He died 1230. His descendant, Anne de Montmorency, was also a celebrated general, and was made prisoner, with Francis I., at the battle of Pavia. The services which he rendered to his country obtained for him the sword of constable 1538. Charles IX. employed him against the Protestants, who took him prisoner at the battle of Dreux 1562; but he recovered his liberty soon afterwards, and fell at the battle of St. Denis 1567. His grandson, the Duke de Montmorency, was beheaded 1632, for conspiring with Gaston of Orleans, and raising an insurrection in Languedoc.

MONTPENSIER, ANNE MARIE LOUISE D'ORLEANS, duchesse DE, better known by the name of Mademoiselle de Montpensier, was the daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, and born 29 May, 1627. She inherited from her father a most ungovernable temper, and in the civil wars took the side of Condé. After a variety of intrigues she married the count de Lauzun, who treated her with great insolence, and one day, on returning from hunting, said, 'Louisa of Orleans, take off my boots.' This extraordinary woman died 5 March, 1693. She wrote her own memoirs, which have been published in 8 vols. Her letters also have been printed, and two romances, one entitled 'Relation de l'Isle imaginaire,' and the other 'La Princesse de Paphlagonie.'

MONTRÉSOR, Claude de Bourdeilles, comte de, grand-nephew of Peter de Bourdeilles, was born about 1608. He was for some time in the service of Gaston of Orleans, but afterwards retired into private life, and died 2 July, 1663. His 'Memoirs' have been published.

MONTROSE, James Graham, marquis of, was descended from the royal line of Scotland. He was born 1612, being the son of the earl of Montrose, who gave him an excellent education, which was improved by a residence in France, where he held a commission in the Scotch Guards. On his return home he experienced such neglect, through the jealousy of the marquis of Hamilton, as induced him to join the Covenanters; but afterwards he saw his error, and took a very active part on the side of the king, and in a few months gained the battles of Perth, Aberdeen, and Inverlochy, for which services he was created a marquis. In 1645 his fortune changed, and after suffering a defeat from Lesley he was obliged to leave the kingdom. He stayed abroad till 1650, when he landed in Orkney, with a few followers, but was soon overpowered, conveyed to Edinburgh, and there hung and quartered on the 21st of May.

MONTUCCI, Antonio, a celebrated Chinese scholar, born at Sienna 22 May, 1762, and educated in the university there, being, in 1785, appointed professor of English in the Tolomei College. While in London in 1792 he met four Chinese youths who were about to accompany Lord Macartney's expedition to China in the capacity of interpreters; and from them he received a valuable Chinese dictionary, and received some instruction in their native tongue to the study of which he thenceforward devoted all his spare time. He resided for some years at Berlin, and next at Dresden, where he completed his great work on the Chinese characters. After an absence of forty-two years he returned to his native country, and was kindly received by Pope Leo XII., to whom he presented his books, MSS., and Chinese types. He then retired to his native city, where he died 25 March, 1827.

MONTUCLA, Jean Étienne, a mathematician, born at Lyons 1725. He practised for some time as an advocate, but gave up the law for scientific pursuits. The publication of his 'Treatise relative to the Quadrature of the Circle,' procured him great reputation, which was increased by his 'History of the Mathematics.' He was now made secretary to the Intendance at Grenoble, and in 1764 went to Cayenne, with the title of Astronomer Royal. Died 18 Dec., 1799.

MOOR, Karel van, a Dutch painter, born at Leyden 1656; died 1738.

MOOR, Michael, a divine of the Roman church, born at Dublin 1640. He taught philosophy and rhetoric in the Grassin College at Paris for some years, and then returned to his native country, where James II. made him provost of the college of Dublin. He died at Paris 1726. His works are De existentia Dei; Hortatio ad Studium linguæ Græcæ et Hebraicæ; 'Vera sciendi Methodus,' against the Cartesian system.

MOORE, Edward, an English writer, was the son of a dissenting minister at Abingdon, in Berkshire, and born there 22 March 1711-12. He was bred a linen-draper in London, which he quitted for the profession of literature. In 1744 he published his 'Fables for the Female Sex,' which procured him friends among the great, particularly Lord Lyttleton, whom he complimented in a piece entitled 'The Trial of Selim.' After two ineffectual attempts at dramatic composition, in the comedies of the 'Foundling,' and 'Gil Blas,' he succeeded greatly in the tragedy of 'The Gamester.' He next became the editor of a periodical paper called 'The World,' in which he was assisted by Lords Lyttleton, Chesterfield, Bath, and Corke, Horace Walpole, Richard Owen Cambridge, and Soame Jenyns. Died 28 Feb., 1757.

MOORE, John, a learned prelate born at Market Harborough, in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1689 he was presented to the rectory of St. Andrew, Holborn, and in 1691 was made bishop of Norwich, from whence he was translated to Ely in 1707. Died 31 July, 1714, æt. 68. Bishop Moore was the patron of Dr. Samuel Clarke, who published his sermons in 2 vols., 1715. His library was purchased by George I., and given to the university of Cambridge.

MOORE, John, M.D., was born 1730 at Stirling, where his father was an episcopal clergyman. He studied surgery and medicine at Glasgow, and in 1747 obtained the appointment of mate in one of the military hospitals in Flanders. After the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle he went to Paris as surgeon in the household of the English ambassador. Two years afterwards he returned to Scotland, and practised as a surgeon in that city with great reputation, till his connection with the Hamilton family induced him to take the degree of doctor of physic. In that capacity he accompanied the duke, who was of a consumptive habit, to the Continent, where they spent five years. In 1778 Dr. Moore settled in London, and there published his Travels in 2 vols.; to which, in 1781, he added two more by way of supplement. In 1785 he printed 'Medical Sketches,' and in 1789 a novel entitled 'Zeluco,' which was uncommonly successful. Happening to be an eye-witness of the dreadful scenes which occurred at Paris in 1792, Dr. Moore was led, after his return to England, to publish 'A View of the Causes and Progress of the French Revolution.' His next work was a novel entitled 'Edward, or various Views of Human Nature,' and in 1800 he produced another, called 'Mordaunt;' but both fell far short of his 'Zeluco.' His last literary concern was an edition of Smollett's works, to which he prefixed a life of the author. Died 20 Feb., 1802.

MOORE, Sir John, son of the preceding, was born at Glasgow, 13 Nov., 1761. At the age of fifteen he obtained an ensigncy in the 51st regiment of foot, of which, in 1790, he became lieutenant-colonel, and served with his corps in Corsica, where he was wounded in storming the Mozello fort at the siege of Calvi. In 1796 he went out as brigadier-general to the West Indies, under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who appointed him to the government of St. Lucie, in the capture of which he had a principal share. On his return home, in 1797, he was employed in Ireland during the rebellion, and was raised to the rank of major-general. In 1799 he went on the expedition to Holland, where he was again wounded severely, notwithstanding which he soon afterwards went to the Mediterranean, and at the battle of Alexandria received a cut from a sabre on the breast, and a shot in the thigh. On his return to England he was made a knight of the Bath; and in 1808 was appointed to command an army in Spain, where, after a signal retreat before a superior force, he fell under the walls of Corunna 16 Jan., 1809.

MOORE, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a butcher at Gloucester, and educated in the Crypt School of that city, after which he went to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. Becoming tutor to the marquis of Blandford, and chaplain to the duke of Marlborough, he rose rapidly in the church. In 1771 he was made dean of Canterbury; in 1776 bishop of Bangor; and in 1783 archbishop. Died 18 Jan., 1805.

MOORE, JOHN, was elected from Merchant Taylor's School to St. John's College, Oxford (B.A. 1763). In 1797 he obtained a Lambeth degree of LL.B. He was a minor canon and sacrist of St. Paul's, a priest of the Chapel Royal, lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, rector of St. Michael Bassishaw, and Langdon Hills, Essex, and served the office of president of Sion College in 1800 and subsequent years. Died 16 June, 1821, æt. 79. His publications prove him to have been a good biblical scholar and antiquary.

MOORE, Sir JONAS, a mathematician, and one of the founders of the Royal Society, was born at Whitley, Lancashire, 8 Feb., 1617. Charles I. appointed him tutor to the duke of York; but the Rebellion reduced him to the necessity of keeping a school, till he was employed under Cromwell as surveyor of the Fens. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor-general of the ordnance. His interest at court was considerable, and he used it for the benefit of science, the proofs of which exist in the Observatory at Greenwich, with the appointment of an astronomer royal, and in the endowment of the mathematical school at Christ's Hospital. For this last he drew up a course of mathematics in three vols. Died 27 Aug., 1679.

MOORE, NELLY, an English actress, born 1845; died in London 22 Jan., 1869.

MOORE, PHILIP, a divine, born in 1705. He became rector of Kirkbride and Douglas in the Isle of Man, where he lived on terms of the greatest friendship with Bishop Wilson, whose funeral sermon he preached and printed. He superintended the translation of the Bible into the Manx language, and edited some other works. Died 22 Jan., 1783.

MOORE, THOMAS, was born in Dublin 28 May, 1779, being the son of a dealer in groceries and spirits. Like Pope, he 'lisped in numbers,' and at thirteen years of age became a contributor to the 'Anthologia Hibernica.' Just at the proper moment for Moore, Catholics were permitted to enter Trinity College, Dublin, and the youthful poet, taking advantage of this relaxation of the penal laws, became a student in that society 1794. Then, as now, party politics ran very high in Ireland, and Moore, having adopted democratic opinions, hymned the independence of the Emerald Isle, and wrote in feeling verse of Emmet. After graduating B.A., he came to London to study law and to publish his translation of the poems of Anacreon, which was, by the influence of the earl of Moira, permitted to be dedicated to the Prince Regent. He now plunged into the vortex of London fashionable society, being everywhere a welcome guest on account of the brilliancy of his conversation and his rare musical talents. Among his intimate friends were the earl of Moira, Lord Holland, the marquis of Lansdowne, and other noblemen of the Whig party, which Moore consistently supported throughout the whole of his career. In 1801 he published 'The Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little, Esq.,' a production disfigured by a licentiousness of which the author was, in later life, heartily ashamed. Two years afterwards he obtained the appointment of registrar to the Admiralty in Bermuda; but on arriving there he promptly appointed a deputy to discharge the duties of the office, and went off on a tour through the United States and Canada, returning home with a less exalted idea than he had previously entertained of the great Transatlantic republic. In commemoration of this trip he composed 'Epistles, Odes, and other Poems,' which being somewhat roughly handled in the 'Edinburgh Review,' led to the author's duel with Jeffrey—a bloodless encounter, which happily resulted in an enduring friendship between the combatants. The same affair produced a quarrel and subsequent friendship with Byron. In 1811 Mr. Moore married Miss Bessie Dyke, an amiable young actress, and thenceforward was obliged to ply his pen more actively than ever, in order to procure a livelihood. Having tried his hand at serious political poetry he wrote with more success in a lighter strain, and the 'Intercepted Letters, or, the Twopenny Post Bag, by Thomas Brown, jun.' (1812), set all the world a-laughing. He had already commenced in 1807, and he continued till as late as 1834, the publication of his charming 'Irish Melodies,' the most popular of all his productions. In 1817 another brilliant work by him appeared. Messrs. Longman, the publishers, agreed to give him £3000 for an Eastern poem. Moore retired to the banks of the Dove, imbued himself with oriental reading, and in three years produced 'Lalla Rookh.' Its success was splendid, for it struck a new key, and poured upon the world a dazzling flood of gorgeous Eastern illustration and imagery. After achieving this literary triumph Moore went twice abroad, the first time with the poet Rogers, the second with Lord John Russell, when he proceeded to Genoa, and at Venice visited Lord Byron. Afterwards, in consequence of a difficulty with his agent at Bermuda, he retired to Paris, where he continued to reside till 1822. At this period he wrote 'The Fudge Family in Paris,' to which 'The Fudges in England' was a sequel; 'Tom Crib's Memorial to Congress;' 'Fables for the Holy Alliance;' and 'The Loves of the Angels.' Soon after coming back to England he settled in graceful retirement at a cottage called Sloperton, in the immediate vicinity of the beautiful demesne of Bowood, Wiltshire, the seat of his ever-constant friend, the marquis of Lansdowne. Mr. Moore, who in his declining years was afflicted with mental imbecility, died 26 Feb., 1852. In this brief sketch we have referred only to his poetical works. His principal prose writings are 'Memoirs of Captain Rock,' 1824; 'Memoirs of the Rt. Hon. R. B. Sheridan,' 1825; 'The Epicurean, a Tale,' 1827; 'Life of Lord Byron,' 1830; 'Life and Death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald,' 1831; 'Travels of an Irish Gentleman in search of a Religion,' a vindication of the Church of Rome, 1833; and a 'History of Ireland,' forming 4 vols. of Lardner's 'Cabinet Cyclopædia,' 1839-46. His 'Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence,' were edited by Lord John Russell, 8 vols., 1852-56.

MORALES, AMBROSE, a Spanish divine, born 1513 at Cordova. He was historiographer to Philip II., and a professor at Alcala, where he died 1590. His principal works are—The Chronicle of Spain; and The Antiquities of Spain.

MORALES, LUIS, a Spanish painter who died 1586. He was surnamed El Divino, from having devoted his pencil exclusively to sacred subjects.

MORAND, SAUVEUR FRANÇOIS, a French writer on lithotomy, born at Paris 1697; died, principal surgeon at the Hôtel des Invalides, 21 July, 1773. His son, Jean François Clement, born 1726, became professor of anatomy in the university of Paris, where he died 13 Aug., 1784, leaving some surgical works.

MORANT, PHILIP, F.S.A., was born at St. Saviour's, Jersey, 6 Oct., 1700; and educated at Pembroke College, Oxford (M.A. 1724). He obtained, successively, several livings in Essex, the principal of which was that of St. Mary's, Colchester. He died in London 25 Nov., 1770. Mr. Morant published the 'History of Colchester,' folio; and the History of Essex, 2 vols. folio. He was also one of the compilers of the Biographia Britannica; and was appointed, by the House of Peers, to publish a copy of the rolls of Parliament, which work, at his death, devolved to his son-in-law, Mr. Astle.

MORATIN, NICOLAS FERNANDEZ, a Spanish poet and dramatist, born 20 July, 1737, at Madrid; died there 11 May, 1780. His son, Leandro Fernandez, who likewise acquired fame as a dramatist, was born at Madrid 10 March, 1760; and died at Paris 21 June, 1828.

MORDAUNT, CHARLES, earl of Peterborough. See PETERBOROUGH.

MORE, ALEXANDER, a French protestant minister, born of a Scotch family at Castres, in Languedoc, 1616; died at Paris 28 Sept., 1670. He was for some time professor of history at Amsterdam, and, during his residence in Holland, published a reply to Milton's second Defence of the People of England.

MORE, Sir ANTONIO, a painter, born at Utrecht 1519. He was very successful in his portraits, of which he painted several in England, in the reign of Queen Mary, on whose death he accompanied Philip II. to Spain, where he lived on terms of great intimacy with that monarch for some time, but at last removed to Flanders. Died 1575.

MORE, Sir FRANCIS, an eminent lawyer, born at East Hildesley, Berks, 1558; died 20 Nov. 1621.

MORE, GERTRUDE, an English lady, who, quitting the world, became a Benedictine nun, and died at Cambray 18 Aug., 1633. Her work, entitled 'Spiritual Exercises, or a Lover's Confessions,' was published 1658.

MORE, Mrs. HANNAH, the daughter of a schoolmaster at Stapleton, Gloucestershire, was born there 2 Feb., 1745, and received her education in a school kept by her sisters at Bristol, in the conduct of which she was herself afterwards associated. From childhood she cultivated the poetic muse, and, in 1773, her first publication, 'The Search after Happiness, a pastoral drama,' made its appearance. It was followed in the succeeding year by 'The Inflexible Captive, a Tragedy,' and 'Sir Eldred of the Bower, and the Bleeding Rock, two poetical tales.' At this period she was introduced to Garrick, Dr. Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, and other eminent literary men in London. Two tragedies by her, 'Percy' and 'The Fatal Falsehood,' were acted at Covent Garden with a certain amount of success; but the serious bent of her mind soon led her to abandon writing for the stage and to devote herself to the composition of religious and moral works. With this object in view, she retired, in 1786, to Barley Wood, a cottage delightfully situated in a village near Bristol; and subsequently, in 1828, to Clifton, where she closed her long and useful life 7 Sept., 1833. In addition to the above-mentioned works, Mrs. More wrote 'Sacred Dramas,' 1782; 'Florio, a tale for fine gentlemen and fine ladies; and the Bas Bleu, or Conversation, two poems,' 1786; 'Slavery, a poem,' 1786; 'Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society,' 1791; 'Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World;' a series of 'Tales for the Common People,' one of the most popular of which was 'The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain;' 'Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education,' 1799; 'Hints towards forming the Character of a young Princess,' a piece which had reference to the education of the Princess Charlotte; 'Cœlebs in Search of a Wife,' 1809; 'Practical Piety;' 'Christian Morals;' and 'Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul.' It is said that Mrs. More realised by her writings £30,000, one-third of which sum she bequeathed to various charitable institutions. A complete edition of her works, in 11 vols. 12mo., appeared in 1853; and her Correspondence with Zachary Macaulay in 1860.

MORE, HENRY, a jesuit, born in Essex 1586. He entered the novitiate at Louvain 1614, studied afterwards at Valladolid and Liège, and took the four vows 1622. For six years he acted as provincial of his order; was rector of the college of St. Omer 1649-52, and again 1657-60; and died at Watten, near St. Omer, 8 Dec., 1661. His principal works are 'Vita et Doctrina Christi Domini in Meditationes quotidianas per annum digesta,' 12mo., Antwerp, 1649; 'Historia Missionis Anglicanæ Societatis Jesu,' folio, St. Omer, 1660. The latter valuable work brings the history of the mission down to the year 1635. His brother, Thomas More, also became a jesuit, and died at Ghent 2 Jan., 1623, aged 36. He translated into English William Warford's 'Brevis Institutio,' 1617; and Floyd's 'Deus et Rex,' 1620.—Dodd; Oliver.

MORE, HENRY, D.D., was born at Grantham, Lincolnshire, 12 Oct., 1614. He was educated at Eton, and next at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the Platonic philosophy, took his degrees in divinity, and obtained a fellowship. In 1640 he published 'Psycho-Zoia, or the Life of the Soul,' a philosophical poem, which he republished, with other pieces, 1647. He refused the highest ecclesiastical preferments; and though he accepted a prebendal stall in the church of Gloucester, he soon resigned it in favour of Dr. Fowler. Died 1 Sept., 1687. His philosophical and theological works have been published in 2 vols. folio.

MORE, HENRY, a dissenting minister, was a native of Plymouth. He was educated at Exeter, and afterwards became pastor of a congregation at Liskeard, in Cornwall, where he officiated many years, and died 1802. He published, 'An elegiac poem, amidst the ruins of an abbey;' which, with other pieces, was reprinted, with some account of the author, by Dr. Aikin.

MORE, JOHN. See CROSS.

MORE, Sir THOMAS, chancellor of England, was the son of Sir John More, one of the judges of the King's Bench, and born in Milk Street, London, 1480. He was educated in the family of Cardinal Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, who was wont to say 'More will one day prove a marvellous man.' In 1497 he went to Canterbury College, now Christ Church, Oxford, and, in 1499, became a student of Lincoln's Inn. At the age of twenty-one he obtained a seat in Parliament, where he opposed a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such spirit, as to incur the resentment of the king, who avenged himself on the judge his father, by causing him to be fined and imprisoned. When admitted to the bar, More delivered a lecture in the church of St. Lawrence-Jewry, on part of St. Augustine's works, and the reputation he thereby acquired procured him to be chosen lawreader in Furnival's Inn. In 1508 he was made judge of the sheriff's court, and a justice of peace. In 1518 he published his 'Utopia,' a political romance; and about this time the friendship began between him and Erasmus, which lasted through life. Such talents could not pass unnoticed at the court of Henry VIII., who delighted in the conversation of More, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood; besides which he made him treasurer of the exchequer. Sir Thomas assisted the monarch in his book against Luther, and he afterwards defended it in a very able treatise. In 1523 he was chosen speaker of the House of Commons, at the instance of Wolsey, who was, however, much exasperated by his frustrating an oppressive subsidy; and said, on that occasion, 'Would to God, you had been at Rome, Mr. More, when I made you Speaker.' To which the other replied, 'Your grace not offended, so would I too.' Yet in 1527 they were joined in a mission to France, and, upon More's return, he was made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1530 he succeeded Wolsey as lord chancellor, which office he discharged for three years with scrupulous integrity. Finding, however, that the affair of the king's divorce, to which he was adverse, would involve him in difficulties, he resigned the seals, and thereby provoked the anger of Henry, who was still more irritated by his refusal to attend the coronation of Anne Boleyn. An attempt was made to implicate him in the practices of Elizabeth Barton; and, though this failed, he was committed to the Tower, for refusing the oath of supremacy. After an imprisonment of twelve months, he was brought to his trial in the court of King's Bench, where, notwithstanding his eloquent defence, he was found guilty of treason, and sentenced to be beheaded. His behaviour, in the interval, corresponded with the uniform tenor of his life; and, on July 6, 1535, he ascended the scaffold, with his characteristic pleasantry, saying to the lieutenant of the Tower, 'I pray you, see me safe up; and as for my coming down, you may let me shift for myself.' In the same spirit, when he laid his head on the block, he told the executioner to wait till he had removed his beard, 'For that,' said he, 'hath committed no treason.' Thus fell this illustrious Englishman, whose learning and virtue entitled him to a better fate. The English works of Sir Thomas More were published together 1557, and his Latin ones at Basle 1563. By his first wife he had four children, three daughters and one son, who all survived him. The latter was also condemned, for refusing the oath of supremacy; but received a pardon, and died not long afterwards. Margaret, the eldest daughter of Sir Thomas, married William Roper, Esq., of Eltham, in Kent. She was a most accomplished woman in Latin and Greek, as well as in music, mathematics, and other sciences. She died 1544. Her husband wrote 'The Life of Sir Thomas More,' printed in 1716. Mary, the daughter of Mrs. Roper, became one of the gentlewomen of the bedchamber in the reign of queen Mary. She translated into Latin Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, and into English, part of her grandfather's exposition of the Passion.

MOREAU, JACOB NICHOLAS, historiographer of France, was born at St. Florentin 20 Dec. 1717; and died at Chambourci, near St. Germain, 29 June, 1803.

MOREAU, JEAN MICHEL, an eminent French designer and engraver, born at Paris 1741; died 30 Sept., 1814.

MOREAU, JEAN VICTOR, a French general, born at Morlaix, in Brittany, 11 Aug., 1763. In his eighteenth year he enlisted in a regiment, but was brought back to Rennes to study the law, for which profession he was destined. In 1789 a company of Breton volunteers being formed, in consequence of the Revolution, Moreau was appointed their commander, and in that capacity joined the army of the North. He soon acquired military distinction, and being befriended by Pichegru, was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine, when he commenced that course of arduous operations which terminated in the celebrated retreat from the extremity of Germany to the French frontier. Meantime, a conspiracy was entered into by Pichegru, which Moreau discovered; but the reluctance with which he accused his friend to the Directory, excited suspicions at Paris, and finding he could not explain himself satisfactorily he begged leave to retire, which was granted. In 1798, however, he was sent to command the army of Italy, where, after some brilliant successes, he was obliged to give way to the Russian force under Suwarrow, and he managed another retreat with great skill. On the return of Bonaparte from Egypt, he at first cordially supported him; but a coldness and jealousy ensued, notwithstanding which the first consul entrusted him with the command of the armies of the Danube and the Rhine. The passage of these rivers, with the battles of Moeskirch, Eupen, Memmingen, Biberach, Hochstedt, Nedenheim, and others, followed, ending with the decisive victory of Hohenlinden, which induced the Austrians to ask for peace. On his return to Paris Moreau married a young lady of birth and fortune, whose ambition, with that of her connections, is supposed to have fomented the discontent which soon afterwards induced him to implicate himself in the conspiracy of Pichegru and Georges. For this he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment; but was allowed, in lieu of imprisonment, to seek an asylum in the United States, on condition that he would not return to France without permission. On his arrival in America he bought a fine estate near Morinville, at the foot of the Delaware, where he remained some years in peace, until, listening to the invitation of the allies, he embarked for Europe, and reaching Göttenburg proceeded to Prague. Here he found the emperors of Austria and Russia with the king of Prussia, all of whom received him with great cordiality, and he was induced to aid in the direction of the allied armies against his own country. His resolution proved fatal to himself, for at the battle of Dresden (27 Aug., 1813), he received a wound in each leg, and amputation of both brought on his death 1 Sept., 1813.

MOREL, GUILLAUME, a learned printer at Paris, was born in Normandy 1505. He succeeded Turnebus as director of the royal press 1555, and directed his labours chiefly to editions of Greek authors. He also wrote Commentaries on Cicero de Finibis; and compiled a Greek, Latin, and French Dictionary. He died 1564. Frédéric Morel was also king's printer at Paris, and royal interpreter for the Greek and Latin languages. He died 17 July, 1583, leaving a son Frédéric, who conducted the printing-office, and was the most learned of the family. He translated from the Greek, and published a number of authors, chiefly ecclesiastical, with annotations. He died 27 June, 1630. His brother, Claude, became king's printer in 1602, and died 16 Nov., 1626, while engaged on an edition of Athanasius. Charles Morel, another son of Frederick, was also king's printer, but resigned the office in 1639 to his brother, Gille, who published an edition of Aristotle, in 4 vols. folio; and the Bibliotheca Patrum, in 17 vols. Gille died about 1650.

MORELL, ANDREW, a Swiss numismatist, born at Berne 9 June, 1646; died 11 April, 1703.

MORELL, THOMAS, D.D., was born at Eton 18 March, 1703. He was educated on the foundation at Eton, and elected thence to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship (D.D. 1743). The only preferments he enjoyed were the rectory of Buckland, Herts, and the chaplainship of the garrison at Portsmouth. He also held the curacies of Kew and Twickenham. Died 19 Feb., 1784. Dr. Morell selected the words for Handel's oratorios, and assisted Hogarth in his Analysis of Beauty. His own works are, Poems on Divine Subjects; The Canterbury Tales of Chaucer modernized; Euripidis Hecuba, Orestes et Phenissæ, 2 vols.; Thesaurus Græcæ Poeseos, of which valuable work a new edition was printed by Dr. Maltby in 1815; The Prometheus of Æschylus; Sacred Annals, or the Life of Christ as recorded by the Evangelists; an Abridgment of Ainsworth's Dictionary; a translation of Seneca's Epistles, 2 vols.; Notes on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, 4to., &c.

MORELLI, COSIMO, an Italian architect, born at Imola 1732; died 1812.

MORELLI, JAMES, an Italian ecclesiastic and bibliographer, for many years keeper of the library of St. Mark at Venice, was born in that city 14 April, 1745, and died 5 May, 1819.

MORERI, LOUIS, a French divine, born at Bargemont, in Provence, 25 March, 1643. He studied in the College of Jesuits at Aix, and on entering into orders settled at Lyons, where he laid the plan of the 'Historical Dictionary,' the first edition of which came out in 1674, in one volume folio. The author died at Paris 10 July, 1680, and the year following his Dictionary was republished in 2 vols. The subsequent editions have been numerous, the last being in 10 vols. folio, 1759. Moreri's other works are The Lives of the Saints; and A Collection of French Poems.

MORES, EDWARD ROWE, D.D., F.S.A., was born at Tunstall, Kent, 13 Jan., 1730. He received his education at Queen's College, Oxford, where, in conjunction with Mr. Romaine, he edited Calasio's Concordance, 4 vols. In 1748 Mr. Mores printed 'Nomina et Insignia gentilitia Nobilium Equitumque sub Edvardo primo rege Militantium;' also a new edition of Dionysius Halicarnassensis 'De Claris Rhetoribus.' He took the degree of M.A. in 1753, soon after which he went abroad, and obtained the degree of D.D. in some foreign university. Died 28 Nov., 1778. The Equitable Society for Assurance on Lives originated with him, and he published several pamphlets on the subject. His 'History and Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent,' was published by Mr. Nichols.

MORETO, AUGUSTIN, a Spanish dramatist, who died at Toledo, 28 Oct., 1669.

MORGAGNI, JOHN BAPTIST, a physician and anatomist, born at Forli, in Romagna, 25 Feb., 1682. He studied under Valsalva, at Bologna, and in 1711 became professor of medicine at Padua. In 1715 he was appointed to the first anatomical professorship, in which situation he continued till his death 6 Dec., 1771. An edition of his works was printed in 1765, in 5 vols. folio.

MORGAN, GEORGE CADOGAN, was born at Bridgend, Glamorganshire, 1754, and studied first at Oxford and next in a dissenting academy at Hoxton. After officiating to congregations at Norwich and Yarmouth he became (1796) a colleague of his uncle, Dr. Price, at Hackney, and a tutor in the college there. However, he entirely laid aside his clerical character and functions some time before his death, which happened at Southend, Middlesex, 17 Nov., 1798. He published 'Lectures on Electricity,' 2 vols., 1795; and the outline of an essay on education.

MORGAN, Sir HENRY, a celebrated commander of buccaneers, was born in Wales about 1637. He took Portobello and Panama from the Spaniards, and for several years continued to enrich himself and his followers by the success of his marauding expeditions against that nation. After amassing a large fortune he was appointed governor of Jamaica by Charles II., who conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. Died 1690.

MORGAN, SYDNEY, Lady, was born in Dublin about 1780, being the daughter of a musician named Owenson. At fourteen years of age she produced a volume of miscellaneous verses, and afterwards a series of songs set to Irish airs. When only sixteen she had published two novels, which, although favourably spoken of at the time, produced no very important effects; but 'The Wild Irish Girl' (1801) at once raised her to a conspicuous position in the world of letters. This book passed through seven editions, and introduced the authoress into the highest ranks of society, where her sprightly conversation and engaging manners made her a universal favourite. She first met Sir T. C. Morgan at the house of the marquis of Abercorn, and they were soon afterwards married (1811). Her next publication of importance was 'France,' a critical review of the social state of that country rather than a book of travels. Of her many subsequent works we have only room to mention 'Italy;' 'Florence Macarthy;' 'The O'Briens and the O'Flahertys;' 'Life and Times of Salvator Rosa;' 'Woman and her Master;' 'Passages from my Autobiography.' The last work was published only a few months before her death, which occurred in Lowndes Square, London, 13 April, 1859. Mr. William John Fitzpatrick published in 1860 a memoir of 'Lady Morgan; her career, literary and personal, with a glimpse of her friends, and a word to her calumniators.'

MORGAN, SYLVANUS, an arms-painter of London, author of one of the rarest of heraldic works, entitled 'The Sphere of Gentry: deduced from the Principles of Nature, an Historical and Genealogical Work of Arms and Blazon,' 1661. Born about 1620; died 27 March, 1693.

MORGAN, Sir THOMAS CHARLES, M.D., husband of the well-known Lady Morgan, was born in London about 1783, and educated at Eton, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge. He was nominated a commissioner of Irish fisheries, and during twenty years' residence in the sister isle, devoted a large portion of his time to the cause of Catholic Emancipation, which he advocated in the public journals and periodicals. He died in London 28 Aug., 1843. His works are 'Sketches of the Philosophy of Life,' 1818; 'Sketches of the Philosophy of Morals,' 1822; and, in collaboration with his wife, 'The Book without a Name,' 2 vols., 1841.

MORGAN, WILLIAM, D.D., a native of Carnarvonshire, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterwards became chaplain to Archbishop Whitgift, who had a high opinion of his abilities, and encouraged him to undertake the translation of the Bible into Welsh, which task he accomplished, his version being published in 1588. He was appointed bishop of Llandaff 1595; translated to St. Asaph 1601; and died 10 Sept., 1604. —Athen. Cantab.

MORGAN, WILLIAM, F.R.S., a Welshman, who, for more than fifty-six years, was actuary to the Equitable Assurance Society. He was a nephew of the celebrated Dr. Price; and his mathematical and scientific attainments were of the highest order. He wrote 'The Doctrine of Annuities and Assurances of Lives;' 'Examination of Dr. Crawford's Theory of Heat and Combustion;' several treatises on financial subjects; and 'Memoirs of the Rev. R. Price,' 1815. Died May, 1833.

MORGHEN, RAFFAELLO SANZIO, an Italian engraver, born 19 June, 1758, at Florence, where he died 8 April, 1833.

MORHOF, DANIEL GEORGE, was born at Wismar, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 6 Feb., 1639. After studying at Stettin and Rostock he came to England, and resided at Oxford. In 1660 he became professor of poetry at Rostock, where he published his 'Lessus in Ciconiam Adrianum, carmen juvenile et ludicrum,' which was followed by his 'Dissertatio de enthusiasmo et furore poetico.' In 1665 he accepted the professorship of poetry and eloquence at Kiel. In 1670 he again visited England, and contracted an intimacy with Mr. Boyle, some of whose works he translated into Latin. In 1673 he was made professor of history at Kiel, and in 1680 librarian of the university. Died 30 July, 1691. His principal work is entitled 'Polyhistor, sive de Notitia Auctorum et Rerum Commentarii,' the best edition of which is that of 1747, 2 vols. 4to. In 1725 was published by Mosheim a dissertation of Morhof's treatise 'De pura Latinitate Latina.'

MORIER, JAMES, an English traveller and novelist, born about 1780; died at Brighton 30 March, 1849. Entering the diplomatic service, he became secretary of embassy in Persia, where he made a long stay, and devoted his leisure to a thorough study of the manners and customs of the people. The knowledge thus acquired he turned to good account in his works, the titles of which are, 'A Journey through Persia, Armenia, and Asia Minor, to Constantinople, in 1808-9. In which is included some account of his Majesty's Mission under Sir H. Jones to the court of the King of Persia,' 1812; 'A Second Journey through Persia to Constantinople,' 1818; 'Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan,' 1824; 'Adventures of Hajji Baba in England,' 1828; 'Zohrab the Hostage,' 1832; 'Ayesha, the Maid of Kars,' 1834; 'Abel Allnutt, a novel,' 1837; 'The Banished; a Swabian historical tale,' 1839; 'The Mirza,' 1841; and 'Martin Poutrond; a Frenchman in London,' in 1841.'

MORIN, ÉTIENNE, a French protestant divine and biblical scholar, born at Caen 1625. He became professor of the oriental languages at Amsterdam; and died 5 May, 1700.

MORIN, JEAN, a French priest of the Oratory, born at Blois 1591; died at Paris 28 Feb., 1659. He distinguished himself by an edition of the LXX.; had a share in the French Polyglott; and published many erudite works on ecclesiastical history.

MORIN, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French physician and astrologer, born 1583; died 1656.

MORIN, LOUIS, a French physician and botanist, born at Mans, 1635; died 1 March, 1715.

MORIN, PIERRE, was born at Paris 1531. After living with Paul Manutius as corrector of his press, he taught Greek and cosmography at Vicenza; from whence he removed to Ferrara, and next to Rome, where he was employed on an edition of the Septuagint, and another of the Vulgate. Died 1608.

MORISON, JAMES, was a native of Perth. His father was a bookseller, and brought up the son to the same business, which he carried on first at Leith and afterwards at Perth, where he died 1809, aged 47. Mr. Morison was for some time a member of the society of Glassites, from whom he seceded and founded a distinct sect, of which he became the minister. His works are 'Bibliotheca Sacra; or a Dictionary of the Bible;' and an 'Introductory Key to the Scriptures,' the object of which is to prove that the Gospel was preached in Paradise.

MORISON, JOHN, D.D., LL.D., a dissenting minister, died at Brompton 13 June, 1859, aged 68. He was pastor of the Congregational church at Chelsea; for thirty-two years editor of the 'Evangelical Magazine;' and author of numerous religious works.

MORISON, ROBERT, M.D., a botanist, born at Aberdeen 1620. After studying at the university of his native place, with a view to the medical profession, he entered the royal army, and was so severely wounded in the battle fought near the bridge of Dee, that he went to France, where he took his doctor's degree at Angers. He was also appointed superintendent of the garden of the duke of Orleans at Blois, of which he published a catalogue. At the Restoration he came to England and was made king's physician, a fellow of the Royal College, regius professor of botany, and keeper of the physic garden at Oxford. Dr. Morison died in London 10 Nov., 1683. His greatest work is entitled 'Plantarum historia universalis Oxoniensis,' folio, 1680; to which Jacob Bobalt added another volume 1690.

MORLAND, GEORGE, an English painter, born 1764. He was the son of a very indifferent artist, who kept him constantly employed in such works as would obtain a ready sale, till, at length, the youth, tired of this drudgery, and conscious of his powers, set up for himself. Unfortunately, however, from the manner in which he had been bred, he contracted irregular habits, so that most of his pictures were painted under circumstances of distress, and many of them in places where he was confined for debt. He fell a victim to intemperance 29 Oct., 1804; and his wife, who was of a similar disposition, died a day or two after him. His subjects were landscapes, views on the sea coast, stables, farm-yards, and animals, executed with admirable spirit and accuracy.

MORLAND, Sir SAMUEL, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Sulhamsted, in Berkshire, about 1625. He was educated at Winchester School, and at Magdalen College, Cambridge. In 1653 he accompanied Whitelock on his embassy to Sweden, and at his return became assistant to secretary Thurlowe, through whose interest he was sent by Cromwell to remonstrate with the duke of Savoy, on his conduct in persecuting the protestants of Piedmont. On his return, in 1658, he received public thanks for his service, and printed the same year a work, entitled 'The History of the Evangelical Churches of the Valleys of Piedmont.' He was now much employed in the affairs of state, in which capacity he rendered eminent service to Charles II., particularly in detecting a plot, laid by Cromwell, to entrap the exiled family into the kingdom for their destruction. For this he was created a baronet at the Restoration, and made one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber. But though he was in great favour with the king, and obtained some grants, he was generally poor, owing to his expensive projects. He invented the speaking-trumpet, the fire-engine, a capstan to heave up anchors, and, above all, the steam-engine, of which last he wrote a description in French. He was also the inventor of two instruments for arithmetical operations, on which he wrote a treatise, printed 1673. Died 30 Dec., 1695.

MORLEY, GEORGE, D.D., was born in London 1597, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he was elected to Christchurch, Oxford. In 1641 Charles I. gave him a canonry of Christchurch. By an order of Parliament, however, he was deprived of his preferment; on which he left England, and remained abroad till the Restoration, when he was made dean of Christ Church, and, in 1660, bishop of Worcester. He was next appointed dean of the Chapel Royal, and in 1662 translated to Winchester, to which see he was a great benefactor, particularly by the purchase of a palace at Chelsea. He also founded five scholarships in Pembroke College, and gave large sums to various charitable uses. The bishop published some controversial tracts, and sermons. Died 29 Oct., 1684.

MORLEY, THOMAS, Mus. B., an English composer, who died about 1604, was a pupil of Bird's, and one of the gentlemen of Queen Elizabeth's chapel. He acquired more celebrity by his treatise, 'A Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke' (1597) than by his performance or compositions, although he was eminent for both.

MORNAY, PHILIPPE DE, sieur du Plessis-Marlay, was born at Buhi, in the Vexin-Français, 1549. His mother, being attached to the Protestant faith, carefully instilled the same principles into the mind of her son, who, in 1567, entered the army; but having the misfortune to break his leg, he quitted the service, and, on his recovery, went to Germany, with the intention of studying the law. He next travelled into Italy, and, on his return, visited England. In 1576 he again took up arms on the side of the Protestants, and succeeded in bringing the royal party to terms of conciliation. After this he went to the court of Navarre, where Henry IV. made him a privy-councillor. Du Plessis continued to act for the king till Henry changed his religion, and then he resigned his situation at Court. After publishing some works against the Catholic Church, he printed a treatise on the Eucharist (1598), which occasioned a conference between him and Du Perron, in 1600, at Fontainebleau, where Du Plessis conducted himself so ably as to obtain from his admirers the name of the 'Protestant Pope.' In 1607 came out his work, entitled 'The Mystery of Iniquity, or the History of the Papacy;' but his chief performance is his treatise 'Upon the Truth of the Christian Religion.' Died 11 Nov., 1623.

MORNY, CHARLES AUGUSTE LOUIS JOSEPH, DUC DE, president of the French Legislative Body, and one of the most staunch supporters of Napoleon III.; died at Paris 10 March, 1865, aged 53.

MOROSINI, FRANCESCO, a native of Venice, distinguished by his valour against the Turks, at the siege of Candia. He maintained himself against 120,000 men, with hardly a fourth part of the number; but though allured by promises from the enemy, he continued firm to his country; and when the place surrendered, he was treated with great humanity. His countrymen, though for a moment displeased, appointed him procurator of St. Mark, and enabled him again to attack the Turks, whom he defeated near the Dardanelles. He was in 1688 elected doge, and died 6 Jan., 1694.

MORRIS, CHARLES, a captain in the Life Guards, author of many convivial songs, which were once highly popular, died at Dorking, Surrey, 11 July, 1838, aged 92. His 'Lyra Urbanica, or Social Effusions,' were published in 2 vols. 8vo., 1840.

MORRIS, LEWIS, a Welsh antiquary, hydrographer, and poet, was born in the Isle of Anglesey 1702. He made a survey of the coast of Wales, by order of the Board of Admiralty; and at his death, on 11 April, 1765, he left above eighty volumes of manuscripts to the Welsh charity school in Gray's Inn Lane. Some of his poems have been printed. His brother, Richard Morris, who died 1779, superintended the printing of the Welsh Bible.

MORRIS, MORRIS DRAKE, was born at Cambridge, educated at Trinity College, in that university, and died about 1720. He left in MS. 'Lives of the most illustrious men educated in the university of Cambridge' (MSS. Harl. 7176, 7177).

MORRISON, Sir RICHARD, president of the Institute of Architects of Ireland, died in Dublin 31 Oct., 1849, aged 82.

MORRISON, ROBERT, D.D., F.R.S., an eminent Chinese scholar, was born of Scotch parents at Morpeth, Northumberland, 5 Jan., 1782, and at the proper age apprenticed to his father, a last and boot-tree maker, who was a man of religious tendencies and an elder of a Presbyterian church.

Subsequently he studied theology under a Presbyterian minister at Newcastle, to which town his father removed, and in 1803 was admitted into the dissenting academy at Hoxton. Two years later he placed himself under the patronage of the London Missionary Society, who sent him to their seminary at Gosport, where he commenced the study of the Chinese language. In 1807 he was 'set apart' to the work of a missionary. Proceeding to Canton the same year, he there continued the study of the language with such success that he was appointed secretary and interpreter to the East India Company's factory. The great object of his life was the translation of the Holy Scriptures into Chinese. The Acts of the Apostles appeared in 1811; the New Testament in 1813; and the Old Testament (translated partly by Dr. Milne) in 1819; but the greatest monument of his literary fame is the Chinese Dictionary, printed at Macao, in 6 vols. 4to., 1815-23. He was also the author of some minor works on the Chinese language, and of a memoir of Dr. Milne. Mr. Morrison accompanied Lord Amherst's embassy to Pekin (1817) as interpreter, and the same year was honoured with the degree of D.D. by the university of Glasgow. In 1824 he paid a visit to England, where he met with a reception worthy of his talents and his services. He returned to China 1826, and died at Canton 1 August 1834. 'Memoirs of his Life and Labours, by Mrs. Morrison, with critical Notices of his Chinese works by S. Kidd,' appeared at London in 2 vols., 1839.

MORTIER, Édouard Adolphe Casimir Joseph, duke of Treviso, a peer and marshal of France, born at Cateau-Cambrésis 13 Feb., 1768. Having enrolled himself as a volunteer 1791, he distinguished himself in all the campaigns of the republic; made himself master of Hanover, 1803; subdued Hesse Cassel 1806; then passed into Spain 1810-11; took part in the expedition to Russia, and contributed materially in gaining the battle of Lutzen. He shared with Marmont the command of Paris, 1814. At the Restoration he was created a peer of France, but his refusal to sit among the judges of Marshal Ney lost him this dignity, which, however, he afterwards recovered. In 1834 he was appointed secretary of war, and president of the council. He was killed by Fieschi's 'infernal machine' while on horseback by the side of Louis Philippe, at Paris, 28 July, 1835.

MORTIMER, John Hamilton, an historical painter, born at Eastbourne, Sussex, Nov., 1739; died 4 Feb. 1779. His best pieces are that of King John granting Magna Charta to the Barons, and the battle of Agincourt. He delighted, however, chiefly in the representation of horrible subjects, as incantations and banditti.

MORTIMER, Thomas, an English author, born in London 1730; died Dec., 1809. He wrote the 'British Plutarch,' 6 vols, 1762; a 'Dictionary of Trade and Commerce;' and other useful works.

MORTON, Charles, M.D., F.R.S., was born in Westmoreland 1716. He practised first at Kendal, from whence he removed to London, where he became a licentiate of the College of Physicians, secretary of the Royal Society, and principal librarian of the British Museum. In 1768 he was appointed one of the superintendents of the publication of the Doomsday Book, but never executed the task. Died 10 Feb., 1799. He published an improved edition of Bernard's 'Table of Alphabets;' Bulstrode Whitelock's Journal of his Embassy to Sweden; and papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

MORTON, James Douglas, Earl of, regent of Scotland, was born at Dalkeith 1530, and educated at Paris under the famous Buchanan. He returned to Scotland 1554, and greatly promoted the Reformation; but on being accused of taking part in the murder of Lord Darnley he fled to England. He was afterwards constituted chancellor of Scotland, and in 1574 succeeded the Earl of Mar as regent, which office he resigned in 1579. He was condemned for high treason 1581, and beheaded on the 3rd of June, in that year, by a machine called the 'Maiden,' very similar to the modern guillotine.

MORTON, James Douglas, Earl of, and also earl of Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh 1707. At the age of twenty-six he established a philosophical society at Edinburgh. The Royal Society of London elected him their president 1733, and on the death of the earl of Macclesfield he was chosen an associate of the French Academy of Sciences. He evinced an ardent zeal for the sciences, and was an eminent patron of merit. He was well versed in natural and experimental philosophy, and particularly devoted to astronomical observations. Died 1768.

MORTON, John, an English cardinal, was born 1410, at Bere, Dorsetshire. He received his education at Baliol College, Oxford, after which he became principal of Peckwater Inn. In 1473 he was appointed master of the rolls, in which situation he adhered faithfully to Henry VI., notwithstanding which Edward IV. made him bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor, in 1478. Richard III., however, committed him to the custody of the duke of Buckingham, who confined him in his castle of Brecknock, from whence he escaped to Ely, and next to the Continent, where he joined the earl of Richmond. In 1486 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, the next year lord chancellor, and in 1493 created a cardinal. In 1494 he was elected chancellor of Oxford. Died 15 Sept., 1500. Among other acts of public benefit performed by him was that of cutting the drain from Peterborough to Wisbech.

MORTON, Richard, M.D., was born in Suffolk about 1635, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, after which he entered into orders, and became chaplain of New College. At the Restoration he gave up that profession, and took his degrees in physic, which he practised with reputation in London till his death 30 Aug., 1698. His works are 'Phthisiologia, seu Exercitationes de Phthisi,' which was translated into English; Pyretologia, seu Exercitationes de Morbis universalibus acutis, 2 vols.

MORTON, Samuel George, M.D., an American physician and ethnologist, born 26 Jan., 1799, at Philadelphia, where he died 15 May, 1851.

MORTON, Thomas, an English prelate, born at York 20 March, 1564. He became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he read lectures on logic, and on leaving the university, was appointed chaplain to the earl of Huntingdon, lord president of the north. In 1602 he accompanied the English embassy to Germany and Denmark. In 1606 he took his doctor's degree, and soon after was made dean of Gloucester. In 1609 he was removed to the deanery of Winchester; in 1615 made bishop of Chester; in 1618 translated to Lichfield, and in 1632 to Durham. He suffered many hardships in the Rebellion, and died at Easton Mauduit, Northamptonshire, 22 Sept., 1659. The bishop wrote several books against the Catholics and Nonconformists.

MORTON, THOMAS, a popular dramatist, born at Durham, 1764; died 28 March, 1838. He studied at Lincoln's Inn, but abandoned the legal profession in order to devote himself to writing for the stage, in which branch of literature he achieved great success. The titles of his principal pieces are subjoined: 'The Children in the Wood;' 'The way to get married;' 'A Cure for the Heartache;' 'Speed the Plough;' 'Secrets worth Knowing;' 'The Blind Girl;' 'The School of Reform;' 'Town and Country;' 'A Roland for an Oliver;' 'The Invincibles.'

MORYSIN, Sir RICHARD, an eminent statesman, was probably born in Hertfordshire, and educated at Eton, from whence he was elected to Cambridge; after which he studied the law, and became a civilian. Henry VIII. employed him as his ambassador to the Court of Charles V., and in the next reign he was knighted, made one of the commissioners for visiting the university of Oxford, and sent on a mission to Brussels. On the death of Edward VI. he went to Strasburg, where he died 17 March, 1555-56. He wrote a defence of Henry VIII. against Cochlæus; and some tracts in English, exhorting his countrymen to loyalty.—Athen. Cantab.

MORYSON, FYNES, born in Lincolnshire 1566. He was educated at Cambridge, but created master of arts at Oxford, after which he went on his travels. On his return he settled in Ireland, where his brother was vice-president of Munster. He died about 1614. His works are—'An Itinerary, containing ten years' travels through the twelve dominions of Germany,' &c., 1617; 'An History of Ireland,' 2 vols., 1735.

MOSCHELES, IGNATIUS, a musical composer, was born in May, 1794, at Prague, of which city his father was a well-to-do merchant, and began to show his love and talent for music so decidedly that his father had him taught the pianoforte at the early age of ten years. After appearing as an infant prodigy for several years in his native city, Moscheles went to Vienna in 1808, where Albrechtsberger became his master, and Salieri, the conductor of the Imperial Opera, his friend and adviser. It was during this period that he made the acquaintance of Beethoven, then in the zenith of his fame, and under his direction he published in 1814 the first selection from 'Fidelio' for the pianoforte. Clementi, who may be said to have been the first eminent pianist, also took a strong liking for the youth, and his influence told not a little on the musical style of Moscheles, who about 1820 gave a series of concerts in Germany, Holland, France, and England, and then settled for a longer period in London in 1825, being appointed to a professorship at the Academy of Music. He was a wonderful improvvisatore, and one of his grandest efforts is said to have been on the occasion of the last concert given by Karl Maria von Weber, in May, 1826, he being then in his thirty-second year. It was mainly through his exertions that the Philharmonic Society voted a liberal donation to Beethoven, who, however, died almost before the much-needed assistance reached him, and whose last dictated letter (March, 1827) was one of thanks to Moscheles. After having assumed the direction of the Philharmonic Concerts, a post which he held for fifteen years, Moscheles yielded to the oft-repeated solicitations of his friend Mendelssohn, and, together with him, undertook the leadership of the then newly-instituted Conservatoire at Leipsic. This was in 1846, and he held the post until his death, which occurred at Leipsic 10 March, 1870.

MOSCHUS, of Syracuse, a Greek bucolic poet, who, with Theocritus and Bion, lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Of his works, four Idyls, and a few smaller pieces, have been preserved.

MOSELEY, BENJAMIN, a physician, was born in Essex, and bred to the business of a surgeon and apothecary, which he practised several years at Kingston, in Jamaica. On his return to Europe he took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and by the interest of Lord Mulgrave obtained the situation of physician to Chelsea Hospital. He gained some credit by 'Observations on the Dysentery of the West Indies;' and 'Two Treatises on Coffee and Sugar:' but disgraced himself by his virulence against the vaccine inoculation. He died 15 June, 1819.

MOSER, GEORGE MICHAEL, an artist, born at Schaffhausen, in Switzerland, 1705. He was a chaser in gold, which business he carried on in England with great reputation; but he was also an excellent enameller, and in 1768 was appointed keeper of the Royal Academy. He died 24 Jan., 1783. His daughter Mary, who married a gentleman named Lloyd, was a famous flower painter, and the only woman, with the exception of Angelina Kaufmann, who was ever elected a member of the Royal Academy. She died 1819.

MOSHEIM, JOHN LAURENCE VON, a German protestant divine, born at Lubeck 9 Oct., 1694. At the invitation of the king of Denmark, he went to Copenhagen; whence he was called by the duke of Brunswick to a professorship at Helmstadt, where he was also appointed ecclesiastical counsellor, and superintendent of the schools. In 1747 he was appointed professor of theology at Göttingen, and chancellor of the university. He died there 9 Sept., 1755. Mosheim wrote no fewer than one hundred and sixty-one works, the best known of which is his 'Ecclesiastical History.' It was originally composed in Latin, but has been translated into English and French.

MOSS, CHARLES, D.D., an Anglican prelate, was the nepew of Dr. Moss, dean of Ely. He received his education at Caius College, Cambridge, and became successively archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Salisbury, rector of St. Andrew Undershaft, and of St. George, Hanover Square. In 1766 he was consecrated bishop of St. David's, whence, in 1774, he was translated to Bath and Wells. Died 13 April, 1802. Besides some sermons, and a charge, he published a tract, entitled 'The Evidence of the Resurrection cleared from the Exceptions of a late Pamphlet.' This was a vindication of Bishop Sherlock's 'Trial of the Witnesses against Chubb.' Dr. Moss also preached the Boyle's Lecture. His son Charles became bishop of Oxford 1807, and died 1811.

MOSS, ROBERT, D.D., was born at Gillingham, Norfolk, about 1666. He became fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and in 1698 was chosen preacher to the society of Gray's Inn. The following year he was appointed assistant at St. James's, Westminster, and in 1705 he was created doctor in divinity at Cambridge. In 1708 he became lecturer of St. Lawrence Jewry, and in 1711 a dean of Ely. Died 26 March, 1729. His sermons were published in 8 vols; besides which he wrote some Latin and English poems.

MOSSOM, ROBERT, a clergyman who suffered much in the civil wars; but in 1660 he was made dean of Christ Church, Dublin; with which he held the bishopric of Derry, where he died 21 Dec., 1679. His works are—The Preacher's Tripartite; Variæ colloquendi Formulæ, 1659; Narrative of George Wild, Bishop of Derry; Zion's Prospect in its first View.

MOSTYN, FRANCIS, an English Catholic prelate, was appointed vicar apostolic of the northern district, and consecrated bishop of Abydos 21 Dec., 1840. Died 11 Aug., 1847.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM, a poet and journalist, born in Glasgow 1798. When a youth he obtained a situation in the Sheriff Clerk's office at Paisley, where he remained till within a few years of his death, which occurred at Glasgow 1 Nov., 1835. In 1828 he became editor of the 'Paisley Magazine' and 'Paisley Advertiser,' and, after having conducted the latter journal about two years, he was offered the editorship of the 'Glasgow Courier,' which he accepted, and continued to conduct that journal till his decease. Mr. Motherwell published, in 1827, a collection of ballads under the title of 'Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern;' and, in 1833, a collected edition of his own delightful poems, lyrical and narrative. He also superintended an edition of Burns.

MOTTEUX, PETER ANTHONY, was born 19 Feb., 1660, at Rouen, in Normandy. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he came to England, where he carried on trade in Leadenhall Street. He was found dead in a brothel in the Strand 19 Feb., 1717-18. He published translations of Don Quixote and Rabelais; besides several poems and dramatic pieces.

MOTTLEY, JOHN, an English dramatic writer, was the son of Colonel Mottley, who followed James II. to France, and was killed at the battle of Turin in 1706. This son, who was born 1692, received his education at St. Martin's Library School; after which he obtained a place in the Excise office, but was obliged to resign it 1720. He then had recourse to his pen for a support, and wrote five dramatic pieces; also the 'Life of the Czar Peter the Great,' and 'The History of Catharine of Russia.' He was the real author of 'Joe Miller's Jests; and died 30 Oct., 1750.

MOUFET. See MUFFET.

MOULE, THOMAS, a topographical and heraldical writer, was for forty-four years inspector of the blind letters' at the General Post Office, and he also held for many years the situation of chamberkeeper in the lord chamberlain's department, which gave him an official residence in St. James's Palace, where he died 14 June, 1851, aged 67. His chief work is entitled 'Bibliotheca Heraldica Magnæ Britanniæ. An Analytical Catalogue of Books on Genealogy, Heraldry, Nobility, Knighthood, and Ceremonies,' 1822. A copy, with numerous MS. notes and a volume of MS. additions, is in the British Museum. Mr. Moule also published 'The English Counties delineated,' 2 vols., 1837; and 'The Heraldry of Fish,' 1842.

MOULIN, CHARLES DU, a French lawyer, born at Paris, 1500; died 1566. He at one time left the communion of the Church of Rome, but rejoined it towards the end of his life. The best edition of his legal works, which are highly esteemed, is that of Paris, 5 vols., 1681.

MOULIN, PIERRE DU, a Protestant divine, born at Vexin 18 Oct., 1568. He studied first at Sedan, and next at Cambridge, from whence he removed to a professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where also he taught Greek; but in 1599 he returned to France, and became minister at Charenton. On the murder of Henry IV., Du Moulin charged the guilt of that detestable deed upon the Jesuits, which produced a contest between him and Father Cotton. In 1615 he visited England on the invitation of James I., who gave him a prebend of Canterbury; and the university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity. After his return to France he officiated as professor of divinity at Sedan, where he died 10 March, 1658. His works are numerous.

MOULIN, PIERRE DU, son of the preceding, was born at Paris about 1600. He took his doctor's degree in divinity at Leyden, after which he came to England, and was made prebendary of Canterbury, where he died 1684. His works are 'The Peace of the Soul,' which was translated into English by Dr. Scrope; 'Defence of the Protestant Religion;' 'Regii Sanguinis clamor ad Cœlum;' this was published in the name of Alexander More, and was answered by Milton. Louis du Moulin, brother of the preceding, became a violent Independent, and wrote some abusive books against episcopacy, but retracted them before his death, 20 Oct., 1683.

MOUNTAGU, or MONTAGUE, RICHARD, a learned prelate, born 1578, at Dorney, Bucks, and educated at Eton School, and King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He assisted Sir Henry Savile in his edition of St. Chrysostom, and in 1613 became fellow of Eton College, and rector of Stamford Rivers, Essex. He was also promoted to the deanery of Hereford, which he resigned for the archdeaconry. In 1620 he was made canon of Windsor. In 1621 he published a sermon and tract on the Invocation of Saints, which brought him under a suspicion of being inclined to Catholicism. The same year he attacked Selden on Tithes, and in 1622 he published an examination of the Annals of Baronius. Soon after this he had a controversy with some Catholic divines, in the management of which he gave great offence to the Calvinists, who complained of his books to Parliament as containing Armenian errors. In consequence of this, he was called to the bar of the House of Commons, and obliged to give security for his appearance. Though the king was displeased at this conduct, the House took up the matter again, and passed several resolutions against the positions advanced by Montagu, who was made bishop of Chichester, and afterwards of Norwich, where he died 13 April, 1641. His other works are—Appello Cæsarem; Originum Ecclesiasticarum libri duo; Theanthropicon, seu de vita Jesu Christi; The Acts and Monuments of the Church before Christ; Versio et Notæ in Photii epistolas.

MOUNTAIGNE, or MOUNTAIN, GEORGE, educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, became successively bishop of Lincoln, London, and Durham. He was enthroned archbishop of York 24 Oct., 1628, and died on 6 Nov. in the same year, 'being,' says Fuller 'scarcely warm in his church ere he was cold in his coffin.'

MOUNTAIN, GEORGE JEHOSOPHAT, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1810), and in 1820 obtained the degree of D.D. at Lambeth. He became Protestant bishop of Quebec 1836, and died 8 Jan., 1863.

MOUNTAIN, JACOB, the first Protestant bishop of Quebec, was born in Norfolk 1750, and educated at the grammar school of Norwich, whence he proceeded to Caius College, Cambridge, graduating B.A. 1774; M.A. 1777; D.D. 1793. In the last-mentioned year he was nominated by his intimate friend Mr. Pitt to the see of Quebec, where he erected a cathedral church. He was also active in promoting missions, building churches, and establishing schools. Previous to his advancement he held the livings of Holbeach, Lincolnshire, and Buckden, Huntingdonshire; and also a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. He died at Marchmont House, near Quebec, 16 June, 1825.

MOUNTFORT, WILLIAM, an actor and dramatist, born in Staffordshire 1659. He was an admirable performer both in tragedy and comedy, particularly in love-scenes, to which excellence he owed his death; for, being suspected of enjoying the favours of Mrs. Bracegirdle, one Captain Hill, who paid his addresses to that actress, contrived, with the assistance of Lord Mohun, to murder Mountfort, in the Strand, 1692. The perpetrator of this deed fled from justice, and, though Mohun was acquitted, he afterwards fell in a duel with the duke of Hamilton. Mountfort wrote six plays, which are now obsolete.

MOUNTJOY, WILLIAM BLOUNT, Lord, K.G., an English nobleman, who was much employed in public affairs during the reigns of Henry VII. and Henry VIII. He was a liberal patron of learned men, and numbered among his friends Erasmus and the illustrious Sir Thomas More. Died 1534.

MOYLE, WALTER, was born in Cornwall 1672. He studied at Oxford, and next in the Temple, but having an independent fortune, he did not follow the law. He died at his seat in Cornwall 9 June, 1721. His works, consisting of an Essay on the miracle of the Thundering Legion; an Essay on the Lacedemonian Government; another on the Roman Constitution, and Letters, were printed in 3 vols., 1726-27.

MOZART, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG THEOPHILUS, a musician, was the son of Leopold Mozart, vice-chapel-master, and composer to the prince archbishop of Saltzburgh, and born there 27 Jan., 1756. At the age of seven years he exhibited his powers at Paris, from whence he came to London, and then proceeded to Italy, astonishing the lovers of music by his knowledge of every branch of the science. In 1778 he was appointed concert-master to the prince of Saltzburgh; but he resigned the place in 1780, and went to Vienna, where he became chapel-master to the emperor. He died 5 Dec., 1791. He composed a number of serious and comic operas. The principal are 'Mitridate,' 1770; 'La Finta Giardiniera,' 1773; 'Idomeneus;' 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail,' 1782; 'Le Nozze di Figaro,' 1786; 'Schauspiel Direktor,' 1786; 'Il Don Giovanni,' his chef d'œuvre, 1787; 'Cosi fan Tutte,' 1790; 'Die Zauberflote,' 1791; and 'La Clemenza di Tito,' 1791. His other compositions are extremely numerous and greatly admired, particularly the famous 'Requiem Mass,' which he composed on his death-bed.

MUDFORD, WILLIAM, journalist and author, born 8 Jan., 1782, in Half Moon Street, Piccadilly; died 10 March, 1848. In early life, Mr. Mudford filled the post of assistant-secretary to the duke of Kent; but a strong love of literature, and some favourable notices of a 'Critical Examination of the Writings of Dr. Johnson,' which he published before he was out of his teens, induced him to forego the prospects of advancement before him, and he resigned his situation with the duke, in order to devote himself exclusively to authorship. Among his earlier works were the 'Critical Examination,' above-mentioned, a philosophical romance, entitled 'Nubila;' some books of travels; a 'Life of Cumberland,' 2 vols; a critical edition of the British Novelists; and many translations from the French and German. He also wrote a 'Historical account of the battle of Waterloo,' a folio, full of valuable information, in the composition of which he received considerable information from the duke of Wellington, to whom the work was dedicated. After the experience of many years, Mr. Mudford, becoming convinced that it is hard to live by literature alone, began to study politics, with a view to journalism. An enthusiastic admiration of the genius of Edmund Burke gave a strong Conservative or old Whig bias to his opinions, which he preserved through life. After a brief connection, as a Parliamentary reporter, with the 'Morning Chronicle,' he obtained the appointment of editor of the 'Courier,' an evening journal, which, under his management, acquired a high degree of popularity and influence, and maintained, upon no unequal terms, a contest for rivalry with the 'Times.' Mr. Mudford warmly supported Mr. Canning during the intrigues that followed upon his acceding to the office of prime minister; and he was in frequent communication with him, until his untimely and lamented death threw the political world into confusion. After that event, a majority of the proprietors of the 'Courier' decided that its principles should undergo considerable modifications; and Mr. Mudford, refusing to take any share in what he considered an act of political apostasy, publicly withdrew from his connection with the paper, in a letter that attracted considerable attention. The change was not a fortunate one for the proprietors. The 'Courier' steadily declined in circulation, and finally expired of inanition, after several unsuccessful efforts had been made to induce Mr. Mudford to resume the editorship of it. Meanwhile, he had the misfortune to lose, at a stroke, by injudicious investments during the speculative mania, the not inconsiderable fortune that his industry had acquired; and, at forty, he had to begin the world again, in company with a young wife and a family that continued, for many years, to increase with great regularity. The habits of application which he had formed, as a young man, now stood him in good stead; and though his health no longer allowed of his sitting up three nights in the week, his pen was never idle during the day. At the invitation of the Conservative party in East Kent, he became the editor, and subsequently the proprietor, of the 'Kentish Observer.' To Blackwood's Magazine he was a regular contributor, and it not unfrequently happened that a single number of that periodical has contained three articles from his pen—a tale, a review, and a political paper. The series of 'First and Last' tales, and the contributions under the title of 'The Silent Member,' were especially popular at the time of their appearance. During this period he published two works of fiction, 'Stephen Dugard,' and 'The five nights at St. Alban's,' the latter, a remarkable story of necromancy, which, in a cheap form, still finds readers. Upon the death of Mr. Theodore Hook, the vacant editorship of the 'John Bull' was offered to Mr. Mudford, and accepted by him. It obliged him to remove his residence to London, but he maintained his connection with the 'Kentish Observer,' and had to make, in consequence, constant journeys between Canterbury and the metropolis, at a time when travelling was neither so pleasant nor so expeditious as it is now. But the consciousness of his own daily declining health, and the imperative claims of the young family that he knew he must so soon leave behind him, rendered it necessary that he should toil incessantly, though, as he used to say, with one foot already in the grave. A vigorous article on the French revolution, written long after midnight, which appeared in the 'John Bull' of 5 March, was the last effort of his pen. Three days afterwards he sank under an accumulation of maladies, which nothing but a constitution of extraordinary strength had enabled him to resist so long.

MUDGE, Zachary, was born at Exeter, where he was educated for the ministry, among the dissenters; whom he left, and took orders in the church of England. In 1716 he became master of the grammar-school at Bideford, in Devonshire, where he remained till 1736, when he was elected to the rectory of St. Andrew, Plymouth, with which he held a prebend in the cathedral of Exeter. Died 3 April, 1769. Mr. Mudge published a visitation sermon, and a volume of discourses. He left four sons, of whom Thomas, the second, was born at Exeter in Sept., 1715, and died 14 Nov., 1794. He served his apprenticeship to Graham, the watchmaker, and became equally eminent in that line with his master; and for his timekeepers, which were adjudged superior to any that had ever been invented, he obtained a parliamentary grant of £3000. Dr. John Mudge, the fourth son of Mr. Zachary Mudge, was born at Bideford, and became a physician at Plymouth. He published 'A Dissertation on the inoculated Smallpox;' and a 'Treatise on the Catarrhous Cough.' He had also a mechanical genius, and received the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society for improvements in the specula of reflecting telescopes. He died 1792. His son, Major-General William Mudge, was employed on a trigonometrical survey of Great Britain, a considerable portion of which he completed before his death, in 1821. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, in whose Transactions are some of his papers on the great work in which he was engaged.

MUDIE, Robert, was born in Forfarshire 28 June, 1777, and was entirely self-educated. In 1802 he was appointed Gaelic professor and teacher of drawing in the Inverness Academy. Some years afterwards he became drawing-master in the Dundee High School; but in 1820 he removed to London, where he was engaged as a reporter on the 'Morning Chronicle.' After settling in the metropolis his time was incessantly devoted to his literary labours; and so great was his industry that he composed more than eighty volumes, including 'Modern Athens,' a description of Edinburgh, 1824; 'Modern Babylon,' a description of London, 6 vols., 1824; 'The Feathered Tribes of the British Islands,' 2 vol., 1833; 'History of Hampshire and the Channel Islands,' 3 vols., 1838. Died 29 April, 1842.

MUFFET, or MOUFET, Thomas, a physician, born in London, and educated at Cambridge, after which he travelled over great part of Europe, being created M.D. at Basle. On his return to this country he practised his profession with great reputation. He represented Wilton in the parliament of 1597. The latter part of his life was spent at Bulbridge, near Wilton, in the capacity of retainer to the Earl of Pembroke, from whom he received an annual pension. Died before 25 June, 1605. The best known of his works are 'The Theater of Insects;' and 'Healths Improvement: or rules comprising and discovering the nature, method, and manner of preparing all sorts of Food used in this Nation.'—Athen. Cantab.

MUGGLETON, Lodowick, the founder of a sect of English enthusiasts, was born 1607. He was bred to the trade of a tailor, and seems to have persuaded himself, as well as a number of ignorant followers, that he was divinely inspired to foretell future events; that he was entrusted with the keys of heaven and of hell; and that none could obtain admittance into heaven unless he opened the gates. At length the magistrates took cognizance of his conduct, and he was sentenced to the pillory and six months' imprisonment, while his writings were burnt by the common hangman. Died 14 March, 1697-8. The last edition of his works appeared in 3 vols., 1832. The sect of Muggletonians still exists, though its members are very few in number.

MULCASTER, Richard, was born at Carlisle, in or about 1533, and educated at Eton, from whence he removed, first to King's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1553), and next to Christ Church, Oxford (M.A. 1577). In 1561 he was appointed master of Merchant Taylor's School, which situation he held till 1586. In 1596 he became master of St. Paul's School, where he remained twelve years. He was likewise rector of Stamford Rivers, Essex. Died 15 April, 1611. He wrote Latin poems; 'Positions wherein those primitive circumstances be examined which are necessarie for the training up of children, either for skill in their booke, or health in their bodie,' 1581; 'The First Part of the Elementarie which entreateth chefelie of the right Writing of our English Tung,' 1582; and 'Catechismus Paulinus, in usum Scholæ Paulinæ conscriptus,' 1599–1601, &c.— Athen. Cantab., iii. 40.

MULGRAVE, Constantine John Phipps, Lord, a naval commander, was born 30 May, 1734; succeeded to his Irish title 1775; was created an English peer 1784; died at Liège 10 Oct., 1792. He entered very young into the naval service, under the auspices of his uncle the earl of Bristol. In 1773 he was placed in command of a north-east Arctic exploring expedition; and he returned the same year, after having reached lat. 80° 40′ N., beyond which an impenetrable field of ice stretched as far as could be seen. He published a narrative of the expedition in the following year. Lord Mulgrave was an ardent politician, and was appointed one of the commissioners of the Admiralty under Lord North's administration.

MÜLLER, Andrew, a German divine and orientalist, born in Pomerania 1630; died at Stettin 26 Nov., 1694. Such was his fame for oriental learning that, according to Moréri, he was invited to England, to assist in Walton's Polyglott.

MÜLLER, CHARLES OTTFRIED, a celebrated classical scholar, born at Brieg, in Prussian Silesia, 28 Aug., 1797. He established his reputation by a dissertation on the island of Ægina; and shortly after its publication he was, although only twenty years old, appointed to a professorship in the university of Göttingen. In 1839 he set out on a tour through Italy and Greece; but, unfortunately, while making excavations at Delphi, he was attacked by fever, of which he died at Athens 1 Aug., 1840. Of his numerous works the following have been translated into English: 'The History and Antiquities of the Doric Race;' 'History of the Literature of Ancient Greece;' 'Introduction to a Scientific System of Mythology;' 'Ancient Art and its Remains, or a Manual of the Archæology of Art;' and 'Dissertations on the Eumenides of Æschylus.'

MÜLLER, CHRISTIAN FREDERICK VON, an engraver, born at Stuttgart 1783; died at Pirna, near Dresden, 3 May, 1816. His masterpiece is an engraving of the Madonna of St. Sixtus.

MÜLLER, GERARD FREDERICK, was born in Westphalia, 1705. He settled in Russia, and accompanied Gmelin and De l'Isle in a tour through Siberia, which occupied them ten years. In 1747 he was appointed historiographer of Russia; in 1754 secretary of the Academy of Sciences; and in 1766 keeper of the archives. Died 4 Oct., 1783. His principal work is 'A Collection of Russian Histories.'

MÜLLER, JOHN. See REGIOMONTANUS.

MULLER, JOHN VON, a Swiss historian, born at Schaffhause 3 Jan., 1752; died 29 May, 1809. An English translation of his 'Universal History' appeared at London, in 3 vols., 1818.

MÜLLER, JOHN GOTTHARD VON, an engraver, born 1747, near Stuttgart, where he died 14 March, 1830.

MULLER, LOUIS CHRISTIAN, a Prussian engineer, born 1735; died 13 June, 1804. By his labours and writings he contributed largely to the improvement of the military art.

MÜLLER, OTHO FREDERICK, a celebrated Danish naturalist, born at Copenhagen 11 March, 1730; died 26 Dec., 1784.

MULLER, WILLIAM JOHN, a painter, born at Bristol 1812. His father, who was curator of the museum in that city, was a native of Germany, and published some scientific works. After studying art under his fellow-townsman, Mr. J. B. Pyne, he made the tour of Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, and returning to Bristol, pursued his profession there, though with very partial success. During a visit to Greece and Egypt in 1838 he enriched his portfolio with a large number of sketches. The following year he settled in London, where his pictures were purchased with avidity; and in 1841 he published his beautiful 'Picturesque Sketches of the Age of Francis I.' Subsequently he accompanied, at his own expense, the government expedition to Lycia (1843), and brought back some fine sketches, which, to his bitter disappointment, were badly hung at the Royal Academy exhibition. Indeed, it is probable that this disappointment hastened his death, which occurred 8 Sept., 1845. Among the best of his pictures are 'Athens from the Road to Athens;' 'Memnon, or Ruins at Gornou, in Egypt, at Sunset;' 'Turkish Burial Ground;' and 'Xanthian Tent Scene.'

MULREADY, WILLIAM, a painter, was born at Ennis, co. Clare, 1786, and in his fifteenth year was entered as a student in the Royal Academy. By 1813 his reputation as an artist was established, and his 'Idle Boys,' in 1815, secured his election as A.R.A. The year following he exhibited 'The Fight Interrupted,' and was elected R.A. 'Lending a Bite,' 'The Wolf and the Lamb,' 'The Careless Messenger,' and a variety of other works, produced steadily year by year, from 1819, marked the maturing of his powers, and displayed the genial humour of his style. 'The First Voyage' appeared in 1833, and was the forerunner of a series of pictures evincing a rare combination of humour and pathos. 'The Last In,' 'The Toyseller,' 'The Sonnet,' 'First Love,' 'The Artist's Study,' and 'The Ford,' may be taken as instances of the development of his serio-comic genius. The last-named picture was produced in 1842; but two years previously Mr. Mulready had prepared a series of twenty illustrations of the 'Vicar of Wakefield,' which were engraved on wood by Thomson, and are usually considered unique specimens of this kind of art. The admiration of the public for these designs led to the reproduction of three of them in oil, viz., 'The Whistonian Controversy,' 'Burchell and Sophia Haymaking,' and 'Choosing the Wedding Gown.' The works of Mr. Mulready were collected and exhibited by the Society of Arts in 1848. His 'Blackheath Park,' in 1852, was the last picture he exhibited. Mr. Mulready died at Bayswater 7 July, 1863. There are some choice specimens of this artist's style in the National Gallery, and in the Sheepshanks collection at South Kensington.

MUMFORD, JAMES, was born in Norfolk 1606, became a Jesuit, served on the English mission for twenty-six years, and died 9 March, 1666. He was a learned controversialist, and published 'A Remembrance for the Living to pray for the Dead,' 12mo., St. Omer, 1641; 'De Misericordiâ Fidelibus Defunctis exhibendâ,' 12mo., Liège, 1647; A Defence of St. Gregory's Dialogues; 'The Question of Questions, which rightly resolved resolves all our Questions in Religion,' published under the name of Optatus Ductor, 4to., Ghent, 1658, 12mo., London, 1686-7, 8vo., Glasgow, 1841; 'Catholike Scripturist,' Ghent, 1662; London, 1686; Edinburgh, 1687, 1767.—Dodd; Oliver.

MUNCER, or MUNTZER, THOMAS, a German fanatic, born at Stolberg, in the Hartz Forest. He studied at Würtemburg, after which he became a preacher at Stolberg, where he connected himself with Nicholas Stork, an Anabaptist, who pretended to inspiration. Muncer fell into the same delusion, and began to collect disciples, on the principle of greater purity of faith and manners. This spirit, however, soon broke out into acts of outrage, for not only churches and monasteries, but castles, were plundered by these reformers, who maintained that the Almighty had ordained perfect equality among men, and that rank and riches were contrary to the law of nature. Muncer was beheaded at Mulhausen 1525.

MUNDAY, ANTHONY, a dramatic poet, born 1553. He turned Catholic, but afterwards went back to the Protestant religion, though he was far from doing honour to any communion. He betrayed Campian, and published an account of his conduct on that occasion. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that he became servant to the earl of Oxford, and a messenger to the queen. He was the author of the City Pageants; and died 10 Aug., 1633. Munday edited and enlarged Stowe's Survey of London, 1618.

MUNDEN, Joseph Shepherd, a famous comedian, was the son of a poulterer in Brooks's Market, Holborn, where he was born 1758. He was originally a lawyer's clerk; but, taking a fancy to the stage, he performed in various provincial theatres, and on 2 Dec., 1790, made his first appearance at Covent Garden, where his success in low comedy characters was marvellous. In 1797 and 1798 he played at the Haymarket; but his summer vacations were chiefly filled up by engagements in the provinces. He remained at Covent Garden till 1813, when he joined the Drury Lane company. There he remained till 1824, when he took his leave of the stage. He died in London 6 Feb., 1832.

MUNDINUS, an Italian physician and anatomist, died at Bologna 1326.

MUNNICH, Burchard Christopher, Count de, was born at New Huntorf, in Oldenburg, 1683. After distinguishing himself in the German wars, he entered the Russian service, where he rose to the rank of marshal; but in 1741 the Empress Elizabeth condemned him to perpetual exile in Siberia. He was recalled at the accession of Peter III.; and died 16 Oct., 1767. Some of his works on fortification, and other subjects, have been published.

MUNOZ, John Baptist, a Spanish historian, born at Museros, near Valentia, 1745; died 19 July, 1799.

MUNRO, Sir Thomas, a general in the service of the East India Company, born 1760. He was sent to India at an early age, and went through the campaign against Hyder Ali (1780-4). After being promoted to the rank of lieutenant (1786), he applied himself to the study of Persian and Hindustani. In 1790, when Tippoo Saib rose in rebellion, he took part in the hostilities which ensued, and was present at the siege of Bangalore. In 1792 he was employed as assistant to Capt. Read in the revenue department, being specially charged with the district of Barramahl. At a later period he was sent to Canara to organise the affairs of that new possession, which had come into the possession of the Company during the second war against Tippoo Saib. He was constituted governor-general of Madras 1820, and for his services in the Burman war was created a baronet. It was in contemplation to nominate him governor-general of India, when he suddenly died 6 July, 1827. His Life was published in 1830 by the Rev. G. R. Gleig.

MUNSTER, Ernest Frederick Herbert, Count de, a Hanoverian statesman, born 1766; died 11 May, 1839.

MUNSTER, George Fitzclarence, earl of, a natural son of the duke of Clarence (afterwards William IV.) by Mrs. Jordan, was born 1794, and committed suicide 20 March, 1842. He was at one period aide-de-camp to the governor-general of India, and published an interesting 'Journal of a route across India through Egypt to England,' 1819.

MUNSTER, Sebastian, a German divine, born at Ingelheim 1489. He received his education at Heidelberg, after which he entered the order of Cordeliers; but left them to join Luther, though he avoided the controversies then in agitation. He settled at Basle, where he succeeded Pelicanus in the Hebrew professorship, and died 1552. He published a Latin version of the Bible, from the Hebrew, with notes; also a 'Universal Cosmography;' a Treatise on Dialling; a Latin Translation of Josephus; and several mathematical works.

MURAT, Henriette Julie de Castelnau, comtesse de, a French authoress, born 1670; died 24 Sept., 1716. She wrote in a pleasing style 'Les Lutrins de Kernosi;' 'Contes des Fés;' 'Voyage de Campagne,' &c.

MURAT, Joachim, king of Naples under Bonaparte, was the son of an innkeeper at Cahors, in France, and born 25 March, 1771. When a boy he escaped from the college of Toulouse, where he had been placed with a view to the ecclesiastical profession. He was afterwards a common chasseur, and deserted; served in the constitutional guard of Louis XVI.; then entered the 12th regiment of mounted chasseurs; rose by his zealous Jacobinism to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; was afterwards removed as a terrorist; and remained without employment till his fate placed him in connection with Bonaparte, whom he accompanied as an aide-de-camp to Italy (1796). He followed his leader to Egypt, and distinguished himself at Mount Tabor, during the Syrian expedition. On his return to France he was made commander of the consular guard, and soon after married the sister of the First Consul, whose favours he profusely experienced. He commanded the cavalry at the battle of Marengo; and in 1802 he governed the Cisalpine Republic, with the title of general. In Jan., 1804, he was appointed governor of Paris, with the title of general-in-chief, and he directed the military force when Bonaparte was proclaimed emperor. Shortly afterwards he was created a marshal of the empire; and, being invested with the grand duchy of Berg, he assumed the state of a sovereign prince, and figured as such in two campaigns, particularly at the battle of Jena. He commanded the cavalry at Eylau and at Friedland; and in 1808 he was sent with an army to Spain, when he effected the temporary submission of that country. On the 1st August in the same year he was proclaimed king of the Two Sicilies, and he had reigned peaceably at Naples for four years, when he was called upon to join Bonaparte in his Russian expedition. He commanded the cavalry of the French army; and after the defeat of Smolensko, he imitated the example of his leader and left the army for Naples. In the campaign of 1813 he joined the French, but after the loss of the battle of Leipsic he endeavoured to make terms with the enemies of the emperor. He entered into separate negotiations with England and Austria, but his vacillating conduct at length proved his ruin, and he was precipitated from his throne. He then resided for some time at Plaisance, near Toulon, till after the battle of Waterloo, when he took refuge in Corsica. Thence, with a few followers, he sailed to Italy, in the hope of recovering his crown; but he was made prisoner soon after landing, and conducted to the castle of Pizzo, where he was shot 13 Oct., 1815.

MURATORI, Louis Anthony, called the Montfaucon of Italy, was born at Vignola, in the duchy of Modena, 21 Oct., 1672. He obtained some ecclesiastical preferment, most part of the revenues of which he bestowed in charity. He became keeper of the Ambrosian library at Milan; and afterwards of the archives of the house of Este, at Modena, where he was librarian to the grand duke. Died 23 Jan., 1750. His principal works are—Anecdota Latina, 4 vols.; Anecdota Græca; Della perfetta Poesia Italiana, 2 vols.; Del l'antichita Estense et Italiane, 2 vols.; Liturgia Romana vetus, 2 vols.; Antiquitates Italicæ medii ævi, 6 vols. fol., and 17 vols. 4to.; Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, 25 vols. fol.; Novus Thesaurus veterum Inscriptionum, 4 vols.; Dissertazioni sopra la antichita Italiana, 3 vols.; Annali d'Italia del principis dell' era volgare, sino all' anno 1749, 12 vols. There is an edition of his works in 43 vols. 8vo.; and another in 36 vols. 4to.

MURDOCH, JOHN, a Scotch prelate of the Roman communion, was born at Wellheads, in the Enzie, 11 Nov., 1796; nominated coadjutor to Bishop Scott 1830; consecrated bishop of Castabala 1833; succeeded Bishop Scott as third vicar apostolic of the western district of Scotland 1846; and died at Glasgow 15 Dec., 1865.

MURE, WILLIAM, a classical scholar, born at Caldwell, Ayrshire, 9 July, 1799. After studying at Westminster School and the university of Edinburgh, he completed his education in Germany, where he imbibed that taste for criticism which inspired him in after years and made his name known far and wide among the scholars of modern Europe. He was M.P. for Renfrewshire 1846-55; lord rector of the university of Glasgow during the year 1847-8; and for many years colonel-commandant of the Renfrewshire militia. His death took place at Kensington 1 April, 1860. He wrote 'Remarks on the Chronology of the Egyptian Dynasties,' 1829; 'Dissertation on the Calendar of the Zodiac of Ancient Egypt,' 1832; and 'Journal of a Tour in Greece,' 1842; but his greatest work, unfortunately left unfinished, is 'A Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece.' Col. Mure also edited 'The Caldwell Papers,' 3 vols., for the Maitland Club.

MURETUS, MARK ANTHONY, a learned critic, born at Muret, near Limoges, 1526. He studied at Agen under the elder Scaliger; after which he taught philosophy and civil law at Paris, where he published his poems 1552. About this time he was thrown into prison, on a serious charge, and with some difficulty effected his release. He then went to Toulouse, which he was obliged to quit abruptly on a similar account. He then passed into Italy, and found a patron in the Cardinal D'Este, whom he accompanied to Paris, where he read lectures on Aristotle's Ethics, with great applause. He next entered into orders, and died at Rome 1585. His works were published at Verona, in 1727, in 3 vols. 8vo.; and again at Leyden in 1789, 4 vols. 8vo. He edited several of the classics, which he illustrated with notes.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMEO ESTEBAN, a Spanish painter, was born at Seville in 1618. He was the disciple of Juan del Castillo, whose favourite subjects were markets and fairs; but Murillo, on going to Madrid, studied the works of Titian, Rubens, and Vandyke, with such success, that on his return to Seville he was employed to adorn most of the churches. Died 3 April, 1685.

MURPHY, ARTHUR, was born at Clooniquin, Roscommon, 1727. He lost his father, who was master of a vessel, early in life; but his mother gave him a good education at St. Omer, whence he returned, in 1744, and was placed in the counting-house of his uncle at Cork, which he soon quitted; and, in 1751, came to London, where he began a paper, called 'The Gray's Inn Journal.' He also made an attempt on the stage, but failed; after which he turned his attention to the law, and was called to the bar in 1762. His chief dependence, however, was upon his literary exertions, and few dramatists have been more successful. His 'Grecian Daughter,' a tragedy; 'All in the Wrong,' and 'The Way to keep Him,' comedies; with the smaller pieces of 'The Citizen,' the 'Old Maid,' and 'Three Weeks after Marriage,' long held their places among the acting plays. Mr. Murphy was likewise a political writer, in a paper called 'The Test;' and 'The Auditor,' in favour of Lord Bute against Wilkes. He also wrote 'An Essay on the Life of Fielding,' for an edition of that author's works. In 1792 he published 'An Essay on the Life and Genius of Dr. Johnson;' and the year following came out his translation of Tacitus, in 4 vols. In 1798 he printed a dramatic poem, entitled 'Arminius;' and afterwards a 'Life of Garrick.' Lord Chancellor Loughborough appointed him a commissioner of bankrupts; and he also obtained a pension from the crown. He died 18 June, 1805; and after his death was published his translation of Sallust.

MURPHY, EDWARD, Catholic bishop of Kildare, was in 1724 translated to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin, and died 1729.

MURPHY, FRANCIS, D.D., a native of the county of Meath, in Ireland, was educated at Maynooth, and for some time officiated as a priest in England. Going to Australia, he was made vicar-general of the diocese of Sydney; consecrated bishop of Adelaide 1845; and died June, 1858.

MURPHY, JAMES CAVANAH, a traveller and antiquary, born at Cork about 1760; died 1816. In 1783 he accompanied his friend William Conyngham to Portugal, where he remained till 1790. On his return he published 'Plans, Elevations, Sections, and Views of the Church of Batalha,' fol., Lond., 1792-5; 'Travels in Portugal,' 1795, translated into French and German; and 'A general View of the State of Portugal,' 1797. He went to Spain 1802, resided there seven years, and on his return to England published 'The Arabian Antiquities of Spain,' fol., Lond., 1813-15; and a 'History of the Mahometan Empire in Spain,' 1816.

MURPHY, PATRICK, the celebrated 'weather prophet,' died in London 1 Dec., 1847.

MURPHY, ROBERT, was the son of a shoemaker at Mallow, in Ireland, where he was born 1806. Being sent to Cambridge, he graduated in arts, and was elected a fellow of Caius College; but, unhappily, he was obliged to leave the university (1832) in consequence of his dissipated conduct. After spending some time in Ireland he settled in London 1836, and two years later was appointed examiner in mathematics and natural philosophy in University College, London. Died 12 March, 1843. Mr. Murphy was author of 'Elementary Principles of the Theories of Electricity, Heat, and Molecular Actions,' 1833; and of a 'Treatise on the Theory of Algebraical Equations,' 1839.

MURRAY, ALEXANDER, D.D., born at Dunkitterick, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, 22 Oct., 1775. At the early age of ten he was sent out to get his living as a shepherd, and the education imparted to him by others was of the most meagre kind; but by extraordinary application he contrived to acquire a knowledge of Hebrew, French, Latin, and Greek. The fame of his acquirements procured him admission into the university of Edinburgh (1794), and the progress of his studies continued unabated. He devoted much attention to oriental literature, particularly the Abyssinian language—a circumstance which pre-eminently qualified him to superintend a new edition of Bruce's Travels. In 1806 he became assistant to Dr. Muirhead, minister of Urr, whom he soon afterwards succeeded in the pastoral office; but in 1812 he was called from thence to fill the chair of oriental languages at Edinburgh. He died shortly afterwards on 15 April, 1813. His 'History of the European Languages' was printed in 2 vols., 1823.

MURRAY, DANIEL, D.D., an Irish Catholic prelate, born at Sheepwalk, near Arklow, co. Wicklow, 18 April, 1768. After an academical training at Salamanca he was ordained priest, and returned to his native country 1790. He was stationed at Arklow till 1798; and in 1809, having been appointed coadjutor to Dr. Troy, archbishop of Dublin, he was consecrated archbishop of Hierapolis. At the instance of his brother prelates he paid a visit, in the following year, to Paris, and succeeded in obtaining from the French government the restoration of the property of religious establishments connected with Ireland. He rendered himself conspicuous, between 1810 and 1816, by his determined opposition to the proposed government veto on the appointment of Catholic bishops in Ireland, and he was delegated to accompany Dr. Milner to Rome, in order to protest against all compromise on this subject; and they carried their point, for the veto was eventually condemned by the Holy See (1814). On 11 May, 1823, Dr. Troy having departed this life, his mitre devolved upon Dr. Murray, who received the pallium from Rome 19 Oct., 1824. The archbishop was one of the foremost in the struggle for Catholic emancipation, and in other political movements. He was appointed by the government a commissioner under the Bequests Act of 1844, and in 1851 an education commissioner. He even consented to act as a visitor of the Queen's colleges; but when the proceedings of the synod of Thurles were ratified by the Sovereign Pontiff (1852), Dr. Murray withdrew from all connection with those 'godless' institutions. Died 26 Feb., 1852. Dr. Murray, who was emphatically a scholar and a gentleman, published some works on political and polemical subjects. His 'Sermons' appeared at Dublin, in 2 vols. 8vo., 1859.

MURRAY, Sir GEORGE, a general and politician, born in Perthshire 6 Feb., 1772; died in London 28 July, 1846. In literature he is known as the editor of 'Marlborough's Dispatches.'

MURRAY, HUGH, a geographical writer, born at North Berwick, in East Lothian, 1779. At an early age he was placed as clerk in the excise office at Edinburgh, where he had ample leisure to devote to literary pursuits. He published numerous works, including fifteen volumes of the Edinburgh Cabinet Library; but his principal production is the 'Encyclopædia of Geography,' 1834. Died in London 4 March, 1846.

MURRAY, JAMES STUART, EARL OF, natural son of James V. of Scotland, was born about 1533. He proved the ingratitude of his heart by his barbarous conduct towards the unhappy Mary, against whom he excited the nobles of the kingdom. On the disgrace of Mary he was appointed regent during the minority of the young king 1567. He was shot 23 Jan., 1570, at Linlithgow, by Hamilton, whose wife he had seduced.

MURRAY, JOHN, M.D., a native of Scotland, received his education at Edinburgh, where he rose to eminence as a lecturer on natural philosophy, chemistry, the materia medica, and pharmacy. He died in that city 22 July, 1820. Dr. Murray wrote 'Elements of Chemistry;' 'Elements of Materia Medica and Pharmacy;' 'A System of Chemistry;' 'A System of Materia Medica and Pharmacy.'

MURRAY, JOHN, an English publisher, born in London 27 Nov., 1778; died 27 June, 1843.

MURRAY, LINDLEY, a grammarian, was the son of an American merchant, and born at Swatara, Pennsylvania, 1745. He practised as a barrister at New York till the breaking out of the war with England, when he retired to Islip, in Long Island, and acquired a handsome fortune by mercantile pursuits. On the establishment of American independence he came to this country, and settled at Holdgate, near York, where he wrote a variety of useful works, of which the best known is his celebrated 'English Grammar,' first published 1795. Among his other works are, 'English Exercises and Key,' 'English Reader,' and 'Spelling Book;' and a tract entitled 'The Power of Religion on the Mind.' Died 16 Feb., 1826

MURRAY, SARAH. See AUST.

MURRAY, WILLIAM, earl of Mansfield. See MANSFIELD.

MURRAY, WILLIAM H., a Scotch actor and theatrical manager, died at St. Andrew's 12 May, 1852.

MUSCULUS, WOLFGANG, a Lutheran divine, born at Dieuze, in Lorraine, 1497. He became a Benedictine monk, but quitted the order 1527, and married. After officiating as minister at Strasburg and Augsburg, he was appointed divinity professor at Berne, where he died Aug., 1563, leaving Commentaries on the Bible, and some controversial works.

MUSGRAVE, Sir RICHARD, an Irish historian, born about 1758. By his marriage into the Cavendish family he obtained a seat in parliament, the collectorship of the excise for Dublin, and a baronetcy. He published in 1801 'Memoirs of the Rebellions in Ireland,' a work which gave great offence to the Catholics, on account of the picture exhibited in it of the atrocities committed by the insurgents in 1798. Sir Richard died 7 April, 1818.

MUSGRAVE, WILLIAM, M.D., F.R.S., was born at Charlton, Somersetshire, 1657, and educated at Winchester School, from whence he was elected to New College, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.B. 1682, but afterwards applied himself to physic, and became a fellow of the Royal College, as also of the Royal Society, to which last learned body he acted as secretary. In 1691 he settled at Exeter, where he died 23 Dec. 1721. Besides some Latin tracts on the gout, he published four volumes of dissertations on Roman and British Antiquities. His grandson, Dr. Samuel Musgrave, was also a physician at Exeter, where he died 3 July, 1782. He distinguished himself in 1763 by charging the ministers with having been bribed to settle a peace advantageous to France. As a scholar he is known by an edition of Euripides, and two dissertations on the Grecian Mythology, and the Olympiads.

MUSIUS, or MUYS, CORNELIUS, a Catholic divine, born at Delft, in Holland, 1503. He studied at Louvain, after which he resided for some years in France, where he was much respected for his learning and piety. On his return home he became confessor to a nunnery; but when the Reformation made progress in the Low Countries, and the false zeal of fanaticism vented itself in outrages against priests, monks, and nuns, Musius was seized by the infuriated bigots, who mutilated him in a shocking manner, and after dragging him about naked in the snow, suspended him on a gallows at Leyden 1572. He was a good Latin poet, and published several pieces, the principal of which are 'Institutio Fœminæ Christianæ;' 'Odæ et Psalmi aliquot;' 'De Temporum Fugacitate;' 'Imago Patientiæ;' 'Tumulorum Erasmi Libellus.'

MUSS, CHARLES, a celebrated enamel painter, who died in London 1824. His picture of the Holy Family, after Parmegiano, is said to be the largest enamel ever painted.

MUSSATO, ALBERTINO, an Italian historian and Latin poet, born at Padua 1261; died 1330.

MUSSCHENBROECK, PETER VAN, a mathematician, born at Leyden 14 March, 1692. He took his doctor's degree in physic, but applied chiefly to natural philosophy; and on visiting London was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society. About 1734 he was appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Utrecht, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he died 19 Sept., 1761. He published several valuable works in Latin, one of which, 'Elementa Physica,' was translated into English by Colston.

MUSSCHER, MICHAEL, a Dutch painter, born at Rotterdam 1645; died at Amsterdam 1705.

MUSSET, LOUIS CHARLES ALFRED DE, a celebrated French poet and dramatist, born 11 Nov., 1810, at Paris, where he died 1 May, 1857.

MUSURUS, MARCUS, a native of Candia, who went to Italy at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and became professor of Greek at Padua. He published an edition of Plato, to which he prefixed some Greek verses, for which Leo X. made him bishop of Malvasia. He also superintended the first editions of Aristophanes and Athenæus. Died 1517.

MUTIS, JOSEPH CELESTINE, a Spanish divine, physician, and botanist, born at Cadiz 6 April, 1732; died 11 Sept., 1808.

MUZIANO, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, born at Acquafredda, near Brescia, 1528. He studied painting under Romanini, whose style he forsook for that of Titian. On going to Rome he became the associate of Taddeo Zucchero, in conjunction with whom he executed several important works. Muziano was a great favourite with Gregory XIII., who employed him to paint a picture of St. Paul the Hermit, and another of St. Anthony, for the church of St. Peter. Sixtus V. also held him in esteem, and entrusted to him the designs for the bas-reliefs of the column of Trajan. At the instance of this artist, Pope Gregory founded the Academy of St. Luke, which Sixtus confirmed by a brief. Died at Rome 1590 or 1592.

MYDDELTON. See MIDDLETON.

MYDORGE, CLAUDE, a mathematician, born at Paris 1585; died there July, 1647.

MYLNE, ROBERT, an architect, was born 4 Jan., 1734, at Edinburgh, where his father was of the same profession, and a magistrate of the city. The son went to Rome for improvement, and during his residence there gained the first prize in the architectural class at St. Luke's Academy, of which he was elected a member. He was also chosen a member of the Academies of Florence and Bologna. On his return home he settled in London, and was selected to build Blackfriars Bridge. He was also appointed surveyor of St. Paul's Cathedral, and built a number of fine seats in different parts of the country. Died 5 May, 1811.

N.

NÆVIUS, CNEIUS, a Latin poet, who died at Utica B.C. 203. Some fragments of his works are extant.

NAHL, JOHN AUGUSTINE, a sculptor, born at Berlin 1710; died at Cassel 1785.

NAIRNE, CAROLINE, LADY, author of 'The Laird o' Cockpen,' 'The Land o' the Leal,' and other popular Scotch ballads, was born 16 July, 1766, at Gask, Perthshire, where she died 27 Oct., 1845.

NALSON, JOHN, LL.D., was born about 1638, and educated at Cambridge. After the Restoration he became rector of Doddington, in the Isle of Ely, and prebendary of that cathedral. He died 24 March, 1685-6. His principal work is 'An Impartial Collection of the Affairs of State, from the Scotch Rebellion to the Murder of Charles I.,' 2 vols., folio.

NANI, JOHN BAPTIST FELIX GASPAR, a Venetian nobleman, born 30 Aug., 1616. He distinguished himself as ambassador to the French court, where he obtained succours for the republic to carry on the war against Turkey. He was afterwards employed in other missions of importance, for which he was made proctor of St. Mark, and captain-general of the marine. Died 5 Nov., 1678. He wrote the 'History of Venice,' part of which has been translated into English.

NANTEUIL, ROBERT, an engraver of portraits, born at Rheims 1630; died at Paris 18 Dec., 1678.

NAPIER, Sir CHARLES, K.C.B., a British admiral, eldest son of Capt. Charles Napier, of Merchistoun Hall, co. Stirling, was born there 6 March, 1786. He entered the navy 1799, and was raised to the rank of post-captain 1809. After performing many brilliant services, his ship, the 'Euryalus,' was paid off in June, 1815; and on the 4th of that month he was nominated a C.B. After a long lapse of time he was called into action again in 1829, when he was employed on particular service on the coast of Portugal in the 'Galatea.' In 1833 he commanded Don Pedro's fleet, and the naval victory he won secured the crown for Don Pedro's daughter, Donna Maria. In 1839 Captain Napier, second in command under Sir R. Stopford of the fleet employed on the coast of Syria, effected a landing at D'Journie, at the head of 1500 Turks and British marines; and in this, his first operation on the Syrian coast, he displayed indefatigable zeal. On 2 Nov., 1840, he assisted at the siege of Acre, after which he concluded an advantageous convention with Mehemet Ali. In acknowledgment of his conduct he was created K.C.B. (1840), and he was also included in the thanks of Parliament to the commander-in-chief and his subordinates. He was subsequently appointed rear-admiral of the blue, and held for two years the command of the Channel fleet. After a prolonged interval Sir Charles Napier received the command of the Baltic fleet, on the outbreak of the Russian war (1854). He promised before setting out to take Cronstadt in a month; but, notwithstanding this boast, he returned without having done anything of importance except the capture of Bomarsund. Sir Charles was returned to parliament for Marylebone 1841; and in 1855 he was elected for Southwark, which borough he represented till his death. That event occurred at his seat, Merchistoun House, near Portsmouth, 5 Nov., 1860. He published 'The Past and Present State of the Navy,' 1851, and some other works.

NAPIER, Sir CHARLES JAMES, G.C.B., a British general, was born in London 10 Aug., 1782, and before he had completed his twelfth year received an ensign's commission in the 22nd regiment of foot, being gazetted a lieutenant 8 May, 1794. His first service to the country was rendered in Ireland, as aide-de-camp to Sir James Duff. In 1805 he was appointed major in the 50th regiment, which he commanded during the terrible retreat at Corunna under Sir John Moore, and during the fatal battle in which their gallant leader fell. Nor had Major Napier much better fortune, for he was wounded in five places and made prisoner. Ney received his captive with kindness, and on his recovery permitted him to return to England on parole. In 1811 he was again in the Peninsula, and, as a volunteer, fought desperately at the engagement on the Coa, where he had two horses shot under him, but escaped unhurt. At Busaco, however, he was shot in the face, his jaw being broken and one of his eyes injured. At this period he was elevated to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and in June, 1811, he was sufficiently recovered to take a share in the battle of Fuentes d'Onore. He was likewise present at the second siege of Badajos. He was not present at Waterloo; but he arrived three days after the battle, took a part in the storming of Cambray, and accompanied the army to Paris. A period of military inactivity followed, during which Colonel Napier, being stationed in the Greek Islands, was appointed to the government of the island of Cephalonia. In 1841, being then major-general, he was ordered to take the command of the army at Bombay. This was the commencement of the most splendid period of his life, resulting in the conquest, the pacification, and the great improvement of Scinde. At the battle of Meeanee, Sir Charles, with only 1600 English and Sepoys, defeated nearly 30,000 Beelooches, strongly posted, with the loss of 6000 men. The Ameers all surrendered except Shere Mahomet, who assembled a new army and faced his terrible antagonist with 25,000 men at Hyderabad, where Sir Charles gained another decisive victory, thus rendering himself master of Scinde, of which territory he was constituted governor. In the course of a few years he completely reorganised the whole physical and moral condition of the district. He returned to England 1847. When the last Sikh war broke out the Duke of Wellington selected him as the fittest officer to take the supreme command. The veteran accordingly started for India in March, 1849, but found, on his arrival there, that the Sikhs had been finally routed. After two years' residence in India he returned to England, where he continued to reside till his death, which occurred at Oaklands, near Portsmouth, 29 Aug., 1853. When Sir Charles Napier was not fighting he was writing, his more important publications being, 'Colonization in Southern Australia;' 'History of the Colonies—Ionian Islands;' 'Indian Misgovernment and Lord Dalhousie;' 'Lights and Shadows of Military Life;' 'Remarks on the Military Law of Flogging.'

NAPIER, or NEPER, JOHN, baron of Merchiston, in Scotland, was born 1550. He studied at St. Andrews, after leaving which university he travelled abroad, and on his return devoted himself to mathematical pursuits and theology. In the former he acquired great celebrity by the invention of logarithms, and the contrivance of a mechanical method of computation, called Napier's bones or rods. As a theological writer he distinguished himself by a curious book on the Apocalypse. Died 3 April, 1617. His other works are, Logarithmorum canonis descriptio; Mirifici Logarithmorum canonis constructio; Rabdologia, seu numerationis per Virgulas. A Life of him, containing an account of the invention of logarithms, was published by Mark Napier in 1834.

NAPIER, MACVEY, a Scotch writer, born 12 April, 1776. He was appointed professor of conveyancing in the university of Edinburgh 1825. His literary career prominently commenced in 1825, when he succeeded Jeffrey as editor of the 'Edinburgh Review.' Afterwards he undertook the superintendence of the seventh edition of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica;' and he also published 'Remarks illustrative of the Scope and Influence of the Philosophical Writings of Lord Bacon,' 1818, and some treatises on Scotch law. Died at Edinburgh 11 Feb., 1847.

NAPIER, Sir WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK, K.C.B., a British general, younger brother of Sir Charles James Napier, was born at Castletown, Celbridge, Ireland, 17 Dec. 1785. He entered the army 1800, and served with great distinction, particularly in the Peninsular war. He was lieutenant-governor of Guernsey 1842-48, and in 1859 attained the rank of general. His fame rests mainly on his literary works, especially the 'History of the Peninsular War,' 6 vols., 1828-40. Among his other publications are the 'Conquest of Scinde;' 'History of General Sir Charles Napier's Administration of Scinde;' 'English Battles and Sieges in the Peninsula;' 'Life and Opinions of Sir Charles Napier.' Died at Clapham, 12 Feb., 1860.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE I. was born 15 Aug., 1769, at Ajaccio, in Corsica. His father was a notary who died in the prime of life, leaving a widow with a large family to subsist on a very precarious pittance. Napoleon was brought up in the military school at Brienne, where he applied himself chiefly to the engineering department. At the commencement of the revolution he was a lieutenant, and in that capacity served at the siege of Toulon. Barras was now his friend; and, under his patronage, he went to Italy, at the beginning of 1794, as general of artillery. The successes which followed increased his reputation, and he soon obtained the chief command. The battle of Lodi (12 May, 1796) raised him still higher; and the progress of the French arms from this period spread the fame of Bonaparte over all Europe. It would take a volume to enumerate the actions in which he was engaged. They are the subjects of history; and, therefore, we must confine the present sketch to a few prominent points. After the battle of Lodi the French seized Leghorn, which was followed by the capture of Mantua and war with the Pope, who was compelled to submit to the terms imposed on him by the conqueror. After this a negotiation with the Archduke Charles took place, which produced the treaty of Leoben. Bonaparte now attacked and captured Venice, which was followed by the peace of Campo Formio. A new scene of operations next opened in a distant part of the world. On 20 May, 1798, a French armament, consisting of 300 sail of ships, departed from Toulon, and after taking Malta, anchored in the vicinity of Alexandria in Egypt, where Bonaparte landed on the 2nd of July. The city was soon taken, and the army marched towards Cairo; but the Mamelukes mustered in considerable force, and brought on the battle of the Pyramids, in which they were defeated with great slaughter on the 21st, and two days afterwards the French entered the capital. They had not been long there, however, before their spirits were damped by the intelligence that their whole naval force was annihilated by the English, under the command of Admiral Nelson. The consequences of this victory were soon seen in the changes which took place throughout Europe. The Ottoman Porte issued a proclamation, stating that 'a man named Bonaparte, calling himself a French general, had in that capacity invaded the Turkish province of Egypt. Some of his emissaries,' it was added in this memorial, 'have pretended to persuade the people of that country that they have been sent by Mahomet to give them liberty, and make their religion universal over the earth; but they have answered that Mahomet does not authorize injustice, and that they can place no faith in the promises of those who have denied their God, and renounced their own prophet.' The charge was true enough, for Napoleon changed his name to that of Ali, and even declared publicly that he was a true Mussulman, sent by the Prophet to deliver Egypt. The French general, it must be owned, made the best of his situation, and took great pains in securing the footing which he had acquired; but while he was employed in forming establishments in Cairo, he was apprised of the hostile operations of the old Pacha of Acre, in Syria. Thither, therefore, Bonaparte repaired with a large force, and after capturing Jaffa, where he put about 3000 Turks to death in cold blood (17 March, 1799), he laid siege to Acre in full confidence of taking it; but, though the place was weak, it was defended by Sir Sydney Smith and a small body of English, who inspirited the Turks to such a degree, that the conqueror of Egypt, after several desperate attempts, in which he lost numbers of men, was obliged to recross the desert, mortified and enraged. At length he formed the sudden resolution of quitting this hostile shore secretly; and accordingly embarked on the 24th of Aug. in an armed vessel for France, where he landed in safety, and on the 10th of Oct. arrived at Paris. A new revolution was the result. Bonaparte on the 10th of Nov. entered the Council of Five Hundred, expelled the members, and assumed the title of Chief Consul. He began his political career by promulgating a new constitution, and offering peace to Austria, but without effect. He then wrote a letter to the king of England in the same pacific strain, but his proposition was declined, and hostilities were renewed with vigour on all sides. On 30 May, 1800, Bonaparte entered Milan, and re-established the Cisalpine republic; and on the 14th of the following month he gained the battle of Marengo. The victory produced an armistice for two months, and the First Consul retired to Paris. At the beginning of the following year the treaty of Luneville was signed, whereupon Bonaparte congratulated the French nation that the ambition of England alone continued to disturb the tranquillity of the world. To curb the proud islanders, therefore, vast preparations for invading the British shores were made all along the coast, from Bruges to Ushant; but, instead of being intimidated, the English seemed to acquire new energy from these gigantic menaces, and the whole kingdom was in motion to defend the country. But in the midst of the alarm a change in the British cabinet took place, negotiations for a peace were set on foot, and the treaty of Amiens was concluded 27 March, 1802. The same year he obtained the situation of First Consul, first for ten years, and next for life, with power to name his successor. Thus possessed of all but the title of sovereign, it was obvious that his aspiring hopes had no limits. Anxious as he had pretended to be for peace, it became plain from his conduct that he intended to maintain it no longer than it suited his ambitious views to do so. At the beginning of 1803 he quarrelled with England, war was suddenly renewed, and all British subjects throughout France were made prisoners, contrary to the practice of civilized nations. In 1804 Napoleon introduced a new civil code for the government of the country; but at the same time, in defiance of every principle of justice, he caused the Duc d'Enghien to be seized on neutral ground, conveyed to France, and shot at midnight in the wood of Vincennes. He now assumed the imperial title, and sent for the Pope to consecrate him in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris, on the 2nd of December; but when the service was about to be performed he snatched the crown from the altar and, standing erect, placed it on his own head. In the following year he played the same farce at Milan, on taking the title of king of Italy. A fresh war now broke out between the French and the Austrians, when Bonaparte compelled Mack to surrender Ulm, and on 13 Nov., 1805, he entered Vienna. On the 2nd of Dec. the battle of Austerlitz brought the war to a close, and peace was concluded between France and Austria, at Presburg, on the 26th of the same month. Early in the following year Napoleon adopted Eugène Beauharnais, the son of his wife Josephine by her former husband, as his successor to the crown of Italy. Soon afterwards he made his brother-in-law, Joachim Murat, Duke of Cleves; his own brother Joseph, king of Naples, and Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland. In the autumn Napoleon marched against the Prussians, who were defeated at the battle of Jena, and the French entered Berlin. This brought on a contest with Russia, which, after the battle of Friedland (14 June, 1807), ended in the treaty of Tilsit. In the following year Napoleon made war upon the Pope, and his troops took possession of Rome. About the same time his designs upon Spain began to be developed, Charles IV. being compelled to resign the throne in favour of his son Ferdinand, and Murat, at the head of a French army, entered Madrid. Bonaparte now obliged the queen of Spain to declare her son illegitimate, in consequence of which the old king resumed the regal title, and then abdicated it for ever in favour of his imperial protector, who caused his brother

Joseph to be proclaimed king. This roused the Spanish nation to arms, and war was declared against France. The English being invited to that country, Napoleon went thither in person, but did not long remain there, having other objects in contemplation. The new war between Austria and the French was decided by the battle of Wagram (8 July, 1809). In December following Napoleon separated himself from his wife Josephine, who had been consecrated empress by the Pope. Notwithstanding this, on 15 Feb., 1810, a marriage ceremony was celebrated between Napoleon and Maria Louisa, the daughter of the emperor of Austria. This connection was productive of a son, whose birth, on 20 March, 1811, was celebrated with great rejoicings. At this time affairs grew serious on the side of Spain, where the flame of patriotism, aided by British valour, proved more than a match for the politics and force of Bonaparte. To extricate himself from this embarrassment he provoked a war with Russia, and, putting the whole Confederation of the Rhine under requisition, marched, with half a million of men, for the north. His progress was marked by devastation till he reached Moscow, where he found a city prepared for destruction by its inhabitants; and soon afterwards the greater part of it was destroyed as a voluntary sacrifice. The winter now began to set in, and Bonaparte, after several ineffectual attempts to effect a peace or a truce, began to retrace his steps for Poland. But the march was impeded by a thousand dreadful disasters; and on his arrival at Smorgonie, in Poland, Napoleon abandoned the wreck of his army to pursue his course to Paris, where he arrived 19 Dec., 1812. The meteor that had so long blazed with splendour was now sinking; and it became evident that, instead of overturning other thrones, Napoleon had business enough on his hands to secure his own. In April, 1813, he marched with another army into Germany; but the Confederation was at an end, and many of those states which had hitherto been at the command of the French ruler were now in the rank of his enemies. At the beginning of August the emperor of Austria joined the coalition, and on the 27th Napoleon suffered a signal defeat at Dresden; but the decisive battle which sealed his fate was that of Leipsic, fought on the 18th Oct., when his army was nearly annihilated. Bonaparte now hastened to Paris and sent commissioners through all the provinces to levy a new conscription; and when desired by the senate to accept terms offered by the allies he dissolved the assembly. On 13 Feb., 1814, the Emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia crossed the Rhine at Basle, where they were met by the Emperor of Austria. Bonaparte, on his part, was not idle; but the decree which he issued at Troyes, threatening death to all Frenchmen bearing the insignia of the Bourbons, indicated desperation rather than fortitude. After a series of actions, in which the allies were successful, negotiations were opened at Chatillon; but such was the extravagance of the demands of Napoleon that they were broken off, and he was abandoned to his fate. On 31 March the allies entered Paris, and the senate decreed that the imperial throne was vacant. Bonaparte being now offered a retreat, chose the isle of Elba, the sovereignty of which was granted to him in perpetuity. Here, at least, he might have been happy; but his restless mind panted after his lost greatness. On 25 Feb., 1815, he escaped from Elba, and landed, with a few men, at Cannes, in the bay of St. Juan, on the 1st of March. His progress was so rapid that on the 21st he entered Paris, chiefly through the treachery of Ney, who, after promising to bring him a captive in an iron cage, went over to him with all his army. On resuming the government Napoleon endeavoured to separate the allies by overtures, and to affect a strain of uncommon moderation. His artifices, however, were seen through, and preparations were made to crush the usurpation and to prevent any further interruption of the peace of Europe. In the meantime Bonaparte having mustered a force sufficient to take the field, marched, on 12 July, to the frontiers, with the design of cutting off the English under Wellington and the Prussians commanded by Blucher in the vicinity of Brussels. On the 15th hostilities commenced near Charleroi, when the Prussians were repulsed, and Napoleon advanced to Fleurus. The next day were fought the battles of Ligny and Quatre Bras, when Blucher was compelled to fall back to Mont St. Guibert, and the British to Waterloo. On the 18th the great contest, in which so many destinies were involved, took place by a desperate attack upon the English, who for four hours remained steadily on the defensive against a vast disparity of force; but at length the Prussians came up, and the rout of the French became general. Napoleon was the first to escape; and on his arrival at Paris, finding that he could not abdicate in favour of his son, he hastened to Rochefort in order to embark for America. The English government had, however, anticipated his design, and blockaded the whole line of coast so completely that, finding it scarcely possible to elude their vigilance, he came to the resolution of surrendering himself, and accordingly was received on board the 'Bellerophon,' Captain Maitland, who bore away for Torbay. In the meantime Napoleon wrote a letter full of compliments to the prince regent, claiming his protection. To this epistle no attention was paid, and on the 7th Aug. he was transferred to the 'Northumberland,' which ship the next day sailed for St. Helena, where the eventful career of this extraordinary man terminated 5 May, 1821. His remains were taken to France by the Prince de Joinville Oct., 1840, and deposited in the Hotel des Invalides on the 15th Dec. in that year.

NAPOLEON II. (NAPOLEON FRANÇOIS BONAPARTE), son of Napoleon I. and of Maria Louisa of Austria, was born at Paris 20 March, 1811, and from his birth was styled king of Rome. After his father's first abdication (1814) he went with his mother to Vienna, where he was created duke of Reichstadt. Died 22 July, 1832.

NARBONNE-LARA, Count LOUIS DE, a statesman, born at Colorno, in the duchy of Parma, Aug., 1755; died at Torgau 17 Nov., 1813. He held the post of minister of war under Louis XVI., and after the revolution was employed in a diplomatic capacity by Napoleon.

NARDI, JAMES, a Florentine, born 1476; died about 1540. His principal work is a History of Florence.

NARES, EDWARD, D.D., received his education at Westminster School, and thence proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, but afterwards migrated to Merton College, where he was elected to a fellowship. He was collated to the rectory of Biddenden, Kent, 1798. In 1805 he preached the Bampton lecture, and in 1813 was appointed regius professor of modern history and modern languages. He died at Biddenden 20 Aug., 1841, aged 79. His works are, 'Remarks on the Version of the New Testament edited by the Unitarians,' 1810, and again 1814; 'Thinks I to Myself,' a novel, 1811; 'Elements of General History,' 1822, being a continuation of Professor Tytler's work; 'Heraldic Anomalies,' 2 vols., 1824; 'Memoirs of the Life and Administration of William Cecil, Lord Burghley,' 3 vols. 1828-31.

NARES, JAMES, Mus. D., was born at Stanwell, in Middlesex, in 1715. He was educated first under Mr. Gates, master of the royal choristers, and next under Dr. Pepusch. At the age of nineteen he became organist of York Cathedral, from whence he removed to London in 1755, on being appointed organist and composer to the king. The year following he was created doctor in music at Cambridge, and in 1757 obtained the place of master of the choristers, which he resigned in 1780. Dr. Nares published several esteemed compositions. Died 10 Feb., 1783.

NARES, ROBERT, F.R.S., F.S.A., son of Dr. James Nares, mentioned above, was born at York 9 June, 1753. From Westminster School he proceeded to Christ Church, Oxford, and after taking orders obtained several livings in succession. He was appointed preacher at Lincoln's Inn 1788; assistant librarian in the British Museum 1795-1807; archdeacon of Stafford 1800; vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, 1805-18; and finally rector of All Hallows, London Wall. His chief work is 'A Glossary; or a Collection of Words, Phrases, Names, and Allusions to Customs, Proverbs, &c., which have been thought to require illustration in the works of English authors,' 1822. Archdeacon Nares also published 'Elements of Orthoëpy;' Essays; and Sermons. He was the projector of, and the principal contributor to, the 'British Critic.' Died 23 March, 1829.

NARUSZEWICZ, ADAM STANISLAUS, a Polish historian and poet, born 1733; appointed bishop of Luck 1790; died at Janow 6 July, 1796.

NARVAEZ, RAMON MARIA, duke of Valentia, and prime minister of Spain, was born at Loja, in Granada, August, 1800. He entered the army at an early age, and took part in the war of liberation against Napoleon I. He afterwards made himself conspicuous by his abilities in the Carlist war, and was in consequence raised to the rank of brigadier. In 1840 he quarrelled with Espartero, and for several years was the prime mover in all the intrigues and plots of Queen Christina against her daughter Queen Isabella. From 1857 the Government of Spain was either in the hands of General O'Donnell or Marshal Narvaez. In 1865 the former was once more succeeded by General Narvaez, who remained prime minister till his decease on 23 April, 1868.

NARY, CORNELIUS, LL.D., a Catholic divine, born in the county of Kildare 1660, and died at Dublin 3 March, 1738. He published The New Testament translated from the Vulgate, with notes, 1705, 1718; A History of the World; and several controversial works.

NASH, JOHN, an English architect, born 1752; died 13 May, 1835. He is chiefly known as the author or promoter of the extensive improvements in the metropolis arising out of the formation of Regent Street and the Regent's Park. He also designed Buckingham Palace, the Haymarket Theatre, and the Pavilion at Brighton.

NASH, RICHARD, was born at Swansea 1674, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards had a pair of colours, but soon quitted the army and entered the Temple, though he never followed the law. A love of pleasure and gaming drew him, in 1704, to Bath, which city he contrived, by his excellent management, to render a place of fashionable resort. He was chosen master of the ceremonies, and was so much esteemed as to be called king of Bath; but commonly he was called, from the peculiarity of his dress, Beau Nash. Died 12 Feb., 1761.

NASH, THOMAS, a satirist, was born at Lowestoft, Suffolk, 1567, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, which he left after taking one degree, and then settled in London, where he died probably in 1601. He wrote three dramatic pieces, but was chiefly distinguished by the virulence of his pamphlets against Gabriel Harvey and Penry, who assumed the title of Martin Marprelate. His principal performance is 'Pierce Penniless,' published in 1589.—Athen. Cantab.

NASH, TREADWAY RUSSEL, an English clergyman, was born 1726, and took his degree of D.D. at Worcester College, Oxford, 1758. He was a man of fortune, and died at his seat in Worcestershire 26 Jan., 1811. Dr. Nash published 'Collections for a History of Worcestershire,' 2 vols. folio; a splendid edition of Hudibras, 3 vols. 4to.; and some papers in the Archæologia.

NASMITH, JAMES, D.D., was born at Norwich 1740, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1773 he was presented to the living of St. Mary Abchurch, which he exchanged for Snailwell, Cambridgeshire. His last preferment was the rectory of Leverington, in the Isle of Ely, where he died 16 Oct., 1808. Dr. Nasmith published 'A Catalogue of Bene't-college Library;' an edition of the 'Itineraries of Simon and William of Worcester;' and a new edition of Tanner's 'Notitia Monastica.'

NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, a landscape painter, was a native of Edinburgh. He studied painting in London, under Allan Ramsay, the son of the poet, and afterwards visited Italy. Having returned to his native city he commenced practising with great success as a portrait painter; but subsequently he devoted his attention almost exclusively to landscape. He died at Edinburgh 10 April, 1840, aged 83. His son Patrick, born 1786, also excelled as a landscape painter, but was cut off in the prime of life 17 Aug., 1831.

NATHAN, ISAAC, a rabbi of the fourteenth century, who compiled a Concordance of the Bible, which has been several times printed.

NATTER, JEAN MARC, a French painter, born at Paris 1685; died 1766.

NATTER, LAURENCE, an engraver of intaglios, was a native of Biberach, in Swabia, and died at St. Petersburg 27 Dec., 1763. He published a treatise on gems.

NAUDÉ, or NAUDÆUS, GABRIEL, a French writer, born at Paris 1600. He studied medicine at Padua, where he took his doctor's degree. After a considerable stay in Italy he returned to Paris, and became librarian to Cardinal Richelieu, on whose death he entered the service of Mazarin; but when that minister was banished Naudé went to Sweden as librarian to Queen Christina. His stay there, however, was short, and he died at Abbeville 29 July, 1653. His principal works are, Avis pour dresser une Bibliothèque; Apologie pour les grands hommes soupçonnés de Magie; Bibliographia Politica; Hieronymi Cardani vita; Jugement de tout ce qui a été imprimé contre le cardinal Mazarin; Naudæana.

NAUDÉ, PHILIPPE, a mathematician, born at Metz 1654; died at Berlin March, 1729.

NAUDET, THOMAS CHARLES, a landscape painter, born 1774 at Paris, where he died 16 July, 1810.

NAUNTON, Sir ROBERT, was born in Suffolk, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, from whence he removed to a fellowship at Trinity Hall. After having been employed on some diplomatic concerns in Scotland and France he returned to the university, and in 1601 was elected public orator, in which capacity he attracted the notice of James I., who made him master of the Requests, surveyor of the Court of Wards, and secretary of state. His last preferment was that of master of the Court of Wards, which office he resigned in 1633. His 'Fragmenta Regalia' contains many curious particulars of the court of Queen Elizabeth. Died 27 March, 1635.

NAVAGERO, ANDREW, Naugerius, a Latin poet, born at Venice 1483; died at Blois 1529.

NAVARETE, FERDINAND, a Spanish friar of the order of St. Dominic, served on the Chinese mission, 1659-72; became archbishop of St. Domingo 1678; died 1689. He wrote an account of China, of which there is an English translation in Churchill's Voyages.

NAVARETE, JUAN HERNANDEZ, a Spanish painter, born at Logroño about 1524. He was deaf and dumb from his childhood, whence he obtained the name of 'El Mudo;' notwithstanding which he attained such excellence in his art as to be called the Spanish Titian. Died 1577.

NAYLER, JAMES, a Quaker, born at Ardsley, in Yorkshire, about 1616. He became a soldier in the Parliament army, but quitted the service 1649, and in 1651 attached himself to George Fox. Soon afterwards, however, he pretended to inspiration, and committed such extravagances that the Parliament condemned him to be whipped, branded in the forehead, and have his tongue bored through with a hot iron. This barbarous sentence was carried into execution at Bristol, after which Nayler was removed to London, and confined in Bridewell, where he remained till 1660, when he was set at liberty. He died the same year, on his journey into Yorkshire.

NEAL, DANIEL, was born in London 14 Dec., 1678. After receiving a private education he went to Leyden, and on his return to London became minister to a dissenting congregation, which met first at Loriners' Hall and next in Jewin Street. Mr. Neal published, in 1720, 'A History of New England,' 2 vols., for which he received the degree of master of arts from one of the colleges in that country; but his greatest work is 'A History of the Puritans,' 4 vols., which was answered by Bishop Madox and Dr. Zachary Grey. A new edition of Mr. Neal's history was published in 1797, 5 vols. 8vo. Died 4 April, 1743.

NEALE, or NEILE, RICHARD, an English prelate, born in Westminster March 1561-2. From Westminster School he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, and after taking orders obtained in succession a large number of benefices. He became master of the Savoy, 1605; dean of Westminster the same year; clerk of the closet to James I. and Charles I.; bishop of Rochester 1608; of Lichfield 1610; of Lincoln 1613; of Durham 1617; of Winchester 1627; and archbishop of York 1632. Died 31 Oct., 1640. He is the supposed author of a book entitled 'Spalato's Shiftings in Religion,' 1624, against Marc Ant. de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato.

NEANDER, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, a Protestant divine and church historian, born at Göttingen, of Jewish parents, 17 Jan., 1789. After having adopted the Lutheran religion, he studied divinity at Halle and Göttingen, and became, in 1813, professor of ecclesiastical history at Berlin, where he continued to labour as teacher and writer, with very little interruption, till his death on 14 July, 1850. His great work is his 'General History of the Christian Religion and Church,' from the close of the apostolic age to the council of Basle in 1430. This has been translated into English, as have also most of the following works by Neander: The Emperor Julian and his Times, 1812; St. Bernard and his Times, 1813; a treatise on Gnosticism, 1818; St. Chrysostom and the Church of his Time, 1822; 'Antignosticus, the Spirit of Tertullian,' 1825; History of the Apostolic Age, 1832; 'Life of Christ,' in refutation of Strauss, 1837; Memorials of Christian Life.

NECKAM, or NEQUAM, ALEXANDER, an English monk of the order of St. Augustine, who was educated in the abbey of St. Albans. He completed his studies at Paris, and died abbat of Cirencester in 1217. His principal work is a Latin poem, 'De Laude Sapientiæ Divinæ.'

NECKER, JAMES, a celebrated statesman, was the son of Charles Frederic Necker, professor of civil law at Geneva, and born there 30 Sept., 1732. At the age of fifteen he was placed in a banking-house at Paris, after which he became partner with Thellusson, on whose death he established a house of his own, in conjunction with his brother and two others. In 1776 he was appointed director, and soon after comptroller-general of the finances. This last office he held five years, and then published an account of his administration, which was attacked by M. Calonne, and defended by Necker, who was in consequence exiled to his country seat, where he wrote his treatise 'On the Importance of Religious Opinions.' In 1788 he was restored to his post, in which capacity he advised the convocation of the states-general, a measure that accelerated the revolution. The year following, he was ordered to leave the kingdom, on which he retired to Copet, in Switzerland, where he died 30 March, 1804. Besides his political works, he published 'A Course of Religious Morality,' and a novel on the 'Consequences of a Single Fault.'

NECTON, HUMPHREY, a Carmelite, first of Norwich and afterwards of Cambridge, died 1303. He was of great eminence for his learning and abilities.

NEEDHAM, JOHN TURBERVILLE, a Catholic divine, was born in London 10 Sept., 1713, and educated at Douay, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of natural philosophy. After presiding some time over a Catholic seminary in Hampshire, he was appointed professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon; but he soon returned to his native country, and became a travelling tutor to some young noblemen. He finally settled at Brussels, as director of the imperial academy, and died there 30 Dec., 1781. Mr. Needham was a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies of London, and also of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Besides some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, he published, in French, New Microscopical Discoveries; On Microscopical Bodies, and the Generation of Organized ones, 3 vols. He was engaged in a remarkable controversy respecting the Egyptian origin of the Chinese, which conclusion he drew from some characters on a bust at Turin. The idea, however, was soon exploded.

NEEDHAM, MARCHAMONT, a political writer, born at Burford, Oxfordshire, Aug., 1620. On leaving the university of Oxford he obtained the situation of usher in Merchant Taylors' School, which place he resigned, 1642, to become a writer to an attorney, but soon quitted that employment for politics. He began his career in this line by a weekly paper, called 'Mercurius Britannicus,' on the side of Parliament, which gained him popularity. After carrying on this journal about four years he espoused the royal cause, in a paper called 'Mercurius Pragmaticus,' for which he narrowly escaped being hanged by his old employers. He now turned again, and conducted a republican paper, under the title of 'Mercurius Politicus.' At the Restoration Needham fled the kingdom, but contrived to obtain his pardon, and then practised physic till his death in 1678. His other works are not worth notice.

NEEFS, PETER, a painter of architectural subjects, born at Antwerp 1570; died in 1651, leaving a son in the same line, who is called the Young Neefs.

NEELE, HENRY, an English poet and novelist, born 1798; died by his own hand 9 Feb., 1828; in a fit of insanity. He was a son of a map-engraver in the Strand, and practised in London as a solicitor. Among his publications are, 'Pain's Dramatic Scenes;' the 'Romance of History,' 3 vols. 12mo.; and a series of tales relating to persons mentioned in the annals of this country.

NEER, ARNOLD VAN DER, a landscape painter, born at Amsterdam 1619; died 1683. His son, Eglon Hendrick Van Der Neer (b. 1643; d. 1703), painted portraits and conversation pieces.

NEILE, RICHARD, Archbishop of York. See NEALE.

NEILSON, JAMES BEAUMONT, F.R.S., a Scotch engineer, invented the hot blast, a process which completely revolutionised the iron trade. Born 1792; died 18 Jan., 1865.

NELSON, HORATIO, Viscount Nelson, was the fourth son of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk, and born there 29 Sept., 1758. He was educated first at Norwich, and next at North Walsham; but in his twelfth year he became a midshipman under his uncle, captain Suckling, of the 'Raisonable.' Soon after this he sailed to the West Indies in a merchant ship, and on his return was admitted on board the 'Carcass,' one of the vessels sent on an expedition to the North Pole, under the order of captain Phipps. He went next to the East Indies. In 1777 he obtained the rank of lieutenant, and in 1779 that of post-captain, when he was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke, in which ship he sailed to the West Indies, where he distinguished himself in an enterprise on the Spanish main. After the peace of 1783 he commanded the 'Boreas' frigate, stationed for the protection of trade at the Leeward Islands, and while there he married Mrs. Nesbit, the widow of a physician. On the commencement of the revolutionary war he was appointed to the 'Agamemnon' of 64 guns, and was placed under the orders of Lord Hood in the Mediterranean, where he displayed great bravery on many occasions, particularly at Toulon and the siege of Bastia, in which last service he lost an eye. In 1796 he hoisted his broad pendant as commodore on board 'La Minerve,' in which frigate he fell in with the Spanish fleet, from whom he escaped, and conveyed the intelligence to Admiral Jervis, off Cape St. Vincent, on the 13th of February, 1797. The same evening the enemy appeared, and Nelson, shifting his flag to the 'Captain,' had a principal part in the glory of that day, for which he received the order of the Bath, and was made a rear-admiral. In this capacity he commanded the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz, where, on the 3rd of July, he made an attack upon the Spanish gun-boats, and on the 15th of the same month he was detached against Santa Cruz in Teneriffe. This enterprise however failed, after a fierce contest, at the close of which Nelson received a shot in the right elbow, which rendered amputation necessary. Notwithstanding this, he hoisted his flag in the 'Vanguard' in April, 1798, and rejoined Earl St. Vincent, by whom he was despatched to the Mediterranean, to observe the armament then preparing at Toulon. While thus employed his ship was so much damaged as to be obliged to bear away for Sardinia. In the mean time the French fleet sailed, and having taken Malta, proceeded for Egypt; whither they were followed by Nelson; but not being able to gain any intelligence of the object of his pursuit, he returned to Sicily. His stay at Syracuse was short, and on the 1st of August he had the satisfaction of descrying the enemy moored in the bay of Aboukir. A bloody engagement ensued, in which the British were completely victorious, and two only of the French ships escaped. For this achievement, Nelson was made baron of the Nile, rewarded with a pension, and covered with honours by different sovereigns as well as his own. He next rendered an important service in the restoration of the king of Naples; on which occasion, however, he tarnished his reputation by trying and executing the Neapolitan admiral Caracciolí. In 1800 he landed in England, where he soon after separated from his lady through an unfortunate attachment to the wife of Sir William Hamilton. The year following he added to his renown as a naval hero by the destruction of the Danish ships and batteries at Copenhagen, for which he was created a viscount. His next enterprise was an attempt upon the flotilla in the harbour of Boulogne; but after the loss of Captain Parker, and many other brave men, the English ships were under the necessity of relinquishing their object. On the renewal of hostilities, Lord Nelson was appointed to command the fleet in the Mediterranean, where for nearly two years he was employed in the blockade of Toulon. At length the French fleet escaped out of port March 30, 1805, and being joined by the Spanish squadron, proceeded to the West Indies, whither Nelson followed them with the utmost expedition; but after a most extraordinary pursuit, the flying enemy returned to Europe, and got safe into Cadiz. The English admiral, as soon as he had recruited himself, sailed for Cadiz, off which harbour he arrived Sept. 29; and on the 21st of the following month was fought the battle of Trafalgar, previous to which he gave his last order, 'England expects every man to do his duty.' His own example went with the injunction; but, unfortunately, by exposing his person too much, and neglecting to take off the insignia of his rank, he became an object to the marksmen placed in the tops of the ship with which he was engaged. In the middle of the engagement, a musket-ball struck him on the left shoulder, and passing through the spine, lodged in the muscles of the back. He fell, and said to his captain, 'Hardy, I believe they have done it at last; my back-bone is shot through.' He lived just long enough to be acquainted with the number of ships that had been captured, and his last words were, 'I have done my duty; I praise God for it!' His body was brought to England, and buried in the cathedral of St. Paul's, where a monument has since been erected to his memory. An earldom was created in the person of his brother, which title descends with an estate granted by Parliament to the issue of his sisters.

NELSON, ROBERT, a learned and pious writer, born in London 22 June, 1656, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was strongly attached to James II., and he continued to communicate with the nonjurors till the death of Bishop Lloyd, when he returned to the established church. He lived on terms of intimacy with Archbishop Tillotson, and was the zealous promoter of all works of charity. His principal works are: 'A Companion for the Festivals and Fasts;' 'Great Duty of frequenting the Christian Sacrifice;' 'The Practice of True Devotion;' 'Life of Bishop Bull;' 'Letter to Dr. Clarke on the Trinity;' 'Address to Persons of Quality and Estate, on the Means of doing Good.' Died 16 Jan., 1714–15.

NENNIUS, a British historian, and abbat of Bangor in the seventh century, who, when the monks of his house were massacred, fled for refuge to Chester. His work entitled 'Historia Britonum' is inserted in Gale's Hist. Brit. Scrip. 1691.

NEPER. See NAPIER.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, a Latin historian who died in the reign of Augustus. He lived on terms of friendship with Cicero and Atticus. The only work of his extant is the 'Vitæ excellentium Imperatorum,' containing the lives of twenty-two celebrated generals. It has been often printed.

NERI, ST. PHILIP. See PHILIP.

NESSE, CHRISTOPHER, a Puritan divine, born 26 Dec., 1621, at North Cowes, Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. On taking orders he obtained the living of Cottingham, in his native county, but being deprived of it at the Restoration for nonconformity, he officiated to a dissenting congregation in London, where he died 26 Dec., 1705. His principal work is entitled 'The History and Mystery of the Old and New Testament,' 4 vols., 1690.

NESSELRODE, CHARLES ROBERT, Count VON, a celebrated diplomatist, born 14 Dec. 1780, at Lisbon, where his father was Russian ambassador. He was appointed secretary of embassy at Berlin 1805; transferred to the Hague 1805; and appointed councillor of the Russian embassy at Paris 1807; but he returned to St. Petersburg when the formidable Russo-Austrian coalition exploded. Nesselrode gained a complete ascendency over the Emperor Alexander I., whom he followed to France 1814. He signed the treaty of the Quadruple Alliance, and afterwards the convention by which Marmont surrendered Paris to the allied troops Subsequently he acted as the plenipotentiary of Russia at the congress of Vienna, and in that capacity was instrumental in accomplishing the dismemberment of Poland. It was Nesselrode who planned the Holy Alliance, which virtually made the Czar of Russia the master of all the potentates of the continent of Europe, by giving him the right to interfere on all occasions 'for the defence of religion, peace, and justice,' and the 'suppression of the revolutionary spirit.' After the death of Alexander I. Nesselrode gained the confidence of his successor Nicholas, but he retired from office soon after the accession of Alexander II. He died at St. Petersburg 23 March, 1862.

NESTORIUS, the founder of a sect, was born in Syria, in the fifth century. On entering into the priesthood he became so popular for his eloquence that Theodosius nominated him, in 428, patriarch of Constantinople; in which station he displayed great zeal against the Arians and Novatians. He also opposed those Christians who differed from the Catholic practice in the celebration of Easter. At last he fell under censure himself for affirming that the Blessed Virgin Mary is not the mother of God. For this he was condemned in the council of Ephesus, deprived of his see, and banished. He died in 439. His followers continue to be numerous in the east, and are organized under a patriarch.

NETSCHER, GASPAR, a painter, born at Prague 1639; died 1684. He had two sons, Theodore and Constantine, who were both good painters of portrait. The first died in 1732, and his brother in 1722.

NETTLETON, THOMAS, M.D., a physician of Halifax, Yorkshire, was born at Dewsbury in that county 1683; and died 9 Jan., 1742. He wrote 'Thoughts concerning Virtue and Happiness,' and an 'Account of the success of inoculating the Smallpox.'

NEUHOFF. See THEODORE.

NEUMANN, CASPAR, a chemist, was born at Zullichau, in Germany, 1682, and prosecuted his studies at Halle, after which he was appointed professor of chemistry in the Royal College, Berlin. The king of Prussia conferred on him the dignity of aulic counsellor. Died 20 Oct. 1737. His chemical works were published in English 1759.

NEUMANN, KARL FRIEDRICH, a German professor, author of a 'History of the East India Company,' and a 'History of the United States,' died at Berlin 17 March, 1870, aged 77. He at one time held a professorship, but was compelled to resign it in consequence of his liberal opinions.

NEVE, TIMOTHY, D.D., was born at Spalding 12 Oct., 1724, and educated at Oxford. He was appointed Margaret professor of divinity in that university 1783, and a prebendary of Worcester the same year. Died 1 Jan., 1798. Dr. Neve published some sermons and 'Animadversions on Philips's Life of Cardinal Pole.'

NEVERS, LOUIS DE GONZAGUE, Duc DE, a celebrated general, born 1539, being son of Frederick II. duke of Mantua. He sided with the League during the wars of religion, and greatly distinguished himself, especially in Poictou 1588. Afterwards he espoused the cause of Henry IV., whose reconciliation with the Catholic Church he promoted; and at a later period he was sent against the duke of Parma in Picardy. Died 23 Oct., 1595. His Memoirs were published 1665.

NEVILE, or NEVILLE, HENRY, a republican writer, born in Berkshire 1620, and educated at Merton College, Oxford. In the Rebellion he took the side of parliament, and was elected a member of the council of state; but on the usurpation of Cromwell he gave up his seat. Died 20 Sept., 1694. He published Machiavel's works, and a piece entitled 'Plato Redivivus, or a Dialogue concerning Government,' which Hollis reprinted in 1763.

NEVILLE, ALEXANDER, was born in Kent 1544. After graduating M.A. at Cambridge he became secretary to Archbishop Parker and his successor, Grindal. He paraphrased Seneca's Œdipus, and wrote in Latin an account of the insurrection under Kett. Died 4 Oct., 1614. His brother, Thomas Neville, D.D., who became dean of Canterbury, and was an eminent benefactor to Trinity College, Cambridge, died 2 May, 1615.

NEVILLE, EDMUND, a Jesuit, was a native of Lancashire. He studied in the English college at Rome, after which he was sent upon the English mission. He died in gaol in London 18 July, 1648, æt. 42. He published 'The Palm of Christian Fortitude, or the glorious combats of the Christians in Japan,' 1630, and prepared for the press 'The Life of St. Augustine, Doctor of the Church.'

NEVILLE, EDWARD, an English Jesuit, whose real name was Scarisbrick, was a native of Lancashire. He became one of James II.'s chaplains and preachers; and died 19 Feb., 1709. Besides sermons, he published the Life of Lady Warner 1690, and again 1692.

NEWBURGH, WILLIAM OF. See WILLIAM.

NEWCASTLE, HENRY PELHAM FIENNES PELHAM CLINTON, 5th duke OF, K.G., was born 1811, and educated at Oxford. He entered the House of Commons in the Tory interest 1832, being then known as Lord Lincoln. When Sir Robert Peel returned to power in 1841, his lordship was constituted first commissioner of woods and forests, a situation which in 1846 he exchanged for that of chief secretary for Ireland. He succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father, the fourth duke, 1851. Lord Aberdeen appointed him colonial secretary 1853, but on the breaking out of the Crimean war in the following year he was transferred to the war department. However, in discharging the duties of that important office he failed to give satisfaction to the public; and accordingly he resigned in 1855, and was succeeded by Lord Panmure. When the second coalition government was formed the duke was again appointed secretary of state for the colonies, and he held that post till a few months previous to his death, which occurred 18 Oct. 1864.

NEWCASTLE, MARGARET CAVENDISH, duchess OF, second wife of William, the first duke, was the daughter of Sir Charles Lucas, of St. John's, near Colchester, where she was born. When very young she had the misfortune to lose her father. In 1643 she went to Oxford, and was appointed one of the maids of honour to the queen, whom she accompanied to France, where the marquis of Newcastle married her in 1645. While abroad she wrote several of her works, which consist of no fewer than ten printed folios, besides manuscripts. She was most extravagantly praised in her lifetime for these performances, not only by servile authors, but even by learned societies and universities. She died at the close of 1673, and was buried in Westminster Abbey 7 Jan., 1673-4. Her publications are—'The World's Olio;' 'Nature's Picture, drawn by Fancy's Pencil to the Life' 'Orations of divers sorts;' Plays; 'Philosophical and Physical Opinions;' 'Observations upon Experimental Philosophy;' 'Philosophical Letters;' 'Poems and Phancies;' 'Sociable Letters;' and a Life of her husband.

NEWCASTLE, THOMAS PELHAM HOLLES, duke of, was employed in several high offices during the reign of George II. He retired from the administration soon after the accession of George III.; and died 1768.

NEWCASTLE, WILLIAM CAVENDISH, duke OF, was the son of Sir Charles Cavendish, and born 1592. James I. made him knight of the Bath, Baron Ogle, and Viscount Mansfield. Charles I. created him earl of Newcastle, and appointed him governor to the prince of Wales. When the king went to Scotland in 1639 he was most splendidly entertained by the earl of Newcastle at his seat at Welbeck. This feast cost near 5000*l.*, but it was far exceeded by another which his lordship gave to their majesties, the expense of which is said to have been more than 14,000*l.* Besides all this he contributed 10,000*l.*, in addition to a troop of horse, towards Charles I.'s northern expedition. He behaved with great spirit and loyalty during the civil wars, till the ruin of the royal cause obliged him to go abroad. After the Restoration he was created duke of Newcastle. Died 25 Dec., 1676. He wrote several plays and poems, but his folio treatise on Horsemanship is the best known of his works.

NEWCOMB, THOMAS, was born in Hertfordshire 1675, and educated at Oxford; after which he became rector of Stopham, Sussex. He also kept an academy at Hackney. He died about 1766. Dr. Newcomb wrote several poems, some of which possess considerable merit.

NEWCOME, WILLIAM, a learned prelate, born at Barton-le-Clay, Bedfordshire, 10 April 1729. He was educated at Abingdon School, whence he removed first to Pembroke College, and next to Hertford College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1765 he accumulated his degrees in divinity, and was appointed chaplain to the earl of Hertford, viceroy of Ireland, who promoted him to the bishopric of Dromore, from whence, in 1775, he was translated to Ossory; in 1779 to Waterford; and in 1795 to Armagh. He died at Dublin 11 Jan., 1800. His works are—A Harmony of the Gospels; Observations on our Lord's Conduct as a Divine Instructor; An Attempt towards an improved Version, a Metrical Arrangement, and an Explanation of the twelve Minor Prophets; An Attempt towards an improved Version of the Prophet Ezekiel; A Review of the chief Difficulties in the History of the Resurrection; An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations; An Attempt towards Revising our English Translation of the Greek Scriptures, or the New Covenant of Jesus Christ, 2 vols.

NEWCOURT, RICHARD, one of the proctors of the Court of Arches, and registrar of the diocese of Canterbury, died at Greenwich Feb. 1716. He published 'Repertorium Ecclesiasticum Parochiale Londinense,' 2 vols. folio, 1708.

NEWDIGATE, Sir ROGER, Bart., of Arbury, Warwickshire, was born 30 May, 1719; educated at Westminster School and University College, Oxford; represented Middlesex in the House of Commons 1751-80; died 25 Nov., 1806. He was a liberal benefactor to the university of Oxford, and gave to it 1000*l.*, to be vested in the funds, for an nnual prize for English verses on sculpture, paintng, and architecture.

NEWPORT, GEORGE, F.R.S., a naturalist, was he son of a wheelwright at Canterbury, and having taste for natural history, became the curator of he museum in that city. He next studied medicine in University College, London, and settled s a surgeon in the West End of the metropolis, ut failed to obtain an extensive practice, as his ttention was almost entirely engrossed by microcopical investigations and philosophical pursuits. The results of his researches were published in the Philosophical Transactions.' Died in London April, 1854.

NEWPORT, MAURICE, an English Jesuit, who lied in London 4 Dec., 1687, æt. 76, was the uthor of a Latin poem, much admired at the ime of its publication, entitled 'Votum candidum, eu Poema congratulatorium, Carolo II. Regi Anliæ dedicatum,' 1669.

NEWTON, GILBERT STUART, R.A., a painter, orn at Halifax, Nova Scotia, 2 Nov., 1795; died t Chelsea, England, 3 Aug., 1835. Among his orks are 'Shylock and Jessica;' 'Yorick and the Grisette;' 'The Abbat Boniface;' 'Macheath;' nd 'Abelard in his Study.'

NEWTON, Sir ISAAC, the prince of philosophers, as born 25 Dec., 1642, at Woolsthorpe, in the arish of Colsterworth, Lincolnshire. His father ied before the birth of this child, and the widow ook for her second husband a clergyman of the ame of Smith, by whom she had one son and wo daughters. Isaac was educated at Grantham chool, where he displayed his genius in the conruction of several curiosities, particularly a windill and wooden clock. He had also a turn for rawing, and took several portraits from the life. lis mother, on the death of her second husband, ook him home to attend the farm; but finding ne business ill managed, she sent him to school gain, and, in 1660, to Trinity College, Cambridge. ere he studied the mathematics with great dilience, and in 1664 made the discovery of the ature of light and colours. The next year, being bliged to leave the university on account of the ague, he conceived the idea of the system of ravitation, by seeing an apple fall from a tree in s garden. Thus, from the most simple occurnce, his penetrating mind was enabled to trace e principle which keeps the planets in motion nd preserves the universe in order. In 1667 he btained a fellowship in his college; and two years erwards Dr. Barrow resigned to him the mathetatical professorship. In 1671 he was chosen ellow of the Royal Society; and in 1687 he was ne of the delegates appointed to defend the prileges of the university of Cambridge before the igh Commission court, where he conducted the ause so ably that James II. dropped his design of truding a monk upon that learned body for a egree. The year following Mr. Newton was chosen o parliament for the university, as he also was in 1701. In 1696 he was made warden of the nt, in the discharge of which office he saved country above eighty thousand pounds by the provement of the coinage. In 1699 he was apnted master and worker of the Mint, which nation he held till his death. On being chosen sident of the Royal Society, in 1703, he resigned professorship; and in 1705 he received the nour of knighthood from Queen Anne. He enyed his faculties to the close of his long life. His temper also was remarkably even, and he might almost be said to have carried patience too far, particularly in suffering other men to run away with the merit of his discoveries. This would have been the case in regard to the invention of fluxions if some of his friends had not interposed and asserted the claim of their illustrious countryman. Sir Isaac was not only a philosopher but a Christian, and spent much of his time in elucidating the sacred Scriptures; nor could anything discompose his mind so much as light and irreverent expressions on the subject of religion. He died, without a will, March 20, 1727; and on the 28th his body lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, from whence it was conveyed to Westminster Abbey, the pall being borne by the lord chancellor, two dukes, and three earls. A monument was afterwards erected to his memory; and his statue, by Roubiliac, has been placed in Trinity College. An entire edition of his works was published by Bishop Horsley, in 5 vols. 4to. Of his 'Principia,' published first in 1687, the best edition is that by the Jesuits, Le Seur and Jacquier, 4 vols. 4to. There is a good English translation of it by Motte, in 2 vols. 8vo. Sir Isaac also left an immense number of manuscripts, of which two only have been published, 'The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms,' and 'Observations on the Prophecies.' His Correspondence with Professor Cotes was published by J. Edleston, 1850.

NEWTON, JOHN, D.D., was born at Oundle, Northamptonshire, 1622, and educated at Oxford. He died rector of Ross, Herefordshire, 25 Dec., 1678. Dr. Newton published 'Astronomia Britannica;' 'Trigonometria Britannica;' and other works on mathematical subjects.

NEWTON, JOHN, was born in London 24 July, 1725. He was bred to the sea under his father, who was master of a merchant vessel. Afterwards he sailed in the Guinea trade, and led a very irregular life for some years; but at last he grew both serious and studious. By indefatigable diligence he attained a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, and in 1764 was ordained on the curacy of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, where he became acquainted with Cowper the poet and Mr. Thornton the banker, the latter of whom presented him, in 1779, to the living of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard Street. He died 31 Dec., 1807. His works are, A Narrative of his own Life; a Review of Ecclesiastical History; Olney Hymns, in which are some by his friend Cowper; Omicron's letters on religious subjects; Cardiphonia, or the Utterance of the Heart; The Messiah, a series of sermons.

NEWTON, RICHARD, D.D., was born in Buckinghamshire about 1676; became principal of Hart Hall, Oxford, 1710; died 21 April, 1753. In 1740, at a great expense, he erected Hart Hall into a college. His works are, University Education; Pluralities indefensible; The Characters of Theophrastus; Sermons.

NEWTON, SAMUEL, alderman of Cambridge, died 21 Sept., 1718, aged 89. He left in MS. a curious diary, of which much use has been made by Mr. Charles Henry Cooper, in his 'Annals of Cambridge.' Two volumes of Newton's MS. collections are in the Harleian library.

NEWTON, THOMAS, a schoolmaster and physician, was born at Butley, Cheshire, and educated at Macclesfield School, from whence he removed to Trinity College, Oxford, and afterwards to Queen's College, Cambridge. On entering into orders he became master of Macclesfield School, where also he practised physic; but in 1583 he obtained the living of Little Ilford, in Essex. He died May, 1607. His principal works are, History of the Saracens; Approved Medicines and Cordial Precepts; Illustrium aliquot Anglorum encomia; The Herbal to the Bible, translated from Lemnius. He was one of the most elegant Latin poets of his age, and wrote a large number of the commendatory verses which it was then the fashion to prefix to printed works.—Athen. Cantab.

NEWTON, THOMAS, an English prelate, born at Lichfield 1704. He was educated at the grammar school of his native city, and next at Westminster, from whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1744 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside, and the year following took his doctor's degree. In 1749 he published an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, with notes, and the life of the author; which was followed by the Paradise Regained, in a similar form. In 1754 appeared the first volume of his Dissertations on the Prophecies, which he completed in 1758. He was made prebendary of Westminster in 1757, and soon after precentor of York, both which preferments he resigned in 1761, on his promotion to the see of Bristol and a canon residentiaryship of St. Paul's. In 1768 he was made dean of St. Paul's. He died 14 Feb., 1782, and the same year his works were printed, with a memoir of the author, written by himself, in 2 vols.

NEWTON, Sir WILLIAM JOHN, an eminent miniature painter, born 1785, in London, where he died 22 Jan., 1869.

NEY, MICHEL, duke of Elchingen and prince of Moskva, a French marshal, born at Sarrelouis 10 Jan., 1769. After receiving a tolerably good education he was placed with a public notary, but this sedentary occupation did not suit him; so after some time he ran away and enlisted in a regiment of hussars. He was made a lieutenant 1793, and the following year was appointed by General Kleber to the head of a body of 500 partisans. The men he commanded were destined to very hazardous and enterprising services, and Ney, as their leader, acquired the surname of the Indefatigable. In three or four years he fought his way up to the command of a division, and in Nov., 1799, he put the seal to his celebrity by a plan which he laid and successfully executed for taking the city of Mannheim. This achievement procured him the rank of marshal, and soon afterwards he crossed the Rhine into Alsace and fought a well-contested battle, in memory of which he was subsequently created duke of Elchingen. His station was on the right of the grand army, and his opponent the Archduke John, whom, after a series of brilliant successes, he chased from the Tyrol, and whose rear he cut to pieces at the foot of Mount Brenner just as Napoleon conquered at Austerlitz. Such indeed had been his conduct during the campaign of 1806–7 that the veteran conquerors of the continent unanimously dignified him with the title of Bravest of the Brave. He was next employed in the Peninsula, where he destroyed many of the guerilla parties, overran Gallicia and the Asturias, defeated Sir Robert Wilson, and cut off many convoys of the allies. In the campaign against Portugal he was compelled by the impregnable lines of Torres Vedras to retreat; but his retreat was a brilliant one. He sustained unmoved the incessant assaults of Lord Wellington's overwhelming forces, though he commanded only a corps of 6000 men; and thus enabled the whole army to retire in perfect safety to Miranda del Corvo. Presently, however, a dispute occurred between him and the commander-in-chief, whom he flatly refused to obey, and for this act of insubordination Ney was divested of his command and ordered to return to France. In the expedition to Russia Ney added to his laurels at the sanguinary battle of the Moskva, but still more by his masterly and heroic conduct in the retreat of Moscow as commander of the rear guard. In the campaign of 1813 Ney contributed to the victories of Bautzen, Lützen, and Dresden; but he and Oudinot received a severe check at Dennewitz from the crown prince of Sweden. On the restoration of the Bourbons Ney was created a knight of St. Louis and a peer of France; and on the return of Napoleon from Elba he was ordered to oppose his advance to Paris. He not only promised fidelity to Louis XVIII., but it is said undertook to bring Napoleon to Paris in an iron cage. However this may be, on his arrival at Besançon he found such a general manifestation of feeling in favour of Napoleon that he immediately tendered him his services. He behaved with his usual heroism at the battle of Waterloo, where five horses were shot under him, his garments pierced with balls, and his whole person covered with blood and mud. Foreseeing the consequence of his defection from Louis he secreted himself with one of his relatives at the château of Bessaris, but was discovered by means of a sabre given to him by Napoleon, which was remarked lying on a sofa by one of his relative's visitors, and the circumstance communicated to the prefect. He was tried by the Chamber of Peers, and being found guilty of treason was sentenced to be shot. The sentence was carried into execution at Paris 7 Dec., 1815. Ney was sincere and honest even to bluntness, merciful, with rare exceptions, to the vanquished, and, equally detesting rapine and extortion, lived and died poor.

NICCOLETTO. See CASSANA.

NICCOLINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian poet, born near Pisa 31 Oct., 1785; died at Florence 20 Sept., 1861. His best works are 'Antonio Foscarini' and 'Arnoldo di Brescia.'

NICERON, JEAN PIERRE, a biographer, born at Paris 1685. He entered into the order of Barnabites, after which he taught the classics and rhetoric, at Loches, in Touraine; but was recalled to the college of Montargis, to hold a professorship; and afterwards he removed to Paris, where he died 8 July, 1738. His great performance is entitled 'Memoirs of Men illustrious in the Republic of Letters, with a critical Account of their Works,' 40 vols. 12mo. He translated several English books into French.

NICHOL, JOHN PRINGLE, LL.D., an astronomer, born at Brechin, Forfarshire, 13 Jan., 1804. He entered the ministry; became professor of astronomy at Glasgow 1836; and died 19 Sept. 1859. Dr. Nichol was the first to make the public familiar with what is called the 'Nebular Hypothesis.' He published several works on astronomical subjects.

NICHOLAS I., a Roman, succeeded Pope Benedict III. 858; died 13 Nov., 867.

NICHOLAS II., Gerard of Burgundy, was elected Pope 1058, and died 22 July, 1061.

NICHOLAS III., John Cajetan, was elected Pope 277, and died 22 Aug. 1280.

NICHOLAS IV., Jerome of Ascoli, succeeded Pope Honorius IV. 1288, and died 4 April, 1292.

NICHOLAS V., Thomas de Sarzana, succeeded Pope Eugenius IV. 1447, and died 24 March, 1455.

NICHOLAS I., emperor of Russia, was born July, 1796, being the third son of the Emperor Paul, at the time of whose murder in 1801 he was only five years old. On the proclamation of peace in 1815 he made the tour of Europe, visiting especially the scenes of the great battles of modern times, and also the courts of various nations; and in the following year he came to London, where his youthful and martial appearance gained him the general good-will. In 1817 he married Charlotte, eldest daughter of the king of Prussia, Frederick William III., and the years from this period to his accession formed the brightest portion of his life. On the death of his brother Alexander in 1825 he ascended the throne, his elder brother Constantine having been incapacitated from reigning in consequence of his marriage with a Polish lady. The accession of Nicholas to the throne became the signal for a formidable insurrection, in the prompt suppression of which the new czar showed great personal courage and presence of mind, but at the same time a cold-blooded and unrelenting disposition. Both in the present emergency and on another occasion somewhat later, when the prevalence of the cholera excited a tumult among the ignorant population of St. Petersburg, the czar showed what can be done by a strong will and iron nerve; on both occasions he walked forth into the midst of the excited populace and commanded them to fall down upon their knees. The populace obeyed, and Nicholas in describing the scene is said to have declared that was the finest moment of his life. Throughout his career he was animated by a desire to crush out every spark of freedom from his country, and to establish a rigid absolutism. 'Despotism,' he said, 'is the very essence of my government, and suits the genius of the land.' In 1826 he declared war against Persia, and after continuing more than a year it was concluded by a treaty whereby the shah ceded two fine provinces to Russia, and bound himself to pay twenty millions of silver roubles as the penalty of resistance. About a year later he was successful in a war against Turkey. The revolution of 1830–31 in Poland terminated in the annihilation of Polish nationality and the absorption of that country into the empire of the czar, who was determined to russianize all his subjects, and who accordingly promoted Panslavism, a movement for the amalgamation of all races of Sclavonic descent into one body, having one language, one literature, one social polity, and one religion. To accomplish this end the United Greeks, a body who acknowledged the authority of the Pope while preserving the usages of the Greek Church, were compelled to join the orthodox establishment, while the Protestants of the Baltic provinces were persecuted and the Jews subjected to the most barbarous treatment. The best purpose of the czar's life was the emancipation of the serfs. His ambition of gaining preponderance in Turkey was constantly perceptible during his reign, and led, in 1853, on the occasion of a controversy about the guardianship of the Holy Places at Jerusalem and the protectorate over the Danubian Principalities, to the rupture with England and France which resulted in the Crimean war. Russia was now left alone to confront the combined forces of England, France, Turkey, and Sardinia. The anxiety consequent upon this gigantic undertaking hastened the death of the czar, which took place 2 March, 1855. He was succeeded by his eldest son, Alexander II.

NICHOLS, Frank, M.D., F.R.S., was born in London 1699. He went from Westminster School to Exeter College, Oxford, in which university he was chosen reader of anatomy 1726. Afterwards he settled in London, and in 1734 was appointed Gulstonian reader and lecturer on surgery to the college of physicians. In 1753 he succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as physician to the king. He died at Epsom 7 Jan., 1778. Dr. Nichols published—'De Anima Medica;' 'De Motu Cordis et Sanguinis in homine nato et non nato;' 'The Petition of the Unborn Babes to the Censors of the Royal College of Physicians.' This last was against man-midwifery.

NICHOLS, James, a printer of Hoxton Square, London; died 26 Nov., 1861, aged 76. He was the author of 'Arminianism and Calvinism,' 1824.

NICHOLS, John, F.S.A., a learned printer and author, was born at Islington 2 Feb., 1744-5, and at the age of thirteen was apprenticed to the celebrated William Bowyer, who took him into partnership 1766, and on whose decease in the following year he succeeded to the entire business. Mr. Nichols edited the 'Gentleman's Magazine' from 1778 till his death, which occurred 26 Nov., 1826. Among the sixty-seven publications of which he was either author or editor, we may enumerate 'A Select Collection of Miscellaneous Poems, with Historical and Biographical Notes,' 8 vols., 1780-82; 'Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica,' conjointly with Richard Gough; 'Biographical Anecdotes of William Hogarth,' which passed through several editions; 'Biographical and Literary Anecdotes of William Bowyer, F.S.A., and of many of his learned Friends,' 1782, an invaluable work, which was recast and extended to 9 vols., under the title of 'Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century,' 1812-15, the series being further continued by himself and his son under the title of 'Illustrations of Literary History,' 8 vols., 1817-58; and a superb topographical work, 'The History and Antiquities of the Town and County of Leicester,' 4 large folio vols., 1795-1815.

NICHOLS, John Bowyer, F.S.A., son of John Nichols mentioned above, was born in London 15 July, 1779. He received his education at St. Paul's School, and in 1796 joined his father in business, to which he attended through life with constant application and assiduity. He also assisted in the editorship of the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' of which he became sole proprietor in 1833; remaining so till 1856, when the whole property was transferred to Mr. J. H. Parker, of Oxford. Mr. Bowyer also received the valuable appointment of printer of the votes and proceedings of the House of Commons. From Mr. Nichols's press proceeded the greater portion of the most magnificent works in English typography that have ever been produced. Among these are Ormerod's Cheshire; Clutterbuck's Hertfordshire; Surtees' Durham; Raine's North Durham; Hoare's South Wilts; Hunter's South Yorkshire; Baker's Northamptonshire; Whitaker's Histories of Whalley and Craven; and Dallaway's Rape of Arundel. Among the works written by Mr. Nichols we may mention, 'A Brief Account of the Guildhall in the city of London;' Anecdotes of Hogarth, 1833; and 'Historical Notices of Fonthill Abbey,' 1836. He also continued and completed his father's 'Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century.' Died at Ealing, Middlesex, 19 Oct., 1863.

NICHOLS, WILLIAM, D.D., was born at Donnington, Bucks, 1664; received his education at St. Paul's School and the university of Oxford; obtained the rectory of Selsey, Sussex, 1691; died April, 1712. His principal works are—Conference with a Theist, 2 vols.; Essay on the Contempt of the World; 'Defensio Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ,' which he afterwards published in English; A Paraphrase on the Common Prayer; A Comment on the Common Prayer; Commentary on Part of the Articles of the Church of England.

NICHOLSON, THOMAS JOSEPH, a Scotch bishop of the Roman Church, born at Birkenbog, Banffshire, 1645. He was nominated the first vicar-apostolic of all Scotland 1694; consecrated bishop of Peristacium at Paris 1695; arrived at Edinburgh 1697; and died at Preshome, Banffshire, 12 Oct., (o.s.) 1718.

NICHOLSON, WILLIAM, was born in London 1753. At the age of sixteen he went to India in the marine service; but in 1776 he was engaged as an agent on the continent for Mr. Wedgwood. After this he settled in London as a teacher of mathematics, but his establishment failed, and he then became concerned in several projects, for which he took out patents. He was also employed as an engineer to the Portsea waterwork company; but lost that situation also, and died, poor, in June, 1815. He published—'An Introduction to Natural Philosophy,' 2 vols.; The Navigator's Assistant; Memoirs and Travels of Count Benyowsky, 2 vols.; A Dictionary of Chemistry, 2 vols.; A Journal of Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, and the Arts; and other compilations.

NICOLAI, CHRISTOPHER FREDERICK, a German publisher and miscellaneous writer, born at Berlin 18 March, 1733; died 8 Jan., 1811.

NICOLAS, SIR NICHOLAS HARRIS, an eminent genealogist and antiquary, was born in Cornwall 10 March, 1799, and passed his early years in the navy. On his retirement from the service he went to the bar (1825), but his legal practice was confined to claims of peerage before the House of Lords. He now devoted his attention to antiquarian literature, particularly in the departments of history, genealogy, and heraldry; and the works which he produced in quick succession bear witness to his critical acumen and almost unparalleled industry. The principal are—'Life of William Davison, Secretary of State and Privy Counsellor to Queen Elizabeth,' 1823; 'Notitia Historica,' 1824; 'Catalogue of Heralds' Visitations,' 1823, 2nd edition 1825; 'Synopsis of the Peerage of England,' 2 vols. 1825; 'Testamenta Vetusta' 2 vols. 1826; 'Memoirs of Augustine Vincent, Windsor Herald,' 1827; 'History of the Battle of Agincourt,' 1827; 'The Siege of Carlaverock,' 1828; 'The Controversy between Sir Richard Scrope and Sir Robert Grosvenor in the Court of Chivalry, A.D. 1385-1389,' 1832; 'The Chronology of History,' 1835; 'History of the Orders of Knighthood,' 4 vols., 1841-2; 'Dispatches and Letters of Lord Nelson,' 7 vols. 1844; 'Memoirs of Sir Christopher Hatton,' 1847; 'History of the British Navy,' 2 vols. He also contributed very valuable articles to the 'Retrospective Review,' and was editor, jointly with Mr. Sothern, of the 'Excerpta Historica.' In 1831 he was nominated a knight of the Hanoverian Guelphic order, and in the following year appointed chancellor of the Ionian order of St. Michael and St. George, of which he was afterwards (1840) made grand cross. He was engaged in arranging for publication the papers of Sir Hudson Lowe, at the time of his death, which occurred at Capé Cure, near Boulogne-sur-Mer, 3 Aug., 1848. Sir Harris Nicolas was a man of a very irritable temperament, and was continually embroiled in literary squabbles.

NICOLE, PIERRE, a French divine, born at Chartres 1625. He studied theology in the Sorbonne; after which he became an associate of M. Arnauld, for which he was exiled in 1679; but was soon recalled, and died at Paris 1695. The principal of his works are, Moral Essays, 23 vols.; Lettres imaginaires et visionaires, 2 vols.; The Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church concerning the Holy Eucharist, 3 vols.; Traité de l'Unité de Église; Epigrammatum Delectus.

NICOLS, THOMAS, a native of Cambridge, was educated at Jesus College in that university. He was alive in 1659. He was author of 'A Lapidary; or the history of pretious stones;' 'Arcula Gemmea; a cabinet of jewels;' and 'Gemmarius Fidelius, or the faithful lapidary.'

NICOLSON, WILLIAM, an Anglican prelate, born at Orton, Cumberland, 1655, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship 1679. In 1681 he was promoted to a prebend in the cathedral of Carlisle; and the year following made archdeacon of that diocese. He published the first part of his 'English Historical Library,' in 1696, and completed the work in 1699. This was followed by a similar work for Scotland, and by another for Ireland. They were all reprinted together in 1776. In 1702 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle, from whence, in 1718, he was removed to the bishopric of Derry in Ireland; and in 1727 translated to the archbishopric of Cashel, but died suddenly a few days after the appointment 14 Feb., 1727. His other works are, 'Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws;' An Essay, affixed to Chamberlayne's collection of the Lord's Prayer, in various languages; a preface to Wilkins's 'Leges Anglo-Saxonicæ.' His letters were published by Mr. John Nichols, 2 vols. 1809.

NICOT, JEAN, seigneur de Villemain, a French statesman, born at Nîmes 1530. He became master of requests in the royal household 1559, and the same year was sent ambassador to Portugal. By introducing tobacco into Europe his name was given to that plant. He published an edition of the life of Aimon of Fleury, and improved Aimar de Rançonnet's French Dictionary. Died 1600.

NIEBUHR, BARTHOLD GEORGE, an historian, son of Karsten Niebuhr, was born at Copenhagen 27 Aug., 1776. After having studied at the universities of Kiel and Edinburgh he travelled for six months in England, and then returning to his native country was appointed secretary to the Danish minister of finance. In 1806 he was taken into the Prussian service, and employed in several missions, with the rank of privy councillor of state. In 1810 he commenced giving lectures on Roman history; and in 1811 published, in German, the first volume of his 'Roman History,' to which a second was added in 1812. In 1816 he was sent ambassador from the court of Prussia to the Holy ee, and in 1818 he was appointed to a professor-hip in the university of Berlin. When the uni-ersity of Bonn was established Niebuhr removed hither; and he died in that town 2 Jan., 1831. lis principal work, the 'Roman History,' has been ranslated into English by J. C. Hare and Connop Thirlwall. In it the author attempts to reproduce fabric of history from scattered fragments, and o extract truth and certainty out of traditional arratives.

NIEBUHR, KARSTEN, a traveller, born at Lüd-ngwart, Lauenburg, 17 March, 1733. He accom-anied a scientific expedition sent to the East 1761), under the auspices of the Danish minister, Count Bernstorff, in the capacity of mathematician nd treasurer. In the course of his travels Niebuhr nade many important astronomical, geographical, nd geodesical observations. All his companions n the expedition died, and he returned alone to Copenhagen in Nov., 1767. His 'Travels,' ori-inally published in Danish, have been translated nto English. Died 26 April, 1815.

NIELD, JAMES, a philanthropist, born at Knuts-ord, Cheshire, 24 May, 1744; died in London 6 Feb., 1814. He carried on the trade of a gold-mith in London, and realised a large fortune. In 793 he founded in the metropolis a society aving or its object the relief and discharge of ersons imprisoned for small debts. Like John Howard, he was a grea' prison reformer, and caused nprovements to be introduced into many of the aols throughout the country.

NIEMEIWICZ, JULIAN URSIN, a Polish patriot nd author, born at Skohi, Lithuania, 1757; died t Paris 21 May, 1841.

NIVERNOIS, LOUIS JULES BARBON MANCINI AZARINI, DUC DE, was born at Paris 16 Dec., 716. He was ambassador in England 1763; and n his return to France obtained admission into he Academy of Inscriptions. Died 25 Feb., 1798. e wrote 'Fables, in verse;' Dialogues of the ead; Moral Letters; and other works.

NOAILLES, ADRIEN MAURICE, DUC DE, a French eneral, born of a noble family 1678. He served ith his father in Catalonia, and afterwards under endôme, both in Spain and Flanders. In 1706 e commanded in Roussillon, and gained several dvantages over the enemy. In the winter of 710 he made himself master of Gironne, one of e most important places in Catalonia, for which hilip V. created him a grandee of Spain, and ouis XIV. made him field-marshal. In the suc-eeding reign he was appointed president of the ouncil of finances; but when Dubois obtained the ascendancy in the ministry, Noailles was dis-graced and exiled. In the war of 1733 he com-manded at the siege of Philipsburg, and obliged the Germans to abandon Worms. He afterwards served with great reputation in Italy. Died 24 June, 1766.

NOAILLES, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a French car-dinal, was the son of the duke de Noailles, and born 1651. He studied at the Sorbonne; and in 1679 was made bishop of Cahors, whence he was translated to Chalons on the Marne; and in 1695 to the archbishopric of Paris, where he distin-guished himself by his zeal against the Quietists and Jansenists; for which, in 1700, he was created a cardinal. In 1715 he opposed the bull Unigenitus, that had been issued against Quesnel's book on the New Testament; but afterwards he made his submission to the pope. Died 4 May, 1729.

NOBLE, MARK, F.S.A., an historical compiler and genealogist, of whose personal history scarcely anything is recorded except that he was presented, in 1784, to the living of Barming, Kent, where he died 26 May, 1827. His chief publications are a 'Genealogical History of the Royal Families of Europe,' 1781; 'Memoirs of the House of Crom-well,' 2 vols., 1784, 2nd edition, 1787; 'Historical Genealogy of the House of Stuart,' 1795; 'History of the College of Arms,' 1805; and a continuation of Granger's Biographical History of England, 3 vols., 1806. He also left numerous works in MS. which were dispersed by auction 24 Dec., 1827.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH, a sculptor, born in Lon-don 11 Aug., 1737. His father, Joseph Francis Nollekens, a native of Antwerp, and a close imitator of Watteau, died 1748. The son became a pupil of Scheemakers, the sculptor, on leaving whom he went to Italy, and studied there some time under Ciavetti. While at Rome he gained a gold medal from the Academy of Painting, Sculp-ture, and Architecture. On his return to England he soon rose to distinction and executed many works of great beauty. He married a daughter of Mr. Justice Welch, but had no issue by her. She died in 1817; and Mr. Nollekens on 23 April, 1823.

NOLLET, JEAN ANTOINE, a French philosopher, born at Pimpré, in the district of Noyon, 1700. He became lecturer in experimental physics to the duke of Savoy; and, after travelling through Italy, was appointed teacher of philosophy to the royal family of France; as well as professor in the same branch of science in the college of Navarre. Died 24 April, 1770. The abbe Nollet distin-guished himself by a new theory of electricity, which was soon exploded.

NONNIUS PINCIANUS. See NUNEZ.

NOODT, GERARD, a Dutch civilian, born 1647 at Nimeguen; died 14 Aug., 1725, at Leyden, where he was professor of law. The best edition of his works is by Barbeyrac, 2 vols., 1735.

NOORTHOUCK, JOHN, an English author, died at Oundle Aug., 1816, aged about 70. His chief productions are, 'A New History of London,' 1773; and 'An Historical and Classical Dictionary,' 1776.

NORDEN, FREDERICK LOUIS, a traveller, born at Gluckstadt, in Holstein, 1708. He was bred in the marine service, and became so skilful in the principles of naval architecture, hydrography, and drawing, that the king of Denmark sent him first to Italy to study the construction of ships, and afterwards to Egypt to examine the curiosities of that country. In 1739 he entered the English navy; but his health being in a declining state he went to France, where he died 1742. His Travels in Egypt and Nubia were published in French, in 1755, and soon afterwards appeared in an English translation.

NORDEN, JOHN, a topographer and engraver, born in Wiltshire about 1548, and educated at Hart Hall, Oxford (M.A. 1573). He became surveyor to Henry, prince of Wales, and died about 1626. He surveyed Essex, Hertford, and Middlesex; but the last of his county maps is that of Surrey. His printed works are, England, or a Guide for Travellers; a Topographical and Historical Description of Cornwall; An Historical and Chorographical Description of Middlesex and Hertfordshire; A Delineation of Northamptonshire; The Surveyor's Dialogue.

NORFOLK, THOMAS HOWARD, DUKE OF, and earl of Surrey, was born 1473. He was bred to arms, and soon after the accession of Henry VIII. was honoured with the order of the Garter. He succeeded his brother, Sir Edward Howard, as high admiral in 1513; and the victory of Flodden Field was chiefly owing to his valour and skill. For this the title of duke of Norfolk was restored to his father, and he was himself created earl of Surrey. In 1521 he went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and while there suppressed a dangerous rebellion. Notwithstanding these services, he was sent to the Tower by Henry, at the close of his reign, and kept there till the accession of Mary; when he was released, and contributed to suppress Wyatt's rebellion. Died 1554.

NORGATE, EDWARD, a native of Cambridge, was sent into Italy by the great collector Thomas Earl of Arundel, to purchase pictures for him, and in 1633 that nobleman, as earl marshal, appointed him Windsor herald. He also held the office of illuminator of the royal patents, and was a clerk of the signet. Died Dec., 1650. Norgate was the best illuminer and limner of his day; his illuminations of royal patents being exquisite specimens of beautiful design and finishing, upon vellum, inferior, in no great degree, to the elaborate bordures which enclose the miniatures of Giulio Clovio. He left in MS. a work entitled 'Miniature, or the Art of Limning.'

NORIS, HENRY, a cardinal, born at Verona 1631. He quitted the Jesuits for the Order of Augustines. In 1673 he published, at Florence, the 'History of Pelagianism,' which, though examined with the greatest rigour, passed without censure at Rome, where the author was appointed qualificator of the holy office. He also taught ecclesiastical history at Pisa; and in 1692 was made under-librarian of the Vatican; which distinction so irritated his adversaries, that they attacked him as a heretic; but he overcame his accusers, and in 1695 was invested with the purple. In 1700 he was appointed chief librarian of the Vatican. He died at Rome in 1704. His works have been published in 4 vols. fol.

NORMANDY, ALPHONSE, an eminent chemist, born in France 1811; died in London 10 May, 1864.

NORRIS, ANTHONY, of Barton Turf, Norfolk, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, but did not graduate. He died 13 Aug., 1785, æt. 75. Mr. Norris was a good antiquary, herald, and historian. His valuable collections relating to Norfolk, in 28 volumes, came, at his death, to Sir John Fenn, who bequeathed them to Lady Fenn's relations, the Freres of Croydon. Mr. Frere of that place now possesses them (1866).

NORRIS, JOHN, was born 1657 at Collingborne-Kingston, Wilts. He had his education at Winchester School and at Exeter College, Oxford, whence he removed to a fellowship at All Souls (M.A., 1684). He was presented to the rectory of Newton St. Loe, Somersetshire, 1689; and in 1691 to that of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he died 1711. Mr. Norris was much attached to the Platonic system, and he is accounted one of the most eminent of the Idealists. His principal works are, Picture of Love Unveiled; An Idea of Happiness; Poems and Discourses; A Collection of Miscellanies; The Theory and Regulation of Love; Reason and Religion, or the Grounds and Measures of Devotion; Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life; Discourses on the Beatitudes; Practical Discourses, 4 vols.; Letters concerning the Love of God; An Essay towards a theory of the Ideal or Intelligible World; Discourse concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul; Treatise on Christian Prudence; Treatise concerning Humility.

NORRIS, JOHN, was born in 1734 in Norfolk, and educated at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge. After leaving the university he settled on his estate, where he died 1777. Mr. Norris was the patron of Porson, and left to the university of Cambridge an estate of one hundred and ninety pounds a year, for the foundation of a professorship in theology, and to provide a yearly premium for an essay on some subject of divinity.

NORRIS, SYLVESTER, D.D., an English Jesuit, was a native of Somersetshire, and received his education in the English college at Rome. He died in England 16 March, 1630, æt. 59. His works are, 'The Antidote, a Treatise of thirty Controversies against the pestiferous writings of Dr. Whitaker, Dr. Fulk, Dr. Bilson, Dr. Reynolds, &c.,' 4to., 1615–22; 'An Appendix to the Antidote: Of the Succession of the Church,' 1621; 'The Guide of Faith against Sectaries,' 1621; 'The Pseudo-Scripturist,' 1623; and 'A True Account of his Conference with Walker,' 1624.

NORTH, DUDLEY, LORD, was born 1581, and succeeded his grandfather, the second lord, 1600. He lived in the court of Henry, prince of Wales; but in the civil war he joined the Parliament. He died 16 Jan., 1666; having written, 'A Forest of Varieties, Exonerations, and Privadoes or Extravagants.' His son, Dudley, the fourth Lord North, was educated at Cambridge, after which he served in the army. He died 24 June, 1677. He published, 'Observations and Advices economical:' 'Passages relating to the Long Parliament;' 'History of the Life of Edward Lord North.'

NORTH, Sir DUDLEY, brother of the lord-keeper, was born 16 May, 1641, and after amassing a fortune as a merchant at Constantinople returned to this country, where he became commissioner of the customs, and afterwards of the Treasury, to King Charles II., who conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. He sat for some time in the House of Commons as member for Banbury; and died 31 Dec., 1691. His 'Discourses upon Trade, principally directed to the cases of Interest, Coinage, Clipping, and Encrease of Money,' originally published in 1691, was reprinted in 1822.

NORTH, FRANCIS, LORD GUILFORD. See GUILFORD.

NORTH, FREDERICK, LORD, Prime Minister of England, afterwards earl of Guilford. See GUILFORD.

NORTH, GEORGE, was born in London 1710. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. He became vicar of Codicote, Hertfordshire; and died 17 June, 1772. Mr. North published, 'An Answer to a Libel, entitled the Impertinence of Modern Antiquaries displayed;' 'Remarks on some Conjectures relative to an Ancient Piece of Money lately found at Eltham in Kent;' 'An Epistolary Dissertation on some supposed Saxon Gold Coins.'

NORTH, JOHN, D.D., brother of Francis, Lord Guilford, was born in London 4 Sept., 1645. He was educated at Bury School, and Jesus College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1672 he was elected Greek professor; and in 1677 appointed master of Trinity College, where he died in April, 1683. He published 'Platonis de rebus divinis, Dialogi selecti, Gr. et Lat.,' &c. 1673.

NORTH, ROGER, was bred to the law, and became attorney-general under James II., and also steward of the courts to Archbishop Sheldon. He was an amateur in music, of which science he wrote memoirs. His other works are, the lives of his three brothers, the Lord-Keeper Guilford, Sir Dudley North, and Dr. John North; an 'Examen into the Veracity of Kennett's History of England;' 'A Discourse of Fish and Fish Ponds,' 1713; 'A Discourse on the Study of the Laws,' 1824; and 'Memoirs of Musick,' 1846. Died 1 March, 1733-4.

NORTHALIS, RICHARD, a Carmelite friar, became bishop of Ossory 1386, and in 1396 archbishop of Dublin. He wrote 'Sermones;' 'Ad Ecclesiarum parochos,' &c.

NORTHAMPTON, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF, was born at Shottisham, Norfolk, about 1539. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1568 was admitted to the degree of M.A. at Oxford. He was neglected through the reign of Elizabeth; but in the next he rose rapidly, being made a privy councillor, warden of the Cinque Ports, earl of Northampton, Lord Privy Seal, and knight of the Garter. He was a man of considerable talents, but unprincipled, and a party in the intrigue of his niece, the countess of Essex, with Carr, Viscount Rochester. He was also more than suspected of being concerned in the murder of Overbury. He died in 1614. His works are, A Defensative against the Poison of supposed Prophecies; An Apology for the Government of Women, a manuscript in the Bodleian library. Some other manuscripts of his are extant.

NORTHAMPTON, SPENCER COMPTON, second EARL OF, son of William, the first earl, was born 1601. He was made knight of the Bath at the age of fifteen, and accompanied Prince Charles to Spain, as master of the wardrobe. At the commencement of the rebellion he distinguished himself by his loyalty, and fell in a battle fought on Hopton Heath, near Stafford, 19 March, 1642-3, refusing quarter when it was offered to him, saying that he scorned to accept it from such rogues.

NORTHCOTE, JAMES, R.A., was born at Plymouth 1746, being the son of a watchmaker, who intended him to pursue the same calling, but an irresistible inclination for the fine arts, and especially for painting, caused him to abandon that career. He worked assiduously, and made such rapid progress that Dr. John Mudge, a friend of his family, recommended him to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who consented to take him as a pupil. Northcote eventually gained great distinction, not only as a painter, but as an author. He died in London 13 July, 1831. His chief publications are several papers in 'The Artist,' a periodical edited by Prince Hoare; 'Memoirs of Sir Joshua Reynolds,' 1813-15; 'One Hundred Fables, original and selected,' 1828; 2nd Series, 1833. The 'Life of Titian,' 2 vols., 1830, which passes under his name, was in reality compiled by William Hazlitt.

NORTHINGTON, ROBERT HENLEY, EARL OF, was born 1708, of an ancient family in Somersetshire, and educated at Westminster School, where he formed an acquaintance with the great Lord Mansfield. He removed thence to St. John's College, Oxford, and was afterwards elected to a fellowship of All Souls. Having chosen the legal profession, he entered the Inner Temple, and in 1732 was called to the bar. In 1747 he was elected recorder of Bath and M.P. for that city. He was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales 1751; attorney-general to the king 1756; received the great seal as lord-keeper 30 June, 1757; and in 1760 was created Baron Henley, in order that he might preside at the trial of Lord Ferrers. His sentence on that unfortunate nobleman has been praised as one of the best specimens of judicial eloquence on record, being at once grave, simple, dignified, and affecting. On the accession of George III. he was elevated to the dignity of Lord Chancellor, and created earl of Northington; and it was through his instrumentality that the Rockingham administration was overthrown. In 1766 he resigned the great seal, and was at the same time declared president of the council, which office, however, he vacated in the course of the next year. Died 14 Jan., 1772. Lord Northington's commonplace book and his legal note-books are preserved in the British Museum (MSS. Add. 26060-66).

NORTHUMBERLAND, ALGERNON PERCY, fourth DUKE OF, K.G., was born 1792, and succeeded to the title in 1847. In early life he served in the navy, and ultimately attained to the rank of admiral. During Lord Derby's short-lived administration he took office as First Lord of the Admiralty. He died 12 Feb., 1865, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His grace delighted to encourage archæological investigation and to contribute to the advancement of literature and the interests of art. He was also a munificent supporter of many charitable institutions, and built at his own expense the Sailors' Home at North Shields.

NORTHUMBERLAND, JOHN DUDLEY, DUKE OF, son of Edmund Dudley, who has been already noticed, was born about 1502. He was restored in blood 1511, and afterwards became the favourite of Henry VIII., who created him Viscount Lisle and made him one of the executors of his will. On the death of that monarch he was created earl of Warwick, and in 1551 duke of Northumberland. Finding that Edward VI. was in a dying state, the duke contrived a marriage between his son, Lord Guildford Dudley, and the Lady Jane Grey, daughter of the duke of Suffolk, after which he persuaded the king to settle the crown upon that unfortunate lady, to the exclusion of his sisters. On the death of Edward, Lady Jane was proclaimed queen; but Mary's adherents were too powerful, and the duke of Northumberland perished on the scaffold 22 August, 1553, as his son and daughter-in-law also did some time afterwards.—Athen. Cantab.

NORTON, THOMAS, was born in London in or about 1532, and after receiving a liberal education, was called to the bar, being, in 1562, appointed counsel to the Stationers' Company. In 1570 he was admitted to the degree of M.A. in the university of Cambridge, and the same year obtained the post of remembrancer of the City of London, which he also represented in the House of Commons for several years. His atrocious cruelty towards the unfortunate adherents of the Catholic faith obtained for him the appellation of the Rack-master, and even of 'Archicarnifex;' and if it be true, as asserted, that he was instrumental in bringing one hundred of his fellow-creatures to the scaffold, he richly merited the appellation. Norton was sent to the Tower on a charge of treason shortly before his death, which occurred at Sharpenhoe, Bedfordshire, 24 March, 1583-4. In literature he is known as the author of the first three acts of 'The Tragedie of Gorboduc,' 1561, which is entitled, in some editions, 'Ferrex and Porrex.' The other two acts were written by Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorset. This is the earliest regular drama in blank verse in the English language.—Athen. Cantab.

NOSTRADAMUS, MICHAEL, a physician and astrologer, born 14 Dec., 1503, at St. Remy, in Provence. He took his doctor's degree at Montpelier, after which he practised at various places, particularly Aix and Lyons, where he was successful in the cure of a pestilential disease. He finally settled at Salon, and pretended to the gift of prophecy, the result of which was a volume of predictions, published at Lyons in 1568. Though some persons regarded these with contempt, and the author as an impostor, there were not wanting persons of distinction who had faith in these prognostics, one of which bore so remarkable an allusion to the death of Henry II., that Nostradamus received many presents, and was appointed physician to the court. Died 2 July, 1566. His 'Centuries of Prophecies' have been published in English.

NOTT, JOHN, M.D., was born at Worcester 24 Dec., 1751. He travelled in the East in early life, and eventually settled as a physician at Hotwell, near Bristol, where he died in Nov., 1825. Dr. Nott published a translation from the Persian of some of the poems of Hafiz; 'Alonzo,' a tale in verse; a translation of the 'Basia' of Joannes Secundus; 'Leonora,' an elegy; 'Sonnets and Odes,' translated from Petrarch; some medical works; an edition of Decker's 'Gull's Hornbook;' and a large number of articles in the 'Gentleman's Magazine.'

NOTT, Sir WILLIAM, K.C.B., a British general, born in Wiltshire, 20 Jan., 1780. He entered the military service of the East India Company 1800, and acquired such distinction that in 1839 he was invested with the command of the whole of the troops in Scinde and Affghanistan, in which command he displayed, at a most critical time, great firmness, decision, and ability. The first important service he performed was the capture of the town and fortress of Khelat. After the breaking-out of the insurrection at Cabool (Affghan) he several times conquered a far superior force of the rebels under Prince Suftur Jung, near Candahar (1842). In Sept. of the same year he captured Ghuznee, and afterwards effected his junction with General Pollock at Cabool, his progress being one scene of uninterrupted successes and victories. For his services he received the thanks of parliament, and an annuity of £1000 from the East India Company. He died at Carmarthen 1 Jan., 1845.

NOTTINGHAM, CHARLES HOWARD, EARL OF, was the son of William, Lord Howard, of Effingham, and grandson of Thomas, the second duke of Norfolk. He was born in 1536. He went in 1559 to congratulate Francis II. on his accession to the throne, and in 1569 was made general of the horse in the army sent against the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland. The next year he went with a fleet of men of war to convoy the Princess Anne of Austria to Spain; and in 1573 he succeeded his father in his titles and estate. The same year he was installed knight of the Garter, and made lord-chamberlain of the household, and in 1585 constituted lord high-admiral of England. In 1588 he commanded the fleet which defeated and dispersed the Spanish armada; and in 1596, when another invasion was apprehended, he was appointed commander-in-chief at sea, as the earl of Essex was on land. In this expedition Cadiz was taken and the Spanish fleet burnt, for which he was made earl of Nottingham, and justice itinerant of all the forests south of Trent. In 1601 he suppressed the earl of Essex's insurrection, and was principally concerned in bringing that nobleman to the block. James I. continued him in all his employments; and at the coronation the earl acted as lord high steward. In 1605 he went ambassador to Spain; and in 1613 he convoyed the Princess Elizabeth, on her marriage, to Flushing. Died 14 Dec., 1624.

NOTTINGHAM, DANIEL FINCH, second EARL OF. See WINCHELSEA.

NOTTINGHAM, HENEAGE FINCH, first EARL OF, was born in Kent 21 or 23 Dec., 1621, being the son of Sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London. He was educated at Westminster School, whence he went to Christ Church, Oxford, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. At the Restoration he was made solicitor-general, and a baronet. In 1661 he was chosen M.P. for the university of Oxford; and in 1665 that learned body created him doctor of laws. In 1670 he was made attorney-general, and about three years after, lord-keeper, with the title of Baron Finch of Daventry. In 1675 he was made lord chancellor. In 1681 he was created earl of Nottingham, and died 18 Dec., 1682.

NOUE, FRANÇOIS DE LA, Lanovius, surnamed 'Iron Arm,' was born in Brittany 1531. He was a Calvinist; and in 1567 took Orleans from the Catholics, after which he distinguished himself at the battle of Jarnac, and made himself master of several strong places. Losing his left arm at the siege of Fontenoy, he had an iron one made, whence he obtained the name of Bras de Fer. He fell at the siege of Lamballe 1591. He wrote 'Discours Politiques et Militaires,' 1587.

NOURSE, TIMOTHY, was born at Newent, Gloucestershire, being the son of a clergyman. Entering University College, Oxford, he obtained a fellowship there, but was deprived of it for embracing the Catholic faith (1673). He then settled on an estate he had in the country, and led a studious and retired life. He published 'A Discourse of the Nature and Faculties of Man: with some considerations of the Occurrences of Human Life,' 8vo., London, 1686; 'A Discourse of Natural and Revealed Religion,' 8vo., London, 1691; and 'Campania Felix; or Discourses on the Benefits and Improvements of Husbandry,' 8vo., London, 1701, 1706.

NOVATIAN, a priest of Rome, who, in 251, was illegally elected bishop of that church, for which he was excommunicated by St. Cyprian. He associated himself with Novatus, another priest of Carthage, who maintained that the church hath no power to restore such persons to communion as have fallen under censure. The works of Novatian were printed by Jackson 1728.

NOVELLO, VINCENZO, a musical composer. Though of Italian parentage he was born in London 1781, and passed the greater part of his life here, holding for many years the post of organist at the Catholic church in Spanish Place. To his exertions is mainly owing the introduction into England of the works of the great Italian and German masters of sacred music. He died at Nice, 9 Aug., 1861. His life has been written by his eldest daughter, Mrs. Cowden Clarke.

NOWELL, ALEXANDER, an English divine, born at Readhall, Lancashire, about 1507. He was educated at Middleton School, whence he removed to Brasenose College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship 1540. Three years after this he became second master of Westminster School, and in 1551 was installed prebendary of Westminster. In the first parliament of Queen Mary he was returned for Looe, in Cornwall; but the election was declared void on account of his being a dignitary of the church. Soon after this he went to Strasburg, where he remained till the accession of Elizabeth, when he returned, and in 1560 was made dean of St. Paul's. He was also rector of Great Hadham, Hertfordshire, and prolocutor of the convocation in which the Articles of Religion were settled. In 1570 he published his 'Larger Catechism,' in Latin, and also an abridgment of it in the same language. He is likewise supposed to have written the greater part of the Church Catechism. In 1572 he founded a free school at Middleton, and also thirteen scholarships in Brasenose College, of which society he was elected principal in 1595. Died 33 Feb., 1601-2. His brother, Laurence Nowell, became dean of Lichfield, and died 1576. He was particularly skilled in the Saxon language, of which he compiled a dictionary, still extant in the Bodleian library.

NOY, WILLIAM, was born at St. Burian, Cornwall, 1577. He studied at Exeter College, Oxford, and next in Lincoln's Inn. When he became a member of the House of Commons, he opposed the royal prerogative; but on being made attorney-general, in 1631, he supported the measures which he had before condemned, and among other projects brought forward by him was the tax called ship-money. He died Aug., 1634. He was author of several legal works.

NUCK, ANTHONY, a physician and anatomist of Leyden, born about 1660; died 1692.

NUGENT, GEORGE NUGENT GRENVILLE, LORD, younger son of George, first marquis of Buckingham, by Lady Mary Elizabeth Nugent, only daughter and heir of Robert, Earl Nugent, was born 30 Dec., 1788. His mother was created a baroness of the kingdom of Ireland 1800, with remainder to her second son, who accordingly succeeded to the peerage on her death in 1813. He received his education at Oxford. Before succeeding to the title he sat in the House of Commons, and in 1830 he was appointed one of the lords of the Treasury, from which position he was removed in 1832, when he was sent to the Ionian Islands as lord high commissioner, which office he retained for three years. In politics he was always an advanced liberal. Died 26 Nov., 1850. He published 'Portugal,' a poem, 1812; 'Oxford and Locke,' 1829; 'Memorials of John Hampden,' 2 vols., 1832; 'Lands Classical and Sacred,' 2 vols., 1843; 'Legends of Lilies.'

NUGENT, ROBERT CRAGGS, EARL, was a native of Westmeath in Ireland. He was born and educated in the Catholic religion, which he quitted for that of the established church; and then became a member of the English parliament. He was three times returned for Bristol. In 1767 he was created Viscount Clare, and in 1776 Earl Nugent. Died 13 Oct., 1788. His lordship wrote some pieces of poetry, a volume of which was published in 1739, 8vo. In 1774 he printed a poem called 'Faith,' and in 1775, 'Verses to the Queen, with a new year's gift of Irish manufacture.'

NUGENT, THOMAS, LL.D., F.R.S., was a native of Ireland, and a Roman Catholic. In 1765 he received the degree of doctor of laws at Aberdeen. Died 27 April, 1772. Dr. Nugent published, Burlamaqui's Principles of Political Law; Condillac's Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge; Macquer's Chronological Abridgment of the History of France; Henault's History of France; History of Vandalia; Travels through Germany; Observations on Italy; The Tour of Europe; A translation of Benvenuto Cellini's Life; another of Grosley's Tour to London; and a French Dictionary. He is to be distinguished from Dr. Christopher Nugent, a physician and fellow of the Royal Society, who died 12 Nov., 1775. His daughter became the wife of Mr. Burke. This Dr. Nugent wrote 'An Essay on the Hydrophobia.'

NUNEZ, FERDINAND, Nonnius Pincianus, a Spanish writer, was born at Valladolid, of the family of Guzman. He studied at Bologna, and on his return home was employed by Cardinal Ximenes on his Polyglott. Afterwards he was appointed professor of Greek at Alcala, whence he removed to Salamanca, where he died 1553, aged 80. His works are, 'Annotationes in Senecæ Philosophi Opera;' 'Observationes in Pomponium Melam;' Observationes in loca obscura et depravata Hist. Nat. C. Plinii; Glosa sobre las obras de Juan de Mena; Refranes, o Proverbios en Romance.

NUZZI, MARIO, an Italian flower painter, born at Penna (Naples) 1603; died 1673.

NYE, PHILIP, a puritan divine, born in Sussex about 1596. He took his degrees in arts at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; after which he became minister of St. Michael's, Cornhill; but in 1633 he went to Holland, and remained there till the rebellion, when he obtained the living of Kimbolton, Huntingdonshire. He was also one of the assembly of divines, and rector of St. Bartholomew behind the Exchange, of which he was deprived at the Restoration. His conduct had been so violent, that an act was passed restraining him from holding any office, ecclesiastical or civil. Died 27 Sept., 1672. He published several books which are now obsolete.

NYSTEN, PIERRE HUBERT, a physician and physiologist, who distinguished himself by his electro-medical researches, was born at Liège 1771; and died at Paris 3 March, 1818.

O.

OATES, Titus, an infamous character, born about 1619. He was the son of a Baptist preacher, and received his education at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he removed to Cambridge, and afterwards took orders. In 1677 he pretended to turn Catholic, but on his return to England he declared himself a Protestant, and in conjunction with one Dr. Ezrael Tongue, gave information of a pretended Popish plot; which met with too ready a belief, and many innocent persons were executed. Oates was rewarded with a pension of 1200*l.* a year; but when James II. came to the throne, he was found guilty of perjury, pilloried, whipped, and ordered to be imprisoned for life, In the reign of William III. he obtained his liberty and a pension of 400*l.* a year. Died 23 July, 1705.

OBERLIN, Jeremiah James, was born at Strasburg 1735; became librarian to the university there 1763; professor of Latin eloquence 1770; professor of logic and metaphysics 1782; died 10 Oct., 1806. He left a large number of works on classical and philological subjects; and published editions of Horace, Tacitus, and Cæsar.

OBRECHT, Ulric, a jurist and philologist, born 1646 at Strasburg, where he died 6 Aug., 1701.

O'BRIEN, Henry, an antiquarian enthusiast, was a native of the county of Kerry; received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, where he proceeded B.A. 1831; and died at Hanwell, Middlesex, 28 June, 1835, aged 29. His principal work, published in 1833, is entitled 'The Round Towers of Ireland; or the History of the Tuath-de-Danaans (being the mysteries of Freemasonry, of Sabaïsm, and of Budhism), for the first time unveiled.'

O'BRIEN, William Smith, an Irish rebel, was born 1803, being the second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, Bart. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1826 he entered Parliament as the Tory M.P. for Ennis, and opposed O'Connell at the famous Clare election. He represented the county of Limerick from 1835 to 1849, and during that period completely changed his politics, becoming a warm friend of the National, or 'Young Ireland' party, who in 1846 set on foot an Irish Confederation and meditated the establishment of a republic, of which O'Brien was to be the president. They in vain endeavoured to obtain the assistance of France. The plan of insurrection was, however, persisted in, and it actually took place in July, 1848, commencing at a place called Mullinahone, where large numbers of the peasantry assembled in arms and hailed him as their general. On the 29th of July he appeared on Boulagh common, near Balingarry, on the borders of Tipperary and Kilkenny. There a sub-inspector of police, named Trant, with about fifty men, had fortified himself in the house of the widow Cormac. The rebel forces surrounded the house, their chief standing in the cabbage garden, parleying with the constabulary through the window. He quickly retired, however, and mounted a horse which he had taken from a policeman. Trant, apprehending an attack, ordered his men to fire, and a 'battle' ensued. Two shots were aimed at Smith O'Brien, and a man who stood beside him was killed. Another party of police came up at the moment and fired on the rebels, who fled in the greatest confusion. Eighteen were killed and a large number wounded, the constabulary suffering no damage whatever. The insurrection was at once crushed, and Mr. O'Brien concealed himself in the Silvermine mountains; but on the 5th of August he was apprehended at Thurles, and conveyed in custody to Dublin. He was tried with Messrs. Meagher and MacManus on the 1st September, and all three being found guilty of high treason were sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, but the punishment was commuted to transportation for life. In 1856 Mr. O'Brien received a free pardon. The remainder of his life was comparatively uneventful. Died at Bangor 18 June, 1864.—Gent. Mag.

O'CAROLAN. See Carolan.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, William de, a scholastic divine of the Franciscan order, was a native of Ockham, in Surrey. He studied at Merton College, Oxford, became a pupil of Duns Scotus, and obtained the archdeaconry of Stow, in the diocese of Lincoln, but resigned it about 1319. Occam was the chief of the 'Nominalists,' and acquired so high a reputation that he was styled the 'Invincible Doctor.' He defended the Emperor Louis of Bavaria, at the solicitation of Michael de Cesena, general of his order, and wrote forcibly against Pope John XXII. and his successors. The Pope excommunicated him, but he is supposed to have been absolved afterwards. He died at Munich 7 April, 1347, leaving several works which discover great genius and subtilty.

OCHINUS, Bernard, was born at Sienna 1487. He was at first a Cordelier, but renounced the habit and became a physician. Afterwards he resumed the monastic profession among the Capuchins, of which order he became vicar-general; but in 1542 he turned Lutheran, married, and settled at Augsburg, whence he came to England 1547, and was made prebendary of Canterbury. On the death of Edward VI. he went to Strasburg, and afterwards to Zurich, but was banished the canton on account of his dialogues in favour of polygamy and divorce. In this distress he travelled to Moravia, where he joined the Socinians, and died 1564. His dialogues and sermons have been translated into English.

O'CLERY, Michael, the chief of the 'Four Masters,' was born about 1575 in the parish of Kilbarron, near Ballyshannon, co. Donegall, and entered the Franciscan order as a lay brother. For some time he was in the Irish convent at Louvain, whence he was sent to Ireland to collect materials for Hugh Ward, who was then engaged in compiling his Lives of the Irish Saints. O'Clery was engaged in this pursuit for fifteen years, during which time he gathered together a vast quantity of valuable documents elucidating the ancient history of his native land. He was well skilled in the Irish language, and with the assistance of three other antiquaries, Conary O'Clery, Cucogry O'Clery, and Forfeasa O'Mulconry, drew up the 'Annala Rioghachta Eireann,' or Annals of the Kingdom of Ireland, a most popular work, commonly called 'The Annals of the Four Masters.' The best edition is by Dr. John O'Donovan, 7 vols. 4to., Dublin, 1848–51; it contains the original Irish text, with an English translation and copious notes. Dr. O'Donovan also edited for the Irish Archæological Society another work by O'Clery, entitled 'The Martyrology of Donegal. A Calendar of the Saints of Ireland.' 8vo., Dublin, 1864. O'Clery left several works, which still remain in MS. The only works he himself saw through the press were, 'Speculum Vitæ,' printed at Louvain in the Irish character 1616; and 'Lexicon Hibernicum præsertim pro Vocabulis antiquioribus et obscuris,' 8vo., Louvain, 1643. He died 1643.

OCKLEY, SIMON, B.D., was born at Exeter 1678, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He was elected professor of Arabic in that university, with which he held the vicarage of Swavesey, but died poor 9 Aug., 1720. His works are, 'Introductio ad Linguas Orientales;' 'The History of the present Jews throughout the World,' a translation from the Italian of Leo Modena; 'The Improvement of Human Reason, exhibited in the Life of Hai Ebn Yok'dhan,' translated from the Arabic; An Account of Barbary; A translation of the Second Book of Esdras; and 'The History of the Saracens,' 2 vols., 1708–18.

O'CONNELL, DANIEL, the celebrated Irish orator, politician, and agitator, was born at Carhen, near Cahirciveen, co. Kerry, 6 Aug., 1775, being the son of Mr. Morgan O'Connell, a Catholic gentleman of good family. After being instructed in the rudiments of learning by a priest in Ireland he was sent to St. Omer, and the English College at Douay. In 1798 he was called to the bar, and soon became distinguished as a brilliant and successful advocate. He delivered his maiden political speech at a meeting of the Catholics of Dublin assembled in the Royal Exchange 13 Jan., 1800, to petition against the Union. The meeting was interrupted by a visit from the then redoubted Major Sirr with his red-coats. The calamitous occurrences in 1803 connected with Emmett's rebellion found Mr. O'Connell already in good practice as a lawyer. He was called upon to serve in the 'Lawyer's Infantry,' when a deep impression was made on his mind by the wanton cruelty which an exasperated citizen soldiery are often too ready to commit. From this time the great question of Catholic Emancipation daily rose in importance and engrossed all the hours he could spare from his legal avocations. In 1804 the Catholic Board was dissolved by a Government proclamation, but it was revived under the name of the Catholic Committee. In 1815 occurred one of the most painful events of Mr. O'Connell's life—his fatal duel with Mr. D'Esterre, a member of the Dublin Corporation, which O'Connell had termed 'beggarly.' This was the offence for which he was challenged. In the duel that ensued, Mr. D'Esterre received a wound which resulted in his death. Shortly after this period Mr. O'Connell resolved, notwithstanding the existing disabilities precluded all hopes of legal success, to become a candidate for a seat in Parliament, and a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the County of Clare, he was nominated in opposition to Mr. (afterwards Lord) Fitzgerald, who had represented that county for many years. A most violent contest ensued; at that period, and perhaps since, unparalleled in the history of electioneering, the result being that O'Connell was returned by a large majority. He lost no time in presenting himself at the table of the House of Commons, and expressed his willingness to take the oath of allegiance, but as he declined to take the other oath denying the spiritual authority of the Pope, he was ordered to withdraw. Discussions in the House of Commons and arguments at the bar ensued, but the speedy close of the session precluded any practical result. The agitation throughout every part of Ireland now assumed so formidable a character that ministers said they apprehended a civil war, and early in the next session the Catholic Relief Bill was introduced and carried. Mr. O'Connell was therefore in the month of April, 1829, enabled to sit for Clare, without taking the objectionable oaths, but it was necessary that a new writ should issue, under which he was immediately re-elected. On the death of George IV. Mr. O'Connell withdrew from the representation of Clare, and was returned to the new Parliament for the county of Waterford. In the House of Commons elected in 1831 he sat for his native county of Kerry. Dublin, the city in which the greater part of his life was spent, enjoyed his services as its representative from 1832–36, when he was petitioned against and unseated after a long contest before a committee of the House of Commons. He then for some time represented Kilkenny, but at the general election in 1837 he was once more returned for the city of Dublin, and in 1841 for the county of Cork. Mr. O'Connell had thus a seat in the House of Commons for eighteen years, in seven several Parliaments, and for six different constituencies. The return of the Conservatives to power in the autumn of 1841 was the signal for renewed agitation in Ireland. In the following year the repeal of the Union was demanded by every parish and hamlet in Ireland, and in 1843 'monster meetings' were held on the royal hill of Tara, on the Curragh of Kildare, the rath of Mullaghmast, and in other renowned localities. A meeting at Clontarf was fixed for the 8th of October, when the Government interfered, and the celebrated prosecutions commenced which terminated in Mr. O'Connell's conviction. He was sentenced to pay a fine of 2,000*l.* and to be imprisoned for a year. This judgment was afterwards reversed by the House of Lords, but the prosecution had answered its purpose. Mr. O'Connell's credit as a politician had been impaired, and the costs of his defence had nearly exhausted the funds of the Repeal Association. The return of the Whigs to power in 1846, and Mr. O'Connell's avowed adherence to them, introduced dissension among those with whom for fifty years he had possessed 'a voice potential.' He retired in disgust from the arena of strife, and commenced a pilgrimage more for devotion than for health, towards Rome, but had proceeded no further than Genoa when he expired 15 May, 1847. His heart was embalmed and carried forward to Rome; and his body was brought to Ireland for interment.

O'CONOR, CHARLES, D.D., an Irish ecclesiastic, brother of the O'Conor Don, became domestic chaplain to the marchioness of Buckingham, and after her death remained at Stowe as librarian. He died at Belanagare, county Roscommon, 29 July, 1828, aged about 67. He published 'Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres,' 4 vols., 1814-26, and other works illustrative of Irish history.

O'CURRY, EUGENE, an Irish scholar, born in the county of Clare about 1795. He was employed by the Brehon Law Commissioners to transcribe and translate the ancient Irish laws in conjunction with Dr. John O'Donovan; became professor of Irish History and Archæology in the Catholic University at Dublin, and died 30 July, 1862. He published a translation of an old Irish story of the Battle of Moylena, and 'Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History,' 1861.

ODEVAERE, JOSEPHUS DIONYSIUS, a Flemish painter, born at Bruges 2 Oct., 1778; died at Brussels 8 Feb., 1830.

ODO (ST.), abbat of Cluny, in France, was born at Tours 879, and died about 943.

ODONE, WILLIAM DE. See HOTHUM.

O'DONOVAN, JOHN, LL.D., the greatest of Irish scholars, was born at Atateemore, county Kilkenny, 9 July, 1809, being the son of a small farmer. About 1830 he obtained an engagement in the historical department of the Ordnance Survey of Ireland, where he was employed to examine Irish manuscripts and to collect local information with the object of settling the orthography of places on the Ordnance maps. He was also engaged with Professor O'Curry in the transcription and translation of the Brehon laws. In the course of these investigations he acquired a knowledge of the language and historic topography of Ireland more extensive than was ever previously possessed by any individual scholar. As professor of the Irish Language in the Queen's College at Belfast, he received a salary of 100*l.* a-year, and the Government allowed him an annual pension of 50*l.* He closed a laborious life 9 Dec., 1861, leaving a wife and family unprovided for. Dr. O'Donovan edited a number of curious works for the Irish Archæological and Celtic Society; published an admirable 'Grammar of the Irish Language,' 1845; and brought out a superb edition of 'The Annals of the Four Masters.' (See O'CLERY.)

OECOLAMPADIUS, JOHN, one of the reformers, was born in Franconia 1482. In 1520 he entered a monastery, but on reading the books of Luther, he quitted his cell, and went to Basle, where he was made professor of divinity. He embraced the doctrine of Zuinglius on the sacrament; married the widow of Cellarius 1522; and died of the plague 1 Dec., 1531. His works have fallen into oblivion.

OEDER, GEORGE CHRISTIAN, a physician and botanist, was born at Anspach 3 Feb., 1728; became professor of botany at Copenhagen; and died at Oldenburg 10 Feb., 1791.

OEHLENSCHLÄGER, ADAM GOTTLOB, a Danish poet and dramatist, born 14 Nov., 1779, at Copenhagen, where he died 20 Jan., 1850.

OERSTED, HANS CHRISTIAN, a Danish naturalist, born at Rudkjöping 14 Aug., 1777; died at Copenhagen 9 March, 1851.

OFFOR, GEORGE, an English antiquary, died at South Hackney 7 Aug., 1864, aged 77. He was at one time a bookseller upon Tower-hill, where he amassed a considerable fortune. He published a life of John Bunyan, and an edition of the works of that famous allegorist. Mr. Offor made a most extensive collection of early printed English Bibles, but these were destroyed by fire shortly after his death.

O'FLAHERTY, RODERICK, an Irish antiquary, was born about 1630 at Park, near Galway, part of the ancient inheritance of his family. He applied himself with astonishing perseverance to the study of the history and antiquities of his native country, and in 1684 published his great work 'Ogygia; seu Rerum Hibernicarum Chronologia; ex vetustis membranis fideliter inter se collatis eruta, atque e sacris et prophanis literis primarum orbis gentium tam genealogicis, sufflaminata præsidiis,' London, 4to., 1685, which he dedicated to the duke of York, afterwards James II. Died 8 April, 1718. He lies buried in a field near the house in which he was born. In 1775 Charles O'Conor published, with notes, 'Ogygia vindicated against the objections of Sir George Mackenzie, a posthumous work, by Roderick O'Flaherty.' This tract was published from the original in the author's handwriting. Besides his published pieces O'Flaherty left several works in MS., one of which is entitled 'Ogygia Christiana, or Annals of the Christian Ages to the Dissolution of the Irish Monarchy.'

OGDEN, SAMUEL, D.D., was born in Manchester 1716, and educated at Cambridge. He became master of the school at Halifax 1744-53; vicar of Damerham, Wilts; Woodwardian professor at Cambridge 1764; rector of Lawford, Essex, and of Stansfield, Suffolk, 1766; died 23 March, 1778. His reputation as a divine rests on 2 vols. of Sermons, published by Dr. Hallifax 1780.

OGILBY, JOHN, was born at Edinburgh in Nov., 1600. He became a teacher of dancing, and on going to Ireland with the earl of Strafford, he was made deputy master of the revels in that kingdom. He also built a theatre at Dublin, but in the rebellion he lost all his property. He then returned to England, and settled at Cambridge, where he published a translation of Virgil. At the age of 54 he learnt Greek, and gave a specimen of his proficiency in a translation of the Iliad (1660), which was followed by the Odyssey (1665). While at Cambridge, he edited a superb impression of the Bible, and in 1661 he was appointed to conduct the poetical part of the coronation pageantry. He was also restored to his place of master of the revels in Ireland, where he again built a theatre. In London, after the Great Fire, he erected a printing-house, and was appointed king's cosmographer; in which capacity he published several large volumes, mostly translated from the Dutch, and illustrated with plates. Died 4 Sept., 1676.

OGILVIE, JOHN, a divine of the church of Scotland, was born 1733; became minister of Midmar, Aberdeenshire; and died 1814. He wrote several poems; a volume of Sermons; The Theology of Plato, compared with the Principles of Oriental and Grecian Philosophers; and an Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy, in behalf of the Christian Religion.

OGLETHORPE, JAMES EDWARD, an English general, was the son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, and was born 1698. After receiving a liberal education at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he obtained a commission in the Guards. He next served under Prince Eugene, and on his return to England became a member of Parliament. In 1733 he settled the colony of Georgia, for which he obtained the royal charter, and to which province he was accompanied by the two Wesleys. While in that government he had to contend with the Spaniards, whose attempts he repelled, though he was unsuccessful in an expedition against St. Augustine. In 1745 he was advanced to the rank of major-general, and the same year marched against the rebels; but his conduct was made the subject of an inquiry, although he was acquitted. Died 30 June, 1785.

A memoir of him by Robert Wright was published in London in 1807. A critic has recently remarked: Many men have done less and been longer celebrated than Oglethorpe. Celebrated by Pope and Thomson, lauded by Johnson, Hannah More, and Horace Walpole, he is comparatively unknown to the present age. Yet he consummated and completed the great work of American colonization which Raleigh had begun; he united, as the heroes of olden days united, the functions of a military commander and a civil administrator; he anticipated Howard and the modern philanthropists in the removal of abuses which were a flagrant scandal at once to the humanity, the justice, and the civilization of England; and his rare intervals of leisure were cheered by the familiar intercourse of scholars, poets, and wits.

O'HALLORAN, SYLVESTER, an Irish surgeon, who died at Limerick 1807, aged 79, wrote 'An Introduction to the Study of the History and Antiquities of Ireland; in which the assertions of Hume and other writers are occasionally considered,' 1772; and 'A General History of Ireland,' 2 vols., 1778.

O'HARA, KANE, an Irish dramatist, who died 17 June, 1782, wrote the popular burlesques, 'Midas,' 'The Golden Pippin,' 'April Day,' 'Tom Thumb,' and a musical farce entitled 'The Two Misers.'

O'KEEFFE, JOHN, an Irish dramatist, born in Dublin 24 June, 1747. His parents intended to bring him up as an artist, but, becoming stage-struck, he turned actor and dramatic author. About 1779 he left Dublin for London, where, failing to procure an engagement on the stage, he devoted himself entirely to dramatic composition, and produced nearly fifty comedies, comic operas, and farces, which were extremely popular. We may particularly mention 'The Castle of Andalusia,' 'Wild Oats,' 'The Poor Soldier,' 'The Young Quaker,' and 'Peeping Tom.' He died at Southampton 4 Feb., 1833.

OKEN, LAURENCE, a Swiss physiologist and naturalist, born 1779; died at Zurich 11 August, 1851.

OLBERS, HENRY WILLIAM MATTHIAS, a German physician and astronomer, born at Arbergen, near Bremen, 11 Oct., 1758; died at Bremen 2 March, 1840. He owes his celebrity to the discovery of two new planets—Pallas, which he perceived in 1802, and Vesta, which he first saw in 1807.

OLDCASTLE, Sir JOHN. See COBHAM, LORD.

OLDFIELD, ANNE, an actress, born in London 1683. Her father was an officer of the Guards, who left a widow and family in destitute circumstances. This daughter was brought up to the business of a sempstress; but having a fine voice, and good figure, she was brought upon the stage in comic characters, and attained the highest reputation. She was successively mistress to Arthur Maynwaring and General Churchill. She died 23 Oct., 1730, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

OLDHAM, JOHN, a poet, born 9 Aug., 1653, at Shipton, Gloucestershire. He was educated at the school of Tedbury, and next at Edmund Hall, Oxford, where he took one degree, and then became usher in the free school at Croydon. From thence he was taken into the family of Sir Edwards Thurland, as tutor to his grandson, and afterward into that of Sir William Hickes. His last patron was the earl of Kingston, in whose house he died 9 Dec., 1683. His works, of which the principal are his Satires on the Jesuits, have been published in 3 vols. 12mo.

OLDISWORTH, RICHARD. See HOLDSWORTH.

OLDISWORTH, WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, who died 15 Sept., 1734. He had a concern in the Examiner, and published besides, 'State and Miscellany Poems;' a translation of part of Horace; 'Life of Edmund Smith;' 'Timothy and Philatheus,' against Tindal's Rights of the Church.

OLDMIXON, JOHN, a political writer, was born at Bridgewater, Somersetshire, 1673. He became a virulent partizan, and distinguished himself by his abuse of the Stuart family. He also accused the editors of Lord Clarendon's History with having interpolated that work; a charge which was effectually refuted by Bishop Atterbury. It is remarkable that Oldmixon was guilty of the same crime which he falsely charged upon others; for, when employed on the first edition of Kennett's Complete History, he made many alterations in Daniel's Chronicle. He was appointed collector of the customs of Bridgewater, and died 9 July, 1742. His principal works, A History of the Stuarts; Critical History of England, 2 vols.; Life of Arthur Maynwaring; Life of Queen Anne.

OLDYS, WILLIAM, a biographer and antiquary, was the natural son of Dr. Oldys, a civilian, and born 14 July, 1696. In 1737 he succeeded Wanley in the care of Lord Oxford's library, the catalogue of which was partly drawn up by him; and he was also employed in the selection of the 'Harleian Miscellany.' He became Norroy king at arms in 1755; but his principal dependence was on the booksellers, for whom he compiled several works; the principal of which are, 'A Life of Sir Walter Raleigh;' the 'British Librarian;' The Universal Spectator; and twenty-two Lives in the Biographia Britannica. His most valuable and curious work, however, is an annotated copy, now in the British Museum, of Langbaine's 'Account of the Early Dramatick Poets.' Died 15 April, 1761. Mr. James Yeowell published in 1862 a 'Memoir of Oldys, together with his Diary, choice Notes from his Adversaria, and an Account of the London Libraries.'

O'LEARY, ARTHUR, a Catholic divine, was born in the county of Cork 1729, and educated at St. Malo, where he became a Franciscan friar. On his return to his native place he distinguished himself by persuading his brethren to take the oath of allegiance, for which, and his other exertions in the cause of loyalty, he obtained a pension. Afterwards he settled in London, and officiated at the chapel in Soho Square. Died 8 Jan., 1802. His tracts against Wesley, and others, were collected into one volume, 8vo.; besides which he published 'A Defence of his Conduct and Writings, in Answer to Dr. Woodward, Bishop of Cloyne.' His 'Life,' by the Rev. Thomas R. England (1822), contains many documents illustrative of the condition of the Irish Catholics during the eighteenth century.

OLIVA, JOHN, an antiquary and bibliographer, born at Rovigo (Venice) 11 July, 1689; died 1722 at Paris, where he was librarian to Cardinal de Rohan.

OLIVAREZ, GASPAR GUZMAN, Count-Duke DE, a Spanish statesman, born 1587 at Rome where his father had been sent on an embassy. He became the favourite and prime minister of Philip IV., and exercised almost unbounded authority. He introduced some useful measures for developing the internal resources of Spain, but his designs for re-establishing her grandeur in Europe were thwarted by the genius of Richelieu. In 1640 the Catalans, whom Olivarez had robbed of their privileges, rushed to arms, massacred the viceroy, and proclaimed their independence. The Portuguese, humiliated by the favourite, and oppressed by his son-in-law, Vasconcellos, followed this example, and placed John of Braganza on the throne. Eventually Philip was obliged to dismiss Olivarez, who died soon afterwards, at Toro, 1643.

OLIVER, GEORGE, D.D., a Catholic divine and antiquary, born at Newington Butts, Surrey, 9 Feb., 1781. He received his education at Sedgley Park, and at Stonyhurst, where he taught humanities for five years. In 1806 he was admitted to holy orders, and the next year he was appointed to the mission at Exeter, where he continued to discharge the duties of his office for forty-five years, enjoying, during that long period, the warm regard of those of his own faith, and the high esteem of his fellow-citizens of every other denomination. In 1844 the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by Pope Gregory XVI. Died 23 March, 1861. Dr. Oliver, who occupies a foremost place among English antiquaries, published 'Historic Collections relating to the Monasteries in Devon,' 1820; 'The History of Exeter,' 1821, new edition, with memoir and appendix, 1861; 'Cliffordiana,' 1828; 'Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Devon and Cornwall;' 'Collections towards illustrating the Biography of the English, Irish, and Scottish Members of the Society of Jesus,' 1838, 2nd edition, 1845; 'Monasticon Diœcesis Exoniensis,' 1846, with supplement, 1854; 'Collections illustrating the History of the Catholic Religion in the Counties of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Wilts, and Gloucester; with notices of the Dominican, Benedictine, and Franciscan Orders in England,' 1857; and 'Lives of the Bishops of Exeter, and History of the Cathedral,' 1861.

OLIVER, GEORGE, D.D., a writer on freemasonry, was born about 1783, and received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. 1813. The following year he took orders, and in 1831 was presented to the vicarage of Scopwick, Lincolnshire. In 1834 he was presented by the dean and canons of Windsor to the incumbency of the collegiate church of Wolverhampton, which at that time was a royal peculiar; and in 1847 he was appointed by Lord Cottenham, then lord chancellor, to the rectory of South Hyckham, Lincolnshire. He resigned Wolverhampton 1846, but retained Scopwick and Hyckham till his death, which took place at Lincoln 3 March, 1867. His masonic works are, 'The Historical Landmarks of Freemasonry;' 'The History of Initiation;' 'The Antiquities of Freemasonry;' 'A History of the Order from 1829 to 1841;' 'The Spirit of Masonry;' 'Institutes of Masonic Jurisprudence;' 'The Book of the Lodge.'

OLIVER, ISAAC, an English painter, born in 1556. He studied under Hilliard and Zucchero; after which he applied to portraits in miniature, though he also executed some historical pictures of great beauty. He died in 1617. His son, Peter Oliver, who was born 1601, and died about 1654, was also an admirable artist in miniature, and much employed by Charles I.

OLIVET, JOSEPH THOULIER D', a learned critic, born at Salins, in France, 1682. He entered into the Society of Jesus, but left it to lead a retired life at Paris, where he was admitted a member of the Academy, whose history he continued, in 2 vols. His greatest work, however, is his edition of Cicero. The Abbé Olivet also published translations from Cicero and Demosthenes, executed in a spirited and elegant manner. Died 8 Oct., 1768.

OLIVETAN, PIERRE ROBERT, a relation of Calvin, and one of the first persons who propagated the reformed doctrines, at Geneva, where he was a schoolmaster. On being compelled to quit that city, he retired to Neufchâtel, where he published, in 1535, a French translation of the Bible. This was in fact a slight alteration of the version of Lefèvre d'Estaples, although Olivetan had the impudence to boast that it was a translation made by himself from the original texts. His edition, the first in use among Protestants, is very scarce, but it possesses scarcely any other merit. Olivetan died at Ferrara 1538.

OLIVIER, GUILLAUME ANTOINE, a French traveller and entomologist, born near Fréjus 19 Jan., 1756; died at Lyons 1 Oct., 1814.

O'MEARA, BARRY EDWARD, a native of Ireland, received his education at Trinity College, and at the College of Surgeons, Dublin, after which he became a surgeon in the army, and next in the navy. On the surrender of Napoleon I. to the British government he was directed to accompany the emperor to St. Helena in the capacity of medical attendant. In this difficult situation he acted to the entire satisfaction of Sir George Cockburn, who then had charge of Bonaparte, and of his successor, Sir Pulteney Malcolm, and he likewise received the thanks of Lord Melville; but not harmonizing so well with the measures of Sir Hudson Lowe, which he deemed arbitrary and cruel, and 'finding that more was required from him than he could reconcile with his feelings and honour,' a rupture took place, O'Meara resigned, and after a long correspondence, returned to England. Having accused Sir Hudson Lowe of tyrannical and oppressive conduct towards his prisoner, his name was erased from the list of naval surgeons. He afterwards produced various publications relative to his late employment, the principal being 'A Voice from St. Helena, or Napoleon in Exile,' 2 vols., 1822. Died 3 June, 1836.

OMER PASHA, MICHAEL LATTAS, commander-in-chief of the Turkish army, was born 1806 at Plaski, a village in the district of Ogulin, about 60 miles from Fiume, on the Adriatic. He entered the Austrian army, but not liking the service to which he was appointed, that of surveyor of roads and bridges, he deserted and went to Turkey, where he adopted the Mahometan religion, and after a time obtained an appointment in the army. He first distinguished himself in quelling an insurrection in Syria and Albania, and in 1848 he was made a pasha. When the Russian troops invaded the Danubian Principalities in 1853, Omer Pasha was appointed generalissimo of the Turkish army, and his services in that capacity during the Crimean war are well known. His most important public service after that time was the subjugation of the insurrection in Crete 1867. Died 18 April, 1871.

ONKELOS, surnamed the Proselyte, a celebrated rabbi of the first century, who preceded Jonathan Ben Uzziel, as a commentator, or paraphrast on the Scriptures. His Targum on the Pentateuch, in Chaldee, is remarkable for the purity of its style. It is inserted in Walton's Polyglot.

OORT, ADAM VAN, a painter of Antwerp, born 1557; died 1641.

OPIE, AMELIA, an English writer, was born at Norwich 12 Nov., 1769, being the daughter of Dr. James Alderson, a well-known physician of that city. In 1798 she became the second wife of John Opie the painter, on whose decease in 1807 she returned to Norwich, never thenceforth to quit it as a home. Among her numerous tales, which were once highly popular, we may mention 'The Father and Daughter,' 'Murder will Out,' 'The Ruffian Boy,' 'The Odd-tempered Man,' 'Temper,' 'St. Valentine's Day,' and 'Illustrations of Lying.' In 1825 she joined the Society of Friends, and after this published only 'Detraction Displayed,' and 'Lays for the Dead.' She died at her residence in the Castle Meadow, Norwich, 2 Dec., 1853.

OPIE, JOHN, a painter, born May, 1761, at St. Agnes, Cornwall. He was put apprentice to a house carpenter, in which situation he was noticed by Dr. Wolcot, who gave him instructions, and afterwards recommended him as a portrait painter. In 1781 he visited London, where he acquired celebrity by some pictures in the exhibition of the Royal Academy; and those which he painted for the Boydell and Macklin galleries. He was admitted an associate of the Academy in 1786, and an academician the year following. In 1804 he delivered four lectures, which have been published. He died 9 April, 1807, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

OPITZ, MARTIN, Opitius, a German poet, born at Bunzlau, in Silesia, 1597. He became schoolmaster at Weissenberg, and afterwards secretary to a nobleman, at whose expense he travelled to Paris, where he contracted an acquaintance with Grotius. Opitz, who is called the 'father' and 'restorer' of German poetry, died at Danzig 1639. He exercised a great influence over the German tongue, both by his precepts and his own writings. According to German critics, he is the representative of an isolated epoch between the 'meistersengers' and the schools of Lohenstein and Gottsched.

OPORINUS, JOHN, a printer and classical scholar of Basle, born 1507; died 6 July, 1568.

OPPIAN, a Greek poet, who flourished about the year 200.

OPTATUS (ST.), bishop of Melevia, in Africa, in the 4th century. He wrote an able and eloquent treatise against the Donatists; and two dissertations, one a History of that Schism, and the other a Sacred Geography of Africa. The best edition of Optatus is that of Dupin, 1700.

ORANGE, PRINCES OF. See WILLIAM.

ORDERICUS VITALIS, a chronicler, born at Atcham, Shropshire, 17 Feb., 1075; was educated in Normandy, where he entered the monastic state and the priesthood; and died about 1143. His 'Historia Ecclesiastica' has been several times printed, and a translation of it, by T. Forester, forms four volumes of 'Bohn's Antiquarian Library.'

ORELLANA, FRANCISCO, a Spaniard, who deserted from Pizarro and discovered the river Amazon. On his return to Spain he gave a marvellous account of the countries he had passed through, and asserted that he had seen a nation of women, whence the name of Amazon was given to that river. He afterwards perished near the mouth of the same river about 1549.

ORFILA, MATEO JOSÉ BONAVENTURA, a French physician, the founder of the science of toxicology, was born at Port Mahon, Minorca, 24 April, 1787. The scientific reputation of M. Orfila may be said to have commenced with his 'Treatise on Poisons, or General Toxicology.' The next works published by him which acquired European reputation were the 'Elements of Legal Medicine,' and 'Lessons on Legal Medicine,' which went through several editions; but he was also the author of many other works of almost equal celebrity. In the celebrated Laffarge case, M. Raspail, who was opposed to him, disputed with great energy most of his statements, but without effect, and subsequently the opinion expressed by M. Orfila, in opposition to that of M. Raspail, as to the absorption of poisons by the human body after interment by contact with the earth to such an extent as to reveal the presence of a quantity which would lead to a supposition that it had been administered during life, has been confirmed by many eminent men who have been examined on such subjects before courts of law. During the whole reign of Louis Philippe M. Orfila remained at the head of the faculty of medicine at Paris, but after the revolution of February the provisional government revoked his functions. Died at Paris 12 March, 1853.

ORIBASIUS, physician to Julian the apostate. He was a native of Pergamus, and studied under Zeno the Cyprian; after which he settled at Alexandria, where he taught with reputation. The best of his works is the Anatomica, printed in Greek and Latin, at Leyden, 1745.

ORIGEN, an ecclesiastical writer, born at Alexandria, in Egypt, about 185. He received the elements of his education under his father, Leonides, after which he became a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, while Clemens Alexandrinus was his preceptor in theology. At the age of seventeen he lost his father, who was beheaded for his profession of Christianity. Origen had now recourse to the teaching of grammar for the support of himself, his mother, and brethren; but this occupation he relinquished, on being appointed professor of sacred learning in the church of Alexandria. In this situation he distinguished himself by the austerity of his life, which he carried so far as to put in practice the passage of the gospel, 'There be some who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven.' About this time he began his great work, called 'The Tetrapla;' or the Hebrew Bible, with four Greek versions; to which he afterwards added two more, and thus gave the name of 'Hexapla' to the whole. Origen, by taking the order of priest, in Palestine, so offended his diocesan, Demetrius, that he interdicted him from teaching, and caused him to be banished the city. Upon this he went to Cæsarea, where he was protected by the bishops of Palestine. In the persecution raised against the church by Maximinus, Origen fled to Athens, where he wrote his Commentaries on the Scriptures. He afterwards convinced Beryllus, bishop of Bostra, of his error in regard to the pre-existence of Christ; and he next assisted at a council called against some Arabians, who maintained the death of the soul as well as of the body. In the persecution of Decius he was thrown into prison, and so cruelly tortured, that, though his life was spared, his health was destroyed by the sufferings which he underwent. He died at Tyre, in 253 or 254. The most complete edition of Origen's works is by Father De la Rue, a French Benedictine, 4 vols. (1733–59). In his 'Treatise against Celsus,' which has been translated into English, he forcibly vindicates the truth of the Christian religion, and, indeed, according to the opinions of Eusebius and St. Jerome, 'all the objections which have been made, and all which ever will be made, against Christianity, are fully refuted beforehand in this excellent book.' If in some of his works he put forth erroneous doctrine it was unintentionally, and only to reply more forcibly as he thought to the difficulties raised by the Manichæans and philosophers.

ORKNEY, George Hamilton, earl of, was the fifth son of the earl of Selkirk. He entered the army, and distinguished himself at the battle of the Boyne, as well as in several other actions and sieges, for which William III. made him a peer in 1696. In 1704 he was at the battle of Blenheim, where his division captured thirteen hundred French officers and twelve thousand soldiers. After various services in Marlborough's campaigns, particularly at the battle of Malplaquet, he was sworn of the privy council, and made field-marshal. Died 29 Jan., 1736-7.

ORKNEY, James Hepburn, duke of. See Bothwell.

ORLEANS, Charles, duc d', the son of Louis of France, was born 1391, and bore the title of duke of Angoulême during his father's lifetime. He was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt 1415, remained in England twenty-five years, and on his return to France undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother. He was not, however, successful in this enterprise. He was an encourager of letters, and wrote several poems which have been printed. Died 4 Jan., 1465.

ORLEANS, Ferdinand Philippe Louis Charles Henri Joseph, duc d', the eldest son of King Louis Philippe, was born 3 Sept., 1810, being first known as the duke de Chartres, and afterwards as the duke of Orleans and prince royal (1830). He assisted as lieutenant-general at the sieges of Antwerp and Constantine, and in several expeditions in Algiers, in one of which he was wounded. He was killed near Paris, by being thrown out of his carriage, 13 July, 1842.

ORLEANS, Gaston Jean Baptiste, duc d', a younger son of Henry IV. and brother of Louis XIII., was born 1608, and pased his life in intrigues, being always the object of his brother's distrust. He conspired several times against Richelieu, and abandoned to the vengeance of the minister his accomplices, Montmorency (1632) and Cinq-Mars (1642). After the death of the king he was appointed lieutenant-general, and he acquired some glory in the campaigns from 1644 to 1646; but during the wars of the Fronde he gained little credit. Died 2 Feb., 1660.

ORLEANS, Louis, duke of, son of Philip, the regent of France, was born at Versailles 4 Aug., 1703. He married, in 1724, Augusta Maria, of Baden, who died in 1726, on which the prince was so much affected that he took an apartment in the abbey of St. Geneviève, where he devoted himself to study, devotion, and works of charity. His alms were boundless, and in 1733 he saved numbers from perishing by famine in the Orleannois, as he again did throughout France, in the dearth of 1740. He also extended his benevolence to distant countries, while in his own he founded schools, professorships, hospitals and colleges. But his charitable occupations did not draw him aside from his studies, which he pursued with such diligence as to become master of the oriental languages and most of the sciences. He died 4 Feb., 1752, leaving many works in manuscript, among which were Commentaries on the Scriptures, and a Translation of the Psalms.

ORLEANS, Louis Philippe Joseph, duc d', known also by his republican name of Philippe Égalité, the fifth duke of his house, was born at St. Cloud 13 April, 1747, and was known as the duke de Montpensier till 1752, when he took the title of duke de Chartres. He married, in 1769, Louise Marie Adelaide de Bourbon, daughter of the duke de Penthièvre. In 1771 he was banished from the capital in consequence of his refusal to sit in the Maupeon parliament; but he was recalled on the accession of Louis XVI., and commanded a naval squadron in the fight off Ushant, where, it is said, he manifested courage and presence of mind. However this may be, the party which, aided by the queen, controlled the king, did not hesitate to accuse him of cowardice, and to deprive him of his command. Irritated at this insult, he thenceforth bore a mortal hatred of the monarchy, and became the leader of the malcontents and innovators. He occupied a seat in the first assembly of notables, and raised a strong opposition to the existing authorities. The queen procured an order for his banishment; but this only increased his popularity, and the parliament addressed to the king solemn remonstrances and demands for his recall. They were unsuccessful, however, and the exile of the duke lasted till 1788. He presided over the third bureau in the second assembly of notables, where he vehemently opposed the ministerial projects; and some time afterwards he was elected by the constituencies of Villers-Coterets and of Crespy a deputy of the nobility to the states-general. He was among the first nobles who joined the deputies of the commons on the 25th of June, and he aided in transforming the states-general into a national assembly. After the events of the 5th and 6th of October he was accused of having caused the insurrection; and Le Chatelet asked the assembly for permission to prosecute him, but it was refused. At this period he took refuge in London, where he remained eight months. During the sitting of the legislative assembly he endeavoured to obtain a command in the army; but all his overtures were obstinately repulsed by the court. At last came the 10th of August, which was soon followed by the meeting of the national assembly. It was then that he assumed the name of Égalité. Being nominated one of the deputies for Paris to this assembly, he sat among the members of the democratic party, and on the trial of Louis XVI. he had the baseness to vote for the death of his near relative. He now became very unpopular with the revolutionists, and was charged in turn by the Girondists and the Montagnards with aspiring to the throne. A decree was passed for his arrest 7 April, 1793, and he was removed for trial to Marseilles. A verdict of acquittal was the result; but he was afterwards arraigned before the revolutionary tribunal at Paris, condemned to death 6 Nov., 1793, and guillotined the same day. He was the father of Louis Philippe, king of the French.

ORLEANS, PHILIPPE, DUKE OF, son of Philip, the first duke, was born at St. Cloud 2 Aug., 1674. He earned considerable distinction as a military commander; and on the death of Louis XIV. the parliament declared him regent of France, according to the right of birth, during the minority of Louis XV. His regency passed very peaceably, two events excepted—the conspiracy of Celamare, and the confusion in which Law's famous scheme involved both the finances and private property. The affairs of the church, and the bull 'Unigenitus' employed him also during his whole regency. When Louis XV. came of age the duke of Orleans was entreated by him to accept the office of prime minister, and took the oaths accordingly 11 Aug., 1723; but he died suddenly at Versailles on the 2nd of Dec. in the same year.

ORLEANS, PIERRE JOSEPH D', a French Jesuit and historian, born at Bourges 1644; died 31 March, 1698. His chief work, a 'History of the Revolutions of England,' has been translated into English.

ORLEY, BERNARD VAN. See BERNARD OF BRUSSELS.

ORLOFF, GRIGORI GRIGORIEVITCH, a Russian, born 1734, early entered the military service, and became an aide-de-camp of General Shuvaloff, with whose mistress, the Princess Kurakin, he had an intrigue, which brought him under the notice of Catharine II., then grand duchess, who took him under her protection. Rising rapidly in favour with her, he was instrumental in the deposition of her husband, Peter III., and in establishing her upon the throne, a service which gained him the first honours of the empire, including the title of count, conferred also on his four brothers, who had assisted him. His conduct, however, gradually alienated from him the affection of the empress, and the mortification attending his fall finally produced mental alienation, in which condition he died at Moscow 1783. His brother, Alexei Orloff, born 1735, was remarkable for his gigantic stature and Herculean strength. He powerfully aided Gregory in elevating his mistress to the throne, and is said to have strangled the emperor in prison with his own hand. He continued to serve the empress with great zeal and fidelity, and was employed by her in the army and navy. On the accession of Paul I. he was disgraced and banished from Russia. He then went to Germany, and resided for several years at Leipsic, but after the death of Paul he returned to Moscow, and died in that city 1808.

ORME, ROBERT, an historian, was born at Anagco, in India, 1728, and educated at Harrow. He afterwards obtained a civil appointment at Calcutta, and was created a member of the council at Fort St. George. After being elected commissary and accomptant-general in 1753, he embarked for England, for the recovery of his health; but the ship in which he sailed being captured by the French, he did not reach his destination till the spring of 1760. He died at Ealing, Middlesex, 16 Jan., 1801. Mr. Orme's works are, 'The History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Indostan, from the year 1745,' the first volume of which appeared in 1763, and the second in 1778; and 'Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire of the Mahrattas, and of the English Concerns in Indostan.'

ORMOND, JAMES BUTLER, DUKE OF, was the son of Thomas Butler, of London, and born at Newcastle House, Clerkenwell, 1610. He succeeded to the earldom of Ormond on the death of his grandfather, Walter Butler, 1632. At the commencement of the Irish rebellion, 1641, he was appointed lieutenant-general of an army of three thousand men, with which force he succeeded in impeding the progress of the insurgents, for which the king created him marquis of Ormond. In 1643 he defeated the rebels commanded by General Preston; but for want of support he was obliged to conclude a cessation of hostilities, after which he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. On the ruin of the royal cause he went to France; but after the murder of his sovereign, thinking a favourable opportunity offered to rouse the people, he returned to Ireland for that purpose. His endeavours, however, failed, and when Cromwell landed, the marquis embarked again for France. He returned with Charles II. at the Restoration, and was raised to the dukedom; but on account of his attachment to Lord Clarendon, he fell under displeasure at court, and was deprived of his situation of lord-lieutenant. In 1670 a desperate design was formed by Colonel Blood, whom he had imprisoned in Ireland, to seize his person, and hang him at Tyburn; but the duke, by his personal exertions, saved himself from the villain, and at the desire of the king, consented to forgive him, saying, 'that if his majesty could pardon him for attempting to steal the crown, he might easily do so for an attempt upon his life.' At length he was again appointed to the vice-royalty, and in 1682 advanced to an English dukedom. He died at Kingston Hall, Dorsetshire, 21 July, 1688.

OROBIO, BALTHASAR OR ISAAC, a Spaniard or Portuguese, who, after being professor of metaphysics at Salamanca, went to Amsterdam and turned Jew. He died about 1687, leaving three works in Latin, published and refuted by Limborch in his treatise 'De Veritate Religionis Christi;' and 'Certamen Philosophicum propugnatæ veritatis divinæ ac naturalis,' against the system of Spinosa.

OROSIUS, PAUL, a Spanish ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was born at Tarragona, in Catalonia. He was a disciple of St. Augustin, at whose request he compiled a work entitled 'Miseria Humana;' or an account of Calamities. Of this there have been several editions; and an Anglo-Saxon version, by King Alfred, has been published, with a translation by Daines Barrington. Orosius also wrote a Treatise on Free Will, against Pelagius.

ORRERY, CHARLES BOYLE, EARL OF, was second son of Roger, earl of Orrery, and was born at Chelsea 1676. He received his education at Christ Church, Oxford, under Dr. Atterbury, and while at the university engaged in a dispute with Dr. Bentley, respecting the Epistles of Phalaris, a new edition of which was published by Mr. Boyle in 1695. In preparing this edition, however, as well as the defence of it, he was materially assisted by his tutor. On leaving the university he was chosen member of parliament for Huntingdon, and on the death of his brother succeeded to the earldom of Orrery. In 1709 he obtained the rank of major-general and was sworn of the privy council. During the treaty of Utrecht he was envoy-extraordinary to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and on his return was created a British peer by the title of Lord Boyle, Baron of Marston, in Somersetshire. At the accession of George I. he retired from court, and in 1723 was sent to the Tower on suspicion of treason; but after six months' confinement he was discharged. Died 28 Aug., 1731. Besides the works already mentioned he wrote a comedy called 'As you find it;' a copy of verses to Dr. Garth on his Dispensary; and a prologue to Southerne's 'Siege of Capua'. The instrument called the 'Orrery' is said by some to have been invented by this earl; but others, with more justice, ascribe its invention to Mr. Rowley of Lichfield, or Mr. George Graham, both of whom were patronised by his lordship. A memoir of his only son is given under Cork and Orrery.

ORRERY, ROGER BOYLE, EARL OF, fifth son of Richard, earl of Cork, was born in Ireland 25 April, 1621, and at the age of seven was created Lord Broghill. Having finished his education at Trinity College, Dublin, he went abroad, and on his return married the daughter of the earl of Suffolk. During the Irish rebellion he commanded a troop of horse in the forces raised by his father; but when the royal cause was ruined and the king murdered, his lordship retired to his seat in Somersetshire, where he lived privately till 1649. Being, however, much affected by the state of affairs, he resolved to go abroad, and accordingly applied for leave to visit Spa, on the plea that this measure was necessary to his health. The committee of state soon penetrated into his real design, which was that of joining the exiled monarch, and therefore resolved to shut him up in the Tower. Cromwell, being at this time nominated to the command in Ireland, diverted his colleagues from this resolution; and by his persuasion Lord Broghill was induced to accept of a commission under him, to act against the Irish rebels only. His conduct gave Cromwell such satisfaction that, when he became protector, he made him one of his privy council. After the Restoration, which he zealously promoted, he was created earl of Orrery, and constituted one of the lords justices of Ireland. He died 16 Oct., 1679, leaving two sons and five daughters. He wrote some controversial treatises against the Irish Catholics; Parthenissa, a romance; a Treatise on the Art of War; several Poems and Plays; and long after his death his State Letters were published in one volume folio.

ORSINI, FELICE, an Italian revolutionist, born at Meldola, in the States of the Church, 1819. His name is associated with a diabolical attempt to assassinate Napoleon III., emperor of the French, on 14 Jan., 1858, when, as the emperor and empress were approaching the Grand Opera at Paris, three bombs were thrown under their carriage. A large number of persons were killed or wounded, but the intended victims escaped unhurt. Orsini was guillotined 13 March, 1858. His associates were Pierio and Rubio, who were also executed; and Gomez, who was condemned to hard labour for life.

ORTELIUS, ABRAHAM, a geographer, was born at Antwerp April, 1527. In his travels he visited England and became acquainted with Camden. On his return home he was appointed geographer to Philip II. of Spain. Died 28 June, 1598. His great work, an atlas, entitled 'Theatrum Orbis Terrarum,' appeared in 1570.

ORTON, JOB, a dissenting minister, born at Shrewsbury, 4 Sept., 1717. He was educated at the free school of his native place, and next under Dr. Doddridge, at Northampton. In 1741 he became minister of the united congregations at Shrewsbury, to whom he officiated till 1765, when he resigned the charge on account of ill health, and in 1766 retired to Kidderminster, where he died 19 July, 1783. His principal works are, Discourses on Eternity; Memoirs of Dr. Doddridge; Religious Exercises; Discourses to the Aged; Christian Zeal, three Discourses; Christian Worship, three Discourses; Discourses on practical Subjects; Sacramental Meditations; Summary of doctrinal and practical Religion; Exposition of the Old Testament, 6 vols.; Letters to a young Clergyman.

OSBORNE, FRANCIS, an English writer, was born about 1589, of an ancient family in Bedfordshire, but was neither educated at a public school nor university. In the civil war he joined the parliament. Died 11 Feb., 1659. His principal works, which were prohibited by authority, are, 'Advice to a Son;' Plea for a Free State compared with Monarchy; Turkish Policy, a Discourse on Machiavel; Historical Memoires on the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James. These, with other tracts, have been frequently printed in a collected form.

OSBORNE, SIR THOMAS, afterwards earl of Danby and duke of Leeds. See LEEDS.

OSIANDER, ANDREW, a Protestant divine, born in Bavaria 1498, became minister and professor at Konigsberg, where he died 1552. His works are, Harmonia Evangelica; Dissertationes de Lege et Evangelio, et Justificatione; and Liber de Imagine Dei. There were several other Protestant divines of the same name.

OSMUND (ST.), a celebrated bishop of Salisbury, died 1099, and was canonized 350 years later by Pope Calixtus III. He corrected the liturgy, which, thus reformed, came into very general use throughout England.

OSSOLI. See FULLER.

OSSORY, THOMAS BUTLER, EARL OF, son of James, duke of Ormond, was born at Kilkenny 1634. He fought gallantly in the Rebellion, and in 1666 was summoned to the House of Peers by the title of Lord Butler, of Moore Park. The same year he bore a distinguished part in the great engagement with the Dutch fleet, and in 1673 was made full admiral. In 1677 he commanded the English troops in the service of the prince of Orange, and was at the battle of Mons. Died 30 July, 1680.

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN, a painter, born at Lubeck 1610. He was a disciple of Frank Hals, after which he became a close imitator of Teniers, and chose the same low subjects, which he represented in an admirable manner. He was also a good engraver, and his etchings, as well as his pictures, fetch high prices. He died 1685. His younger brother, Isaac van Ostade (born 1617; died 1671), was also an artist in the same style.

OSTERVALD, JOHN FREDERICK, a Protestant divine, of Neufchatel, in Switzerland, born there 1683; died 1747. His principal writings are, 'Arguments of the Books and Chapters of the Bible;' 'Treatise concerning the causes of the present Corruption of Christians;' 'Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion;' 'The Nature of Uncleanness;' and 'Lectures on the Exercise of the Sacred Ministry.' All these have been translated into English.

O'TOOLE, ST. LAURENCE. See LAURENCE.

OTTLEY, WILLIAM YOUNG, F.R.S., F.S.A., an artist, picture collector, and writer on the fine arts, was appointed keeper of the prints in the British Museum 1833, and died 26 May, 1836, æt. 65. His principal publications are, 'The Italian School of Design,' 1808-23, being a collection of facsimiles of drawings by the best Italian masters; 'The Florentine School of Design,' 1826; and 'An Inquiry into the Origin and early History of Engraving upon Copper and in Wood, with an account of Engravers and their Works, from the invention of chalcography by Maso Finiguerra to the time of Mark Antonio Raimondi,' 2 vols., 1816.

OTWAY, THOMAS, a dramatic writer, born 3 March, 1651-2, at Trottin, in Sussex, being the son of Humphrey Otway, rector of Woolbeding. He was educated at Winchester School, and next at Christ Church, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and in 1672 made an attempt on the stage without success. But though he failed as an actor he had better fortune as a writer. His first tragedy was 'Alcibiades,' which appeared in 1675, and was followed by 'Don Carlos' in 1676. The year following came out 'Titus and Berenice,' a translation from Racine, and the 'Cheats of Scapin,' a farce, from Molière. In 1678 he produced a comedy called 'Friendship in Fashion.' About this time he obtained a commission as cornet in the troops sent to Flanders; but he soon quitted the military life, and resumed his dramatic pursuits. In 1680 appeared his 'Caius Marius,' which was followed by 'The Orphan.' In 1682 he produced the tragedy of 'Venice Preserved;' which, like 'The Orphan,' exhibits a powerful command of the human heart. Otway died, in the extremity of indigence, at a public-house on Tower Hill, 14 April, 1685.

OUDENAERDE. See AUDENAERDE.

OUDINOT, NICOLAS CHARLES, a marshal of France, born at Bar-le-Duc 25 April, 1767. In 1791 he was major in the brave regiment of Volunteers of the Meuse, with which he defended the fortress of Bitche against the Prussians in 1792, and made 700 prisoners. He was immediately afterwards apointed to command the regiment of Picardy, and in 1794 he was made a general of brigade for his bravery in the battle of Moorlautern. He captured Treves 7 Aug., 1794, and remained in command of the town. Oudinot was nearly cut to pieces by sabre-wounds on the 18th of October, 1795, in a night attack, and was made prisoner, but was exchanged after a period of five months. At the blockade of Ingoldstadt he received a gun-shot wound in the thigh and several sabre-cuts on the arm and neck. He was appointed general of division on 12 April, 1799. He commanded a division at Ulm and at Zurich, and subsequently acted as Massena's principal aide-de-camp, and brought the account of the armistice of Treviso to Paris. In 1805 he commanded the grenadiers at the camp of Boulogne. He entered Vienna forty-five days afterwards, whence he marched to force the bridges of the Danube. Oudinot afterwards took part in the battles of Wertingen, Armstetten, and Juntersdorff, where he was again wounded, and eminently distinguished himself at Austerlitz. He was at the battle of Jena, and he entered Berlin 28 Oct., 1806, whence he passed into Poland. He gained the victory of Ostrolenka 6 Feb., 1807. Napoleon raised him to the dignity of a count of the empire, with a dotation of 1,000,000 francs. Oudinot figured subsequently at the siege of Dantzig, at Friedland, and at Tilsit. He was governor of Erfurt 1808, defeated the Austrians 13 May, 1809, and won fresh laurels at Wagram. He entered Vienna, and the emperor created him a marshal of France. In 1810 he took possession of Holland in the absence of King Louis, who had quitted the throne. He afterwards made the campaign of Russia, and that of 1814. After the restoration of the Bourbons Louis XVIII. appointed him colonel-general of grenadiers, and governor of Metz. During the Hundred Days he lived in retirement. Under the second restoration Louis XVIII. appointed him commander-in-chief of the national guard of Paris, and decorated him with his orders. Marshal Oudinot made the campaign of Spain in 1823, when he captured and governed Madrid. Louis Philippe made him chancellor of the Legion of Honour 1839, and governor of the Hôtel des Invalides 1842. Died at Paris 13 Sept., 1847.

OUDRY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter and engraver, born at Paris 1686; died 1755.

OUGHTRED, WILLIAM, a mathematician, born at Eton 1573 or 1574. He received his education at Eton School, and was elected from thence to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. While at the university he invented a new method of geometrical dialling. On entering into orders, he was presented to the living of Shalford, Surrey, which he resigned for that of Albury, in the same county. About the time that Lord Napier invented logarithms our author wrote his Treatise on Trigonometry, on the same plan as his lordship's canon. In prosecuting his subject, he also invented an instrument, called 'The Circles of Proportion.' In 1631 he published a treatise, entitled 'Arithmeticæ in numeris et speciebus institutio, quæ tum logisticæ tum analyticæ, atque totius mathematicæ clavis est.' This 'Clavis,' though small, contains the essence of the science, and the plan of it was followed by Newton, in his Universal Arithmetic. Oughtred suffered some trouble from the zealots in the civil war, but he lived to see the Restoration, and is said to have died of joy, occasioned by that event, 30 June, 1660. In 1676 his Miscellaneous Tracts were printed at Oxford, under the title of 'Opuscula Mathematica.'

OUTRAM, Sir JAMES, a British general, born in Scotland 1805, and educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen. In early life he received a nomination to a cadetship in the Bombay Native Infantry, and proceeded thither in 1819. In 1838, when the Affghan war broke out, Lord Keane, the commander-in-chief, appointed him his aide-de-camp, in which capacity he served at the siege and capture of Ghuznee. As a recognition of his services, he was soon afterwards appointed political resident at the court of the Ameers of Scinde. While holding this position, he had a violent quarrel with Sir Charles Napier, then commander-in-chief of Bombay. Outram believed the Ameers would observe the treaties into which they had entered, but Sir Charles, on the other hand, distrusted them, and proposed to them a more stringent treaty. The Ameers, who not unnaturally resisted this proposal, were dispossessed and Scinde was annexed to the British crown. Outram afterwards held a succession of political offices in Sattara and at Baroda, as well as at Bombay. He was appointed political commissioner at Oude 1856, and on the outbreak of the Persian war he was nominated commander of the expedition that was sent to operate from the Persian Gulf, having Sir Henry Havelock as his second in command. The restoration of peace and the return of the expeditionary force was singularly opportune, as it was able to take part in crushing the great mutiny which just then broke out. The brilliant march of the 17th Highlanders and other regiments under the command of Brigadier Havelock, their victories at Bithoor and Cawnpore, their arrival at the latter town too late to save the English captives, though prompt to avenge their fate, must always occupy a conspicuous place in our military annals. Outram, when at last able to rejoin the force, finding his old subordinate in the full career of success, generously declined to deprive him of his command, and accompanied him as a friend and adviser only, till the army had forced its way into the residency of Lucknow and relieved the beleaguered garrison. He now resumed the position with which he had been entrusted by Lord Canning of political commissioner of Oude and military commander. For his services in inducing the natives to submit to the new régime he was created a baronet and gazetted to the rank of a lieutenant-general. He died at Paris 11 March, 1863.

OUTRAM, WILLIAM, D.D., was born in Derbyshire 1625. He became fellow of Trinity College, and afterwards of Christ's College, Cambridge. After holding the living of St. Mary Woolnoth, he obtained the archdeaconry of Leicester, and a prebend of Westminster, which he held with the rectory of St. Margaret. Died 23 Aug., 1679. Dr. Outram was the author of a work, entitled 'De Sacrificiis,' 8vo.; and after his death was published a volume of his sermons.

OVERALL, JOHN, an English prelate, born 1559, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he removed to a fellowship in Trinity College. In 1596 he was appointed regius professor of divinity, and elected master of Catherine Hall. In 1601 he became dean of St. Paul's, and in 1614 bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence, in 1618, he was translated to Norwich, where he died 12 May, 1619. He compiled 'The Convocation Book,' in which he maintained the divine origin of government. He had also some concern in the 'authorised' translation of the Bible, and wrote the sacramental part of the church catechism.

OVERBECK, FRIEDRICH, founder of the modern German religious school of painting, born at Lübeck 3 July, 1789, commenced his artistic education at Vienna 1806, and as a student gave evidence of the peculiar bent of his genius. In 1810 he went to Rome, with Schadow, Veit, and Cornelius, embraced the Catholic faith, and made that city his residence. A Madonna, exhibited in 1811, attracted much attention, but the first considerable work executed by the artists of the new school were the frescoes from the 'History of Joseph,' at the villa of the Prussian consul-general Bartholdy. Of these, Overbeck painted the 'Selling of Joseph,' and the 'Seven Lean Years,' in 1816, and the school won a still higher reputation by the frescoes at the villa of the Marchese Massini, in 1817, of which Overbeck furnished five large compositions from Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered.' His best fresco is the 'Miracle of Roses of St. Francis,' in the church at Assisi. His oil-paintings are not numerous: the best known out of Italy are 'The Entrance of Christ into Jerusalem,' and 'The Descent from the Cross,' at Lübeck; the former picture was finished and exhibited at Rome in 1824. In addition to these he painted 'Christ on the Mount of Olives,' at Hamburg; the 'Nuptials of the Blessed Virgin;' several 'Holy Families;' the 'Death of St. Joseph;' and the great painting in the Stadel Institute at Frankfort, representing the 'Influence of Religion upon Art.' His drawings, 'Christ Blessing Little Children,' 'John, the Preacher in the Wilderness,' 'The Raising of the Young Man at Nain,' and the 'Gathering of the Manna,' afford proof of his artistic powers. The school to which Overbeck belonged is characterized by much of the simplicity of the early painters. His fundamental belief was that art does not exist for its own sake, but only to subserve the cause of religion. Many of his productions have been engraved. He was made foreign associate of the French Institute, and published at Paris, in 1842–3, a splendid edition of the 'Passion de N. S. Jésus-Christ.' Died at Rome Nov., 1869.

OVERBEECK, BONAVENTURE VAN, a Dutch painter, whose memory is kept alive by his work entitled 'Reliquiæ antiquæ urbis Romæ,' published in 1709. Born at Amsterdam 1660; died 1706.

OVERBURY, Sir THOMAS, was born at Ilmington, Warwickshire, about 1581, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford, after which he became a student of the Middle Temple. The intimacy which he formed with Robert Carr, afterwards earl of Somerset, proved his ruin. In 1608 he was knighted, and his father was made one of the judges for Wales; but at length Overbury, by venturing to dissuade his friend from marrying the divorced countess of Essex, provoked the anger of both, and, through their contrivance, he was sent to the Tower, where he was poisoned 15 Sept., 1613. This iniquitous deed was not discovered till two years afterwards, when Sir Gervase Elways, lieutenant of the Tower, and some others, were tried and executed; but the principals were pardoned. Sir Thomas Overbury wrote a poem, entitled 'The Wife;' which, with his piece called 'Characters,' went through many editions.

OVID (PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO), a poet of the Augustan age, was of the equestrian order, and born at Sulmo, now called Abruzzo, in the year of Rome 710. He studied the law, and pleaded with eloquence in the court of the centumviri. He was also constituted one of the triumviri, whose authority extended to the trial of capital causes. On succeeding to the paternal estate, he quitted the bar for poetry and pleasure. His writings and his morals, however, appear to have coincided, for he indulged in a prurient fancy, and repudiated two of his wives soon after marriage. Yet he lived happily with his third consort, and derived consolation from her attachment when he fell under the displeasure of Augustus, who, for some cause, never explained, banished him to Tomos, in Scythia, where he died A.D. 17. The best editions of Ovid are that of Heinsius, Amsterdam, 1661, 3 vols.; and of Burman, at the same place, 4 vols., 1727.

OVIEDO, MATTHEW DE, a Franciscan, native of Segovia. He accompanied the Spanish forces to Ireland 1601, having been in the preceding year appointed archbishop of Dublin. When he died is unknown.

OWEN, EDWARD PRYCE, only son of Archdeacon Hugh Owen, was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. 1810; M.A. 1816. After officiating for some time at Park Street Chapel, Grosvenor Square, he became vicar of Wellington, and rector of Eyton, Salop (1823–40). Mr. Owen was an accomplished artist, and published the 'Book of Etchings,' 2 vols. folio, 1842–55. He died at Cheltenham 15 July, 1863, aged 76.

OWEN GLENDOWER. See GLENDOWER.

OWEN, HENRY, M.D., a divine, born near Dolgelly, Merionethshire, 1716. He received his education at Ruthin School, Denbighshire, and next at Jesus College, Oxford, where he studied physic, and took his doctor's degree 1753. After practising a few years, he entered into orders, and obtained the living of Terling, Essex, which he resigned 1760, on being presented to the rectory of St. Olave, Hart Street; to which was added, in 1775, the living of Edmonton. Died 14 Oct., 1795. He wrote, among other things, The Intent and Propriety of the Scripture Miracles; Observations on the four Gospels; Enquiry into the State of the Septuagint Version of the Old Testament; The Intent and Propriety of the Scripture Miracles, in a Series of Sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture, 2 vols.; Critica Sacra, or a short Introduction to Hebrew Criticism; Collatio Codicis Cottoniani Geneseos cum editione Romana à viro clarissimo Joanne Ernesto Grabe, jam olim facta, nunc demum summa cura edita; Critical Disquisitions.

OWEN, HUGH, F.S.A., son of a physician at Shrewsbury, received his academical education at St. John's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1783; M.A. 1807), and after taking orders obtained several valuable preferments, including the living of St. Mary's, in his native town, and the archdeaconry of Salop. In conjunction with J. B. Blakeway he compiled 'The History of Shrewsbury,' 2 vols., 1825. Died 23 Dec., 1827, aged 66.

OWEN, JOHN, Audoënus, the epigrammatist, was born at Armon, Caernarvonshire, and educated at Winchester School, whence he was elected to New College, Oxford, where he proceeded to his bachelor's degree in civil law, and obtained a fellowship. He afterwards taught school at Trylegh, Monmouthshire, and in 1594 became master of that at Warwick. He died in London 1622. His epigrams came out in portions, and were at last published in one volume; and in 1794 Renouard printed an edition of them at Paris.

OWEN, JOHN, D.D., an Independent minister, born at Stadham, Oxfordshire, where his father was vicar, 1616. He studied at Queen's College, Oxford; but after taking his degrees in arts he turned nonconformist, and in the Rebellion distinguished himself so zealously that the committee for purging the church appointed him to the living of Fordham, in Essex, from whence he removed to Coggeshall, in the same county. The very day after the murder of Charles I. he preached a sermon before the House of Commons; and he made himself so acceptable to the men in power, that Cromwell took him to Ireland, where, however, he did not remain long. He next accompanied Oliver to Scotland, and in 1651 was made dean of Christ Church, Oxford, on which appointment he received his doctor's degree. He served the office of vice-chancellor with great credit; but on the death of Oliver he was deprived of that situation, as he afterwards was of the deanery. In 1673 he took the charge of a congregation in Leadenhall Street. He died at Ealing 24 Aug., 1683. His works are numerous, and of the high Calvinistic character. The principal are, A Display of Arminianism; Treatise on the Perseverance of the Saints; 'Vindiciæ Evangelicæ,' against the Socinians; 'De natura, ortu, progressu, et studio veræ Theologiæ;' Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 4 vols.; Exposition of the 130th Psalm; A Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit; The Glorious Mystery of the Person of Christ; Tracts and Sermons.

OWEN, JOHN HUGH, a Jesuit, was a native of Anglesea, and died at Holywell, Flintshire, 28 Dec., 1686, æt. 71. He published anonymously a treatise 'On the grievousness of Mortal Sin, especially of Heresy,' London, 1668; a Catechism in Welsh; and the prayer-book called 'The Key of Heaven,' London, 1670.—Oliver.

OWEN, LEWIS, D.D., LL.D., a Catholic prelate, born at Maltraeth, co. Anglesea, 1533, and educated at Winchester School and New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In Queen Mary's reign he was chosen professor of canon law at Oxford; but shortly after the accession of Elizabeth, being attached to the old religion, he retired to Flanders, and was appointed regius professor of canon law at Douay. He was also made a canon of Cambrai, official of the chapter, and archdeacon of Hainault. Going subsequently to Rome, he was employed by the papal court in several ecclesiastical affairs of the highest importance. St. Charles Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, chose him to be one of the vicar-generals of his diocese 1580, at the same time taking him into his family, where he was an eye-witness of the edifying life of the great saint, who, not long after, died in Dr. Owen's arms. He was made bishop of Cassano, in the kingdom of Naples, 1588, and died at Rome 14 Oct., 1594. The English colleges at Douay and Rome were founded by the joint endeavours of Dr. Owen and his intimate friend Dr., afterwards Cardinal Allen.

OWEN, ROBERT, a social reformer, born at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, 1771. At the age of eighteen he became partner in a cotton mill, and subsequently removed to Chorlton Mills, near Manchester. Prospering in this undertaking, he married, in 1801, the daughter of David Dale, a Glasgow manufacturer, and afterwards assumed the charge of a large cotton factory at New Lanark, Scotland, belonging to his father-in-law. Here he introduced a patriarchal system of social reform, which proved, for a time, highly successful. He then turned his attention to more extensive social evils, and published 'New Views of Society, or Essays upon the Formation of Human Character,' 1812; and subsequently a 'Book of the New Moral World,' in which he maintained a theory of modified communism, insisting on an absolute equality in all rights and duties, and the abolition of all superiority, even that of capital and intelligence. In 1823 he went to the United States, and founded a communist society at New Harmony, in Indiana. The scheme, of course, proved an utter failure, and in 1827 he returned to this country, where experiments of a similar nature, attended by a similar result, were made at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire, and at Tytherley, in Hampshire. Owen succeeded no better in establishing a 'Labour Exchange' in London, in connection with a bazaar and bank. In 1828 he went to Mexico, on the invitation of the government, to carry out his experiment there, but effected nothing. He and his followers, called Owenites, became, in 1827, the soul of the labour leagues out of which sprang the Chartist movement. During his latter years Owen was a believer in spiritualism, and published several conversations held with Benjamin Franklin and other persons. He died at Newtown 19 Nov., 1858.

OWEN, THOMAS, a native of Hampshire, who, having entered the Society of Jesus, succeeded Father Persons in the rectorship of the English College at Rome 1610, and died 6 Dec., 1618, aged 62. He translated from the French 'A Defence of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus,' 1610; 'An Answer to Anti-Cotton,' 1611; 'A Letter of Cardinal Perron to Isaac Casaubon,' 1612. All these works were printed at St. Omer.

OWEN, WILLIAM, a painter, born in Shropshire 1769. He went to school at Ludlow, and by the advice of Mr. Payne Knight, who resided in the neighbourhood, he was afterwards sent to London, where he became a pupil of Charles Catton, and was favourably noticed by Sir Joshua Reynolds. In 1806 he became a member of the Royal Academy, and in 1813 principal portrait painter to the prince regent, afterwards George IV. He executed many admirable portraits, and occasionally painted historical subjects. Died 11 Feb., 1825.

OWENSON, Miss SYDNEY. See MORGAN, LADY.

OXENEDES, JOHN DE, an English chronicler, was probably a native of Oxnead, Norfolk. He became a monk of the abbey of St. Benet Holme. His Chronicle was edited by Sir Henry Ellis, under the direction of the master of the Rolls, London, 8vo., 1859.

OXENSTIERN, AXEL, a Swedish statesman, born 1583. He was the favourite of Gustavus Adolphus, after whose death he conducted the affairs of the kingdom with equal ability and integrity. There is a history of Sweden which bears his name; but its authenticity is doubtful. Died 28 Aug., 1654.

OXFORD, EDWARD VERE, EARL OF, was the only son of John, the sixteenth earl, and was born about 1540. He had a rencontre with Sir Philip Sidney, which did not redound to his honour; and in 1586 he sat as lord high chamberlain at the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, as he did afterwards on the earls of Arundel, Essex, and Southampton. He married a daughter of the great Lord Burghley, but treated her inhumanly, out of spite for his father's refusal to save the life of the duke of Norfolk. Died July, 1604. Some of his poems are in the Paradise of Dainty Devices. His lady also wrote sonnets and odes.

OXFORD, ROBERT HARLEY, EARL OF, was the son of Sir Edward Harley, and born in London 5 Dec., 1661. At the Revolution he was returned to the House of Commons for Tregony, Cornwall; in 1690 he was chosen one of the commissioners for stating the public accounts, and, in 1694, was ordered to bring in a bill for the frequent meeting of parliaments. In 1702 he was chosen speaker, which office he held while secretary of state, but resigned the latter place in 1708. In 1710 he was constituted one of the commissioners of the Treasury, and chancellor of the Exchequer. On the 8th of March, that year, he was stabbed by the marquis of Guiscard, a Frenchman, when under examination at the council-board. The assassin died in prison; and Mr. Harley, on his recovery, received the congratulations of the House of Commons. The year following he was advanced to the peerage, and made lord high treasurer; which office he resigned a few days before the death of Queen Anne, in 1714. The next year he was impeached by the House of Commons of high treason, and committed to the Tower, where he was kept two years, and then, after a public trial, was acquitted. He died 21 May, 1724. Lord Oxford was a liberal encourager of literature, and a great collector of books. These were sold to Osborn, and the printed catalogue of them makes four volumes 8vo. The manuscripts are in the British Museum. His lordship wrote, A Letter to Swift for correcting and improving the English Tongue; An Essay on Public Credit; An Essay upon Loans; A Vindication of the Rights of the Commons of England.

OZANAM, JACQUES, a French mathematician, born at Bouligneux (Dombes) 1640; died 3 April, 1717.

OZELL, JOHN, was born in England, of a French family, and received a liberal education, with a view to the church, which profession he declined for business. He became auditor-general of the City and Bridge accounts, and also of the accounts of St. Paul's Cathedral and St. Thomas's Hospital. Died 15 Oct., 1743. His principal works are translations from the French, Italian, and Spanish, among which are Rabelais, Don Quixote, and Molière. The only book of any merit, however, which he published is entitled 'Common Prayer and Common Sense in several places of the Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, French, Latin, and Greek Translations of the English liturgy,' 1722. Ozell was a man of consummate vanity, and, as such, is recorded by Pope, in the Dunciad.

OZEROFF, VLADISLAS, a Russian tragic poet, born 29 Sept., 1770; died, 1816.

P.

PAAS, CORNELIUS, an engraver, was a native of Germany, but settled at an early age in this country, where he was appointed engraver to the king. He died at his residence in Holborn, London, 8 Jan., 1806, aged 65.

PAAS, or PASSE, CRISPIN, an engraver of Utrecht, who resided some time in England, where he executed a number of portraits. Afterwards he appears to have settled at Amsterdam, his drawing-book being published in that city 1643. He also illustrated several works with fine plates. He had three sons and a daughter, who were all eminent artists in the same line.

PAAW, PETER, Pavius, a physician, born at Amsterdam 1564; became in 1589 professor of medicine at Leyden, where he founded the botanic garden, and died Aug., 1617. His writings are on medical and botanical subjects.

PACCHIAROTTO, JAMES, a painter of Sienna, who flourished between 1497 and 1535.

PACE, RICHARD, a divine and statesman, was born in Hampshire, about 1482. He studied at Padua, and on his return became a member of Queen's College, Oxford, but soon afterwards accompanied Cardinal Bambridge to Rome. In 1515 he was sent to the court of Vienna, and in 1522 was made dean of Exeter. He was also dean of St. Paul's; but falling under the displeasure of Wolsey, he lost his preferments, became deranged, and died at Stepney 1532. He wrote a book on the lawfulness of Henry's marriage with Catharine of Arragon, and some other works. He was the correspondent of Erasmus.

PACHECO, FRANCESCO, a Spanish painter, and writer on his art, born at Seville 1571; died 1654.

PACIAUDI, PAOLO MARIA, an Italian monk of the Theatine order, one of the most learned and laborious antiquaries of the eighteenth century, was born at Turin 1710, obtained the highest dignities in his order; became librarian to the duke of Parma 1761; and died at Parma 2 Feb., 1785. His principal works are, A Series of Medals, representing the chief events of the government of Malta; De Sacris Christianorum Balneis; De Athletarum Cubistesi; Monumenta Peloponnesia; Memoirs of the Grand Masters of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem; De Libris Eroticis Antiquorum.

PACIUS, JULIUS, a celebrated civilian, born at Vicenza 1550; died 1635.

PACK, RICHARDSON, a poetical and miscellaneous writer, was born in Suffolk about 1680, received his education at Oxford, attained the rank of major in the army, and died at Aberdeen Sept., 1728. His 'Whole Works' were published in an 8vo. vol. 1729.

PACUVIUS, MARCUS, a nephew of Ennius, was born at Brundusium about 220 B.C., and became celebrated at Rome, both as a painter and a tragic poet. Of his tragedies only a few unimportant fragments are extant.

PAER, FERDINANDO, a musical composer, born at Parma 12 July, 1774. Precocious like Mozart, he went to Venice at the age of fifteen, and brought out 'Circe,' an opera of his own composition, which met with considerable success. Here he remained several years to finish his musical education, and then he visited in succession Padua, Milan, Florence, Bologna, Rome, and Naples, everywhere increasing his reputation. On his return to Parma the grand-duke, his godfather, granted him a pension. In 1795 he repaired to Vienna, and in 1801 he was appointed chapel-master to the Elector of Saxony. During his sojourn at Dresden he composed 'Leonoro,' 'I Fuorusciti,' and several other operas. In 1806 he was taken into the service of the Emperor Napoleon, and appointed composer and conductor of the chamber music of the Empress Marie-Louise. From this time forward he resided principally in Paris, where he was for several years director of the Italian Opera. Died 3 May, 1839. The best of his operas are 'Griselda,' 'Camilla,' 'Agnese,' 'Achille,' and 'Sargino.'

PAGAN, BLAISE FRANÇOIS, Comte DE, a French nobleman, born 1604; died 18 Nov., 1665. He acquired great distinction in the army, was one of the principal military engineers of his time, and wrote some esteemed works on fortification, geometry, and astronomy.

PAGANINI, NICOLO, the most wonderful of violinists, was born at Genoa 18 Feb., 1784, and received his earliest instruction from his father. In his ninth year he performed with great applause in the theatre of his native city. He afterwards became a pupil of Costa at Genoa, and next of Paer and Ghiretti at Parma. After performing at Lucca, Leghorn, Milan, Turin, Florence, Naples, and Rome, he visited Palermo, whence he went to Vienna and Berlin. In Feb., 1831, he arrived at Paris, and in May following in London. At both these capitals his reception was enthusiastic, and his profits enormous. He died at Nice 27 May, 1840. By a Jewess named Antonia Bianchi he had one son, Achillino, to whom he left the bulk of his vast fortune.

PAGE, WILLIAM, D.D., was born at Harrow, Middlesex, 1590, and educated at Oxford. In 1629 he became master of Reading School; but he was deprived of this post during the Rebellion, though he continued to hold the living of East Locking, Berkshire, till his death on 14 Feb., 1663. He wrote 'A Treatise in Justification of Bowing at the name of Jesus;' 'Animadversions on Hales's Tract concerning Schism;' and a translation of the 'Imitation of Christ.'

PAGET, EUSEBIUS, a Puritan divine, born at Cranford, in Northamptonshire, about 1542, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He became successively vicar of Oundle, and rector of Langton, in his native county. Afterwards he removed to the living of Kilkhampton, Cornwall, and lastly to St. Anne's, Aldersgate Street, where he died in May, 1617. He wrote 'A History of the Bible,' and some other works. His son, Ephraim Paget, was born 1575, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He obtained the living of St. Edmund the King, in Lombard Street, of which he was deprived in the Rebellion. He then retired to Deptford, where he died in April, 1647. His works are, Christianographia, or a Description of the different Sorts of Christians in the World; and Hæresiographia, or a Description of the Heresies of later Times.

PAGET, HENRY WILLIAM, Marquis of Anglesey. See ANGLESEY.

PAGI, ANTOINE, a learned Cordelier, born at Rognes, in Provence, 1624; died at Aix 5 June, 1699. His chief literary performance is a Critique upon Baronius's Annals, in which he was assisted by his nephew, François Pagi (b. 1654; d. 1721), who was also a Cordelier, and who wrote a history of the Popes, entitled 'Breviarium Historico-chronologico-criticum.'

PAGNINO, SANTE, in Latin Sanctes Pagninus, a Dominican, born at Lucca 1466, devoted twenty-five years to a translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew text, which he followed with admirable precision. He afterwards translated the New Testament, and compiled a Hebrew Lexicon and Grammar. He died at Lyons 1536.

PAINE, THOMAS, a political and infidel writer, born 1737, at Thetford, Norfolk, where he was brought up to the business of a stay-maker. He afterwards became an exciseman at Lewes; but being dismissed for some malpractices, he went to America, where he contributed much to the Revolution by a pamphlet entitled 'Common Sense;' for which he was rewarded with five hundred pounds by the legislature of Pennsylvania. He also obtained a grant of land in the province of New York. In 1790 he came to London, and excited considerable notice by his 'Rights of Man,' in answer to Burke. A prosecution, however, being instituted against Paine, he went to France, where he was chosen into the national assembly; but in the time of Robespierre he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped the guillotine. During this confinement he wrote his infamous work called 'The Age of Reason,' in which he endeavoured to bring religion into contempt. After his liberation he published some political tracts of little moment; but one of them was a scandalous attack upon the character of Washington. In 1802 he went to America, where he ended a debauched life 8 June, 1809.

PAISIELLO, GIOVANNI, a musical composer, born at Tarentum 9 May, 1741, was one of Durante's pupils. He made his début in dramatic composition 1763, when he produced two comic operas, 'La Pupilla' and 'Il Mondo al Roveseio,' which spread his reputation throughout his native county; and he gained a European renown by 'La Madama Umorista,' 'Demetrio,' 'Artaserce,' 'Le Virtuose Ridicole,' 'Il Negligente,' 'Il Marchese Tulipano,' 'L'Idole Cinese,' 'Le due Contesse,' and 'La Disfatta di Dario.' After residing nine years in Russia, on the invitation of the Empress Catharine, he proceeded to Warsaw, where he set to music for the king of Poland Metastasio's oratorio of the 'Passion,' and to Vienna, where he composed for the Emperor Joseph II. the opera of 'Il Re Teodoro.' Returning to Italy, he brought out at Rome, in 1785, 'L'Amore Ingegnoso,' and then settled for ten years at Naples, where he produced a large number of masterpieces, among which 'La Molinara' and 'La Nina' deserve special mention. Subsequently, on the invitation of Napoleon, he spent two years and a half in France. His death occurred at Naples, 5 June, 1816. Besides the operas above mentioned, he composed 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia' (since superseded by Rossini's opera with the same title), 'Il Tamburro Notturno,' 'La Serva Padrona,' 'Antigono,' 'Elfrida,' 'Andromacha,' Catone in Utica,' &c., and a great deal of church music.

PAJOU, Augustin, a French sculptor, born at Paris 1730; died there 1809.

PALAFOX Y MELZI, José, a Spanish patriot, born at Torre del Alfranca, Aragon, 1780. His family was one of the oldest in Aragon. At an early age he entered the royal body-guard, and became part of the military household of the king of Spain. As an officer in the body-guard he accompanied the royal family to Bayonne, 1808. There the king was retained a prisoner; but Palafox escaped in a peasant's dress, and repaired to his estate near Saragossa. In the same year the revolted city was menaced by the French army under Lefebvre-Desnouelles, and the populace proclaimed him captain-general of Aragon (May 23). He is represented by Sir W. F. P. Napier and some Spanish historians as totally unfitted for the position, and indebted to others for the temporary success of his defence. Soldiers from the adjacent country were called into the city; barricades were erected in every street, and nearly every house was made a point of resistance. After a siege of sixty-one days the French retired; but they returned in greater force successively under Moncey, Mortier, Junot, and Lannes, and the city capitulated in Feb., 1809. Palafox was not in active command at the time, being ill of a prevalent epidemic. The capitulation provided that Palafox should depart free, and that no one should be molested; but the city was pillaged, blood profusely shed, and Palafox, still prostrate with the malady, sent a prisoner to Vincennes. He was only released upon the restoration of Ferdinand VII. in 1813, when he returned to Madrid with the king, and was confirmed in his position of captain-general of Aragon. Nevertheless he pronounced in 1820 for the constitution, and in 1823 signed a protest against the royal power. In 1833 he joined the party of Queen Isabella, and was soon afterwards imprisoned upon suspicion of some correspondence with the queen's enemies, but was liberated upon proof of his innocence. Palafox was made duke of Saragossa 1836, and died at Paris 16 Feb., 1847.

PALESTRINA, Giovanni Pierluigi da, a musical composer, born at the ancient Prænestе, now called Palestrina, about 1524. He was master of the chapel of St. Peter's at Rome, where he died 2 Feb., 1594. His church music stands in the highest estimation, and he was styled by his contemporaries the 'Prince of Music.' The most remarkable of his compositions are the famous 'Mass of Pope Marcellus,' a 'Stabat Mater,' and the celebrated motett 'Populeus.'

PALEY, William, D.D., the son of a clergyman, was born at Peterborough July, 1743. He became a sizar of Christ's College, Cambridge, where, in 1763, he took his first degree. After this he was employed as an assistant in the academy at Greenwich, and curate of the parish. In 1766 he was elected fellow of his college, and took his master's degree. He now resided at the university till 1776, when he was inducted to the vicarage of Dalston, Cumberland, to which was added that of Appleby, in the adjoining county. In 1780 he was collated to a prebend in the cathedral of Carlisle, of which diocese he became archdeacon in 1782; and in 1785 he was appointed chancellor. In that year he published his great work 'The Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy.' His next publication was entitled 'Horæ Paulinæ, or the truth of the History of St. Paul evinced by a comparison of the Epistles which bear his name with the Acts of the Apostles, and with one another.' In 1793 he vacated Dalston, on being presented to the vicarage of Stanwix, near Carlisle; and the year following he printed 'A View of the Evidences of Christianity.' The same year he was instituted to the prebend of St. Pancras, in the diocese of London, and soon afterwards was promoted to the subdeanery of Lincoln. In 1795 he took his doctor's degree on being presented to the living of Bishop Wearmouth, where he wrote his last work, entitled 'Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity, collected from the Appearances of Nature.' He died 25 May, 1805. His sermons have been published in one volume. Dr. Paley was also the author of a life of Bishop Law; The Clergyman's Companion in visiting the Sick; and a small piece entitled 'The Young Christian instructed.'

PALGRAVE, Sir Francis, an antiquary, was born in London, July, 1788, being the son of a Jewish gentleman, Mr. Meyer Cohen, of the Stock Exchange. After being carefully educated at home under Dr. Montucci, he was articled to a firm of solicitors in Basinghall Street, of which he afterwards became managing clerk, retaining that position till 1822, when he was employed under the Record Commission, for from an early period he had devoted himself with great ardour to antiquarian pursuits, and in 1818 he had edited a collection of Anglo-Norman Chansons. In 1823 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. Dawson Turner, on which occasion he obtained a royal license to assume the name of Palgrave, that being the maiden name of his wife's mother. He was called to the bar in 1827; received the honour of knighthood 1832, in acknowledgment of his contributions to constitutional and parliamentary history; and on the reconstruction of the Record Office in 1838 he was appointed deputy-keeper of the Records, which office he retained till his death. Among his works are, 'Calendars of the Treasury of the Exchequer:' 'Parliamentary Writs;' 'Curia Regis Records;' 'Documents illustrative of the History of Scotland;' 'The Merchant and the Friar,' an imaginative history of Marco Polo and Friar Bacon; 'Handbook for Travellers in Northern Italy;' 'History of England and Normandy;' and numerous articles in the 'Quarterly' and 'Edinburgh Reviews,' a list of which is printed in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for Oct., 1861. Sir Francis died at Hampstead 6 July, 1861. A number of his MS. note-books are preserved in the British Museum (Addit. 26083 et seq.).

PALISOT DE BEAUVOIS, AMBROISE MARIE FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, baron DE, a French naturalist, born at Arras 27 July, 1752. In 1786 he undertook a journey to Africa to explore the kingdoms of Oware and Benin, where he collected a number of flowers and insects which he forwarded to Europe. Being attacked twice with yellow fever, he sailed for St. Domingo, where he was much persecuted by the negroes. He contrived, however, to escape to the United States, and ultimately returned to France. He became a member of the Institute 1806; and died at Paris 21 Jan., 1820. His principal works are, 'Flore d'Oware et de Benin, en Afrique;' 'Insectes recueillis en Afrique et en Amérique;' and 'Essai d'une nouvelle Agrostographie.'

PALISSY, BERNARD DE, an artist, was born at Agen, in France, about 1524. He discovered the method of applying enamel to stone-ware, and his manufacture soon excelled the finest of the Italian. He next pursued the study of chemistry, his knowledge of which enabled him to make improvements in agriculture. He also formed the first cabinet of natural history in France, on which science he delivered lectures. He was a Protestant, and died about 1589. His works and life were published at Paris, in 1777, by St. Fond. J. Salles has written an 'Étude sur la Vie et les Travaux de B. Palissy,' 8vo., Nimes, 1855; and an interesting Life of Palissy, the Potter,' by Henry Morley, appeared at London 1852.

PALLADIO, ANDREA, an architect, was born 1518, at Vicenza, in Lombardy. He learnt the principles of his art from Trissino, after which he studied at Rome, and on his return to Lombardy constructed a number of noble edifices. He was also employed in various parts of Italy, particularly at Venice, where he built the Palace Foscari. He died at his native place 6 Aug., 1580. His Treatise on Architecture was printed at Venice in 1570, folio; and again at London in 1715, in 3 vols. folio. In 1730 Lord Burlington published some of Palladio's designs in 1 vol. folio. This artist was likewise the author of a work, entitled 'L'Antichità di Roma.'

PALLAS, PETER SIMON, a naturalist, was born at Berlin 22 Sept., 1741. He studied at Halle and Göttingen, at which last university he wrote a treatise, 'De infestis viventibus intra viventia,' or inquiry concerning worms in the human body. In 1760 he went to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree, and the year following visited London, to improve himself in surgery and medicine. After residing in England about a year, he returned to Berlin, from whence he removed to the Hague, where he published his 'Elenchus Zoophytorum,' and his 'Miscellanea Zoologica.' In 1767 he went to St. Petersburg, and the next year accompanied an expedition sent to explore the distant provinces of the Russian empire, which tour took up six years, and the account of it was published by Pallas in 5 vols. 4to. Soon after this he printed his collections relative to the Monguls. In 1794 Pallas made a journey into the Crimea, of which he published an account entitled 'A Physical and Topographical Picture of Taurida.' Soon after this he took up his residence in that country, where the Empress Catharine gave him an estate. He died at Berlin 7 Sept., 1811. His other works on natural history are numerous and valuable.

PALLAVICINO, SFORZA, a cardinal, born at Rome 1607. He was made a bishop when very young; and he was also chosen president of the Academy of Humoristi. In 1638 he entered the order of Jesuits, and in 1657 was made a cardinal. He died 5 June, 1667. Pallavicino wrote 'The History of the Council of Trent,' printed in Italian, 2 vols. folio, Rome, 1656-57; and in Latin, 3 vols. 4to., Antwerp, 1672. In this work Cardinal Pallavicino ably defends the Holy See from the charges and insinuations brought against it by Father Paul Sarpi in his history of the same Council.

PALLISER, Sir HUGH, an English admiral, born 1721. He entered the navy early in life, and distinguished himself on many occasions, particularly at the taking of Quebec. In 1773 he was made a baronet; but being second in command to Admiral Keppel, in the memorable battle off Ushant, 27 July, 1778, some misunderstanding took place, and these two officers preferred charges against each other. Keppel was acquitted, and Palliser censured. This sentence was considered as more the effect of party feeling than of justice; and he was made governor of Greenwich Hospital, where he died 1796.

PALMA, GIACOMO, a painter, was born at Serinalta, in the territory of Bergamo, about 1510, and became the disciple of Titian, to whose style he also added that of Giorgione. His pictures are very fine and rare. He died at the age of 48. His great-nephew, Giacomo Palma, called the Young, was born 1544, and died 1628. He resided at Venice, and his paintings are excellent.

PALMBLAD, VILHELM FREDRIK, a Swedish author, professor of Greek literature in the university of Upsal, was born at Liljested 16 Dec., 1788, and died 2 Sept., 1852.

PALMELLA, Dom PEDRO DE SOUZA-HOLSTEIN, duke OF, a Portuguese statesman, born at Turin 1786; died at Lisbon 12 Oct., 1850.

PALMER, JOHN, an actor of very considerable talents, belonging to Drury Lane Theatre, was born in London about 1742, and came on the stage at the age of twenty. No performer ever had a wider range of characters, showed more industry, or exercised great talents with more success. His final exit was singularly awful. On 2 Aug., 1798, while performing in Kotzebue's play of 'The Stranger,' at the Liverpool theatre, after uttering the line, 'There is another and a better world,' he fell on his back, heaved a convulsive sigh, and immediately expired.

PALMER, JOHN, the first projector of mail-coaches, was born about 1750 at Bath, where he was brought up as a brewer; but he subsequently solicited and obtained a patent for a theatre in his native city. As a reward for his new plan of mail-coaches he was made comptroller of the Post Office, with a salary of 1500*l.* per annum. Some disputes, however, occurring, a party grew up against him which he was not powerful enough to encounter, and he was suspended in 1702; but on subsequent petition he was reimbursed by parliament, though very inadequately to his promised reward. Died at Brighton 16 Aug., 1818.

PALMER, ROGER, earl of Castlemain. See CASTLEMAIN.

PALMER, SAMUEL, an eminent printer of Bartholomew Close, London, died 9 May, 1732. He wrote a 'History of Printing,' in which he was assisted by that singular character, George Psalmanazar.

PALMERSTON, Henry John Temple, Viscount, K.G., was born 20 Oct., 1784, in Park Street, Westminster, and not, as is usually stated, at Broadlands, near Romsey, Hants, the family seat. He was the eldest son of the second viscount, and succeeded to the title 1802. His education commenced at Harrow, was continued at the university of Edinburgh, and was completed at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he proceeded M.A. 1806. In the same year, when the formation of the Grenville administration obliged Lord Henry Petty, on his accession to the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, to appeal to his constituents, Lord Palmerston, then little more than of age, contested with him the representation of Cambridge university. He was unsuccessful, and though his name appeared in a double return from Horsham, he failed to obtain a seat in Parliament. In the following year he again contested the university, but failed, when he was returned for Newport, I.W., which he continued to represent till elected member for Cambridge. On the formation of the duke of Portland's administration Lord Palmerston, who had displayed considerable ability in Parliament, was appointed a junior Lord of the Admiralty, and a speech made by him 3 Feb., 1808, in opposition to Mr. Ponsonby's motion for the production of papers explanatory of the grounds on which the administration had advised the expedition against Copenhagen, may be regarded as an indication of the principle of much of his subsequent practice as a diplomatist. In 1809, on the resignation of the secretaryship of war by Lord Castlereagh, Lord Palmerston was appointed to that office, which he continued to fill until 1828, under the successive administrations of Mr. Perceval, the earl of Liverpool, Mr. Canning, Lord Goderich, and the duke of Wellington. He exhibited remarkable ability in his conduct as secretary at war. During the whole of this period he confined himself, in his speeches in Parliament, chiefly to the business of his department, interfering occasionally only in discussions on other topics. Among these exceptions, however, was the question of Catholic Emancipation, to which he always gave a steady support. A difference of opinion on the East Retford disfranchisement question occasioned his withdrawal from office, and he remained in opposition until the accession of Earl Grey to power in Nov., 1830, when he received the post of foreign secretary in the Whig ministry which was then formed, and he was ever afterwards a prominent leader of the Liberal party. He resigned when Sir Robert Peel came into office 1834, but resumed his functions under Lord Melbourne 1835. The following six years were perhaps the period during which he attained that reputation for brilliancy, alertness, and omniscience as a foreign minister, which made his name a word of exultation to his admirers and of execration and fear to some foreign governments. In 1841 Sir Robert Peel again came into power, and Lord Palmerston went out of office with his party. While in opposition he denounced the Ashburton Treaty with the United States; and on the question of the Corn Laws he publicly announced in 1845 his conversion to the principle of absolute repeal, having before that time been in favour of a fixed duty for the purposes of revenue. When Sir Robert Peel came to the same determination his cabinet, being of opinion that the work ought to be left to the Liberal party, resigned office, and Lord John Russell was sent for by the queen, and entrusted with the task of forming a new government. He solicited the assistance of his old colleagues, including Earl Grey and Lord Palmerston. The former nobleman, disapproving of Lord Palmerston's foreign policy, refused to lend any assistance to Lord John unless Lord Palmerston were excluded from office. Lord Palmerston, on the other hand, expressed his willingness to refrain from taking office, but promised to give the new government all the support he could. The quarrel, however, disconcerted the measures of the Whig leader, and Sir Robert Peel was therefore called to the helm, and under his auspices the law abolishing the protective duty on corn was passed. Soon afterwards Sir Robert's cabinet broke up through the dissensions of the party of which he was the head, and Lord Palmerston again came into office as minister of foreign affairs, in the summer of 1846, as a member of the new Whig ministry of Lord John Russell. He continued to direct the diplomacy of the country in this capacity through the many difficult and intricate foreign questions which arose. Among these were the troubles in Portugal, the Swiss question, the revolutionary movements of 1848, the Greek question, which had its origin in 1847, and was brought to an issue by the reprisals of 1850, and finally the Hungarian war and the protection of the fugitive Hungarian chiefs. In 1851 differences with Lord John Russell and with his other colleagues induced him to resign. He was not, however, long out of office. In 1852 he became home secretary in the coalition government of Lord Aberdeen, and premier in Feb., 1855, when that ministry broke up through the events of the Crimean war. In 1857 a vote of censure was passed in the House of Commons on his policy in China, the effect of which was a dissolution. The election went in his favour; but he was obliged to retire in 1858, in consequence of a defeat on the Conspiracy Bill. In June, 1859, the short career of Lord Derby's government came to an end, and Lord Palmerston returned once more to the post of premier, and held it till his death, which occurred 18 Oct., 1865, at Brockett Hall, Hertfordshire. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Lord Palmerston married (1839) Lady Emily Mary, sister of Viscount Melbourne, and widow of Earl Cowper; but as he had no issue, his title became extinct.

PALOMINO Y VELASCO, Don Acislo Antonio, a Spanish painter, born at Bujalance, near Cordova, 1653 or 1658; died at Madrid, 13 April, 1726.

PALSGRAVE, John, a native of London, studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and subsequently at Paris, where he proceeded M.A. He was chosen to instruct the Princess Mary in the French language previously to her marriage with Louis XII. of France, and he accompanied her to that country. On his return to England he was appointed one of the king's chaplains, and obtained several benefices. He died before 12 Sept., 1554. His works are, 'Lesclarcissement de la langue Francoyse,' 1530, one of the earliest attempts to explain in English the rules of French grammar; and a translation of Fullonius's 'Comedye of Acolastus,' 1540.—Athen. Cantab.

PANARD, Charles François, a French poet and dramatist, born at Nogent-le-Roi, near Chartres, about 1694; died at Paris 13 Jan., 1765.

PANCIROLI, Guido, an Italian civilian, born at Reggio 1523. He became professor of the Institutes at Padua, and after filling that chair seven years, was appointed to that of the Roman law, but resigned it in 1571, to go to Turin, where he obtained the professorship of civil law. In 1582 he returned to Padua, where he died 1599. He wrote lives of eminent Italian jurists, and a curious work, translated into English under the title of 'The History of many Memorable Things lost which were in use among the Ancients,' 2 vols. 12mo., London, 1715; 1727.

PANCKOUCKE, André Joseph, a French bookseller and author, born at Lille 1700; died 17 July, 1753. His son, Charles Joseph Panckoucke, born at Lille 26 Nov., 1736, settled in Paris, where he acquired great celebrity as a publisher and writer. He died 19 Dec., 1798.

PANZANI, Gregorio, an Italian ecclesiastic, who was sent to England by Pope Urban VIII. to settle the differences which had arisen between the regular and secular clergy. He resided here from 1634 to 1636, and wrote very interesting Memoirs of his mission, which have never been published in Italian. Dodd, however, has given some extracts from them in his 'Church History;' and the Rev. Joseph Berington published an English translation, entitled 'Memoirs of Gregorio Panzani,' 8vo., Birmingham, 1793, on which work a volume of 'Remarks,' by the Rev. Charles Plowden, S.J., was published at Liege in the following year. On his return to Italy, Panzani was appointed a canon of St. Laurence's in Damaso, and bishop of Mileto, with the addition of a civil judicature in the city of Rome.

PANZER, George Wolfgang Francis, a bibliographer, born at Sulzbach, in the Upper Palatinate, 16 March, 1729, become pastor of the cathedral church of St. Sebaldus at Nuremberg, where he died 9 July, 1805. His famous 'Annales Typographici, ab artis inventæ origine ad annum MD.,' appeared at Nuremberg, in 11 vols. 4to., 1793-1803.

PAOLI, Pasquale de, was born at Rostino, in the island of Corsica, 1726. His father, Giacinto de Paoli, after labouring in vain to establish the freedom of his country, went to Naples, where Pasquale was educated in the college of Jesuits. In his twenty-ninth year he was chosen generalissimo of Corsica, where he exerted himself in promoting such objects as were best calculated to secure the independence of the republic. The Genoese, however, having made a transfer of the island to France, that power sent such an overwhelming force into it as compelled Paoli to seek an asylum in England, where he obtained a pension. On the breaking-out of the French Revolution he returned to Corsica, and prevailed upon his countrymen to submit to the English government, after which he returned to London, and died in Feb., 1807.

PAOLO SARPI. See Sarpi.

PAOLO VERONESE. See Cagliari.

PAPEBROCH, Daniel, a learned Jesuit, one of the most industrious editors of the 'Acta Sanctorum,' was born 1628 at Antwerp, where he died 28 June, 1714.

PAPIN, Denis, a physician, was a native of Blois. After taking his doctor's degree he visited England, and, in 1680, became a fellow of the Royal Society. While here he published an account of an invention which still bears his name. His work is entitled 'The New Digester, or Engine for the softening of Bones.' Papin assisted Mr. Boyle in his experiments, and, on leaving England, went to Marburg, where he taught mathematics. His other works are, 'Fasciculus Dissertationum de quibusdam Machinis Physicis;' 'Ars nova ad aquam ignis adminiculo efficacissime elevandum.' Died 1710.

PAPIN, Isaac, a French divine, born at Blois 1657. He was educated for the ministry, among the Protestants at Geneva; but being refused a testimonial on account of his opinions on the doctrine of grace, he came to England, and was ordained by the bishop of Ely. Soon after this he published a book against Jurieu, who avenged himself by preventing Papin from obtaining a settlement in Germany. He then turned Catholic, and died at Paris 1709. His theological works were published in 3 vols., 1723.

PAPINIANUS, Æmilius, a Roman lawyer, born in the year 175. He became advocate of the treasury, and afterwards prætorian prefect under the Emperor Severus, who recommended his sons, Caracalla and Geta, to his care. When the former murdered his brother, he ordered Papinianus to justify the deed. Refusing to do this, he was beheaded A.D. 212. He wrote several valuable works.

PARACELSUS, Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus, a noted empiric, whose family name was Bombastus, which he changed to Paracelsus. He was born near Zurich 1493; and though his father was a physician, he neglected the education of his son, who, however, gathered considerable practical knowledge in his various travels. He had considerable success by the boldness of his practice, and he possessed no small skill in chemistry and metallurgy. He died in an hospital at Salzburg 24 Sept., 1541. His works were printed at Geneva in 1658, 3 vols., folio.

PARDOE, Miss Julia, an English authoress, born at Beverley, Yorkshire, 1812; died in London 26 Nov., 1862. She was the daughter of an officer in the army, travelled much abroad, and in 1859 received a pension of £100 from the civil list. Her principal works are, 'Traits and Traditions of Portugal;' 'The City of the Sultan;' 'Romance of the Harem;' 'Beauties of the Bosphorus;' 'The City of the Magyar;' 'Louis XIV. and the Court of France in the Seventeenth Century;' 'Court and Reign of Francis I.;' 'Life of Mary de Medicis.'

Paré, Ambroise, a celebrated surgeon, born at Laval, in the province of Maine, 1509. He was appointed surgeon to Henry II., and he held the same office under the three succeeding kings. Though a Protestant, he was esteemed by Charles IX., who saved him in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and was prevailed upon by Paré to put a stop to the effusion of blood. He died 20 Dec., 1590. His works have been published in one volume folio. Paré is justly regarded as the father of modern surgery.

Pareja, Juan de, a painter, was born in the West Indies, and became the slave of Diego Velasquez. In the absence of his master, Pareja amused himself by drawing, but, fearful of giving offence, kept his works concealed. Philip IV. coming one day into the painting-room, Pareja was tempted to place before him one of his own pictures, with which the monarch was highly pleased, and more so on being informed by whom it was executed. He desired Velasquez to give him his liberty and instructions; but the faithful Pareja remained with his master till his death. His portraits are very fine. Died 1670.

PARENT-DUCHATELET, Alexandre Jean Baptiste, a French physician, noted for his researches in connection with the public health, was born at Paris about 1790, and died 6 March, 1836. His principal work is entitled 'De la Prostitution dans la Ville de Paris, considerée sous le rapport de la morale, de l'hygiène publique, et de l'administration,' 2 vols.

PARINI, Giuseppe, an Italian poet, born at Bosisio, near Milan, 22 May, 1729; died 15 Aug., 1799. His fame rests on a didactic and dramatic satire entitled 'Il Giorno.'

PARIS, John Ayrton, M.D., was born at Cambridge 7 Aug., 1785, received his education at Caius College in that university, and afterwards practised medicine at Penzance, Cornwall. In 1817 he came to London, and in 1844 became president of the College of Physicians, which post he retained till his death on 24 Dec., 1856. He wrote, 'Pharmacologia,' containing the substance of his lectures on Materia Medica; A Treatise on Diet, 1827; a Memoir of Sir Humphry Davy; Philosophy in Sport made Science in Earnest; and Medical Jurisprudence, 3 vols., 1823, in collaboration with Mr. Fonblanque.

PARIS, Matthew, a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's. He was a mathematician, poet, divine, and historian, in which latter capacity he wrote 'A History of the World, from the Creation to the Conquest,' and afterwards continued it to 1259, in which year he died. The work, with Rishanger's continuation, was printed in 1571, and several times since. This author also wrote 'Vitæ duorum Offarum, Merciæ regum;' and other pieces, which remain in manuscript.

PARISIS, Pierre Louis, a distinguished French prelate, born 1795; died 1866. He was a native of Orleans, and in 1834 was consecrated bishop of Langres, whence he was translated to Arras 1851. Among his works are, 'Demonstration of the Divinity of Jesus Christ,' and 'Freethinkers disavowed by Common Sense.'

PARISOT, or NORBERT, Pierre, a Capuchin, born at Bar-le-Duc 1697. In 1736 he went as a missionary to the East Indies, but having quarrelled with the Jesuits, they got him removed to America. He returned to Europe in 1744, and soon after published a work, entitled 'Historical Memoirs relative to the Missions in the Indies,' which, giving offence to his own order as well as the Jesuits, he removed into England, where he established two manufactories of tapestry. From hence he went to Prussia, and afterwards to Portugal. Having finished his History of the Jesuits, he returned to France, and published it in six volumes. He now re-entered the order, which he had left, but quitted it again, and died in Lorraine 1770.

PARK, Sir James Allan, a learned judge, was born at Newington, Surrey, 1766; received his education in the free-school of Northampton; was nominated a justice of the Court of Common Pleas 1816; and died 8 Dec., 1838. His 'System of the Law of Marine Insurances,' 1787, became a standard work, and passed through several editions.

PARK, Mungo, an enterprising traveller, born at Fowlshiels, co. Selkirk, 10 Sept., 1771, his father being a respectable yeoman, who held a farm under the duke of Buccleuch. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to Mr. Thomas Anderson, a surgeon of Selkirk, with whom he spent three years. In 1789 he removed to Edinburgh, and attended lectures there for three successive sessions, devoting much of his attention to the study of botany. Coming to London, he was introduced to Sir Joseph Banks, through whose influence he obtained the appointment of assistant surgeon to the 'Worcester' East Indiaman, and made a voyage to Bencoolen, in Sumatra, during which he collected a number of specimens in botany and natural history. On his return the Association for Promoting Discoveries in Africa, of which Sir Joseph Banks was president, sent him on an expedition to ascertain the course of the Niger, and the state of the great central emporium, Timbuctoo. On 22 May, 1795, he set sail from Portsmouth on board the 'Endeavour,' and arrived in the Gambia on the 24th of the following month. He advanced into the kingdom of Walli, reached Medina, the capital, and after many hair-breadth escapes arrived at Sego, where he saw the long-sought Niger, as broad as the Thames at Westminster. He next pushed forward to Moorzan, after which he crossed the Niger to Silla, nearly 1100 miles east of Cape Verd, whence he returned by the same route, and after passing through innumerable difficulties and privations arrived at Pisania. During this journey he fixed the boundaries of the Negroes and Moors, traced the sources of the Senegal, Gambia, and Niger, confirmed the ancient accounts relative to the course of the last river, illustrated the history of the ancient Lotophagi and the mode of propagating the Mahommedan religion by proselytism, and established a number of geographical positions in a direct line of 1100 miles from Cape Verd. After an absence from England of two years and seven months Park arrived at Falmouth 22 Dec., 1797. Retiring now for a while to his native place, he drew up an account of his wanderings, which appeared under the title of 'Travels in the interior Districts of Africa, 1795-7, by Mungo Park, with an Appendix containing geographical illustrations of Africa, by Major Rennell,' 4to., London, 1799. In 1804 he was placed at the head of another expedition, which left Portsmouth on the 30th of January. On the 8th March he arrived at St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verd islands, and on the 28th at Goree, where he engaged upwards of forty soldiers belonging to the garrison to attend him in his expedition. Half his journey towards the Niger was not completed when the rainy season commenced, and out of forty-four men who left Goree only nine arrived at the Niger, all sick, and several in a state of mental derangement. Nothing, however, could shake Park's resolution. Having constructed a boat, he set sail down the Niger; but Mr. Maxwell, the governor of Goree, in vain awaited intelligence of his progress. At length one Amadi Fatouma, one of his attendants, was found, and he stated that in sailing down the Niger, Park and his companions had a skirmish with the natives, when the boat was sucked into a rapid, and the white men drowned. Thus perished Mungo Park, towards the close of the year 1805. His Journal and Correspondence were published 1815, with his Life prefixed by Mr. Wishaw.

PARK, Thomas, F.S.A., an engraver and antiquarian writer, died at Hampstead 26 Nov., 1834, aged 75. He wrote some volumes of original poetry, but is best known as the editor of antiquarian works, such as the 'Nugæ Antiquæ' of Sir John Harington; Walpole's 'Royal and Noble Authors;' the 'Harleian Miscellany,' &c.

PARKE, JAMES, Lord Wensleydale. See WENSLEYDALE.

PARKER, JOHN, D.D., bishop of Elphin; archbishop of Tuam 1667; archbishop of Dublin 1678–9; died 28 Dec., 1681.

PARKER, MATTHEW, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich 6 Aug., 1504. He received his education at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1533 the king granted him a licence to preach throughout the nation; and as he was much afflicted with a disorder in the head, he obtained leave to preach covered. He was also made chaplain to Anne Bolevn. In 1535 he was preferred to the deanery of Stoke Clare in Suffolk; and in 1544 he became master of Corpus Christi College. He took a wife in 1547. When Ket's insurrection broke out, 1549, he had the boldness to oppose the rebels in their camp, and exhorted them to submission. In 1552 he became dean of Lincoln. His marriage rendered it necessary for him to live in retirement during the reign of Mary, but when Elizabeth came to the throne he was appointed archbishop of Canterbury. There were, however, great difficulties in connection with his consecration. All the old Catholic prelates refused point-blank to have anything to do with the affair, and consequently a royal commission was issued to William Barlow, John Scorey, Miles Coverdale, and John Hodgkins, all reformed bishops, empowering them to consecrate Parker archbishop of Canterbury. A ceremony was accordingly performed, as Protestant writers allege, on the 17th of December, 1559, although some Catholic writers of great learning stoutly maintain that the whole transaction was an empty fiction, and that even assuming the ceremony to have been gone through, Barlow, the chief acting consecrator, had never himself received episcopal consecration. Numberless volumes have been written on this very mysterious transaction, on which the whole theory of the validity of Anglican orders depends. It is only necessary here to state that the Church of Rome has uniformly refused to recognise the orders of the Church of England. He died 17 May, 1575, and was buried in the chapel at Lambeth; but in the Rebellion his tomb was demolished, and his bones lay scattered about, till Dugdale deposited them in the chapel. The archbishop published a sermon preached at the funeral of Bucer; and besides his share in the reformed Liturgy, he was principally concerned in the Bishops' Bible. He was also an eminent antiquary, as appears in his editions of the old English historians, and his work 'De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ,' fol., 1572.

PARKER, RICHARD, was educated at Cambridge, where he became a fellow of Gonville and Caius College, and B.D. In 1611 he retired to Littlebury, in Essex, and died in or about 1624. He is author of a brief history of the university of Cambridge, entitled 'Σκελετος Cantabrigiensis.'

PARKER, SAMUEL, an English bishop, born at Northampton Sept., 1640, and educated at Oxford. In 1665 he became a fellow of the Royal Society, and published 'Tentamina Physico-Theologica de Deo;' for which Archbishop Sheldon made him one of his chaplains, and gave him the archdeaconry of Canterbury. He also obtained a prebend in that church, and other preferments, in return for which he displayed his zeal by writing against the nonconformists, in a 'Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity.' But he hereby raised up a host of enemies, the chief of whom was Andrew Marvell, who reduced him to silence by the force of ridicule. At the commencement of the next reign he was made bishop of Oxford, and constituted by mandamus president of Magdalen College. He became extremely unpopular, in consequence of supporting in his writings some of the distinctive doctrines of the Roman Church. The most noteworthy of his works are a 'Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Law of Nature, and of the Christian Religion,' and his 'History of his own Times.' Died 20 May, 1687.

PARKER, THEODORE, an American clergyman, politician, and lecturer, born at Lexington, Massachusetts, 24 Aug., 1810, the son of a farmer, and grandson of a revolutionary soldier. He studied theology among the Unitarians at Cambridge, became a graduate of its Unitarian school 1836, and was afterwards settled as minister of the Second church in Roxbury. From 1840 to 1842 he was a contributor to the 'Dial' and to the 'Christian Examiner' of papers, chiefly on theological topics, which he collected in a volume of 'Critical and Miscellaneous Writings,' 1843. In 1842 he published 'A Discourse of Matters relating to Religion,' containing the substance of a series of lectures delivered during the previous season in Boston, and constituting a manifesto of the growing changes of the author in his doctrinal opinions, which had widely departed from points of Church authority, the inspiration of the Scriptures, and the divinity of our Saviour. He had previously, in May, 1841, startled his associates by his 'Discourse on the Transient and Permanent in Christianity.' Proscribed by the Unitarian Societies of Boston on account of the promulgation of his new views, Mr. Parker organised, with the aid of his friends, a congregation which met in the old Melodeon in that city, but which afterwards transferred itself to the new music hall. He also became a popular lecturer, and discussed the questions of slavery, war, and social and moral reforms, with much acute analysis and occasional effective satire; but as a practical teacher he was in the unfortunate position of a priest without a church and a politician without a state. In 1859 he made a voyage to Mexico for the benefit of his health, and there wrote his 'Experience as a Minister.' He then visited Italy, and died at Florence 10 May, 1860. Collected editions of his works, consisting chiefly of miscellanies, sermons and lectures, have appeared both in England and the United States.

PARKER, THOMAS, Earl of Macclesfield. See MACCLESFIELD.

PARKES, SAMUEL, an ingenious professor of chemistry, born at Stourbridge, Worcestershire, 1759, and educated under Dr. Addington, at Market Harborough. In 1806 he first published his 'Chemical Catechism,' of which many editions subsequently appeared; and he was long eminent as a practical chemist. This work was followed in 1808 by an 'Essay on the Utility of Chemistry in the Arts and Manufactures;' and in 1809 by 'Rudiments of Chemistry,' an abridgment of his first work. His last production was 'Chemical Essays, principally relating to the Arts and Manufactures of the British Dominions,' 8 vols., 1815. Died in London 23 Dec., 1825.

PARKHURST, JOHN, a prelate, born at Guildford, Surrey, in 1511, and educated in the school of Magdalen College, Oxford; after which he became fellow of Merton College, where he was tutor to Jewell. After the death of Edward VI., Dr. Parkhurst retired to Zurich, where he remained till the accession of Elizabeth, when he was made bishop of Norwich. Died 2 Feb., 1574. His share in the translation of the Bishops' Bible was the Apocrypha, from the book of Wisdom to the end. He also published 'Ludicra, sive Epigrammata Juvenilia,' and other Latin poems.

PARKHURST, JOHN, was born at Catesby, Northamptonshire, in June, 1728. He was educated at Rugby School, and next at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. He entered into orders; but inheriting a handsome fortune he declined preferment, and settled on his estate at Epsom, Surrey, where he died 21 March, 1797. He published a Hebrew and English Lexicon; a Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament, and other works.

PARKINSON, ANTHONY, an English Franciscan friar, author of an interesting historical work entitled, 'Collectanea Anglo-Minoritica, or a Collection of the Antiquities of the English Franciscans or Friars Minors, commonly called Gray Friars; with an Appendix concerning the English Nuns of the Order of St. Clare,' 4to., Lond., 1726. Born about 1668; died 30 Jan., 1728.

PARKINSON, JOHN, a botanist, born 1567, became apothecary to James I., and in the next reign obtained the title of Botanicus Regius Primarius. He is believed to have been living 1640, in which year appeared his 'Theatrum Botanicum, or Theatre of Plants,' a ponderous folio, with innumerable woodcuts.

PARKINSON, THOMAS, a mathematician, born at Kirkham-in-the-Fylde, Lancashire, 1745, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. He became rector of Kegworth, Leicestershire, and died 1830. He was employed by the Board of Longitude in calculating tables of the series of parallax and refraction; and published 'A System of Mechanics and Hydrostatics,' &c.

PARLEY, PETER. See MARTIN, WILLIAM.

PARMEGIANO. Francesco Mazzuoli, a painter, commonly called Il Parmegiano, was born at Parma 1503. He was a close imitator of Correggio, from whose works, compared with those of Michael Angelo, Raffaelle, and Giulio Romano, he formed a style of his own. Died 24 Aug. 1540.

PARMENIDES, a philosopher of the Eleatic sect, who flourished B.C. 504.

PARNELL, Sir HENRY BROOKE. See CONGLETON, LORD.

PARNELL, THOMAS, a poet, born at Dublin 1679. He received his education at Trinity College (M.A. 1700). In 1705 he was promoted to the archdeaconry of Clogher; in 1713 to a prebend in the cathedral of Dublin; and in 1716 presented to the vicarage of Finglass. He died at Chester July, 1717. His poems, the principal of which is the 'Hermit,' were published by Pope in 1721; and in 1758 was printed another volume, entitled the 'Posthumous Works of Dr. Thomas Parnell.' The authenticity of these latter works has, however, been questioned.

PARR, CATHARINE. See CATHARINE.

PARR, RICHARD, D.D., was born at Fermoy, co. Cork, 1617. He became a servitor of Exeter College, Oxford; and on entering into orders was made chaplain to Archbishop Usher, who gave him a canonry in the cathedral of Armagh, and procured for him the vicarage of Reigate, in Surrey. He was also presented to the rectory of Camberwell, where he died 2 Nov., 1691. Dr. Parr published some sermons, and a collection of Archbishop Usher's letters, to which he prefixed a life and defence of that great prelate, fol., 1686.

PARR, SAMUEL, LL.D., a learned clergyman and schoolmaster, born 1747 at Harrow, where his father was a surgeon and apothecary. He received his first instruction at Harrow School, and afterwards at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he laid in a large stock of classical learning. For five years he was an assistant-master at Harrow, and subsequently he opened a school of his own at Stanmore, which he removed successively to Colchester and Norwich. After taking orders he became rector of Asterby, Lincolnshire, 1780; perpetual curate of Hatton, Warwickshire, 1783; rector of Wadenhoe, Northamptonshire, 1790; and rector of Graffham, Huntingdonshire, 1802. Died 6 March, 1825. His published works are not of much importance, but he had a high reputation as a conversationalist, though he was too apt to browbeat those who ventured to oppose his opinions. In politics he was a decided liberal. His 'Works, with memoirs of his life and writings, and a selection from his correspondence,' were published by Dr. Johnstone, in 8 vols., 1828.

PARR, THOMAS, an extraordinary instance of longevity, born in Shropshire 1483. He was bred to husbandry, in which he laboured after he was one hundred and thirty years old. Ten years before this he married a widow; and he exhibited every sign of health when, in 1635, the earl of Arundel took him to the court of Charles I., where he died, through the change of air and mode of living, at the age of one hundred and fifty-two years and nine months. His body was opened by Dr. Harvey, who discovered no internal marks of decay. A grandson of Parr died in Shropshire at the age of one hundred and twenty.

PARRHASIUS, a painter of antiquity, who was a native of Ephesus (though others say he was an Athenian), where he flourished in the time of Socrates. He excelled all the artists of his time in the just proportions of his figures. He was so excessively vain as to wear a crown of gold and to carry a staff studded with gold nails, to indicate that he was the prince of painters.

PARRY, RICHARD, D.D., was born in London 1722, and educated at Westminster School, whence he was elected to a studentship of Christ Church, Oxford. He became rector of Wichampton, and lecturer of Market Harborough, Leicestershire. He published 'A Dissertation on Daniel's Prophecy of the seventy Weeks;' a 'Harmony of the four Gospels;' 'The Genealogy of Jesus Christ explained,' &c. Died 9 April, 1780.

PARRY, Sir WILLIAM EDWARD, an English admiral, well known as the first explorer of the Polar Sea. He was son of Caleb Hillier Parry, M.D., and was born at Bath 19 Dec., 1790. He entered the navy at an early age, and saw much service. In 1818 he accompanied Captain Ross in his expedition to the Arctic regions, and in the following year he took the command of the 'Hecla' and the 'Griper,' for the purpose of discovering the North-west Passage. He subsequently undertook a second expedition (1834), but returned the following year without success. He was knighted in 1829 for his services in the Polar Ocean. From 1823 to 1829 he was hydrographer to the Admiralty, and he was for some time commissioner for the management of the Australian Agricultural Company's affairs in New South Wales. In 1853 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital, and died at Ems, in Germany, 7 July, 1855. Admiral Parry, besides his several Arctic Voyages, published a small book entitled 'Thoughts on the Parental Character of God.'

PARSONS, James, M.D., F.R.S., an eminent London physician, born at Barnstaple, Devonshire, 1705; died 4 April, 1770. He wrote some able works in connection with his profession, and, as an antiquary, distinguished himself by his 'Remains of Japhet; being historical inquiries into the affinity and origin of the European languages,' 1767.

PARSONS, Philip, was born at Dedham, Essex, 1739, and educated at Sidney College, Cambridge (M.A. 1776). In 1761 he was presented to the living of Wye, Kent; where also he became master of the free school. In 1767 he obtained the rectory of Eastwell, and in 1776 that of Snave, in the same county. His works are, 'The Inefficacy of Satire,' a poem; 'Newmarket, or an Essay on the Turf;' 'Astronomic Doubts;' a volume of Essays; 'Dialogues of the Dead with the Living;' 'Simplicity,' a poem; and a description of 'Monuments and Painted Glass in upwards of 100 churches, chiefly in the eastern part of Kent,' 1794. Died 12 June, 1812.

PARSONS, Robert. See Persons.

PARSONS, William, earl of Rosse. See Rosse.

PARUTA, Paolo, called the Cato of Venice, was born there 1540. He was employed in several embassies; made governor of Brescia; and, lastly, procurator of St. Mark. His works are, 'Della perfezione della vita Politica;' 'Discorsi Politici;' a History of Venice; and an Account of the War of Cyprus. Died 6 Dec., 1598.

PASCAL, Blaise, a celebrated writer, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, 19 June, 1623. His father, Stephen Pascal, president of the Court of Aids in his province, was an excellent mathematician, and the friend of Descartes. Having a great affection for his son, he went to Paris, that he might be at liberty to superintend his education, from which, however, mathematics was excluded, till the child, by his own unaided efforts, discovered his genius for that science, and at sixteen, wrote a treatise on Conic Sections. He next turned his attention to philosophy, and published some experiments on the pressure of the atmosphere at different heights. He also discovered a solution of the problem proposed by Mersenne, respecting the curve produced by a wheel in motion, called the cycloid. This was his last mathematical publication; for in his twenty-fourth year he devoted himself to religious studies, and took part with the Jansenists against the Jesuits, in his celebrated 'Lettres Provinciales,' published under the name of Louis de Montalte. The remainder of the life of Pascal was spent in a rigid austerity of devotion, and he died in the spirit of piety 19 Aug., 1662. After his death appeared his 'Thoughts upon Religion;' and all his works were collected in 5 vols. 8vo., 1779.

PASCHAL I., a Roman, succeeded Pope Stephen IV. 817; died 12 May, 824.

PASCHAL II., a Tuscan, who succeeded Pope Urban II. 12 Aug., 1099, and died 22 Jan., 1118.

PASKIEWITCH, Ivan Fedorowitch, Prince of Warsaw, a distinguished Russian general, born at Pultawa 12 May, 1782; died at Warsaw 29 Jan., 1856.

PASQUIER, Étienne, a noted jurist and writer, born 1529 at Paris, where he became a counsellor in parliament, and advocate-general in the chamber of accounts. Died 31 August, 1615. He wrote with great asperity against the Jesuits; and his works were printed together at Trevoux in 1665; but his 'Catechism of the Jesuits,' and a licentious work 'Les Ordonnances d'Amour,' are omitted. Among his poetical pieces, that entitled 'La Puce' obtained most popularity.

PASSAVANT, Johann David, a German painter and art critic, born at Frankfort 1787; died 12 Aug., 1861.

PASSEMANT, Claude Siméon, an optician, born at Paris 1702; died 1769.

PASSERI, Giovanni Battista, a painter, born about 1610; died at Rome 1679, leaving a curious work, entitled 'Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects of Rome,' published in 1772. His nephew, Giuseppe Passeri, born at Rome 1654, studied painting under Carlo Maratti, and acquired a fine style of historical composition. He died 1714.

PASSERI, Giovanni Battista, an Italian ecclesiastic and antiquary, born 1694; died 1780.

PASSIONEI, Domenico, a cardinal, born at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino, 2 Dec., 1682. He studied in the Clementine College at Rome, where he formed subsequently an immense library. In 1706 he accompanied his relative, Gualterio, the nuncio, to Paris; and, in 1708, became a secret agent for the Pope in Holland. He was also employed on several other missions, particularly in Switzerland, of which he published an account, entitled 'Acta Legationis Helveticæ.' Innocent XIII. made him archbishop of Ephesus; and Clement XII. raised him to the purple, and made him secretary of the briefs. Benedict XIV. appointed him librarian of the Vatican, in which situation he promoted Dr. Kennicott's great undertaking, by causing the Hebrew manuscripts to be collated for his use. Died at Frascati, 5 July, 1761.

PASTA, Judith, a celebrated vocalist, born about 1801. Though a Jewess by birth, she received her first musical education from the maître de chapelle of Como Cathedral. At the age of 15 she became a Pupil at the Milan Conservatory of Music, and five or six years later came out at the Milan and Venice operas. In 1821 she sang at Paris, where she soon became a public favourite. Managers fought and masters composed for her. Bellini composed 'Norma' and the 'Sonnambula' that she might sing in them, and for her Pacini wrote his 'Niobe.' She died at her villa, on the lake of Como, 1 April, 1865, having retired from the stage about thirty years previously.

PATERCULUS, Caius Velleius, a Roman historian, born about 19 B.C.; died about A.D. 31. His abridgment of the Roman history was first published at Bâle in 1520.

PATERSON, Alexander, a Scotch Catholic prelate, born at Pathhead, in the Enzie, March, 1766. He was nominated coadjutor to Bishop Cameron 14 May, 1816; consecrated bishop of Cybistra, in Cappadocia, 15 Aug., 1816; succeeded as sixth Vicar Apostolic of the Lowland District, on Bishop Cameron's resignation, 20 Aug., 1825. On the new ecclesiastical division of Scotland into three vicariates, by Papal rescript of 13 Feb., 1827, which was put in execution in Sept., 1828, he became first Vicar Apostolic of the Eastern District of Scotland. His death occurred at Dundee, 30 Oct., 1831.

PATERSON, SAMUEL, a bibliographer and miscellaneous writer, born 17 March, 1728, in London, where he died 29 Oct., 1802. He was by trade an auctioneer, and was much employed in the formation of catalogues, and the sale of libraries. His principal performance in this line is the 'Bibliotheca Universalis Selecta.'

PATERSON, WILLIAM, the founder of the Bank of England and projector of the Darien expedition, was born in Dumfriesshire in 1655, and in early life travelled extensively. He communicated to the merchants of London his scheme for a great bank, and it became the basis of the constitution of the Bank of England, which was established in 1694. In the same year he circulated his proposal for a settlement in Darien, which he anticipated might be made the great emporium of the world. His countrymen entered enthusiastically into the scheme; immense funds were raised, and a company was incorporated in 1695 by Act of the Scottish Parliament to carry out the undertaking. Jealously watched and opposed by English and Dutch merchants, and also by the English Government, the plan grievously failed; quarrels, fever, and famine ruined the colonists, and the few survivors of the several expeditions were forcibly expelled by the Spaniards in 1700. Paterson was one of those who got back to Scotland, and in 1713 some compensation was proposed to be granted to him by the government for his immense losses and sufferings, but the bill was not passed. Died 22 Jan., 1719.—Anderson.

PATON, MISS, an English vocalist, acquired great popularity at Drury Lane and Covent Garden theatres. In the zenith of her reputation as a vocalist she married Lord William Lennox, from whom she obtained a divorce. Subsequently she became the wife of a vocalist named Wood. Died 1864.

PATRICK (ST.), the patron saint of Ireland, born, according to most authorities, near the site of Kilpatrick, at the mouth of the Clyde, in Scotland, in 372. At the age of 16 he was carried captive to Ireland by a band of marauders, but made his escape after six months and returned to his native country. Carried away a second time, and again escaping he resolved to become a missionary to the Irish: was ordained in Scotland, and after a long preparation was consecrated bishop. He went to Ireland about 432, and preached the Gospel with such extraordinary effect that he has always received the credit of the general conversion of that country to Christianity. In his old age he wrote his 'Confession,' the authenticity of which has, however, been questioned. St. Patrick died at Down, Ulster, probably in 464. Festival, March 17.

PATRICK, SIMON, D.D., an Anglican prelate, born at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, 8 Sept., 1626. He became a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge 1648; rector of St. Paul's, Covent Garden 1662; prebendary of Westminster 1672; dean of Peterborough 1679; bishop of Chichester 1689; bishop of Ely 1691; died 31 May, 1707. His principal works are—Paraphrases and Commentaries on the Old Testament, as far as the Prophets; Discourse on the Lord's Supper; The Heart's Ease, or a Remedy against Troubles; Parable of the Pilgrim; A friendly Debate betwixt a Conformist and a Non-conformist; The Christian Sacrifice; Jesus and the Resurrection justified. He also completed Gunton's 'History of the Church of Peterborough.

PATRIN, EUGÈNE LOUIS MELCHIOR, a mineralogist, born at Lyons 1742; became librarian of the School of Mines at Paris; died at St. Vallier, near Lyons, 15 Aug., 1815. He wrote 'Histoire Naturelle des Minéraux,' 5 vols., 1801.

PATTEN, GEORGE, an English painter, born 1801; died 11 March, 1805. He studied first as a miniature painter, and afterwards, on aiming at historical painting, in a larger style, he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy 1834. His most interesting work is a portrait of Paganini.

PATTENSON, MATTHEW, M.D., a Catholic writer, was physician in ordinary to Charles I. His only work, which was formerly much esteemed, is entitled 'The Image of bothe Churches, Hierusalem and Babel, Unitie and Confusion, Obedenc and Sedition. By P. D. M.' 8vo., Tournai, 1623; again Lond. 1653.

PATTISON, WILLIAM, a poet, born at Peasmarsh, Sussex, 1706. He had his education at Appleby School, in Westmoreland, and next in Sidney College, Cambridge, which he left abruptly, and repaired to London, where he led an irregular life, and died in the extremity of indigence in 1727. His poems were published in 1728.

PAUL I. was elected Pope 22 May, 757, in succession to his brother, Stephen II; and died 29 June, 767.

PAUL II., Peter Barbo, born 1418, was elected Pope 31 Aug., 1464, and died 26 July, 1471.

PAUL III., Alexander Farnese, born 1468, was elected Pope in succession to Clement VII., 13 Oct., 1534, and died 20 Nov., 1549.

PAUL IV., John Peter Caraffa, born 1476, was elected Pope, in succession to Marcellus II., 23 May, 1555, and died 19 Aug., 1559.

PAUL V., Camillus Borghese, born 1552, was elected Pope 16 May, 1605, in succession to Leo XI., and died 16 Jan., 1621.

PAUL OF THE CROSS (ST.), the founder of the order of Passionists, or 'Barefooted Clerks of the Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ,' was born at Ovada, in Piedmont, 3 Jan., 1694; passed his life in the exercise of the Christian virtues; and died 8 Oct., 1775. He was canonized by Pius IX. in 1867.

PAUL THE DEACON, Paulus Diaconus, was born at Friuli about 740; became deacon of the church at Aquileia; died about 799. His most valuable work is a History of the Lombards.

PAUL, FATHER. See SARPI.

PAUL OF SAMOSATA, was chosen bishop of Antioch in 260; but having preached against the divinity of Christ, he was deposed in 270. The Queen Zenobia took his part, but the Emperor Aurelian expelled him from Antioch in 273, and what became of him afterwards is unknown.

PAULIN DE SAINT-BARTHÉLEMI, a Carmelite friar, whose name was originally John Philip Werdin, was born near Mannersdorf, in Lower Austria, 25 April, 1748. He went to the Malabar coast 1774, and passed fourteen years as a missionary in India. On his return to Europe he settled in Rome, where he died 7 Jan., 1806. His works throw much light on the manners, the philosophical and religious opinions, the literature, and the languages of the natives of India.

PAULINUS, was born at Bordeaux 353. After filling some of the highest offices in the empire, he embraced Christianity in Spain, and in 409 was chosen bishop of Nola, where he died 431. His works consist of Letters and Poems.

PAULINUS, patriarch of Aquileia, was born near Friuli 726. He was a zealous defender of the doctrine of the Trinity, and died 804. His works were printed at Venice 1737.

PAULMY, Marc Antoine René de Voyer, Marquis De, minister of state, and a member of the French Academy, was born at Valenciennes 1722, being the son of the Marquis d'Argenson. He collected one of the most magnificent libraries in Europe, which was sold to the Count d'Artois, brother of Louis XVI. M. de Paulmy published 'Mélanges d'une grande Bibliothèque,' 69 vols. 8vo. Died 1787.

PAULUS ÆGINETA. See ÆGINETA.

PAULUS ÆMILIUS, Lucius, a Roman general, born about 228 B.C., died B.C. 160. At the age of sixty he accepted the command of the armies sent against Perses, king of Macedon, whom he made prisoner, leading him in triumph through Italy, with the king of Illyria, his ally. See also ÆMILIUS.

PAUSANIAS, a Greek writer, who flourished in the second century. His valuable 'Itinerary of Greece' (Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις) is extant.

PAXTON, Sir Joseph, was born of humble parents, at Milton-Bryant, near Woburn, Beds, in 1803, and educated at the Woburn Free School. He obtained employment as a gardener at Chiswick, the seat of the duke of Devonshire, who, appreciating his remarkable talents, removed him to Chatsworth, where the gardens and grounds were entirely remodelled from his designs, one great feature of the work—the grand conservatory—being entirely his production. Mr. Paxton first became known to the general public as the architect of the glass and iron building in which the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851 was held. As a recognition of his services in designing this wonderful structure he received the honour of knighthood. Subsequently he designed, and superintended the erection of, the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. He was elected M.P. for Coventry in 1854, and continued to represent that borough till his death, which happened at Sydenham 8 June, 1865. Sir Joseph contributed somewhat extensively to the literature of horticulture.

PAYEN, Anselme, a distinguished French chemist, professor at the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, member of the Academy of Sciences, and general secretary of the Société Centrale d'Agriculture, was born at Paris 6 Jan., 1795, and died there 13 May, 1871. He published a large number of works relating to the application of chemistry to the arts and agriculture.

PAYNE, John Howard, an American actor and dramatist, born 1792, at New York; died 1852, at Tunis, where, during the latter years of his life, he had been United States consul.

PAYNE, Roger, a bookbinder, celebrated for the elegance and strength of his binding, was born at Windsor, 1739, and died in London 20 Nov., 1797.

PEACHAM, Henry, M.A., was born at North Mims, Hertfordshire, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He afterwards went to Italy, and while in that country studied painting and music, besides which, he was skilled in surveying and engraving. He died about 1640. His principal work, 'The Compleat Gentleman,' was once extremely popular.

PEACOCK, George, D.D., was born at Thornton Hall, Denton, co. Durham, 9 April, 1791, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and tutor. He became Laudian professor of mathematics in that university 1837; dean of Ely 1839; and died 8 Nov., 1858. During twenty-five years passed at Cambridge, in the offices of tutor and professor, his efforts were strenuously devoted to the care of his pupils, the promotion of mathematical learning, and the advancement of university reform. Dean Peacock published a 'Treatise on Algebra;' 'Observations on the Constitution and Studies of the University of Cambridge,' 1840-1; and a Life of Dr. Young, whose works he edited in conjunction with Mr. Leitch.

PEACOCK. Reginald. See Pecock.

PEARCE, Zachary, D.D., a learned prelate, born in London 8 Sept., 1690, was educated at Westminster School, and Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow. After holding in succession the rectories of Stapleford Abbots, Essex, and of St. Bartholomew Exchange, London, and the vicarage of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, he was appointed dean of Winchester 1739; bishop of Bangor, 1748; was translated to Rochester, 1756; and died 29 June, 1774. He edited several classical works, and was the author of 'A Review of the Text of Milton's Paradise Lost,' 1733; 'A Commentary on the four Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles,' 2 vols., 1777; and 'Sermons on various Subjects,' 4 vols., 1778.

PEARSON, George, M.D., F.R.S., a physician and chemist, born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 1751, practised first at Doncaster, and afterwards in London, where he was chosen one of the physicians to St. George's Hospital. He published 'Observations and Experiments on the Buxton Waters,' and made a successful analysis of Dr. James's fever powders. Died 9 Nov., 1828.

PEARSON, John, a learned bishop, born at Snoring, Norfolk, 12 Feb., 1612, received his education first at Eton, and next at King's College, Cambridge. In 1639 he was collated to a prebend in the church of Salisbury, of which he was deprived in the Rebellion. In 1650 he became minister of St. Clement's, Eastcheap, where he preached a course of sermons which he afterwards published under the title of 'An Exposition of the Creed.' In 1659 he published the Remains of John Hales of Eton; and about the same time, engaged with his brother in that great work the 'Critici Sacri,' 9 vols. folio. At the Restoration, he was presented to the rectory of St. Christopher, London, installed prebendary of Ely, archdeacon of Surrey, and made master of Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1661 he was appointed professor of divinity. In 1662 he was one of the commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy, and the same year was admitted master of Trinity College. In 1673 he was consecrated bishop of Chester, where he died 16 July, 1686. His principal works, besides those already mentioned, are 'Vindiciæ Epistolarum S. Ignatii;' and 'Annales Cyprianici.'

PECK, FRANCIS, was born at Stamford 4 May, 1692; took his degrees in arts at Trinity College, Cambridge; became rector of Godeby, Lincolnshire; obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln 1736; and died 13 Aug., 1743. His principal publications are 'The Antiquarian Annals of Stamford;' 'Desiderata Curiosa; or a collection of scarce pieces, relating chiefly to English History,' 2 vols. folio, and reprinted in 1779 in one volume quarto; 'Memoirs of Oliver Cromwell;' and 'Memoirs of John Milton.'

PECOCK, REGINALD, bishop successively of St. Asaph and Chichester, was born in Wales about the end of the fourteenth century, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he was elected a fellow 30 Oct., 1417. In 1421 he was ordained priest, and soon afterwards took the degree of B.D. In 1431 he was appointed master of Whittington College, London, to which the rectory of St. Michael in Riola was attached. During the time he held this preferment he wrote many works against the Lollards. On 14 June, 1444, he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph, being at the same time admitted to the degree of D.D. He was translated to the see of Chichester 1450. Subsequently, however, he fell into disgrace on account of his having promulgated certain heretical opinions, and was accordingly expelled from a council held at Westminster in 1457, and cited to appear before the archbishop of Canterbury, by whom, after repeated examinations, he was condemned 28 Nov., 1457. Pecock read a recantation of his errors from Paul's Cross, in the presence of 20,000 persons. He was deprived of his see, and sent to the abbey of Thorney, Cambridgeshire, where he probably died about 1460. His theological writings are numerous. One of the best known is the 'Repressor of over much blaming of the Clergy,' which was printed at London, 2 vols. 8vo., 1860. The design of this work, which was composed about 1449, was to defend the clergy from what he conceived to be the unjust aspersions of the Lollards. Its learned editor, Mr. Churchill Babington, remarks, 'It is no exaggeration to affirm that Pecock's 'Repressor' is the earliest piece of good philosophical disquisition of which our English prose literature can boast.

PECQUET, JEAN, an anatomist, born at Dieppe 1622; died at Paris 1674. He discovered the thoracic duct, and the receptacle of the chyle.

PEDLEY, ROBERT. See DEVERELL.

PEDRO I. (Antonio Jose d'Alcantara, Dom), emperor of Brazil and king of Portugal, was born at Lisbon 12 Oct., 1798, being the second son of John VI. of Portugal, and of Charlotte Joachima, sister of Ferdinand VII. of Spain. By the death of his elder brother Antonio, he became heir presumptive to the crown of Portugal. On the irruption of the French troops into Portugal (1807) under the command of Junot, Dom Pedro, then duke of Beira, was taken, along with the rest of the royal family, under the protection of an English squadron, to Brazil. In 1817 he married Leopoldina, archduchess of Austria, daughter o the Emperor Francis I., by whom he had five children. On account of the events which led to Pedro's abdication of the crown of Brazil, in favour of his son, Pedro II., he embarked on board an English ship of war for Europe (1831), and arrived in London as a private gentleman, bearing the title of duke of Braganza. Operations immediately commenced for displacing his brother, Dom Miguel, from the throne of Portugal, and many severe conflicts occurred. At length, in July 1832, the fleet of Pedro, under the command of Admiral Napier, signally defeated that of Miguel, which event, with other successes of the Pedroite party, especially the capture of Evora (26 May, 1834), led to his brother's abandonment of the throne, and the accession of his daughter Donna Maria, who was crowned on the 22nd of September following, and who married soon after the duke of Leuchtenberg, brother of the duchess of Braganza. Pedro died 24 Sept., 1834, two days after the coronation of his daughter.

PEEL, Sir ROBERT, Bart., the father of the great statesman, was born at Peel's Cross, near Lancaster, 25 April, 1750. He inherited a moderate property, and in conjunction with Mr. Yates, whose daughter he afterwards married, established at Bury, Lancashire, in 1773, a cotton factory, which attained extraordinary prosperity. He became a landowner on a large scale; represented Tamworth in the House of Commons; was created a baronet 1800; and died at Drayton Manor, Staffordshire, 3 May, 1830, leaving property estimated at £2,000,000. He wrote a pamphlet entitled 'The National Debt productive of National Prosperity.'

PEEL, Sir ROBERT, Bart., prime minister of England, eldest son of the preceding, was born 5 Feb., 1788, in a small cottage in the neighbourhood of Chamber Hall, his father's residence near Bury, Lancashire, being under repair at the time. His early education was received under his father's eye, and then he was sent to Harrow. He had scarcely completed his sixteenth year when he became a gentleman-commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. 1808, with unprecedented distinction. The present system of examination being then new, he was the first man who ever took the honours of a double first class—first in classics, and first in mathematics In 1809 he attained his majority, and took his seat in the House of Commons as member for the city of Cashel. He entered upon his parliamentary career as a supporter of Mr. Perceval, and one of his first efforts was a vindication of the unfortunate Walcheren expedition. At the commencement of the session in 1810 he seconded the address in answer to the speech from the throne, and before the close of that session, so great was his parliamentary and official aptitude, that he was promoted to office as under-secretary of state for the Home Department. In May 1812 Mr. Perceval fell by the hands of an assassin, and on the formation of the Liverpool ministry Mr. Peel was chief secretary in Ireland, where the duke of Richmond was then viceroy. On this appointment he was sworn a privy councillor, 13 Aug., 1812. At the general election in the same year he had been elected member for Chippenham, Wilts. Pledged by all the ties of party to maintain the Protestant supremacy in Ireland, Mr. Peel found his bitterest opponent in O'Connell, who abused him heartily on every opportunity. At length, in 1815, Mr. Peel felt so highly provoked that he sent Col. Brown to arrange the preliminaries of a hostile meeting. Fortunately this became known, and the meeting was prevented. During the six years that he held the Irish secretaryship Mr. Peel introduced and defended many Irish measures, including some Peace-Preservation Bills. The establishment of a constabulary force in that country is amongst the most permanent results of his administration. In June, 1817, when the elevation of Mr. Speaker Abbot to the peerage caused a vacancy in the representation of the university of Oxford, Mr. Peel was unanimously elected one of its members. On 4 Feb., 1819, he was chosen chairman of the famous Committee on Currency, the result of which was one of the measures whereon his political celebrity mainly rests—the return to cash payments; the Act for which passed in the same session. On 17 July, 1822, Mr. Peel was appointed home-secretary on the retirement of Lord Sidmouth, and he filled that office during the remainder of the Liverpool administration. In 1826 he carried his measures for the reform of the Criminal Code. On the accession of Mr. Canning as premier in April, 1827, Mr. Peel determined to retire, because he considered that minister pledged to yield to the demands of the Catholics, to which Mr. Peel had always offered an uncompromising resistance. On 25 Jan., 1828, he was reinstated in office as one of the ministers of the duke of Wellington. The agitation of the Catholics had now become irresistible; the Relief Bill had been passed by the Commons and thrown out by the Lords. After the discussions in the two Houses of Parliament on the question in the session of 1828, frequent communications took place between the duke of Wellington and Mr. Peel respecting the position of that question; and each of them came to the conclusion that it could not be safely left in the position in which it had stood for so many years, the members of the government having no opinion in common upon it, and the two Houses of Parliament coming to opposite decisions. In Aug. 1828, Mr. Peel wrote a letter to the duke, in which he gave a deliberate opinion that there was, upon the whole, less of evil in making a decided effort to settle the Catholic question, than by leaving it, as it had been left, an open question. He expressed his readiness to commit himself to the support of a measure of ample concession and relief, but desired to give it out of office. In Jan. 1829, however, the duke of Wellington convinced him that his assistance in office was indispensable. Mr. Peel moved the Relief Bill in the House of Commons 5 March, 1829. The contest was long and arduous, and the position of the minister open to great obloquy, but Mr. Peel met the opposition with unshaken firmness, and the measure was carried; although Mr. Peel's connections, private and political, were greatly estranged by so sudden and unlooked for a change of policy. Having announced, in a letter to the chancellor of the university of Oxford, the reasons of his change of opinion and consequent resignation of his seat, Mr. Peel's re-election was opposed, and Sir Robert Harry Inglis was returned in his place by a considerable majority. Mr. Peel re-entered the House of Commons as member for Westbury, and it was in that capacity that he opposed the Catholic Relief Bill, which received the royal assent 18 April, 1829. On 3 May, 1830, Mr. Peel succeeded his father in the dignity of baronet, and also as member for Tamworth, which he continued to represent in parliament until his decease. On 15 Nov., 1830, the administration were in a minority of 29 in the House of Commons, on the Civil List, and on the following day the House was informed by Sir Robert Peel that he and his colleagues had resigned office. The real motive of this resignation was, however, not so much the division on the Civil List question, as the anticipation of the probable result of Mr. Brougham's motion for Parliamentary Reform, which stood for the evening on which they announced their resignation. Parliamentary Reform was one of the great changes of his time in which Peel had no share. It was carried by his rivals, the Whigs, in spite of all the efforts he could make to oppose it. Nevertheless the courage and the genius which he manifested in the struggle won for him the support and restored to him the confidence of many of those who had abandoned his leadership because they thought they had been betrayed by him in the passing of the Relief Bill, as well as in the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. The first elections under Reform reduced the Tory party to a small minority; the largest number they were able to collect on any one occasion being 174, in opposition to the second reading of a bill for the admission of dissenters to degrees at Oxford and Cambridge. But it was wonderful in how brief a time Peel rallied his broken forces. The unobjectionable party name of Conservative was dexterously assumed, and it soon appeared that the period of reaction was at hand. Every engine of party organization was put into vigorous activity, and before the summer of 1834 reached its close, Sir Robert Peel was at the head of a compact, powerful, and well-disciplined opposition. Such a high impression of their vigour and efficiency had King William IV. received, that when Lord Althorp became a peer, and the Whigs therefore lost their leader in the Commons, his majesty, having taken the advice of the duke of Wellington, sent to Italy to summon Sir Robert Peel to his counsels, with a view to the immediate formation of a Conservative ministry. Sir Robert accepted this heavy responsibility, though he mistrusted the condition of the country and the chances of success. A new House of Commons was instantly called, and for nearly three months Sir Robert Peel maintained a gallant struggle against a most formidable opposition. At no time did his command of temper, his almost exhaustless stores of information, his vigorous and comprehensive intellect appear to create such astonishment, or draw forth expressions of such unbounded admiration as in the early part of the year 1835. After a well-fought contest, however, he resigned office on the 8th of April, and retired once more into opposition; but though restored to office, the vigour of the Whig party appeared to be exhausted, and from various causes their power perceptibly declined. Amongst these causes was the existence of the compact and well-drilled party which Sir Robert led with consummate prudence and skill—an opposition frequently strong enough to modify the views of the ministry in accordance with their own, yet not sufficiently numerous to accept office with prospect of permanence. The accession of the Queen to the throne had also given to the Melbourne administration additional strength from the personal friendship of the sovereign for its leaders. Sir Robert Peel, therefore, with characteristic caution, bided his time, conducting the business of opposition throughout the whole of this period with rare ability and success. He had accepted the Reform Act as the established constitution of the legislature, and as the system upon which the country was thenceforward to be governed. He was willing to carry it out in its true spirit, but he would proceed no further. He marshalled his opposition upon the principle of resistance to any further organic changes, and he enlisted the majority of the peers, and nearly the whole of the country gentlemen of England in support of the principle of protection to British industry. In 1839 the Whig ministry was reduced to a majority of five, and it resigned on the 7th of May, but was restored on the 11th. Meanwhile Sir Robert Peel had been 'sent for,' had submitted to her majesty the names of his principal coadjutors, and had been accepted. He required, however, that certain ladies of the bedchamber who were near relatives of eminent Whig politicians, should be removed from the personal services of the sovereign. This being refused he abandoned for the time any attempt to form a government, and his opponents remained in office till 1841. On the 27th May in that year he submitted to the House of Commons a vote of want of confidence in the ministry, which, after eight nights' debate, was carried by a majority of one. Still they did not resign; but on the 30th of August Sir Robert Peel became first lord of the Treasury while the duke of Wellington, without office, accepted a seat in the cabinet, taking the management of the House of Lords. Sir Robert Peel's ministry was formed emphatically on Protectionist principles, but before the close of its career his sense of public duty impelled him once more to incur the odium which attends a fundamental change of policy. The repeal of the Corn Laws and relaxation of the commercial code, the Bank Charter Act, and the general financial policy of the country (including the Income Tax), were the marked features of his last administration, and will render it ever memorable in our annals. These great measures were, however, again accompanied by the total alienation of political friends and supporters. Abandoned by a great portion of the party he had organised and led to victory, and receiving a precarious support from the Whigs, and open opposition from the radical reformers, he was defeated, and finally driven from office in June, 1846, on the Irish Arms Bill. For three years subsequently to this the Whig administration received an efficient support from Sir Robert Peel. This support was more than a mere parliamentary assistance—the advice of the great statesman was constantly asked and freely given on the details of ministerial measures. In particular his efforts tended to repeal the Navigation Laws, and to advance the cause of Jewish Emancipation. He spoke for the last time in parliament (28 June 1850) in opposition to Lord Palmerston's foreign policy as exemplified in the Greek question. On the succeeding day, while riding on Constitution Hill, he was thrown from his horse, and after great physical suffering in consequence of the injuries received, he expired 2 July, 1850. His death excited a universal feeling of regret. It was admitted by those who differed from him on the great political measures he successfully advocated, that no man ever undertook public affairs with a more thorough determination to leave the institutions of his country in an orderly, honest, and efficient condition; and his friend the duke of Wellington once said of him, 'Of all the men I ever knew, he had the greatest regard for truth.' In private life he was honoured by all classes. Of his simplicity and independence of character it is sufficient to cord that he declined a peerage and the order of the Garter, and left in his will a solemn injunction to his children against the acceptance of such honours. By his wife Julia, daughter of General Sir John Floyd, he had five sons and two daughters.

PEELE, GEORGE, a dramatic poet, was born, it is believed in Devonshire about 1552, and educated at Broadgates Hall, now Pembroke College, Oxford, graduating B.A. 1577; M.A. 1579. On leaving the university he became an actor in London, where he died of debauchery about 1598. In 1828 Mr. Dyce published an excellent edition of Peele's Works, in 2 vols. 8vo., to which a third volume was added in 1839.

PEGGE, SAMUEL, D.C.L., an antiquary, was born at Chesterfield, Derbyshire, 5 Nov., 1704, and became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1731 he was presented to the living of Godmersham, Kent, and in 1751 to Whittington, Staffordshire, to which was added the rectory of Brinhill, or Brindle, Lancashire; but this last he exchanged for Heath, near Whittington. He obtained also two prebends, one in Lichfield Cathedral, and the other in Lincoln. His principal works are 'Dissertations on Anglo-Saxon Remains,' and a 'Life of Robert Grossetete, bishop of Lincoln. Died 14 Feb., 1796.

PEGGE, SAMUEL, son of the above, born 1731, became a barrister, groom of the king's bedchamber, and one of the esquires of the royal household. He published 'Curialia; or an historical account of some branches of the royal household.' After his death, which occurred 22 May, 1800, appeared his 'Anecdotes of the English Language.'

PEIRESC, NICOLAS CLAUDE-FABRI DE, a learned antiquary, born at Beaugensier, in Provence, 1 Dec., 1580. He was educated in the Jesuits' College at Avignon, and next at Aix, where he studied the law; but applied himself chiefly to antiquities, to indulge his taste for which he went to Italy, and, during his residence at Padua, made himself master of the mathematics, and of the Hebrew, Samaritan, Syriac, and Arabic languages. In 1605 he visited England, and became acquainted with Camden and other learned men. In 1607 he was admitted a senator at Aix, and in 1618 he obtained the abbey of Guistres, in Guienne. Died 24 June, 1637. His letters have been often printed.

PELAGIUS, a British monk, whose real name was Morgan, which he changed for the corresponding Greek term, signifying 'born of the sea.' He is said by some to have been abbat of Bangor; and about the year 400 he went to Rome, where he opposed the doctrines of St. Augustine respecting Original Sin, Irresistible Grace, and Eternal Election. Accompanied by his countryman Celestius he went to Palestine, and met with a kind reception from John, bishop of Jerusalem. In the mean time Augustine and Jerome wrote bitterly against Pelagius, and the council of Carthage condemned his opinions. Pope Zosimus at first took Pelagius and Celestius under his protection; but afterwards he turned against them, and instigated the emperor to persecute their followers. What became of Pelagius is uncertain; but it is most probable that he returned to Britain, and died in his monastery. He wrote several books in explanation of his sentiments.

PELAGIUS I., Pope, succeeded Vigilius 16 April, 555, and died 3 March, 559.

PELAGIUS II. succeeded Pope Benedict I, 578, and died 8 Feb., 590.

PÉLISSIER, Aimable Jean Jacques, duke of Malakhoff, a marshal of France, born at Maromme, near Rouen, 6 Nov., 1794. He served for many years in Algeria, and, during the insurrection of the Kabyles in 1845, incurred much odium in consequence of his having applied burning faggots to the mouth of a cave into which an Arab tribe had retreated, and thus suffocating nearly six hundred human beings. In 1855 he was sent to the Crimea as second in command to General Canrobert, and when, on May 19, the latter resigned, he was appointed in his place, which he retained till the close of the war. Immediately after the fall of Sebastopol he was created marshal of France and duke of Malakhoff. He was French ambassador at the English court from April, 1858, to April, 1859, and died 22 May, 1864.

PELL, John, D.D., a mathematician, born at Southwyke, Sussex, 1 March, 1610. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1643 became professor of mathematics at Amsterdam, whence he removed to Breda. In 1652 he returned to England, and in 1654 was sent by Cromwell to the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, where he remained four years. After the Restoration he was presented to the rectory of Fobbing, in Essex, to which was added, in 1663, that of Langdon in the same county. He died poor 12 Dec., 1685. Dr. Pell was an inventor in mathematics, particularly of the algebraic index. His works are numerous and valuable.

PELLERIN, Joseph, a French antiquary, who was commissary-general and clerk of the marine at Paris, where he died at the age of 99 on 30 Aug., 1782. He published ten volumes in quarto on the subject of medals; and his cabinet, which was one of the richest in Europe, was purchased by the king of France.

PELLETIER, Bertrand, a chemist, born at Bayonne, 1761; died of consumption, brought on by inhaling oxymuriatic acid gas, 1797. He made a number of discoveries, the particulars of which were communicated to the public in the Journal of Natural History, of which he was the principal conductor. His principal writings were published after his son, under the title of 'Mémoires et Observations de Chimie,' 2 vols., 1798.

PELLEW, Edward, Viscount Exmouth. See EXMOUTH.

PELLEW, George, D.D., dean of Norwich, third son of Admiral Sir Edward Pellew, afterwards Viscount Exmouth, was born at Tregony, Cornwall, 1793, and educated at Eton and Corpus Christi College, Oxford (B.A. 1815; M.A. 1818; D.D., 1828). He received holy orders in 1817, and in 1823 became a canon of Canterbury, where he resided until his appointment to the deanery of Norwich in 1829. He died at Great Chart, Kent, 3 Oct., 1866. Dr. Pellew was an accomplished scholar, and published, among other works, the 'Life of Lord Sidmouth,' and several volumes of sermons.

PELLICO, Silvio, was born at Saluzzo, in Piedmont, 1789. After having resided for some years in France, he was appointed (1810) teacher of French at the 'Collegio degli Orfani Militari,' at Milan, and soon afterwards entered the family of Count Luigi Porro Lambertenghi as tutor. Here he formed the acquaintance of Monti, Ugo Foscolo, Madame de Staël, Schlegel, and Byron. His first literary production, the tragedy of 'Laodamia,' was followed by that of 'Francesca da Rimini,' which gave him a high rank as a dramatic poet. He also translated Lord Byron's 'Manfred,' and, unfortunately for himself, became attached to 'Il Conciliatore,' a Liberal newspaper, which was soon suppressed by the Austrian Government. Pellico now joined a deep-laid and formidable conspiracy against the emperor. In 1821 he was arrested and subsequently condemned to death; but his sentence was commuted to fifteen years of severe imprisonment (carcere duro), whereupon he was removed to the fortress of Spielberg, near Brünn, in Moravia. His sufferings are touchingly narrated in his work entitled 'Le mie Prigione,' ('My Prisons'), which will hand his name down to posterity. On being set at liberty, in 1830, he repaired to Turin, and was employed as librarian in the house of the Marchesa Barolo. Died 1 Jan., 1854.

PELLISSON-FONTANIER, Paul, a French writer, born at Beziers, of Protestant parents, 1624. He was bred to the law, and at the age of twenty-one published 'A Commentary on the Institutes of Justinian.' In 1652 he became secretary to the king, and the same year published the 'History of the French Academy,' for which he was admitted a member of that learned body. The minister Fouquet appointed him master of the accounts at Montpellier; but when that statesman was disgraced, Pellisson was sent to the Bastille, where he remained four years. On recovering his liberty he attended the king in his expedition against Holland, of which campaign he wrote the history. After this he abjured the Protestant religion, entered into orders, and obtained several benefices. He was the author of 'Reflexions sur les differends de la Religion,' and other works. Died 7 Feb., 1693.

PELOPIDAS, a Theban general, who inherited from his father a large fortune, which he disposed of liberally among his fellow citizens. The closest amity subsisted between him and Epaminondas, from which friendship the Thebans derived important benefits. When the Spartans conquered Thebes Pelopidas went to Athens, where he assembled his exiled countrymen, with whom he returned, seized upon Thebes, and expelled the invaders. Afterwards he defeated the Lacedemonians at Tegyra, and shared with Epaminondas the victory of Leuctra. Pelopidas, being sent to Alexander, the tyrant of Pherea, was thrown into prison; but on the appearance of Epaminondas he obtained his release. He went next to the court of Persia, and after his return commanded the forces sent to the relief of Thessaly, where he fell at the battle of Cynocephalea, B.C. 364.

PEMBERTON, Henry, M.D., F.R.S., was born in London 1694, and studied under Boerhaave at Leyden. On his return to London he became professor of medicine in Gresham College, and an active member of the Royal Society. His principal works are 'A View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy;' 'Lectures on Chemistry;' 'Observations on Poetry;' 'On the Alteration of the Style and Calendar.' Died 9 April, 1771.

PEMBROKE, Anne Clifford, Countess of. See Clifford.

PEMBROKE, Richard de Clare, Earl of, surnamed Strongbow, became lord-lieutenant of Ireland under Henry II., and died at Dublin, in May, 1177.

PEMBROKE, William Herbert, Earl of, was born at Wilton, Wilts, 8 April, 1580. He was educated at New College, Oxford, and in 1601 succeeded to the family honours and estates. He was made a knight of the Garter in 1604, and in 1610 governor of Portsmouth. In 1626 he was chosen chancellor of Oxford, and about the same time appointed lord steward of the household. Died 10 April, 1630. His lordship was a learned man, and a great encourager of letters. He gave to the university of Oxford, among other benefactions, a large collection of manuscripts, for which Pembroke College was so named in honour of him. His poems were printed in 1660.

PENINGTON, Isaac, an eminent writer among the Quakers, was the son of Isaac Penington, who was lord mayor of London in 1642, and became one of the king's judges, for which he was condemned at the Restoration, but not executed. He died in the Tower. The son was born about 1617, and in 1658 joined the Quakers, for which, and preaching, he suffered imprisonment at Aylesbury and Reading. He died 1679. His works have been published in one volume folio.

PENN, Sir William, an admiral, born at Bristol 1621. He distinguished himself greatly in the war between the English Commonwealth and the Dutch; after which he went to the West Indies, where he captured the island of Jamaica. At the Restoration he was knighted, and in 1665 gained a victory over the Dutch fleet. Died 16 Sept., 1670.

PENN, William, son of the preceding, was born in London 14 Oct., 1644. He was educated at Chigwell, in Essex, and in 1660 became a commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, where he fell under censure for going to conventicles. His father also treated him severely on that account, and to cure him of his puritanical notions, sent him to France, on his return from whence he entered at Lincoln's Inn, which he soon left, and went to Ireland, where he turned Quaker. In 1668 he became an itinerant preacher, for which he was sent to the Tower, and while in confinement wrote his treatise, entitled 'No Cross, no Crown.' After his release he continued his usual course, and was tried at the Old Bailey for preaching in Gracechurch Street. Though the jury acquitted him the court ordered him and his companion, Mead, to be imprisoned in Newgate. When he recovered his liberty he travelled through Holland and Germany. In 1672 he married, and settled at Rickmansworth. In 1681 Charles II. granted him lands in North America, to which he gave the name of Pennsylvania, but not till he had previously entered into a treaty with the native Indians. He then drew up a constitution for the province, which he settled with Quakers, who founded the city called Philadelphia. Penn was a great favourite with James II.—a circumstance which led to his being arrested four times, after the Revolution of 1688, on accusations of being a concealed Papist and a Jesuit. After a life of great activity he died at his seat at Ruscombe, Berks, 30 July, 1718. His writings, which are numerous, were published in 2 vols. folio, 1728. The serious charges brought against the founder of Pennsylvania by Lord Macaulay were replied to by Mr. William Hepworth Dixon, in his 'Life of William Penn.' 1851.

PENNANT Thomas, D.C.L., F.R.S., a naturalist and antiquary, born 14 June, 1726, of an ancient Welsh family at Downing, Flintshire. He became a student of Queen's and afterwards of Oriel College, Oxford, but left the university without a degree. In 1771, however, that of D.C.L. was conferred upon him in convocation. In 1761 he began his 'British Zoology;' and in 1765 he visited the Continent, where he became acquainted with Buffon, Haller, and Pallas. From 1767 to his death he was incessantly employed in travelling or publishing; but in 1793 he gave to the world a curious volume, which he called 'The Literary Life of the late Thomas Pennant;' notwithstanding which, he discovered proofs of resuscitation, in a 'History of the Parishes of Whiteford and Holywell;' and a 'View of Hindostan.' He died 16 Dec., 1798. His principal works are, 'Synopsis of Quadrupeds;' 'A Tour in Scotland,' 3 vols.; 'The Genera of Birds;' 'Voyage to the Hebrides;' 'A Journey to Snowdon;' 'Journey from Chester to London;' 'Arctic Zoology,' 2 vols.; 'An Account of London;' 'Outlines of the Globe;' and 'A Journey from London to the Isle of Wight.'

PENNI, Giovanni Francesco, a painter, born at Florence 1488; died at Naples 1528. He obtained the name of Il Fattore, or steward, from being employed by Raphael in managing his affairs. He also assisted that great artist in his Cartoons, and completed those works which Raphael left unfinished.

PENRY, John, a Puritan, born in Brecknockshire 1559, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge (B.A., 1583-4), whence he removed to St. Alban Hall, Oxford (M.A. 1586). He took orders, but soon got into trouble with the bishops on account of his heterodox opinions. In 1588 he was residing at Moulsey, Surrey, where he superintended the publications which came from the press of Robert Waldegrave, whom the Puritans had engaged as their printer. He also stayed for a time in Nottingham; but in March, 1588-9, he fled to Scotland. It was believed that he was the principal author of the pasquinades published under the name of Martin Marprelate, which much exasperated and terrified the English Government. Queen Elizabeth applied to King James VI. for Penry's banishment from Scotland, and that monarch issued an edict requiring him to depart the realm. The clergy, however, stayed the proclamation, and it was not till Sept., 1592, that he returned to England. He took up his abode in London, joining a congregation of Separatists which met in the suburbs of the metropolis. In March, 1592-3 he was apprehended and committed to the Poultry Compter. During the examinations he underwent he boldly stated his objections to episcopacy and the discipline of the Established Church. In May, 1593, he was arraigned on the charge of having, in Edinburgh, feloniously devised and written certain words in order to excite insurrection and rebellion in England. Being convicted he was hanged at St. Thomas-a-Watering, Surrey, 29 May, 1593. A list of his works is given in Cooper's 'Athenæ Cantabrigienses.' Penry always disavowed the authorship of the Marprelate Tracts, which certainly differ greatly in style and temper from his acknowledged publications.—Athen. Cantab.

PENSWICK, Thomas, an English Catholic prelate, was consecrated bishop of Europum 29 June, 1824, and appointed Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District. He died 28 Jan., 1836.

PEPUSCH, John Christopher, Mus.D., F.R.S., was born at Berlin about 1667. He came to England at the beginning of the last century, and, in 1713, obtained the degree of doctor of music at Oxford, soon after which he was appointed master of the chapel at the seat of the duke of Chandos. In 1724 he accompanied Dr. Berkeley on his voyage to Bermudas; but being shipwrecked, he returned to London, where he married an opera singer, who had realised a handsome fortune. He was chosen organist to the Charter-house 1737, and died 20 July, 1752. His 'Treatise on Harmony,' is held in high estimation.

PEPYS, SAMUEL, was born at Brampton, Huntingdonshire, 23 Feb., 1632, and educated at St. Paul's School, whence he removed to Magdalen College, Cambridge. After leaving the university, he became secretary to the navy, and next to the admiralty. He was in great favour with Charles II., who communicated to him the narrative of his escape after the battle of Worcester. He was elected president of the Royal Society in 1684, and held that office two years. In 1690 he resigned his place in the admiralty, and died 26 May, 1703. He wrote 'Memoirs of the English Navy;' and made a large collection of manuscripts, particularly old poetry, which he bequeathed to Magdalen College. Among these manuscripts was the celebrated Diary, which has rescued the name of Samuel Pepys from almost total oblivion. This highly-amusing record of his personal experiences, thoughts, and foibles, which gives graphic sketches of society and domestic manners in the reign of Charles II., was written in Rich's system of shorthand, and remained unnoticed on the shelves of the Pepysian Library until the commencement of the present century, when it was deciphered by the Rev. John Smith, and published under the editorial supervision of Lord Braybrooke, under the title of 'Memoirs of Samuel Pepys, Esq., comprising his Diary from 1659 to 1669,' 2 vols., 1825. A sixth edition, with improvements and additions, appeared in 4 vols., 1858. In 1851 Pepys's 'Life, Journals, and Correspondence, including a Narrative of his Voyage to Tangier, and residence there,' was published at London in 2 vols. 8vo.

PERCEVAL, SPENCER, second son of the second Earl of Egmont, was born 1st Nov., 1762. He was educated at Harrow School, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his M.A. degree, 1782, and the year following became a student of Lincoln's Inn. He commenced practice as a barrister in the King's Bench, from whence he removed to the court of Chancery. In 1796 he was made King's counsel, and, about the same time, attracted the notice of Mr. Pitt by a pamphlet proving that an impeachment of the House of Commons does not abate by a dissolution of parliament. The same year he was returned for Northampton. In 1801 he was made solicitor-general, and the next year attorney-general. On the change of administration in 1807, he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, in which situation he displayed great political talents, particulary in the settlement of the regency; but, unhappily, he fell soon afterwards, in the lobby of the House of Commons, by the hands of an assassin named Bellingham, 11 May, 1812.

PERCIVAL, THOMAS, M.D., was born at Warrington, Lancashire, 29 Sept., 1740. He was educated at the grammar-school of his native town, and next at Edinburgh, whence he removed to Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree, 1765. In 1767 he settled at Manchester, and there founded a literary and philosophical society, of which he was chosen president. He died Aug. 30, 1804. His works were collected and published by his son in 4 vols. 8vo., 1807.

PERCY, THOMAS, a learned prelate, related to the family of Northumberland, was born at Bridgnorth, Shropshire, 1728. He was educated at Christchurch, Oxford; and, on taking orders, was presented to the vicarage of Easton Mauduit, in Northamptonshire, which he held with the rectory of Wilby, in the same county. In 1769 he was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, in 1778 promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1782 advanced to the bishopric of Dromore, in Ireland, where he died 30 Sept., 1811. His works are—'Han Kiou Chouan, a translation from the Chinese;' 'Chinese Miscellanies;' 'Five Pieces of Runic Poetry, translated from the Icelandic Language;' 'A New Translation of the Song of Solomon;' 'Reliques of Ancient English Poetry,' 3 vols., 1765, the work by which he is best known; 'A Key to the New Testament;' 'The Northumberland Household Book,' 'The Hermit of Warkworth,' a poem in the ballad style; and a translation of Mallet's Northern Antiquities. A valuable collection of 'Ballads and Romances' from Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript, was published in 3 vols. 8vo., 1867-8.

PÉREFIXE, HARDOUIN DE BEAUMONT DE, a French historian, born 1605, became one of the preceptors of Louis XIV. 1644; bishop of Rodez 1648; archbishop of Paris 1662; died 31 Dec., 1670. His 'History of Henry IV.,' 1661, has been translated into every European language.

PEREIRA, JONATHAN, M.D., F.R.S., a physician, who practised with success in London, was born in the parish of Shoreditch 22 May, 1804, and died 20 Jan., 1853. His celebrated work on the 'Elements of Materia Medica' appeared in 1839, and the latest edition by R. Bentley and T. Redwood was published in 1872.

PEREIRE, JACOB RODRIGUEZ, F.R.S., the first person who directed his attention in France to the education of the deaf and dumb, was born at Berlango, in Estramadura, 1716, and died in Paris 15 Sept., 1780. He received a pension from Louis XV., and was a member of the Academy of Sciences and of the Royal Society of London.

PERGOLESI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a musician, whose real name was Jesi, was born at Pergola, in the duchy of Urbino, 1707, and died 1739. He is called the Domenichino of music, but his compositions are considered too plaintive. The principal are, 'La Serva Padrona,' and the 'Olimpiade' operas; a 'Stabat Mater,' a 'Salve Regina,' and other pieces of church music.

PERICLES, an illustrious Athenian, was the disciple of Zeno and Anaxagoras. He became an excellent commander, orator, and statesman. Having gained the confidence of the people, he effected a revolution in the state, by reducing the authority of the Areopagus, and banishing Cimon, with some other powerful men of the republic. He then led the Athenians against the Sicyonians, the Samians, and Lacedemonians; but at last the people, forgetful of their obligations to Pericles, condemned him to pay an exorbitant fine, for having advised the war in which they had gained so much glory. Afterwards, repenting of their ingratitude, they recalled him to the government. He died B.C. 429.

PÉRIER, CASIMIR, a French statesman, born at Grenoble 21 Oct., 1777, was educated by the Fathers of the Oratory at Lyons. He served in Italy on the staff of the military engineers in 1799 and 1800. On the death of his father he resolved to devote himself to commerce; and in conjunction with his brother Scipion he founded a banking establishment at Paris 1802. Subsequently he established a number of cotton-spinning and sugar-refining manufactories, and also steam flour-mills; by which undertaking he acquired a large fortune. In 1816 he published a pamphlet, which attracted much notice, against the foreign loan system. The next year he was elected to the Corps Législatif, where he became noted as an opponent of the ministry. After the revolution of 1830 he devoted himself with ardour to the task of consolidating the throne of Louis Philippe. On the dissolution of the ministry of Laffite he was made president of the council and minister of the interior; and immediately entered upon that conservative policy which he continued to the close of his career. Died 16 May, 1832.

PÉRIGNON, Dominique Catherine, a peer and marshal of France, born at Grenade, near Toulouse, 31 May, 1754; died at Paris 25 Dec., 1818.

PERIZONIUS, James Voorbroek, born at Dam, in Holland, 1651; became professor of History and Greek at Leyden 1693; died 6 April, 1715. He wrote 'Animadversiones Historicæ,' and other valuable works.

PERKINS, William, was born at Marston Jabet, Warwickshire, 1558, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he led a very dissolute life at first, but afterwards grew serious and devout. In 1582 he was elected a fellow of his college, and on entering into orders he officiated to the prisoners at Cambridge. Afterwards he became lecturer of Great St. Andrew's in that town, where he died 1602. He was a rigid Calvinist, and, as Fuller says, 'would use the word "damn" with such an emphasis as left a doleful echo in his auditors' ears a good while after.' Cooper's 'Athenæ Cantabrigienses' contains a long list of his works, of which there have been several collected editions more or less complete.

PEROUSE, Jean François Galaup de la, an unfortunate navigator, born at Albi, in Languedoc, 1741. He entered the French navy, and in 1782 commanded an expedition to Hudson's Bay, where he destroyed the English settlements. On the restoration of peace he was employed in a voyage of discovery in the South Sea; but after exploring the coasts of California, Corea, and Japan, his ships touched at Botany Bay in 1788, which was the last account ever received of them till 1828, when it was ascertained that the vessels had been wrecked on one of the Queen Charlotte Islands.

PERRAULT, Charles, was born at Paris 12 Jan., 1628. He became an advocate, but was taken from the bar by Colbert, who appointed him secretary to a literary society established in his house. This institution was the parent of the Academy of Inscriptions; besides which Perrault had a share in forming the Academy of Sciences. The minister next made him comptroller-general of the royal buildings, in which situation he contributed to the foundation of the Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. He was admitted into the French Academy in 1671; soon after which he had a famous controversy with Boileau, respecting the comparative merits of the ancients and moderns; Perrault maintaining the superiority of the latter, and Boileau as vigorously asserting that of the former. This dispute was carried on with great asperity and personal rudeness on both sides. The work by which Perrault is best known is entitled 'The History of illustrious Men of the Age of Louis XIV.' Died 16 May, 1703.

PERRAULT, Claude, brother of Charles Perrault, was born 1613 at Paris, where he died 9 Oct., 1688. He forsook the practice of physic to study the fine arts, particularly architecture, in which he rose to great eminence, and constructed many noble works, the principal of which is the façade of the Louvre. Boileau, however, ridiculed him in his satires as a doctor turned mason. His works consist of a translation of Vitruvius; a treatise on the Five Orders of Architecture; 'Memoirs for a Natural History of Animals;' 'Essais de Physique,' 4 vols.; and an account of several machines of his own invention.

PERRENOT, See Granvelle.

PERRIER, François, a French painter and engraver, born at St. Jean-de-Lône about 1590; died at Paris about 1650.

PERRIN, Louis, justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland from 1835 to 1860; died 7 Dec., 1864.

PERRON, Jacques Davy du, a cardinal, born in the canton of Berne 1556. His father, who was a Protestant and physician, gave him the elements of education; and he acquired by himself a knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew, as well as of logic and philosophy. By studying the Summa of St. Thomas Aquinas, he began to waver in his religious sentiments, and ended in an abjuration of the Protestant faith. His success in converting Henry IV., and procuring the papal absolution for that monarch, proved the means of his advancement to the highest dignities. He was first made bishop of Evreux, next archbishop of Sens, and lastly created a cardinal by Clement VIII. After the murder of Henry he became wholly devoted to the see of Rome, and was much employed in promoting its interests. He died at Paris 5 Sept., 1618. His works were printed in 1620, in 3 vols. folio. The principal is a 'Treatise on the Eucharist,' in answer to Du Plessis Mornay.

PERROT, Sir John, was born in Pembrokeshire about 1527. He was one of the knights of the Bath at the coronation of Edward VI.; but at the beginning of the reign of Mary he was sent to prison for harbouring the Protestants. Elizabeth sent him, in 1572, to Ireland, as president of Munster, where he suppressed a dangerous rebellion. He was afterwards appointed admiral of a fleet, to protect Ireland against the Spaniards. In 1583 he was made lord-deputy of that kingdom, where his conduct gave such offence that he was recalled, tried for high treason, and sentenced to death. The queen, however, respited him; but he died in the Tower 1592.

PERRY, James, born at Aberdeen 30 Oct., 1756, was educated at the High School and at Marischal College, in that city, and studied for the Scottish bar. His father failing in business in 1774, he proceeded first to Edinburgh and afterwards to Manchester, where he became a clerk to a manufacturer, with whom he remained two years. In the beginning of 1777 he came to London, and soon after was retained by Messrs. Richardson and Urquhart as a writer in the 'General Advertiser' and the 'London Evening Post,' in which capacity he reported the memorable trials of Admirals Keppel and Palliser, sending up from Portsmouth daily, and unassisted, eight columns of proceedings taken by him in court. In 1782 he projected, and was the first editor of, the 'European Magazine,' which situation he quitted in little more than a year for that of editor of the 'Gazetteer.' In conducting this journal, he had the merit of suggesting an improvement in the manner of reporting the debates in parliament, by substituting the employment of a succession of reporters for that of a single one. By these means he completely superseded Mr. Woodfall's reports in the 'Morning Chronicle'—a paper which he afterwards purchased, and carried on as sole editor and proprietor. Died 6 Dec., 1821.

PERSE, STEPHEN, M.D., a native of Norwich, was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and for forty years held a fellowship in that society. He appears to have been a practising physician, and to have acquired considerable property. He died 30 Sept., 1615, aged 65. He was a magnificent benefactor to the university and borough of Cambridge, and founder of the free grammar school of that town.

PERSIUS (AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS), a Roman satirist, born at Volterræ, in Etruria, A.D. 34; died A.D. 62. We have only from him six satires, by which, however, he has acquired much celebrity.

PERSONS, ROBERT, a celebrated Jesuit, born at Nether Stowey, Somersetshire, 24 June, 1546, his father being a yeoman of good repute who, after embracing the new doctrines, was again reconciled to the Catholic Church. After a preliminary education in the free school of Taunton he proceeded to St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, whence he migrated to Balliol College, of which he became a fellow and tutor. Having become convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion he quitted England 1574, and visited first the Low Countries and next Padua, where he studied physic and the civil law. He could not settle down, however, to secular pursuits, and therefore, travelling on foot to Rome, he entered the Society of Jesus 7 July, 1575. In due course he received holy orders, and in 1580 was sent with Father Campian upon the English mission, they being the first Jesuits who ever set foot in this country. Campian was taken prisoner, condemned, and executed, and Persons, narrowly escaping, fled to France before he had been an entire year upon the mission. He now found means to establish a grammar school at Eu, in Normandy (1582), for the instruction of English youth, in order to prepare them for higher studies at Rheims and Rome; but this institution was of no long duration. In the course of the same year he visited Lisbon and Spain, where he was honourably received by Philip II. Throughout his career Father Persons displayed incredible industry and perseverance in promoting the Catholic religion, and in preventing it from being entirely crushed out by persecution in England. To this end he founded the English establishments at Valladolid (1589), Lucar (1591), Seville and Lisbon (1592), and St. Omer (1593); besides giving powerful support to the colleges of the secular clergy at Douay and Rome. He was for many years rector of the English College at Rome, and held that office at the time of his death, which happened 15 April, 1610. His works are, 'A Discoverie of F. J. Nichols, Minister, misreported Jesuite, latelye recanted in the Tower of London, ... by John Howlett,' 1580; 'Reasons for refusal to go to Church,' 1580; 'A Brief Censure upon two Books written in answer to Mr. Edmund Campian's offer of Disputation;' 'Defence of the Censure given upon two books of William Charke and Meredith Hanmer,' 1581; 'Epistola de Persecutione Anglicanâ,' Rouen, 1581; 'The Book of Resolution, or Christian Directory,' Rouen, 1581, a work which has passed through almost numberless editions; 'A Treatise of the Three Conversions of England.' All Father Persons's works drew forth a host of replies from writers on the Protestant side. The work entitled 'A Conference about the next Succession to the Crown of England,' 1593, 1594, 1681, written under the name of N. Dolman, but commonly attributed to Persons, appears to have been chiefly composed by Dr. Allen.

PERTH, JAMES DRUMMOND, EARL OF, son of the third earl, was born 1648. He went through a course of philosophy at the university of St. Andrew's, and afterwards visited France. He was served heir to his father 1675; was sworn a privy councillor 1678; and having joined the opposition to the duke of Lauderdale, was, on his fall, constituted justice-general of Scotland 1682. In 1684 he was promoted to the high office of chancellor of Scotland and appointed sheriff principal of the county of Edinburgh. On the accession of James II. he declared himself a Catholic, and his 'Letters to his sister the Countess of Erroll, and other members of his family' (edited by William Jerdan for the Camden Society, 1845) show the sincerity of his conversion and the zeal with which he laboured to impress his opinions on his relatives. Having resided two years at Rome he was recalled to St. Germain by King James II., who created him duke of Perth and K.G., and appointed him first lord of the bedchamber, chamberlain to the queen, and governor to the prince of Wales. He died at St. Germain 11 March, 1716, and was interred in the chapel of the Scotch college at Paris.

PERTHES, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH, a German publisher, born at Rudolstadt 21 April, 1772; died at Friederichroda, near Gotha, 18 May, 1843. He originated the famous 'Almanach de Gotha.'

PERUGINO, PIETRO, an Italian painter, whose real name was Vanucci, born 1446, at Città della Pieve, in the State of the Church, and not at Perugia, though he took his name from the latter place. He chiefly excelled in the natural and elegant expression of his female figures. He was the master of Raphael, and was patronised by Sixtus IV., for whose chapel at Rome he painted some beautiful pieces. Died 1524.

PERUSINUS. See BIZARRI, PETER.

PERUZZI, BALDASSARE, an Italian, eminent as a painter and architect, was born at Volterra 1481. He was patronised by the Popes, and finished some designs and models for the ornamenting of St. Peter's. He designed the Palazzo Massimi, one of the most original and tasteful edifices of its class in the Eternal City. His execution of the perspective and of the chiaro oscuro was so perfect as to excite the astonishment of Titian. Died 1536.

PESTALOZZI, JOHN HENRY, a celebrated teacher, was born at Zurich 12 Jan., 1746, and in his youth devoted himself successively to the study of languages, divinity, law, and literature, but at the age of twenty-two he burnt all the MS. collections he had made on these subjects, and took a small farm in the canton of Aargau. It was here that his attention was first directed to the intellectual and moral wretchedness of the lower classes of society; and in 1775 he established a school for poor and abandoned children. He greatly impoverished himself by this generous attempt to benefit his fellow-creatures; but, nothing daunted, he persevered, and propagated his educational method by several writings, which attracted so much attention that in 1798 he was enabled to found a larger school at Stanz, in the canton of Unterwal, under the patronage of the Swiss government. The approach of foreign armies obliged him to remove this establishment to the château of Burgdorf, in the canton of Berne, where he reorganised it on a larger scale. In 1804 he removed his institution to Yverdun, where it attained to a high degree of prosperity. His death occurred at Brugg, in the canton of Aargau, 27 Feb., 1827. Pestalozzi rendered great service to the cause of popular education, and published several works, the best known of which is a moral romance entitled 'Leonard and Gertrude.'

PETAU, DENIS, Dionysius Petavius, was born at Orleans 21 Aug., 1583. He became professor of philosophy, in his nineteenth year, at Bourges; but in 1605 he entered the Society of Jesus, and afterwards taught rhetoric and theology in the colleges of the order at Rheims, La Flèche, and Paris. In 1621 he succeeded Father Fronton du Duc in the chair of theology, which he filled with distinguished reputation for twenty-two years. He died in the college of Clermont 11 Dec., 1652. His great work on chronology, 'De Doctrinâ Temporum,' was originally published in 2 vols. folio., 1627. It has been several times reprinted, as has also an abridgment of it, entitled 'Rationarium Temporum.'

PETER DE BLOIS, a writer of the twelfth century, who came to England in the reign of Henry II., and was made, first, archdeacon of Bath, and afterwards of London. He died about 1200. His works were published in 1667.

PETER OF CLUNI, or Peter the Venerable, a native of Auvergne, who was made prior of Vezelay, and afterwards, in 1121, abbat of the monastery of Cluni, or Clugny, the principal house of a reformed branch of the Benedictines. He was also general of his order. He is memorable for having afforded an asylum to Abelard. Died 24 Dec., 1156, aged about 65.

PETER THE GREAT, Czar of Russia, was the son of Alexis Michaelowitz, and born 30 May, 1672. On the decease of his half-brother, Feodor, in 1682, Peter was proclaimed Czar, in conjunction with John, his eldest brother, who died in 1696, and left him in full possession of the empire. While a youth, he conceived those projects of improvement which have stamped immortality upon his name. He entered into the military life and performed the duties of a common soldier, till, by rising gradually from the ranks to the command of a body of troops, he exhibited the duty of obedience and the necessity of discipline in his own example. He also began to build some vessels; but finding more difficulties than he could surmount in this undertaking, he visited Holland, under a disguised name, in 1698. Here he worked as a common labourer in the dock-yard, and then came to England, where he employed himself in the same manner for four months, during which he also studied the principles of shipbuilding. While thus engaged, the news of an insurrection, excited by the Princess Sophia, obliged him to return to Russia, where he severely punished the conspirators and confined his sister in a nunnery. In 1700 he declared war against Charles XII. of Sweden, and, though unsuccessful at first, he afterwards gained such advantages as induced him to build a fortress on the Baltic, called, after him, Petersburg. In 1709 the Czar obtained the victory of Pultowa, after which he conquered Livonia, Ingria, Finland, and part of Pomerania. But he had a narrow escape when engaged in a contest with the Turks, who surrounded his army on the banks of the Pruth, from which perilous state Peter was extricated by the Empress Catherine, who entered into a treaty of peace with the grand vizier. To perpetuate this deliverance, Peter instituted the order of St. Catherine, into which none but women were admitted. In 1716 the Czar and his consort visited Denmark and Holland, where he left Catherine while he made a journey to Paris. On his return home Peter prosecuted his plans for the reform of his empire with renewed zeal, and founded several schools, colleges, an observatory, a physic garden, printing-offices, and a royal library. He died 28 Jan., 1725, and was succeeded by the Czarina Catherine.

PETER THE HERMIT, a French enthusiast of the eleventh century, who made a pilgrimage to Palestine, and on his return to Europe preached up the crusade for the recovery of the Holy City from the infidels. He passed through Hungary with an immense crowd of followers, thousands of whom perished miserably. Peter, however, entered Syria, and displayed great bravery at the taking of Jerusalem. He then returned to Europe. His death occurred 7 July, 1115, in the abbey of Neu-Moutier, near Huy, in Belgium, of which he was the founder.

PETERBOROUGH, CHARLES MORDAUNT, EARL OF, was son of John, Lord Mordaunt, and born about 1658. He succeeded to the paternal honours and estate in 1675, and in 1680 accompanied the earl of Plymouth to Tangier, where he distinguished himself against the Moors. In the reign of James II. he went to Holland, and returned with the prince of Orange, on whose advancement to the throne he was made earl of Monmouth, and first commissioner of the Treasury. In 1697 he succeeded his uncle in the earldom of Peterborough. In 1705 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the English forces in Spain, where he took Barcelona, and drove the French out of the kingdom, for which the emperor declared him generalissimo of the allied forces. He also received the thanks of parliament, and after serving his country in a diplomatic character, was honoured with the order of the Garter. In the reign of George I. he was made general of the Marines. He died in his passage to Lisbon in 1735. Some of his poetical compositions have been printed. His second wife was Anastasia Robinson, a celebrated singer, by whom he had no issue. She died 1750.

PETERS, BONAVENTURA, a painter, born at Antwerp 1614; died 1652. He excelled in painting storms at sea.

PETERS, CHARLES, the learned author of a 'Critical Dissertation on the Book of Job,' was presented by Elizabeth, Lady Mohun, to the living of Boconnoc, in Cornwall, in 1715, and resided there till 1727, when he obtained that of St. Mabyn, in the same county, where he resided till his death in 1777. He was the intimate friend and correspondent of Bishop Lowth, who speaks highly of him in his letter to Warburton.

PETERS, HUGH, a fanatic, born at Fowey, Cornwall, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. 1622. He afterwards went on the stage, which he quitted and entered into orders; but having had an intrigue with another man's wife, he fled to Rotterdam, and next to America. He returned to England in the Rebellion, and became very active against the king, for which he was tried and executed with the regicides 1660. Some of his discourses, and his 'Last Legacy to his Daughter,' have been printed.

PETHION DE VILLENEUVE, JÉROME, one of the most active agents in the French Revolution, was born at Chartres about 1753, and quitted the profession of the law to become a member of the States-General 1789. His conduct as a legislator was violent and factious; but his popularity raised him to the office of mayor of Paris. His hatred of Louis XVI. hastened the horrors of the 10th of August and of the first days of September. While he aspired to the difficult office of guiding the destinies of the republic he found a powerful rival in Robespierre, and in the struggle was defeated by his antagonist. Outlawed by his victorious opponent 31 May, 1793, he fled from the capital in disguise, and some time afterwards his corpse was found, half-eaten by wolves, in a corn-field near St. Émilien, in the Gironde.

PÉTION, ALEXANDRE SABÈS, a mulatto, born at Port-au-Prince 2 April, 1770, was elected president of St. Domingo 1807, and retained that position till his death 29 March, 1818.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, FRANÇOIS, secretary and interpreter to the king of France in the Turkish and Arabic languages, published 'Persian Tales' and other works. Born 1653; died 4 Dec., 1713. His son, Alexandre Louis Marie (b. 1698; d. 6 Nov., 1751), became royal professor of Arabic.

PETIT, JEAN LOUIS, a very distinguished French surgeon, born at Paris 13 March, 1674; died 20 April, 1750.

PETITOT, JEAN, an artist, born at Geneva 1607. He painted portraits in enamel, in conjunction with his brother-in-law, Bordier, who executed the hair, draperies, and grounds. The two friends studied in Italy, and afterwards came to England, where they acquired considerable information in the preparation of colours from Sir Theodore Mayerne. Petitot, while in this country, painted several portraits; but after the death of Charles I. he went to Paris, and was employed by Louis XIV. Died at Geneva 1691.

PETIVER, JAMES, F.R.S., an English botanist, who was apothecary to the Charterhouse, and made a large collection of rare and curious plants, animals, and insects, afterwards purchased by Sir Hans Sloane. He wrote several works on botany. Died 20 April, 1718.

PETRARCA, FRANCESCO, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Arezzo in July, 1304. On account of the dissensions which raged in his native country his father removed with him to Avignon, and afterwards to Carpentras, where Petrarca received his education, which was completed at Montpellier and Bologna. He was intended for the law; but Cicero and Virgil had more charms for him than Justinian. On the death of his parents he returned to Avignon, where he fell in love with a lady named Laura, upon whose heart he could make no impression, either by his constancy or his verses. To conquer his passion he travelled, and then retired to Vaucluse, a romantic spot near Avignon, where he poured out his amorous complaints in several sonnets. He afterwards travelled into different countries; but, with his return to Vaucluse, his passion for Laura returned. Again he celebrated her charms and the delights of his retreat. His works now made him famous, and he received invitations from the senate of Rome, the king of Naples, and the university of Paris. He accepted the former, and, on Easter Day, 1341, he was laureated in the Capitol with great pomp. In 1348 he received the news of the death of Laura. He was then at Parma, but immediately set out for Vaucluse, where he passed some time in grief; but in 1352 he returned to Italy, and, at Padua, obtained a canonry. He died suddenly near that city 18 July, 1374. The Sonnets of Petrarca are tender; but his Latin poems are inferior to the Italian. He also wrote, 'De remediis utriusque Fortunæ;' 'De otio religiosorum;' 'De vera Sapientia;' 'De vita Solitaria;' 'De Contemptu mundi;' 'Rerum memorabilium;' 'De republica optime administranda;' 'Vita Scipionis Africani;' 'Epistolæ;' and 'Orationes.' All his works have been published in 4 vols. folio. The best edition of his Italian poems is that of Professor Marsland, 2 vols., Padua, 1819-20.

PETRE, BENJAMIN, an English prelate of the Roman communion, was consecrated bishop of Prusa 1721, and nominated Vicar Apostolic of the London District. He died 22 Dec., 1758.

PETRE, EDWARD, a noted Jesuit, born in London 1631. At the age of 21 he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Watten, and returned as a missionary to England, where he generally passed by the name of Spenser. During the excitement occasioned by the Popish Plot he was apprehended and thrown into Newgate, and after about a twelvemonth's imprisonment he was removed, through the interest of the duke of York, to another prison, where he enjoyed comparative freedom. On the duke's accession to the throne as James II. Father Petre was called to court, made clerk of the closet, and some time afterwards enrolled among the privy councillors. In the popular imagination of the populace, he was James's evil genius, and accordingly he became the best hated man in the country. In the general consternation caused by the revolutionary explosion Father Petre found his way to the Continent, and thus disappointed the vengeance of the frenzied populace who clamoured for his blood. In 1693 he was appointed rector of the college at St. Omer; but he resigned this office 1697, and settled at Watten, where he died 15 May, 1699.—Oliver; Dodd.

PETRE, EDWARD ROBERT, third son of Robert Edward, ninth Lord Petre, was born about 1794, and died 8 June, 1848. His remains were interred in the Catholic church in the London Road, Southwark, but were subsequently removed to a chantry founded for the repose of his soul in St. George's Cathedral. In 1849 there appeared 'Notices of the English Colleges and Convents established on the Continent after the dissolution of Religious Houses in England. By the late Hon. Edward Petre. Edited by the Rev. F. C. Husenbeth.' Norwich, 4to. Mr. Petre, however, had only collected a few notes on the subject, and Dr. Husenbeth is in reality the author, and not merely the editor, of the work.

PETRE, FRANCIS, an English Catholic prelate, was consecrated bishop of Amoria, 27 July, 1750, and appointed Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District. He died 24 Dec., 1775.

PETRIE, GEORGE, LL.D., an Irish artist and archæologist, was the son of a portrait-painter in Dublin. He developed his artistic talents at n early age, and was gradually acknowledged as the best draughtsman in water-colours in Ireland, and employed by all the publishers of tours or topographical works. In 1830 he received the appointment of librarian to the Royal Hibernian Academy, to the annual exhibitions of which he sent numerous pictures, a large proportion of which combined the illustration of antiquities with the ordinary characteristics of landscape. In conjunction with the Rev. Cæsar Otway he edited the first fifty-six numbers of the 'Dublin Penny Journal' (1832-33); and ten years later he carried on alone, for a year, another periodical, similar in character and aim, called the 'Irish Penny Journal.' He laid the foundation of the fine museum and library of the Royal Irish Academy, and also took a very active part in the Ordnance Survey of Ireland (1833-46). His principal literary work is an essay on the Round Towers, which gained the gold medal of the Royal Irish Academy in 1832, and was afterwards amplified and published under the title of 'An Inquiry into the Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland.' Died 17 Jan., 1866.

PETRONIUS ARBITER, TITUS, a native of Marseilles, who received his education at Rome, rose to the rank of consul, and held the office of governor of Bithynia. He was a favourite of Nero, who cherished him as a chief and leader among his chosen companions. This exposed him to the envy of Tigellinus, who accused him of treachery; and thus Petronius was constrained to destroy his own life, which he did by a gradual letting of blood, A.D. 66. His 'Satyricon,' is a representation of the prevailing licentiousness of his age, often offensive in its pictures, but not destitute of wit and animation.

PETTIGREW, THOMAS JOSEPH, F.R.S., F.S.A., an antiquarian writer, born in London 28 Oct., 1791; died 23 Nov., 1865. He practised as a surgeon in the metropolis, and became eminent in his profession. His principal works are memoirs of Dr. Lettsom, Dr. Thomas Cogan, and Lord Nelson; 'Bibliotheca Sussexiana,' a catalogue of the library of the duke of Sussex; 'History of Egyptian Mummies;' 'The Medical Portrait Gallery,' containing biographies of sixty eminent physicians and surgeons; 'On Superstitions connected with Medicine and Surgery;' and a collection of epitaphs entitled 'Chronicles of the Tombs.'

PETTY, Sir WILLIAM, was the son of a clothier at Romsey, Hampshire, where he was born 16 May, 1623. He received his education at the school of his native town, and next at Caen, in Normandy. On his return to England he obtained some situation in the navy, but soon quitted that service, and went to Paris, where he studied anatomy. In 1647 a patent was granted to him by the parliament for the invention of a copying machine, or pentagraph. The year following he settled at Oxford, where he became assistant to the professor of anatomy, practised physic, and was admitted to a fellowship of Brazenose College. In 1649 he was created doctor of physic at Oxford, where, in 1651, he was chosen professor of anatomy; and the same year he was elected musical professor in Gresham College. In 1652 he was appointed physician to the army in Ireland, and secretary to Henry Cromwell, by whom he was employed in surveying the forfeited lands, for which charges were alleged against him to the House of Commons, and he was dismissed from his places. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor-general of Ireland. He was one of the first fellows of the Royal Society, to which he presented the model of a double-bottomed ship, to sail against wind and tide. He suffered much by the fire of London, but, by marriage and various speculations, he recovered his loss, and died very rich, 16 Dec., 1687. Of his works, which are numerous, the best are his 'Political Anatomy of Ireland;' a treatise on 'Taxes and Contributions;' 'Political Arithmetic;' and a treatise on money, entitled 'Quantulumcunque.'

PETTY, WILLIAM, earl of Shelburne and marquis of Lansdowne. See LANSDOWNE.

PEYRE, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, a French painter and architect, born at Paris, 5 April, 1739; died 7 March, 1823.

PEYRÈRE, ISAAC DE LA, was born at Bordeaux 1594, and brought up in the Protestant religion. He was patronised by the Prince de Condé, who made him his librarian. He was imprisoned at Brussels for publishing a book to prove that Adam was not the first man, and when set at liberty went to Rome, where he abjured his opinions, and was received into the Catholic Church. Died 13 Jan., 1676.

PEYRON, JEAN FRANÇOIS PIERRE, a French historical painter, born at Aix 15 Nov., 1744; died 20 Jan., 1815.

PFEIFFER, AUGUST, an orientalist, born at Lauenburg 1640, professed the eastern languages at Leipsic, and was superintendent of the churches in Lubeck, where he died 11 Jan., 1698. His philological works were published at Utrecht, in 2 vols., 1704.

PFEIFFER, IDA, nee Reyer, a German traveller, born at Vienna 1795. At the age of 47, her husband being dead, and her two sons established in life, she began to gratify her passion for travelling, and as 'an unprotected female,' visited Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, Sweden, Norway, and Iceland, and after going through many dangers, accomplished two voyages round the world (1846 and 1851). She started on a fresh expedition in 1856, and at Madagascar was attacked by a fever, which carried her off 27 Oct., 1858. The accounts of her travels have been translated into English.

PHÆDRUS, an ancient fabulist, was a native of Thrace, and the freedman of Augustus, who gave him his liberty. He was persecuted in the reign of Tiberius, by the enmity of Sejanus, but for what cause is unknown. His Fables, which are written in Latin Iambic verse, lay in obscurity till the sixteenth century, when Peter Pithou discovered them at Troyes in 1596.

PHAER, THOMAS, M.D., was born in Pembrokeshire, and educated at Oxford, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn to study the law, which profession he quitted, after publishing a work on the nature of writs and a book of precedents. In 1559 he took his doctor's degree in physic, and his medical works were printed in 1560. Among his poetical productions are 'The Regimen of Life;' translated from the French; 'The Story of Owen Glendower in the Mirror for Magistrates;' and a translation of the first nine books of Virgil's Æneis 1562. Died 12 Aug., 1560.

PHALARIS, a native of Crete, who, in the year

571 B.C., made himself master of Agrigentum, in Sicily, where he was guilty of horrible cruelties. Among other instruments of destruction, he caused a hollow brazen bull to be made, into which Perillus, the inventor, was first put and burnt alive, for only demanding his reward. The people of Agrigentum at length arose and put the tyrant to death in the same way, B.C. 563. The letters which go under the name of Phalaris occasioned much controversy between Boyle and Bentley. They were printed at the Sorbonne about 1470, and at Oxford in 1695.

PHELAN, PATRICK, D.D., Catholic bishop of Toronto, died 16 July, 1857, having only enjoyed his see twenty-eight days.

PHERECRATES, a Greek comic poet, the contemporary of Plato and Aristophanes. Of his works only some fragments are extant.

PHIDIAS, one of the most celebrated sculptors of antiquity, was born at Athens between 490 and 480 B.C. He constructed a statue of Minerva; but being accused of embezzling some of the gold entrusted to him for that work by Pericles, he went to Elis, where, by way of revenge, he made a colossal statue of Jupiter, which infinitely surpassed his Minerva, and was deemed one of the wonders of the world. He died B.C. 432.

PHILELPHUS, FRANCIS. See FILELFO.

PHILEMON, a poet of Athens, who flourished B.C. 283. He was the rival of Menander, and lived to the age of 101. The fragments of Philemon's Comedies were published by Grotius, and some of them have been translated by Cumberland.

PHILIDOR, or DANICAN, ANDRÉ, a celebrated chess-player, was born at Dreux, in France, 1726. He resided several years in England, where he published his Analysis of the Game of Chess 1749. He also composed music with considerable success. Died in London 30 Aug., 1795.

PHILIP I., king of France, born 1052; succeeded his father, Henry I., 1060; and died 29 July, 1108.

PHILIP II., surnamed the August, was born 1165; succeeded his father, Louis VII., 1180; died 14 July, 1223.

PHILIP III., surnamed the Hardy, born 1245; succeeded his father, Louis IX., 1270; died 5 Oct., 1285.

PHILIP IV., called the Fair, son of the preceding, was born 1268; succeeded to the throne 1285; died 29 Nov., 1314.

PHILIP V., surnamed the Long, younger son of the last mentioned, was born 1294; succeeded his brother, Louis X., or Louis le Hutin, 1316; died 3 Jan., 1322.

PHILIP VI., usually called Philip de Valois, son of Charles, count of Valois, brother of Philip the Fair, was born 1293; ascended the throne 1328, on the death of his cousin, Charles le Bel; died 22 Aug., 1350.

PHILIP I., king of Spain, son of the Emperor Maximilian I., was born 1478; obtained the Spanish crown 1504; died 1506.

PHILIP II., son of Charles V., born 1527, became king of Naples and Sicily, by the abdication of his father, 1554, and the same year married Mary, queen of England. In 1556 his father resigned to him the crown of Spain. Died 13 Sept., 1598.

PHILIP III., born 1578, succeeded his father, Philip II., 1598; died 31 March, 1621.

PHILIP IV., born 1605; succeeded his father, Philip III., 1621; died 17 Sept., 1665.

PHILIP V., duke of Anjou, second son of Louis, dauphin of France, born 1683; assumed the title of king of Spain 1700; died 9 July, 1746.

PHILIP II., king of Macedon, the son of Amyntas, was born 382 B.C.; succeeded his brother, Perdiccas, 359 B.C., and was assassinated 336 B.C. He was the father of Alexander the Great.

PHILIP V., king of Macedon, born 237 B.C.; obtained the crown after the death of his cousin, Antigonus, 220 B.C.; died 179 B.C.

PHILIP, MARCUS JULIUS, a native of Bostra, in Trachonitis, became captain of the imperial guards 243. In 244 he caused the Emperor Gordian the Younger to be assassinated, and was himself proclaimed emperor. He was slain by his soldiers near Verona 249.

PHILIP the Good, duke of Burgundy, was born 1396; ascended the throne 1419; died 15 July, 1467.

PHILIP BENITI (ST.), or BENIZZI, fifth general of the Servites, was born 1232, of a noble family at Florence. He obtained the approbation of his order in the general council of Lyons 1274, and died at Podi 22 Aug., 1285. He did not found the order of Servites, as some have supposed; he only extended it. He was canonized by Clement IX. in 1671. Festival 23 Aug.

PHILIP NERI (ST.), founder of the congregation of priests of the Oratory in Italy, was born 23 July, 1515, of a noble family at Florence. His piety and zeal for the glory of God obtained for him an uncommon reputation. He died at Rome 26 May, 1595, and was canonized by Gregory XV. 1622. The congregation founded by St. Philip Neri was confirmed (1574) by Gregory XIII., and took the name of the Oratory because the original assemblies which gave rise to its establishment were held in an oratory of St. Jerome's Church at Rome. This congregation differs from the Congregation of the Oratory founded by Cardinal de Berulle, in France. Its members take no vows; their general governs but three years; their office is to deliver such instructions every day in their church as are suited to all capacities. Each institution has produced great numbers of men celebrated for their piety, learning, and services to the church. The Congregation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri was introduced into this country in 1849 by Father Faber.

PHILIPOT. See PHILPOT.

PHILIPS, AMBROSE, a poet, born in Leicestershire about 1671, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. Settling in London, he published his 'Pastorals,' which produced a difference between him and Pope. His next work was an abridgment of Hacket's 'Life of Archbishop Williams,' but his principal piece is the tragedy of 'The Distressed Mother,' taken from the French of Racine. He was also concerned in a periodical paper called 'The Free-thinker;' and when Dr. Boulter, one of the writers of that work, and afterwards archbishop of Armagh, went to Ireland, he made Philips registrar of the Prerogative Court at Dublin. He died in London 18 June, 1749

PHILIPS, FABIAN, was born at Prestbury, Gloucestershire, 28 Sept., 1601. He studied in the Middle Temple, and in the Rebellion distinguished himself by his loyalty. He became filazer, and one of the commissioners for regulating the law, and died 17 Nov., 1690. His principal works are, 'Veritas inconcussa; or King Charles I. no Man of Blood, but a Martyr for his People;' 'Tenenda non tollenda; or the necessity of preserving Tenures in Capite, and by Knights' Service;' 'The Antiquity and Necessity of Præ-emption and Pourveyance for the King.'

PHILIPS, JOHN, a poet, born at Bampton, in Oxfordshire, 30 Dec., 1676, and educated at Winchester School, whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, where he wrote his 'Splendid Shilling,' a poem, in imitation of Milton, and also 'Blenheim,' in praise of Marlborough's victory. But his principal production is the poem upon 'Cyder,' formed on the Georgics of Virgil. He died at Hereford 15 Feb., 1708. Philips was so inordinately attached to tobacco, that he mentions it in all his pieces except Blenheim.

PHILIPS, KATHERINE, the daughter of Mr. Fowler, a merchant of London, was born there 1 Jan., 1631; became the wife of James Philips, Esq., of the Priory of Cardigan; and died 22 June, 1664. Her poems, under the name of 'the matchless Orinda,' were printed in 1667; and in 1705 a volume of her correspondence was published, with the title of 'Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus.'

PHILLIMORE, JOHN GEORGE, born 1809; educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. He went to the bar, and eventually was appointed Q.C. He wrote several works on English and Roman law, and in 1863 produced the first volume of 'The History of England during the Reign of George III.;' but this was left incomplete by the author's death, which took place 27 April, 1865.

PHILLIP, JOHN, an eminent artist, born at Aberdeen 1817. Like many other celebrated artists, he commenced his career as a house-painter. During his apprenticeship he painted some studies of heads in his leisure hours, which attracted the notice of Lord Panmure, by whose liberality he was enabled to prosecute his studies in London. He entered the Royal Academy as a student in 1837, and astonished his fellow-labourers by his amazing dexterity, especially with the brush. From that time until his death he was a constant contributor to the exhibitions of the Royal Academy; but, however skilful and dexterous was his work, he never became famous until a happy thought led him to Spain, where the influence of Velasquez, and the habits and costumes of the people, aroused his latent powers. His first Spanish picture, 'The Letter Writer,' now in the possession of Queen Victoria, at once placed him in a conspicuous position, which his subsequent works enhanced. He was made an associate of the Royal Academy 1857, an academician two years afterwards, and died in London 27 Feb., 1867.

PHILLIPS, EDWARD, son of Edward Phillips, secondary in the Crown Office, by Anne, sister of Milton, was born in London Aug., 1630. He was educated under his uncle, after which he went to Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He published several compilations, particularly a dictionary, entitled 'A new World of Words,' folio; but his principal performance is his 'Theatrum Poetarum, or compleat Collection of the Poets,' 1675, of which a new edition was published by Sir Egerton Brydges 1800, and reprinted in 1824, 1828, and 1856.

PHILLIPS, RICHARD, F.R.S., an English chemist, born 1778; died at Camberwell, Surrey, 11 May, 1851. He was successively lecturer on chemistry in various public schools, and in 1839 was appointed curator and chemist of the Museum of Economic Geology, now the Museum of Practical Geology, which office he held till his death. In 1829 he became the conductor of the 'Annals of Philosophy;' and upon the incorporation of that journal with the 'Philosophical Magazine' he was retained as one of the editors. Mr. Phillips brought out an edition of the 'Pharmacopœia Londinensis,' and discovered the presence of phosphoric acid in uranite—a fact which had escaped the notice of Berzelius.

PHILLIPS, THOMAS, a Catholic divine, born at Ickford, Buckinghamshire, 5 July, 1708, received his education at St. Omer, after which he entered the priesthood and became a Jesuit, but quitted that society and was appointed to a canonicate of Tongres 1739, with a dispensation to enjoy the fruits thereof while he should serve the English mission. He served it as chaplain to George, fourteenth earl of Shrewsbury, to Sir Richard Acton, and to Mr. Berkley, of Spetchley, from 1763 to 1765. Retiring to Liège, he was readmitted into the Society of Jesus, and died there in July, 1774. His chief work is 'The Life of Cardinal Pole,' 2 vols. 1764, and again 1767; to which several replies were published by Protestant writers.

PHILLIPS, THOMAS, R.A., F.S.A., a painter, born at Dudley, Warwickshire, 18 Oct., 1770. Having learned at Birmingham the art of painting on glass, he came to London in 1790, and was employed by West on the glass paintings in St. George's Chapel, Windsor. He afterwards exhibited some historical paintings; but his portraits gained him his reputation. Mr. Phillips was professor of painting at the Royal Academy 1824-32, and in that capacity delivered ten 'Lectures on Painting, its History and Principles,' published together in 1833. Died 20 April, 1845.

PHILLIPS, WILLIAM, F.R.S., a geologist, elder brother of Richard Phillips, mentioned above, was born in London 10 May, 1773, and died at Tottenham Green 1828. Besides contributing a number of papers to the Transactions of the Geological Society, he wrote communications for scientific periodicals, and published works on mineralogy and geology, which had great influence in popularizing those branches of science.

PHILO-JUDÆUS, a Greek writer of Alexandria, who was sent by the Jews of that city on an embassy to Rome, to plead their cause against Apion, about the year 40. He went a second time to Rome in the reign of Claudius, and while there is said to have turned Christian. Philo was so great an admirer of Plato as to neglect the Jewish rites and customs for the doctrines of that philosopher. The two best editions of his works are by Mangey, 2 vols., London, 1742; and Richter, 8 vols., Leipsic, 1828-30.

PHILOMENA (ST.), a holy virgin, whose body was discovered 25 March, 1802, in the Catacombs of St. Priscilla, near Rome. The sepulchral stone exhibited many mysterious symbols regarding the virginity and martyrdom of the saint. According to revelations made to different persons after the discovery of the relics, the Emperor Diocletian, after the death of St. Sirene, his wife, whom he put to death along with her daughter, because they embraced the Christian faith, determined to marry Philomena. Being unable, however, to obtain her consent, since she had made a vow of chastity, he grew furiously indignant, subjecting her to every species of torment, till at length, failing to triumph over her virtue, he caused her to be beheaded at Rome 10 Aug., 286.

PHILOSTRATUS, FLAVIUS, a Greek author, born in the island of Lemnos about A.D. 172. He lived in the reign of Severus, whose empress, Julia Augusta, commanded him to write the 'Life of Apollonius Tyanæus,' which is full of fables. An edition of the works of Philostratus was printed at Leipsic in 1709.

PHILPOT, JOHN, was a native of Compton, Hampshire. He was educated at Winchester School, and next at New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In the reign of Edward VI. he was made archdeacon of Winchester; but at the accession of Mary he was seized by Bonner, and burnt in Smithfield 18 Dec., 1555. His works, edited by the Rev. R. Eden, were published by the Parker Society 1842.

PHILPOT, or PHILIPOT, JOHN, Somerset herald, was a native of Folkestone, Kent. He assisted Camden in his visitations. In 1636 he published a catalogue of the chancellors of England, and in 1637 an edition of Camden's Remains. The university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. He died 25 Nov., 1645. His son, Thomas Philpot, was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, and published the 'Villare Cantianum,' 1659; also a volume of poems; and 'Historicall Discourse of the Original and Growth of Heraldry,' 1672. He died Sept., 1682.

PHILPOTTS, HENRY, D.D., an Anglican prelate, born at Gloucester May, 1778. He received his academical education at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was afterwards elected a fellow of Magdalen College in that university. He became one of the chaplains to Dr. Barrington, bishop of Durham, 1806; a prebendary of Durham 1809; rector of Stanhope; and dean of Chester 1828. In 1830 the duke of Wellington appointed him to the bishopric of Exeter, and he held that dignity until a short time previous to his death, which occurred 8 Sept., 1869. Dr. Philpotts, who was the leader of the High Church party, wrote a large number of controversial works.

PHIPPS, CONSTANTINE JOHN, Lord Mulgrave. See MULGRAVE.

PHOCAS, emperor of the East, usurped the throne by murdering the Emperor Maurice and his children in 602. He was assassinated 4 Oct., 610.

PHOCION, an Athenian General, who was the disciple of Plato and Xenocrates. He opposed the war stirred up by Philip of Macedon; but when it commenced he fought bravely. He held the government for a long period, and with inflexible integrity; notwithstanding which he was deposed and poisoned B.C. 317.

PHOTIUS, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, was a native of that city. He rose to the highest offices of the state before he entered into orders, which took place on the deposition of Ignatius in 858. Photius was deprived in his turn by Basilius in 867; but, after living in exile eleven years, he forcibly regained his seat, which he kept till 886, and was then deprived by the Emperor Leo, who sent him into Armenia, where he died. His 'Bibliotheca' contains the substance of nearly three hundred ancient authors. It was printed at Vienna in 1601; but the best edition is that of Rouen in 1653, folio. The 'Nomocanon' of this author is a valuable digest of the canons of councils and imperial laws on ecclesiastical affairs. Photius's Letters were printed in 1651, folio; and a Greek Lexicon by him was published at Leipsic in 1808, from two inaccurate manuscripts. There is a very correct one, with a beautiful copy, made by Professor Porson, in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge.

PIAZZETTA, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a painter, born 1682, at Venice, where he died 1754.

PIAZZI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian astronomer, born at Ponte, in the Valtelline, 1746; died at Naples 22 July, 1826. He was director-general of the observatories of Naples and Palermo.

PIBRAC. See FAUR.

PICARD, JEAN, a French astronomer, born at La Flèche July 21, 1620, became prior of Rille, in Anjou, but afterwards settled at Paris, where he was appointed astronomer to the Academy of Sciences. Louis XIV. sent him, in 1671, to make observations at the castle of Uranienburg, whence he brought the manuscripts of Tycho Brahe. Picard first applied the telescope to quadrants; and he executed the work entitled 'La Connoissance des Temps,' which he calculated from 1679 to 1683, in which year he died. He began the measurement of the degrees of the French meridian, and was the first who observed the mercurial phosphorus in the barometer. He wrote treatises on Levelling, Dioptrics, and Measures.

PICART, BERNARD, an engraver, born at Paris 1663; died at Amsterdam 1733. He engraved the plates in the 'Cérémonies Religieuses de toutes les Nations.'

PICCART, MICHAEL, born at Nuremberg 1574, became professor of philosophy and poetry at Altdorf, where he died 3 April, 1620. He wrote Commentaries on Aristotle, &c.

PICCINI, NICOLO, a composer, born at Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, 1728, and studied in the Conservatorio of St. Onofrio at Naples, under Leo and Durante. In 1754 he went to Florence, where he produced some operas, the principal of which was 'Zenobia.' After this his fame spread over Italy. At Paris, however, he met with difficulties, the amateurs being divided in their judgment between him and Gluck; but at last Piccini triumphed even over the prejudices of the French. He died at Passy 7 May, 1800.

PICHEGRU, CHARLES, a French general, born 16 Feb., 1761, at Arbois, in Franche-Comté. His parentage was mean; but he received a good education under the monks in his native town, after which he entered into the army and became a sergeant. In the Revolution he was elevated to the rank of general, and in 1793 gained a victory over the combined armies at Hagenau; in consequence of which he succeeded to the command of the army of the north. His most celebrated exploit was the subjugation of Holland, for which he was elected a member of the National Assembly. At length he fell under the suspicion of being a royalist, and was banished to Cayenne, from whence he escaped to England. In the spring of 1804 he went to Paris, but was soon seized and thrown into a dungeon of the Temple, where he was secretly murdered on the 6th of April, the same year.

PICHLER, CAROLINE VON, a German romancist, born at Vienna 7 Sept., 1769; died 9 July, 1843.

PICKFORD, EDWARD. See DANIEL.

PICTET, BENEDICT, a Protestant divine and historian, born at Geneva 1655, became professor of theology in his native city, and died there 10 June, 1724.

PICTON, Sir THOMAS, a British general, descended from an ancient family of Pembrokeshire, commenced his military career as an ensign in the 12th Regiment of Foot, in 1791. In 1794 he embarked for the West Indies; and after the reduction of St. Lucia and Trinidad in 1797 he rose to the rank of colonel, and was appointed governor of the latter island. In 1809 he was at the siege of Flushing, and on its capture was appointed governor. He afterwards went to Spain, and distinguished himself at Badajos, Vittoria, Ciudad Rodrigo, &c. At the battle of Waterloo (18 June, 1815), where he commanded the 5th Division of the army, he was killed after having repulsed one of the most serious attacks made by the enemy. A monument to his memory was voted by Parliament, and erected in St. Paul's Cathedral.

PICUS OF MIRANDULA. See MIRANDOLA.

PIERCE, EDWARD, an English painter in the reigns of Charles I. and II. He was eminent in history and landscapes; but there are few of his pictures in existence, most of them having been destroyed in the Fire of London. He worked some time for Vandyke. Pierce had three sons, one of whom was a sculptor, and executed several good statues, particularly of Gresham, at the Royal Exchange; of Walworth, at Fishmongers' Hall; and of Sir Christopher Wren, at Oxford.

PIERCY, JOHN. See FISHER.

PIERMARINI, GIUSEPPE, an Italian architect, born 18 July, 1734, at Foligno, where he died 18 Feb., 1808. For thirty years he was constantly employed at Milan, which city is indebted to him for the Theatre della Scala and other magnificent structures.

PIERRE, CORNEILLE DE LA. See LAPIDE, CORNELIUS À.

PIGALLE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French sculptor, born 1714 at Paris, where he died 20 Aug., 1785. His masterpiece is the tomb of Marshal Saxe, at Strasburg.

PIGHIUS, ALBERT, a divine and mathematician, born at Kampen, in Holland, about 1490; died at Utrecht 26 Dec., 1542. He wrote many able treatises in defence of the Roman Church, and a learned work on the reform of the Church Calendar.

PIGHIUS, STEPHEN VINAND, nephew of the above, born at Kampen 1520, spent many years in Italy, and died, canon of Xanten, 19 Oct., 1604. His great work, which was completed by Andrew Schott, is the 'Annales Magistratuum et Provinciarum S.P.Q.R. ab urbe conditâ,' 3 vols. folio, Antwerp, 1599-1615.

PIGNOTTI, LORENZO, born at Figline, in the Val d'Arno, 1739, became professor of natural philosophy at Pisa, where he died 5 Aug., 1812. He wrote a History of Tuscany, and a series of Fables in Italian verse.

PILES, ROGER DE, a French writer, born at Clameci 1635. He studied divinity in the Sorbonne, and while there cultivated a taste for painting, which brought him acquainted with Du Fresnoy, whose Latin poem on the art he translated into French. In 1652 he was appointed tutor to the son of M. Amelot, to whom he became secretary when he went ambassador to Venice. During his residence there, he received a commission from the king to purchase pictures, and to negotiate some political business at Vienna. In 1692 he was employed in the same double character in Holland, but being discovered, he was thrown into prison, where he wrote his 'Lives of the Painters.' At the peace of Ryswick he gained his liberty, and soon after went to Spain, but the climate not agreeing with him, he returned, and died at Paris 5 May, 1709. He wrote An Abridgment of Anatomy, accommodated to the Arts of Painting and Sculpture; Dialogues on the Knowledge of Painting; a Dissertation on the Works of famous Painters; and Elements of Practical Painting.

PILKINGTON, JAMES, an Anglican prelate, born 1520, at Rivington, in the parish of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became president. In Queen Mary's reign he retired, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth, and was appointed master of St. John's College 1559. He was consecrated bishop of Durham 2 March, 1560-61, and died at Bishop's Auckland 23 Jan., 1575-6. Bishop Pilkington wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, and other works, published at Cambridge, for the Parker Society, 1842, under the editorship of the Rev. James Scholefield.—Athen. Cantab.

PILON, GERMAIN, a French sculptor, died at Paris in or about 1605.

PILPAY, or BIDPAI, an oriental fabulist, of whose personal history nothing is recorded. It is conjectured that he lived several centuries before the Christian era. His Fables have been translated into almost every European language, and perhaps no book, the Sacred Scriptures excepted, has undergone so many versions.

PINDAR, the first of lyric poets, was born at Cynoscephalæ, a village between Thebes and Thespia, in Bœotia, B.C. 522. He quitted his native country, which was proverbial for the stupidity of its inhabitants, and went to Athens, where the greatest honours were bestowed upon him; but his principal patron was Hiero, king of Syracuse, at whose court he is supposed to have spent the latter part of his life. He died B.C. 442. Such was the respect paid to his memory, that when the Lacedæmonians took Thebes, they spared his house, as did also Alexander the Great. We have only his four volumes of his Epinician Odes, or hymns of triumph, extant, and some fragments of his other poems. The best edition of his works is by Böckh, 3 vols., Leipsic, 1821. There are English translations of Pindar by West, Moore, and Carey.

PINDAR, PETER. See WOLCOT, JOHN.

PINDEMONTE, IPPOLITO, an Italian poet, born 13 Nov., 1753, at Verona, where he died 18 Nov., 1828.

PINE, JOHN, an English engraver, born 1690; was created Bluemantle pursuivant 1743; and died in the College of Arms 4 May, 1756. His son, Robert Edge Pine, a painter of no great merit, died at Philadelphia 1790.

PINEL, PHILIPPE, a French physician, who introduced many improvements in the treatment of the insane, was born at Saint Paul, near Lavour, 20 April, 1745; and died 25 Nov., 1826.

PINELLI, BARTOLOMEO, an Italian painter and etcher, born 1781, at Rome, where he died 1 April, 1835.

PINGRÉ, ALEXANDRE GUI, an astronomer, born at Paris 4 Sept., 1711; died 1 May, 1796.

PINKERTON, JOHN, F.S.A., the son of a dealer in hair, was born at Edinburgh 13 Feb., 1758, and after having received an ordinary education, was articled to a writer to the signet, with whom he remained five years. In 1781 he settled in London, where he published a variety of works; and in 1806 removed to Paris, where he died o March, 1826. His chief publications are, 'An ssay on Medals;' 'Letters on Literature;' 'Walpoliana;' 'The Treasury of Wit;' 'Dissertation n the Origin and Progress of the Scythians, or Goths, being an introduction to the Ancient and Modern History of Europe;' 'The Medallic History f England;' 'Inquiry into the History of Scotnd, preceding the reign of Malcolm III.;' 'Iconoraphia Scotica, or Portraits of Illustrious Persons f Scotland, with Biographical Notes;' 'Modern Geography, digested on a new plan;' 'General ollection of Voyages and Travels;' 'New Modern tlas,' and 'Petralogy, or a Treatise on Rocks.' His Literary orrespondence was edited by Dawson Turner, nd published at London in 1830.

PINKNEY, Miles. See Carr, Thomas.

PINTURRICHIO, Bernardino, a painter, born t Perugia 1454; died 1513. He became the isciple and assistant of Pietro Perugino. His rincipal pictures are the History of Pius II., and Nativity.

PIOMBO, Sebastiano del, a painter, born 1485, Venice, whence he was called also Veneziano. e was at first a musician, but quitted that prossion to study painting under Giovanni Bellini, nd next under Giorgione da Castel Franco. He nitated the latter with success, and many of his ctures are equal to those of Giorgione. On oing to Rome, he became the friend of Michael ngelo, who stimulated him to rival Raphael in a inting of the resurrection of Lazarus. This cture is now in the National Gallery. Sebastian ed at Rome 1547.

PIOZZI, Hester Lynch, was the daughter of hn Salusbury, Esq., of Bodvil, Caernarvonshire, here she was born 1739. In 1763 she married r. Henry Thrale, an opulent brewer in Southark, and M.P. for that borough. Soon after this nion Dr. Johnson became intimate with the mily, which acquaintance ripened into friendip, and continued till the death of Mr. Thrale, 1781, when the widow gave up housekeeping nd retired to Bath, where, within a short time, e married one Piozzi, an Italian music master, ith whom she went abroad. At Florence she rmed one of the associated English, who conucted a kind of poetical magazine there, in hich the effusions of Mrs. Piozzi figured conicuously, but so little to her credit, that these rformances made most readers suspect that the le of 'Three Warnings,' and some other pieces blished formerly under her name when Mrs. hrale, had another origin. In 1786 she gave to e world an entertaining volume of 'Anecdotes Dr. Johnson,' and soon afterwards two volumes Letters by that great man. Her subsequent blications are, 'Observations and Reflections ade in a Journey through France, Italy, and rmany,' 2 vols.; 'The Florence Miscellany;' ritish Synonymy, or an Attempt to regulate the oice of Words in Conversation,' 2 vols.; and he Retrospect, or a Review of the most striking d important Events, Characters, Situations, and eir Consequences, of which the last 1800 years re presented to the View of Mankind,' 2 vols, 1. Hayward published in 1861 the 'Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains of Mrs. Piozzi.'

PIPPI. See Giulio Romano.

PIRANESI, Giovanni Battista, an engraver and architect, born at Venice 1720. He resided at Rome, where he executed a number of fine views of antiquities, of which a volume was published in 1750, and many afterwards; but the principal collection is entitled 'Della Magnificenza ed Architettura de' Romani.' Among his works is an engraving of Blackfriars Bridge in its unfinished state. Died 9 Nov., 1778.

PIRON, Alexis, a French poet and dramatist, born at Dijon 9 July, 1689. On visiting Paris he obtained employment as a copyist, and afterwards turned author. His best piece is the drama of 'La Métromanie.' He also composed Tales, Odes, &c., most of them grossly licentious, a circumstance which kept him from a seat in the Academy. In revenge he wrote this epitaph for himself:—

'Cy gît Piron, qui ne fut rien,
Pas même Académicien.'

Died 21 Jan., 1773.

PISANO, Giovanni, son of Niccolo Pisano, and like him, a famous sculptor and architect, was born about 1235. His principal work was the renowned Campo Santo, or cemetery at Pisa, with the adjacent cathedral, campanile, and baptistery. He executed several celebrated works at Siena, Naples, and elsewhere; and, loaded with honours and distinctions, died at Pisa 1320.

PISCATOR, Paganus. See Fisher.

PITCAIRNE, Archibald, M.D., born at Edinburgh 25 Dec., 1652; was educated in the university there and at Paris. In 1680 he took his doctor's degree at Rheims, after which he settled in his native city. In 1692 he was appointed professor of medicine at Leyden, but in the following year he returned to Edinburgh, where he practised till his death, 13 Oct., 1713. His principal work, 'Elementa Medicinæ Physico-Mathematica,' was published in 1717.

PITHOU, Pierre, a French lawyer, born at Troyes 1539. He studied at Paris, and next at Bourges; after which he attended the bar, where he acquired a considerable reputation. Being a Protestant, he had a narrow escape in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but soon afterwards he was reconciled to the Catholic Church. He died on his birthday, 1 Nov., 1596. To him the world is indebted for the Fables of Phædrus, which his brother discovered in manuscript. His principal works are, 'Adversaria Subseciva;' a treatise on the 'Liberties of the Gallican Church;' and notes on classical authors.

PITISCUS, Samuel, born at Zutphen 30 March, 1637, became master of the school at his native place, and afterwards director of the college of St. Jerome at Utrecht, where he died 1 Feb., 1727. His publications are, 'Fundamenta religionis Christianæ;' 'Lexicon Latino-Belgicum;' 'Lexicon Antiquitatum Romanorum;' and editions of Quintius Curtius, Solinus, Suetonius, and Aurelius Victor.

PITS, or PITSEUS, John, a biographer, born at Alton, Hampshire, 1560. He was educated at Wykeham's School, near Winchester, and at New College, Oxford, which he left, and went to Douay, next to Rheims, and lastly to Rome, where he was ordained priest. He was for some time professor of rhetoric and Greek at Rheims; after which he became confessor to the duchess of Cleves, and dean of Liverdun, in Lorraine, where he died 17 Oct., 1616. His works are, 'De Legibus;' 'De Beatitudine;' 'De Peregrinatione;' 'Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis;' better known by the general title, 'De Illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus,' Paris, 1619.

PITT, CHRISTOPHER, a poet, born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1699, and educated at Oxford, became rector of Pimpern in his native county, and died 14 April, 1748. He is best known by his versions of 'Vida's Art of Poetry,' and the Æneid.

PITT, THOMAS, the founder of an illustrious family, was born at St. Mary's, Blandford, 1653. Towards the end of that century he went to the East Indies as Governor of Fort St. George, where he resided many years, and realized a large fortune; particularly by a diamond which he purchased for £20,400, and sold to the king of France for somewhat more than five times that sum. The cuttings were valued at eight or ten thousand pounds. It having been reported that the Governor gained this jewel unfairly, he published a narrative containing a fair statement of the transaction, which completely refuted the calumny, although Pope very unwarrantably endeavoured to give the falsehood currency. In 1716 Mr. Pitt was made Governor of Jamaica, but did not hold that situation above a year. He sat in four Parliaments for Old Sarum and Thirsk. He repaired and beautified the churches of St. Mary, Blandford, Stratford, in Wiltshire, and Abbotston, in Hampshire. He died 28 April, 1726; and was buried in Blandford church, where a monument was erected to his memory. At Boconnoc, in Cornwall, the seat of Lord Grenville, is a portrait of him by Kneller, with the diamond in his hat. His eldest son, Robert Pitt of Boconnoc, who died in 1727, was the father of the great Lord Chatham.

PITT, THOMAS, Lord Camelford. See CAMELFORD.

PITT, WILLIAM, earl of Chatham. See CHATHAM.

PITT, WILLIAM, second son of the first earl of Chatham, was born 28 May, 1759, at Hayes, Kent. He had a domestic education; and at the age of fourteen was entered of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, under Doctor Pretyman, afterwards bishop of Winchester. On leaving the university he spent some time in France; and, after his return, became a student of Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar, which he quitted in 1780, when he obtained a seat in parliament, where he exerted the power of his eloquence against Lord North. On the removal of that minister, Mr. Pitt did not obtain a place; but when the earl of Shelburne succeeded the marquis of Rockingham, he became chancellor of the exchequer. This ministry, however, was soon displaced by the coalition of Lord North and Mr. Fox, in 1782; but the famous India Bill of the latter producing another change, at the end of 1783 Mr. Pitt became first lord of the treasury, as well as chancellor of the exchequer. Though in this situation he had to encounter an extraordinary combination of talents and influence, he overcame all obstacles, and carried many important measures, particularly his own India Bill, a commercial treaty with France, the Acts against smuggling, and the establishment of a Sinking Fund for liquidating the public debt. The illness of the king, in 1788, opened a new field for the energies of this great man, who, by taking constitutional ground in regard to the right of parliament to settle a regency, ingratiated himself with the nation, though certain of being removed when that appointment should take place. The recovery of his majesty, however, fixed him more firmly in his seat. The next great event in his life was that of being called to oppose the power of revolutionary France, and to secure the nation from similar convulsions. In this also he succeeded; and though many of his plans were thwarted, he had the satisfaction of seeing the English flag triumphant over every sea. At length he acceded to the wish than an experiment for peace should be tried, which took place in 1801, under Mr. Addington; but the event proved how fallacious were the hopes of the people; and, in 1804, Mr. Pitt was recalled to power. But his health was now in a very precarious state, and an hereditary gout, aggravated by public cares, completely undermined his constitution. After trying the waters of Bath, without effect, he died at Putney 23 Jan., 1806. His greatest glory was, that after spending his whole life in the service of his country, he died insolvent; on which account, besides a public funeral, parliament voted a grant of forty thousand pounds to pay his debts. His remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey.

PITTACUS, one of the seven sages of Greece, was born at Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos, about 650 B.C. He was sovereign of his native place, and discharged the duties of his station in such a manner that the citizens would have rewarded him with a large grant of land; but he refused to take more than a very small estate. He died B.C. 579.

PITTS, WILLIAM, a sculptor, born in London 1790; committed suicide 16 April, 1840.

PIUS I., Pope, succeeded Hyginus 142, and died 11 July, 150.

PIUS II., Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini, born 18 Oct., 1405, at Corsini, in the territory of Siena, succeeded Calixtus III. 1458; died 14 Aug., 1464.

PIUS III., Francis Todeschini, succeeded Pope Alexander VI. 22 Sept., 1503, and died on 13 Oct. in the same year.

PIUS IV., John Angelo de Medici, born at Milan 1499; succeeded Paul IV. 25 Dec., 1559; died 9 Dec., 1565.

PIUS V. (ST.), Michael Ghislieri, born at Boschi 17 Jan., 1504; succeeded Pius IV. 7 Jan., 1566; died 30 April, 1572; was canonized 1712.

PIUS VI., Giovanni Angelo Braschi, born at Cesena 1717; succeeded Clement XIV. 1774; died 29 Aug., 1799.

PIUS VII., Gregorio Barnaba Chiaramonti, born 1742; succeeded Pius VI. 14 March, 1800; died 20 Aug., 1823.

PIUS VIII., Castiglione, born 1761; succeeded Leo XII. March, 1829; died 30 Nov., 1830.

PIXERÉCOURT, RENÉ CHARLES GUILBERT DE, a French dramatist, born at Nancy 22 Jan., 1773; died 27 July, 1844. Among his very numerous works we may specify 'La Fille de l'Exilé;' 'Le Chien de Montargis;' 'Tekeli;' and 'La Peste de Marseille.'

PIZARRO, FRANCIS, the conqueror of Peru, was the illegitimate son of a gentleman in Truxillo, who abandoned him in his youth, so that he was obliged to keep hogs. He next embarked for America as a soldier, and in 1524 associated, at nama, with Diego de Almagro and Hernandez icque, a priest, in an enterprise to make dis- veries. In this voyage they fell in with the coast Peru; but, being too few to make any attempt a settlement, Pizarro returned to Spain, where that he gained was a power from the court to osecute his object. However, having raised me money, he was enabled again, in 1531, to sit Peru, where a civil war was then raging be- ween Huascar, the legitimate monarch, and his lf-brother Atahualpa. Pizarro, by pretending take the part of the latter, was permitted to arch into the interior, where he made the un- specting chief his prisoner, and exacted an im- ense ransom. This drew fresh adventurers; and on after Pizarro murdered the unfortunate Ata- alpa by burning him at a stake. In 1535 the nqueror laid the foundation of Lima; but in 37 a contest arose between him and Almagro. no was defeated and executed. The son and ends of Almagro, however, avenged his death, d on 26 June, 1541, Pizarro was assassinated in s palace.

PLACE, FRANCIS, was born at Dinsdale, co. rham. He was bred to the law, and afterwards pended considerable sums in an attempt to ake porcelain. He was an excellent painter as ll as engraver, but executed all his works for nusement. His etchings of landscapes and birds e admirable, and his portraits in mezzotinto are o fine. Died at York 1728.

PLANTA, JOSEPH, F.R.S., born in the Grisons, Switzerland, 21 Feb., 1744; came early to Eng- nd; was for many years secretary to the Royal ciety; succeeded Dr. Morton as principal libra- n of the British Museum 1799; died 3 Dec., 27. He wrote a 'History of the Helvetic Con- leracy;' 'View of the Restoration of the Hel- tic Confederacy;' and the Catalogue of the Cot- nian MSS.

PLANTIN, CHRISTOPHE, a printer, born near urs 1514. He was brought up under Robert cé, at Caen, after which he went to Antwerp, ere he established one of the first printing- uses in Europe. The king of Spain gave him a nsion and a patent for the exclusive printing of ticular works. Plantin had also an office at yden, and another at Paris. Died 1 July, 1589.

PLATINA, BARTOLOMEO DE' SACCHI, an historian, rn 1421 at Piadena, the Latin name of which is tina, a village near Mantua. He was at first a lier, but afterwards settled at Rome, where he s appointed one of the apostolical abbreviators, which office he was afterwards deprived by l II. Pope Sixtus IV. made him librarian of Vatican. He died 1481. His principal work De Vitis ac Gestis summorum Pontificum,' or tory of the Popes, printed first at Venice in 9, and translated into English by Rycaut. He wrote 'A History of Mantua.'

PLATO, the most illustrious philosopher of an- iity, was born in the island of Ægina B.C. 429. his youth he applied himself to poetry and nting, both which pursuits he relinquished to ome a disciple of Socrates. During the im- onment of his master Plato attended him, and mitted to writing his last discourses upon the mortality of the Soul. He then retired to Me- a, after which he extended his travels to Magna ecia and Egypt. On his return to Athens he ned his school in a grove called the Academy, r the door of which seminary was this inscrip- tion: 'Let no one ignorant of geometry enter here.' He was soon attended by a number of hearers from various countries, who spread his fame abroad in such a manner that several princes invited him to their courts. Among those who sought his ac- quaintance was Dionysius of Syracuse, whom Plato visited three times. When he first went to Sicily he undertook the instruction of Dion, the brother- in-law of the king; but the doctrines which the philosopher taught were so disagreeable to the tyrant that he not only banished him from the island, but prevailed upon the inhabitants of Ægina to sell him for a slave. From this state, however, he was redeemed by Aniceris, of the Cyrenaic sect, who sent him to Athens. Dionysius now desired Plato to return, which request he answered by saying that philosophy would not allow him to think of such a man. A regard for Dion, however, overcame his resentment; and a wish to be serviceable to the younger Dionysius induced him to visit Syracuse, where he was re- ceived by the tyrant with extraordinary honours. The king even went so far as to introduce a reform in his court, which, while it gave satisfaction to the virtuous, produced jealousies and cabals against the philosopher among men of corrupt principles, at the head of whom was Philistus, whose evil counsels prevailed, and Dion was ban- ished. Plato then returned to Athens, where he had not been long before the tyrant courted him back once more, with which request he complied at the entreaty of Archytas of Tarentum, and other philosophers. On his arrival he met with a gracious reception, and was presented with eighty talents of gold; but as he could not procure the recall of Dion, he returned to Greece, where he devoted the rest of his days to the improvement of science and the education of youth. Plato died B.C. 347. The best edition of Plato's works, in Greek and Latin, is that of Immanuel Bekker, 10 vols., 1816-18. A portion of his works (fifty Dialogues and twelve Epistles) has been translated into English by Sydenham and Taylor, London, 5 vols., 1804.

PLAUTUS, MARCUS ACCIUS, a comic writer, was born at Sarsina, in Umbria. His proper name was Marcus Accius, to which the term Plautus was added, it is supposed, on account of his ill-formed feet. His parentage was low, and he is said to have been the son of a slave. Besides writing for the theatre, in which he was very successful, he carried on trade, but became so unfortunate as to be reduced to the necessity of working at a mill. He died B.C. 184. We have only twenty of his plays extant, first printed at Venice in 1472, folio; but the best edition is that of Ernesti, Leip- sic, 1760, 2 vols. 8vo.

PLAYFAIR, Sir HUGH LYON, a distinguished military officer in the service of the East India Company, afterwards provost of St. Andrew's, was born at the manse of Meigle and Newtyle, of which parishes his father was minister, 17 Nov., 1786, and died at St. Leonard's, St. Andrew's, 21 Jan., 1861.

PLAYFAIR, JOHN, was born 10 March, 1748, at Bervie, near Dundee, of which parish his father was minister. He received his education at St. Andrew's, and in 1772 succeeded to his father's living, but resigned it some years afterwards, and went to Edinburgh, where he became professor of mathematics. When the Royal Society was esta- blished there he was appointed one of the secretaries, and contributed many papers to the memoirs of that institution. In his latter years the professor applied himself to the study of geology, which he pursued with indefatigable ardour, and, in 1816, undertook a journey to the Alps for the purpose of making observations on those mountains. He died at Edinburgh 20 July, 1819. Among his works are, 'Elements of Geometry;' 'Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth;' 'System of Geography;' and 'Outlines of Philosophy.' A collected edition of his works was published at Edinburgh, in 4 vols. 8vo., 1822. His brother, William Playfair (b. 1759; d. 1823), was the author of several political works, including 'A Commercial and Political Atlas;' 'Inquiry into the Decline and Fall of Nations;' and 'France as it is.'

PLAYFORD, JOHN, a publisher of music, born 1613. He kept a shop in Fleet Street, and was, besides, clerk of the Temple Church. In 1655 appeared his 'Introduction to the Skill of Music,' which went through numerous editions. This was followed by 'Court Ayres;' and 'Psalms and Hymns in solemn Music.' He died about 1693. His son, Henry Playford, published 'Orpheus Britannicus.'

PLINY THE ELDER, Caius Plinius Secundus, was born at Verona A.D. 23. He became procurator in Spain and Africa, and he was also advanced to the dignity of augur. As an inquirer into the works of nature he was indefatigable, and he lost his life by his thirst for knowledge. Being at Misenum with a fleet which he commanded, on the 24th of August, A.D. 79, his sister desired him to observe a remarkable cloud that had just appeared. Pliny, discovering that it proceeded from Mount Vesuvius, ordered his galleys to sea, to assist the inhabitants on the coast, while he himself steered as near as possible to the foot of the mountain, which now sent forth vast quantities of burning rocks and lava. Pliny and his companions landed at Stabiæ, but were soon obliged to leave the town for the fields, where the danger was equally great from the shower of fire which fell upon them. In this state they made the best of their way to the shore; but Pliny, who was very corpulent, fell down dead, suffocated by the noxious vapours, and it was not till three days afterwards that his body was found. Of the works of this great man we have only his 'Natural History,' in thirty-seven books, first printed at Venice in 1469. One of the best editions is that of Hardouin, 3 vols. folio, 1723. It has been miserably translated by Philemon Holland, folio, 1601.

PLINY THE YOUNGER, Caius Plinius Cæcilius Secundus, nephew of the preceding, was born at Novocomum A.D. 62. His father's name was Cæcilius, and his other names he received from his mother's brother, by whom he was adopted. He studied under Virginius and Quintilian; and in his eighteenth year began to plead in the Forum. Soon after this he went as tribune to Syria; from whence he returned, when he had made one or two campaigns, and settled at Rome. He was promoted A.D. 100 to the consular dignity by Trajan, in praise of whom he pronounced a famous oration, which is extant. He was next chosen augur, and afterwards made pro-consul of Bithynia, from whence he wrote to Trajan a curious account of the Christians, and their manner of worship. Pliny died about A.D. 116. His epistles have been translated into English by Lord Orrery, and by Mr. Melmoth.

PLOT, ROBERT, D.C.L., F.R.S., a naturalist, was born at Borden, in Kent, 1640. He studied at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. 1671; after which he removed to University College. In 1677 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, of which body he became one of the secretaries. In 1683 he was appointed keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, and reader of chemistry at Oxford, both which offices he resigned on being made secretary to the earl-marshal, who gave him the place of Mowbray herald, and that of registrar of the court of honour. Died 30 April, 1696. His works are, 'The Natural Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire.' He also wrote 'De Origine Fontium, Tentamen Philosophicum,' and several papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher, born at Lycopolis, in Egypt, A.D. 205; died 270.

PLOWDEN, CHARLES, a lineal descendant of the great lawyer Edmund Plowden, was born at Plowden Hall, Shropshire, 1 May, 1743. Being intended for the priesthood he was sent to study at St. Omer and Bologna, after which he received holy orders, and entered the Society of Jesus. After holding offices in connection with his order at Bruges and Liége, he was appointed (1784) tutor to the sons of Mr. Weld, of Lullworth, Dorsetshire. Ten years later he rejoined his brethren at Stonyhurst College, Lancashire, and essentially promoted the welfare of that establishment. He was nominated provincial of his order 1817, and died at Jougné, in France, while returning from a journey to Rome, 13 June, 1821. His works are numerous. We have only space to mention, 'Considerations on the modern opinion of the Fallibility of the Holy See in the decision of Dogmatical Questions,' 1790; 'Remarks on the Writings of the Rev. Joseph Berington,' 1792; 'Remarks on the book entitled Memoirs of Gregorio Panzani,' 1794.

PLOWDEN, EDMUND, an eminent lawyer, born at Plowden, Shropshire, 1518. He studied for three years at Cambridge, and then entered the Middle Temple, of which he afterwards became reader. A writ was directed to him calling upon him to take upon himself the state and degree of serjeant-of-law, but being a Catholic, and therefore unable to take the oaths, he was never actually created a serjeant, though he is not unfrequently so entitled. He steadily adhered to the Catholic religion, and was frequently employed in opposition to the established authorities. Died 6 Feb., 1584-5. His celebrated 'Reports,' first published in French 1571, appeared in an English dress 1779, and again 1816.—Athen. Cantab.

PLUKENET, LEONARD, a botanist, born 1642. He was an apothecary, and resided in Westminster, where he had a garden; but afterwards he had an appointment at Hampton Court. He rendered great service to Ray; and died about 1706. His works are, 'Phytographia;' 'Almagestum Botanicum;' 'Almagesti Botanici Mantissa;' and 'Amaltheum Botanicum.' All these were republished in 1720, and again in 1769.

PLUMPTRE, JAMES, son of Dr. Robert Plumptre, president of Queen's College, Cambridge, became a fellow of Clare Hall in that university, (B.A. 1792; M.A. 1795; B.D. 1808). His college presented him in 1812 to the living of Great Gransden, Huntingdonshire, where he died 23 Jan., 1832, æt. 62. He published a number of plays and works relating to the drama.

PLUNKET, OLIVER, a Catholic primate of Ire-d, born at Loughcrew, co. Meath, 1629. He s educated at Rome, and on 9 July, 1669, the cred Congregation nominated him archbishop Armagh and primate of all Ireland. At the ne of Oates's plot, some miscreants accused him having abetted a pretended invasion. He was ordingly tried in London, convicted of high ason, and executed at Tyburn 1 July, 1681. is now universally admitted that he was quite ocent of the offence for which he suffered.
interesting volume of 'Memoirs' of this pre-
, by the Very Rev. Patrick Francis Moran, D.D., e-rector of the Irish College at Rome, was blished at Dublin in 1861.

LUNKET, WILLIAM CONYNGHAM, Lord Plunket, son of a Unitarian minister at Enniskillen, was n there July 1764, received his academical cation at Trinity College, Dublin; was called he Irish bar 1787, and became a king's counsel
8. When the rebellion broke out he gave fessional aid to the patriots, and was publicly used of being associated in their proceedings.
s charge he vehemently denied in 1803, on the l of Emmett, whom he prosecuted on behalf he crown. Mr. Plunket certainly discharged duty on that painful trial in a manner more arkable for zeal in his cause than for humane sideration towards the culprit. He had entered Irish Parliament 1798, as member for Clare-st. His speeches in the debates on the union h England raised him to the first rank of his y, and they also greatly increased his practice he bar. In Oct. 1803, Mr. Plunket was adced to the office of solicitor-general for Ireland, in Oct. 1805 to that of attorney-general, which tion he held till 1807. During a portion of latter year he sat in the British House of mmons for Midhurst. Mr. Plunket now gave self up to the practice of his profession at the bar. In every Chancery suit he appeared as ing counsel, and continued in the undisputed yment of that position from 1807 to 1827, in course of which period his fees, exclusive of essional gains during the preceding twenty , could not have amounted to less than an age income of £6,000 per annum. In 1812 ok his seat in the British House of Commons epresentative for Dublin university. He was alous supporter of Catholic emancipation, and ed Mr. Canning afterwards remarked that no vidual whatever had contributed so much as Plunket had done to the success of the Catholic ss. In 1822 he was again appointed attorney-ral for Ireland. In 1827, on the recommendaof Mr. Canning, he was raised to the peerage he United Kingdom, by the title of Baron ket, being at the same time appointed chief e of the Common Pleas in Ireland, which e he held till 1830. During the passing of the us Catholic Relief Bill through the House of , Lord Plunket, by the invitation of the of Wellington, sat beside him on the treasury h, and took charge of the measure. He was inted lord chancellor of Ireland 1830, and held office, except for a brief interval, till 1841, he retired into private life. Died 5 Jan.,

UTARCH, a philosopher and historian, was at Chæronea in Bœotia. He studied under onius, who taught with reputation at Athens; which he went to Alexandria, and next to Rome, where, though he resided near forty years, he acquired but a very imperfect knowledge of the Latin language. His lectures on philosophy, however, were attended by most persons of distinction; among whom was Trajan, who, on his accession to the diadem, conferred on him the consular ornaments. At the close of life Plutarch returned to his native place, of which he was chosen archon. He was also admitted into the order of Delphic priests, and died about A.D. 120. His works are, 'Lives' and 'Morals.' The former class consists of the memoirs of illustrious Greeks and Romans, written in a strain of virtue and impartiality; the latter comprehends discourses on miscellaneous subjects. The best edition of Plutarch is that of Hutten, published at Tübingen in 14 vols. 8vo., 1791-1805. The Lives have been well translated by the Langhornes; and the Morals by various hands, in 5 vols.

POCOCK, EDWARD, D.D., was born at Oxford 8 Nov., 1604. He was educated at Thame School, from whence he removed to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he remained two years, and then became scholar of Corpus Christi College. Here he studied the oriental languages, and in 1628 obtained a fellowship. In 1630 his edition of the Epistles, in Syriac, was printed at Leyden; and the same year he went to Aleppo as chaplain to the English factory. While in the East, he laid out considerable sums in the collection of MSS., for which he was liberally supplied by Archbishop Laud. On his return to England he was appointed professor of Arabic. Soon after this he made a second journey into the Levant to procure MSS.; but when he came back he found his patron was a prisoner in the Tower. His college, however, presented him to the living of Childrey, Berkshire; but he was deprived of his professorship, till the influence of Selden prevailed with the Parliament to restore him to it. In 1648 he was nominated to the Hebrew chair, with a canonry annexed; but the faction continued to harass him on account of his loyalty, till the Restoration, when he recovered his places. Died 10 Sept., 1691. Dr. Pocock had a share in Walton's Polyglot, and translated Grotius 'de Veritate' intoArabic. His other publications are, 'Specimen Historiæ Arabum;' 'Porta Mosis, or six discourses of Maimonides, with a Latin version;' a Latin translation of the Annals of Eutychius; an Arabic poem, entitled 'Carmen Abu Ismaelis Tograi,' with a Latin version; Abulfaragius's 'Historia Dynastiarum;' Commentary on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel, folio; and an Arabic translation of the Liturgy and Catechism. An edition of his works was published in 1740, 2 vols. folio.

POCOCKE, RICHARD, D.D., was born 1704 at Southampton, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1737 he travelled into the East, returning in 1742. The year following he published the first volume of his travels, and in 1745 the second volume, both in folio, and rich in description, particularly of the curiosities in Egypt and Palestine. He was made precentor of Waterford 1744, and in 1756 raised to the see of Ossory, whence he was translated, in 1765, to Meath, but died suddenly in Sept. the same year His MSS. are in the British Museum.

POE, EDGAR ALLAN, an American writer, born Jan., 1811, at Baltimore, where he died of delirium tremens 7 Oct., 1849. His grandfather, of Maryland, served honourably in the army of the Revolution. His father married an English actress, and went himself upon the stage. Both parents dying while he was young, Edgar Allan Poe was left destitute; but a generous merchant, John Allan, adopted him and provided for his education. His course of life in college and afterwards was dissolute and disgraceful, and his patron refused to pay his frequent drafts for gambling debts, and would no longer keep the ungrateful and profligate young man in his house. He was now thrown upon the labours of his pen, in prose and verse, for subsistence. His poem of 'The Raven' first brought him into public notice; but he is best known by his sensational 'Tales,' the most remarkable of which are, 'The Gold Bug;' 'The Fall of the House of Usher;' 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue;' 'The Purloined Letter;' 'A Descent into the Maelström;' 'The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar.' Poe's 'Works' were published at New York, in 4 vols., 1850, under the editorial supervision of R. W. Griswold.

POELEMBURG, Cornelius, a painter, born at Utrecht 1586. He was a disciple of Abraham Bloemart, and completed his studies at Rome. On his return to Utrecht, he received much encouragement from Rubens; and Charles I. invited him to England, where he painted a number of pictures. He died at Utrecht 1660.

POGGIO. See Bracciolini.

POILLY, François, a French engraver, born at Abbeville, 1622; died March, 1693.

POIRSON, Auguste Simon Jean Chrysostome, a French historian, born at Paris 20 Aug., 1795. He was principal of Charlemagne College from 1837 to 1853, and raised that educational establishment to the first rank among the colleges of the university of Paris. His works are, 'Histoire Romaine,' 2 vols., 1827-8; 'Précis de l'Histoire Ancienne,' in conjunction with M. Cayx, 1827; 'Précis de l'Histoire de France,' 1834; 'Histoire de Henri IV.,' 3 vols., 1857, 4 vols., 1862-7. Died Aug., 1871.

POISSONNIER, Pierre Isaac, a physician, born at Dijon, 5 July, 1720, became professor of medicine in the College de France, and was the first who gave chemical lectures at Paris. In 1757 he was appointed physician to the French army, and the year following went to Russia, to attend the Empress Elizabeth. On his return he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences, and made a councillor of state. In 1764 he was appointed inspector-general of physic in the ports and colonies. M. Poissonnier wrote several practical works; but he is chiefly known by his method of procuring fresh water from that of the sea, for which he received a pension. Died 15 Sept., 1798.

POLE, Reginald, a cardinal, was descended from the blood-royal of England, being a younger son of Sir Richard Pole, cousin to Henry VII., by Margaret, daughter of George, duke of Clarence, younger brother of Edward IV. He was born at Stourbridge Castle, Staffordshire, 11 May, 1500, and educated in the monastery of Shene, Surrey, whence he removed to Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1517 he obtained a prebend of Salisbury, to which were added the deaneries of Winbourne, Minster, and Exeter. About this time he went abroad and resided at Padua, where he contracted an acquaintance with Bembo, Sadolet, and Longolius, particularly the latter, whose life he afterwards wrote. In 1525 he returned home, but carefully avoided all concern with the divorce, which was then under discussion. The king, however, to gain his sanction to that measure, offered him the archbishopric of York, which Pole refused in such terms that Henry drove him from his presence, and never saw him more. Pole then returned to Padua, where he wrote a book against the Reformation, entitled 'De Unitate Ecclesiastica;' for which he was deprived of his preferments. About this time the Pope, intending to call a general council, summoned Pole to it, and created him a cardinal. This brought down upon his family the vengeance of the king, who caused Pole's mother, the Countess of Salisbury, to be executed for treason (1541). On the death of Paul III., 1549, the majority of votes was in favour of Pole, who desired the cardinals to defer the election till the next morning, in consequence of which they chose Cardinal Monti, who assumed the name of Julius III. When Mary ascended the throne Pole returned to England as legate, in which capacity he absolved the Parliament from the sin of heresy, and reconciled the nation to the Holy See. The cardinal was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury 1556, and in the same year elected chancellor of both universities. He expired the day after the queen, 19 Nov., 1558. A collection of his letters has been published in 5 vols., 1744-57. A complete list of his works is given in Cooper's 'Athenæ Cantabrigienses.'

POLENI, Giovanni, an Italian marquis, born at Padua 1683. He was professor of astronomy and mathematics at Padua, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the Royal Society of London. The Venetian government appointed him superintendent of the rivers and waters throughout the republic; and Benedict XIV. made him surveyor of St. Peter's. His works are, Supplement to the Antiquities of Grævius and Gronovius, 5 vols; 'Exercitationes Vitruvianæ;' and 'Dissertazione sopra al Tempio di Diana di Efeso.' Died 14 Nov., 1761.

POLIDORI, Gaetano, was born at Bientina, in Tuscany, and soon after the outbreak of the first French Revolution settled in London, where he died 1853, aged 89. He was at one time the secretary of Alfieri. Signor Polidori wrote 'Novelle Morali,' and other original works in prose and verse, besides metrical translations of all Milton's works and of Lucan's 'Pharsalia.' In 1814 he published in London a 'New Pocket Dictionary of the Italian, French, and English Languages,' 3 vols. 12mo.

POLIDORI, John William, was born in England in or about 1796, being son of Gaetano Polidori, who has been already mentioned. In 1815 he took the degree of M.D., at Edinburgh, and in the following year left England with Lord Byron, taking up his abode at Coligny on the Lake Geneva, on their way to Italy. Byron, however, soon became disgusted with the petulant temper, the morbid vanity, and the extravagance of his young physician and companion, and a separation took place while they were yet at Geneva. A dialogue which Byron himself used to mention, as having taken place between them during their journey on the Rhine, is amusingly characteristic of both the persons concerned:—'After all,' said the physician, 'what is there you can do that I cannot?' 'Why, since you force me to say,' answered the other, 'I think there are three things which I can do which you cannot.' Polidori defied him to name them. 'I can,' said Byron, 'swim across t that river; I can snuff out that candle with a pistol-s shot at the distance of twenty paces; and I have v written a poem' ('The Corsair,') 'of which 14,000 c copies were sold in one day.' Polidori died in l London 1821. His works are, 'Disputatio Medica l Inauguralis, quædam de Morbo Oneirodynia dicto c complectens; quam pro gradu Doctoris subjicit l Joannes Gulielmus Polydorus,' Edinburgh, 1815; '"On the Punishment of Death," 1816; 'An Essay con the Source of Positive Pleasure,' London, 8vo., 1818; 'The Vampyre; a Tale,' London, 8vo., 1819; '"Ximenes, the Wreath, and other Poems,' London, 8vo., 1819; 'Ernestus Berchtold; or the Modern CŒdipus. A Tale,' London 12mo., 1819; and 'The Fall of the Angels; a Sacred Poem,' London, 1821.

POLIGNAC, Jules Auguste Armand Marie, Prince de, the minister and favourite of Charles X. of France, was born at Paris 14 May, 1780. His parents being compelled to leave France at the time of the Revolution, he first went to Russia and then to England, as aide-de-camp of the Count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X. In Dec., 1803, he returned to France, being concerned in the conspiracy of Cadoudal and Fichegru. When the plot was discovered, his brother Armand, who was also engaged in it, was condemned to death, and he himself was condemned to two years' imprisonment. Armand's life was spared; but both were retained in captivity till 1814, when they escaped and joined the Count d'Artois. After the Second Restoration Jules was made a peer of France; but he refused to take the constitutional oath on account of religious scruples until these were relieved by the Pope, who conferred on him the title of Roman prince. He was minister at London from 1823 to Aug., 1829, when he was recalled by Charles X. and nominated president of the Council with the portfolio of foreign affairs. Being the representative of the Catholic party, he was naturally regarded with disfavour and distrust by the French Liberals. The growing difference between the ministry and the Chambers, and the arbitrary measures of the court, after a few months led to the revolution by which Charles was deprived of his throne. Polignac endeavoured to escape in the disguise of a valet, but was arrested at Granville 15 Aug., 1830, sentenced to imprisonment for life, and confined in the fortress of Ham, till 1836, when he was released. Subsequently he resided for a time in England, but returing to his native country, died there 29 March, 1847. During his imprisonment he wrote 'Considerations Politiques,' published in 1832.

POLIGNAC, Melchior de, a cardinal, born at Puy en Velay, in Languedoc, 11 Oct., 1661. He studied at Paris, after which he was employed in diplomatic concerns, in which he gave such satisfaction, as to be rewarded with the purple. During the regency he was banished to his abbey of Anchin; but afterwards he was recalled and appointed agent for French affairs at Rome. In 1726 he was made archbishop of Auch. Died 20 Nov., 1741. He wrote a Latin poem, entitled 'Anti-Lucretius,' Paris, 1747, which is intended as a refutation of the system of Lucretius, and a demonstration of the existence of a Supreme Being.

POLITI, Lancelot. See Catarino.

POLITIAN, Angelus, was born at Mont Pulciano, in Tuscany, in 1454. He took his name from the Latin appellation of his native place, 'Mons Politianus,' his real one being Benedict de Cinis. Lorenzo de Medici employed him as the preceptor of his children, and gave him the priory of the college of S. Giovanni, and afterwards a canonry in the cathedral of Florence. He died 24 Sept., 1494. His principal works are, Miscellanea; a Latin Version of Herodian; Greek Epigrams; Latin Poems; and Letters.

POLK, James Knox, an American statesman and the eleventh president of the United States, was born in Mecklenburg co., North Carolina, 2 Nov., 1795, and graduated at the university of North Carolina in 1815. In 1825 he was elected a representative in Congress by the Democratic party, whose principles he always steadily maintained. He was speaker of Congress in 1835 and 1837, and was chosen governor of Tennessee in 1839. In Dec., 1844, he was chosen president of the United States, the votes being for him 170, for Clay 105. During his administration (March, 1845—March, 1849) the Oregon question was settled, Texas annexed, the Mexican war waged, and New Mexico and California acquired. Mr. Polk died at Nashville, Tennessee, 15 June, 1849.

POLLEXFEN, Sir Henry, an eminent judge, was a native of Devonshire. In 1688 he was one of the counsel for the seven bishops. After the Revolution he was knighted, and made chief justice of the Common Pleas. Died 1692. His 'Arguments and Reports' were published in 1702.

POLLIO, Caius Asinius, a celebrated Roman, who was much esteemed by Augustus, and gained a great reputation by his military exploits, but more by his literary connections. He defeated the Dalmatians, and rendered service to Marc Antony during the civil wars. He was the intimate friend of Horace and Virgil, who have immortalized him in their works. He was himself an author, and wrote tragedies, orations, and a history, which are lost. He died at Frascati, aged 80, B.C. 4.

POLLOK, Robert, a Scotch clergyman and poet, born at Muirhouse, in the parish of Eglesham, Renfrewshire, 1799, and educated at the university of Glasgow. Soon after he became a minister his health gave way, and he was advised to visit Italy; but while on his way to that country he died at Southampton, 15 Sept., 1827. His principal work is 'The Course of Time,' a poem, in 10 books.

POLLUX, Julius, a grammarian, born in Egypt in 180. He taught rhetoric at Athens with such reputation, as to be appointed preceptor to the Emperor Commodus, for whose use he drew up an 'Onomasticon, or Greek vocabulary;' printed by Aldus, in 1502; and with a Latin version, in 1608; but the best editions are those of Amsterdam, in 1706, and Leipsic in 1824. Pollux died in 238. There was another of this name in the fourth century, who wrote 'Historia Physica,' published at Bologna 1779.

POLO, Marco, a Venetian traveller, born about 1250, is celebrated for the singularity of his adventures, the extent of the countries he passed through, and the influence which the description of his wanderings had upon the progress of navigation and commerce. The son of a noble Venetian who had embraced the career of commerce and travelled a long time in the East, he accompanied his father and his uncle in a new excursion which they undertook in 1271. After having resided in Tartary and China, traversed the Indian Ocean, and visited several parts of India, Persia, and Asia Minor, he returned to Venice with his relatives 1295, and a few months later received the command of a vessel in the fleet which had just been fitted out to repel the aggression of the Genoese. Wounded and made prisoner in this expedition, he was conveyed to Genoa, where, to relieve the monotony of his captivity he dictated to one of his companions in misfortune the narrative of his travels. On obtaining his release he went back to Venice, married there, and died about 1323. The account of his Travels, written about 1298, was translated into almost every European language. The best of the English versions is that by W. Marsden, 1818.

POLWHELE, RICHARD, a topographer and poet, born at Truro 6 Jan., 1760, proceeded from the grammar school there to Christ Church, Oxford, and after officiating for some years as curate of Kenton, Devonshire; he held in succession the vicarages of Manaccan and St. Anthony, and the curacy of Kenwyn in Cornwall. He died at Truro 12 March, 1838, leaving numerous works in prose and verse; the best known being, 'The History of Devonshire,' 3 vols. folio, 1796-1806; 'The History of Cornwall,' 7 vols. 4to., 1816; 'Poems,' 5 vols.; and 'Traditions and Recollections,' 2 vols., 1826.

POLYÆNUS, a Greek author in the second century, who wrote eight books of the 'Stratagems of Illustrious Generals.' He appears to have been a Macedonian, and, after serving in the army, he became a statesman under Antoninus and Varus. Of his work entitled 'Stratagemata,' there is an English translation by Shepherd, 1793.

POLYBIUS, a Greek historian, the son of Lycortas, general of the Achæans, was born at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, probably about 204 B.C. He was sent to Rome as one of the hostages demanded of the Achæans, and his residence at the capital of the world was of great importance to Polybius, who, on his return to Greece, was employed in public affairs by several states. He lived to the age of eighty-two. He wrote a 'Universal History,' in forty books, of which we have only five complete, and an abridgment of twelve others. Polybius has been translated into English by Hampton.

POLYCARP, ST., was born, it is supposed, at Smyrna, in the reign of Nero. He is said to have been a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, who consecrated him bishop of Smyrna, and addressed him in his apocalyptical epistle. Ignatius also held Polycarp in high estimation, and recommended to his care the church of Antioch. He visited Rome to confer with Pope Anicetus about the time of celebrating Easter, and, during his stay there, opposed the heresies of Marcion and Valentinus. He governed the church of Smyrna till A.D. 167, when he suffered martyrdom for the Christian faith. His epistle to the Philippians is in Wake's collection of the apostolical fathers.

POLYCLETUS, a sculptor, born at Sicyon, flourished about B.C. 430.

POLYGNOTUS, one of the most celebrated of the ancient painters, was a native of Thasos, and flourished at Athens about B.C. 460.

POMBAL, MARQUIS DE. Dom Sebastiao José de Carvalho, Count d'Oeyras and Marquis de Pombal, a Portuguese statesman, was born at Soura, near Coimbra, 1699. He embraced a military life, which he quitted for retirement and a union with Donna Almada, a noble Spanish lady, who died 1739. He was in 1745 sent ambassador to Vienna, where he married the countess of Daun, related to the marshal of that name; and by means of this lady, who became a high favourite with the queen of Portugal, he rose in the state. On the succession of Joseph to the throne, 1750, Pombal was appointed secretary for foreign affairs, and by the wisdom of his administration, introduced excellent regulations for the promotion of the agriculture, the finances, and the marine of the kingdom. His conduct, however, displeased some of the nobles, and a conspiracy was formed against him and the king; but the discovery of it brought disgrace on the accomplices, and the Jesuits, as concerned in the plot, were expelled from the kingdom. In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed Lisbon 1755, Pombal showed great benevolence, and by his means the city rose from her ruins with new splendour. On Joseph's death 1777, Pombal fell into disgrace, and died 5 May, 1782. His Memoirs were published at Paris 1783. An interesting work on the Marquis de Pombal, by the Conde da Carnota, appeared at London 1843; 2nd edition 1871.

POMERANUS. See BUGENHAGIUS.

POMEY, FRANÇOIS, a Jesuit, who became an eminent instructor of youth at Lyons, where he died, very old, in 1673. His 'Pantheon, or System of Mythology,' was published in English, without acknowledgment, by Tooke. Father Pomey was the author of some other useful educational works.

POMFRET, JOHN, a poet, the son of the Rev. John Pomfret, rector of Luton, Bedfordshire, where he was born about 1667. He took his degrees in arts at Queen's College, Cambridge, entered into orders, and obtained the living of Malden, in Bedfordshire. On going to London to obtain institution to another benefice, in 1703, he caught the small-pox, and died the same year. His poems were published 1699; and some additional pieces were printed after his death.

POMMERAYE, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, born at Rouen 1617; died 1687. He wrote several works on the ecclesiastical history of his native city.

POMPADOUR, JEANNE ANTOINETTE POISSON, Marquise DE, the mistress of Louis XV., was the daughter of a butcher, and was born 1722, and became the wife of M. d'Étioles. The licentious monarch first saw her while he was hunting in the forest of Senart, and from that time he made her his favourite, raising her in 1745 to the rank of a marchioness. She exercised great influence at court, till her death on 14 April, 1764. The liberal manner in which she patronized literature, has, in some degree, blunted the shafts of criticism against the infamy of her life. The Memoirs and Letters, published under her name, are spurious.

POMPEY, called the Great, was of a noble family, and born 30 Sept., B.C. 106. He studied the art of war under his father, and, when he was only twenty-three, raised three legions, with which he joined Sylla, whose opponents he drove out of Sicily and Africa. That commander recalled him to Rome, and gave him the name of Magnus. Pompey also obtained the honours of a triumph, and was chosen consul; in which office he restored the tribunes, and extended the Roman empire beyond Asia Minor. For these services he received another triumph, soon after which he formed the first triumvirate with Cæsar and Crassus; but though he married the daughter of Cæsar, a civil war broke out between them, in which Pompey was defeated, at Pharsalia. He was assassinated the same year, 29 Sept., B.C. 48.

POMPONIUS LÆTUS, JULIUS, a classical antiquary, born in Upper Calabria 1425; died at Rome 1497.

POND, JOHN, F.R.S., an astronomer, born about 1767, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, succeeded Dr. Maskelyne as astronomer royal 1811, retired from that office 1835, and died at Blackheath 7 Sept., 1836. The branch of astronomy to which he devoted his attention was the determination of the places of the fixed stars.

PONIATOWSKI, JOSEPH, PRINCE, born at Warsaw 1763, was the nephew of Stanislaus Augustus, the last king of Poland. Entering the Austrian service he became colonel of dragoons, and aide-de-camp of the Emperor Joseph II., with whom he made a campaign against the Turks 1787. In 1794, when the Poles rose against the Russians, Joseph Poniatowski served under Kosciusko; but Kosciusko being defeated, he was obliged to emigrate, and he retired to Vienna. In 1798 he returned to Warsaw, and afterwards took the command of the Polish army which rendered such great services to the French during the campaign of 1807, against the Russians. When the war broke out between France and Russia in 1812, Poniatowski obtained the command of the fifth corps of the 'Grand Army,' which was composed entirely of Poles. He maintained the strictest discipline in his corps which, in the disastrous retreat from Moscow, distinguished itself by its orderly behaviour. Being obliged to evacuate Warsaw, Poniatowski withdrew into Saxony; but in the following campaign of 1813 he fought with his usual bravery in various battles; and was made a marshal of France by Napoleon just before the battle of Leipsic. A few days after, being pressed by the enemy on the banks of the Elster, which was swelled by the rains, he spurred his horse into the river, and was drowned 18 Oct., 1813.

PONIATOWSKI, STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS, king of Poland. See Stanislaus.

PONSONBY, Sir FREDERICK CAVENDISH, K.C.B., a distinguished cavalry officer and major-general in the British army, was born 1783, being a younger brother of the earl of Bessborough. He was appointed to a cornetcy in the 10th Dragoons 1800, and after passing through the intermediate grades of rank, obtained a majority in the 23rd Light Dragoons 1807. During the Peninsular War he distinguished himself at Talavera, Barossa, Vimiera, Salamanca, and Vittoria. He was severely wounded at Waterloo, after he had repulsed a French column at the head of the 12th Light Dragoons. Died 1 Jan., 1837.

PONTAULT. See BEAULIEU.

PONTIUS, PAUL, an engraver, born at Antwerp in 1596 or 1603. He is chiefly distinguished for his prints after Rubens and Vandyck.

PONTOPPIDAN, ERIC, a native of Aarhuus, in Jutland, became bishop of Bergen, in Norway, in 1747, and died 1764. His 'Natural History of Norway' was translated into English 1755.

POOLE, JOHN, dramatist, died in London 5 Feb., 1872, aged 87. He wrote 'Paul Pry,' 1825, 'Deaf as a Post,' 'Turning the Tables,' and many popular farces; also some comedies, among which is 'The Wife's Stratagem,' altered from Shirley.

POOLE, MATTHEW, was born at York 1624. He took his degree of M.A. at Emanuel College, Cambridge, after which he became minister of St. Michael-le-Querne, London. In 1662 Mr. Poole was ejected from his living for nonconformity, whereupon he undertook his 'Synopsis Criticorum.' This immense body of biblical criticism, originally published in 5 vols. folio, was reprinted at Frankfort in 1678; again at Utrecht, by Leusden, in 1686; and a fifth edition of it appeared at Frankfort in 1709, in 6 vols. folio. While thus employed, our author began also 'English Annotations on the Holy Bible,' but proceeded no farther than the 58th chapter of Isaiah, the remainder being completed by other hands. When Oates gave an account of the Popish Plot, in the list of those who were to be taken off by it the name of Mr. Poole was found, which induced him to go to Amsterdam, where he died in Oct., 1679.

POOLE, Miss. See DICKONS.

POPE, ALEXANDER, a celebrated poet, was born May 22, 1688, in Lombard Street, London, where his father, a linendraper, acquired a considerable fortune. Both his parents were Roman Catholics. He was, from his birth, of a delicate constitution, very small, and much deformed. His first instructor was a priest named Taverner, who taught him the rudiments of Greek and Latin at the same time. He was next sent to a Catholic seminary at Twyford; but having written a lampoon on his master, he was removed to a school near Hyde Park Corner, where he formed a play taken from Ogilby's translation of the Iliad, which was performed by the upper boys and the gardener. In 1700 he went to live with his father at Binfield, near Oakingham, where another priest was engaged for his instruction, from whom he learned but little, and therefore he resolved to study by himself. Though his 'Ode on Solitude' is said to have been his first performance, it appears that he had produced some poetical pieces at an earlier period. At the age of sixteen he wrote his 'Pastorals,' which procured him the friendship of the principal wits of the time. His next performance was the 'Essay on Criticism,' 1711. The 'Messiah' appeared first in the 'Spectator,' and this was followed by his 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.' About this period also, he produced the 'Rape of the Lock,' occasioned by Lord Petre's cutting of a ringlet of Mrs. Arabella Fermor's hair. He next brought out his 'Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard.' Pope now undertook his translation of the 'Iliad,' which he published by subscription, and cleared by it above five thousand pounds, part of which he laid out in the purchase of a house at Twickenham, and with the rest he bought an annuity. This work, however, occasioned a difference between him and Addison, owing to the appearance of another version of the first book of the 'Iliad,' under the name of Tickell, but which was, as Pope pretended, the performance of Addison himself. Our author next engaged in an edition of Shakspere, after which he issued proposals for a translation of the 'Odyssey;' but his part only amounted to twelve books, the rest being executed by Broome and Fenton. In 1729 appeared the 'Dunciad,' in which Pope took ample vengeance on his enemies, but at the same time injured his own reputation by his illiberality. In a subsequent edition of this poem he altered the hero from Theobald to Cibber. Two years after this he produced his 'Epistle to the Earl of Burlington,' in which he took occasion to ridicule the duke of Chandos under the name of Timon. His 'Essay on Man,' which was completed in 1734, attracted universal admiration, though it was soon discovered that the doctrines were more favourable to natural than revealed religion. Warburton, however, published a defence of the principles of the Essay, and thereby gained the friendship of the poet, who left him the copyright of his works, and, by introducing him to Allen, was the cause of his getting a wife, an estate, and a bishopric. In 1735 Pope brought out an 'Epistle on the Characters of Women,' in a subsequent edition of which he introduced a personage named Atossa, intended, as was said, for the duchess of Marlborough, who paid the author for the suppression of it one thousand pounds. In 1737 Pope printed his Letters by subscription, for which he alleged as his excuse that some of his epistles had been surreptitiously published by Edmund Curll. His last literary concern was the publication of a fourth book of the 'Dunciad.' He died in the Roman Catholic religion 30 May, 1744, and was buried at Twickenham.

POPE, Sir Thomas, a statesman, born at Dedington, Oxfordshire, about 1508. He was educated at Eton, whence he removed to Gray's Inn, where he was called to the bar, after which he became clerk to the crown in Chancery. He was a favourite of Henry VIII., who knighted him and gave him several lucrative offices and grants of land. Pope was the friend of Sir Thomas More, to whom he imparted the intelligence of the hour appointed for his execution. In the next reign he was not employed; but in that of Mary he was entrusted with the care of the Princess Elizabeth, towards whom he behaved with great respect, though a conscientious Catholic. He died 1559. Sir Thomas founded Trinity College, Oxford.

POPE, Walter, M.D., F.R.S., was a native of Fawsley, Northamptonshire. He was half-brother to Dr. Wilkins, bishop of Chester, and educated first at Trinity College, Cambridge, and next at Wadham College, Oxford. In 1660 he was elected Gresham professor of astronomy, and in 1667 he became registrar of the diocese of Chester. He afterwards lived with Bishop Ward, of Salisbury, who left him £100 a year, in gratitude for which Dr. Pope published his Life. He died in June, 1714. His other works are, 'Memoirs of Monsieur du Vall, a notorious Highwayman;' the 'Old Man's Wish,' in imitation of Horace, with curious notes; Select Novels from the Spanish and Italian; The Salisbury Ballad, &c.

POPHAM, Sir Home Riggs, K.B., F.R.S., a British naval officer, born in Ireland 1762; died at Cheltenham 13 Sept., 1820. He published a Description of the Prince of Wales's Island.

POPHAM, Sir John, was born at Huntworth, Somersetshire, 1531, and educated at Oxford. After going through the offices of solicitor and attorney-general he was made chief-justice of the King's Bench 1592. Died 1607. His works are 'Reports and Cases;' 'Resolutions and Judgments upon Cases in the Courts of Westminster.'

PORDEN, Eleanor Anne. See Franklin.

PORDENONE, Il, an Italian painter, whose real name was Giovanni Antonio Licinio, born 1484 at Pordenone, near Udine, deserved to be called the rival of the great Titian. He was for some time at Genoa, under Doria, and went to Venice and then to Ferrara, where he died 1540.

PORPHYRIUS was born at Tyre A.D. 233. His original name was Malchus, and he received his education under Origen, after which he went to Athens, where he had Longinus for his instructor, who gave him the name of Porphyrius. At the age of thirty he removed to Rome, and became a hearer of Plotinus, whose life he wrote. He next went to Sicily, whence he is sometimes called Siculus; and here he composed his books against the Christian religion, which are lost. He died at Rome about 304. Among the works of Porphyry which have been printed are his four books 'On Abstinence from Animal Food;' 'Life of Pythagoras;' and Introduction to the Categories of Aristotle.'

PORPORATI, Carlo Antonio, an Italian engraver, born 1741 at Turin, where he died 16 June, 1816.

PORSON, Richard, an eminent critic, born 25 Dec., 1759, at East Ruston, Norfolk, where he was first instructed by his father, who was the parish clerk. He next went to the village school, after which the vicar instructed him and his brother in the classics. The proficiency of Richard was so great that Mr. Norris sent him to Eton 1774, whence, in 1777, he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he gained a prize medal, and in 1781 was elected to a fellowship. In 1785 he took his master's degree, but having an objection to the Church he was under the necessity of resigning his fellowship, and in 1793 was elected Greek professor. In 1797 he published the 'Hecuba' of Euripides, which was followed by the 'Orestes,' the 'Phœnissæ,' and 'Medea.' He contributed assistance also to the Grenville Homer, and published Letters to Archdeacon Travis upon the contested verse, 1 John, v. 7. His last literary work was an edition of Æschylus, 2 vols. 8vo. On the establishment of the London Institution he was appointed librarian with a salary of £200 a year. He died 19 Sept., 1808, and was buried in the chapel of Trinity College. His 'Adversaria,' collected by T. K. Monk and C. J. Blomfield, were published 1812; and the Rev. Thomas Kidd edited his 'Tracts and Miscellaneous Criticisms,' 1815. The Rev. H. R. Luard contributed an interesting memoir of Porson to the 'Cambridge Essays' for 1857; and a more ambitious 'Life of Porson' was published in 1861 by the Rev. John Selby Watson, a clergyman of the Church of England, who in 1872 was sentenced to death for the murder of his wife.

PORTA, Baccio della. See Baccio.

PORTA, Giambatista, a Neapolitan gentleman, who made himself famous by his application to letters and to science, particularly mathematics, medicine, and natural history, was born about 1550, and becoming eminent for his knowledge, held a kind of literary assembly at his house, in which, according to the notions of those times, the secrets of magic sometimes formed the subject of discussion. The court of Rome, on this account, forbad these meetings; but his house was always the resort of literary men, foreign as well as Neapolitan. Porta not only established private schools for particular sciences, but to the utmost of his power promoted public academies. He had no small share in establishing the academy of 'Gli Oziosi,' at Naples; and that in his own house, called 'I Segreti,' was accessible only to such as had made some new discoveries in nature. Died 4 Feb., 1615. Notwithstanding the absurdities which abound in Porta's works, he rendered greater service to physical science than perhaps any of his contemporaries. To him we are indebted for the invention of the camera obscura, and also for a number of optical experiments. His chief works are a treatise on Natural Magic, which has been translated into English; another on Physiognomy, wherein he judges of the physiognomy of men chiefly by comparing them to different animals, and with his other fancies mixes those of judicial astrology; 'De occultis literarum notis,' an able treatise on writing in cypher; 'Phytognomica,' a pretended method of knowing the inward virtues of things by inspection; and 'De Distillationibus.'

PORTER, ANNA MARIA, an English novelist, sister of Sir Robert Ker Porter, was born about 1780, and died at Bristol 21 July, 1832. Her romances are, 'Octavia,' 1798; 'The Lakes of Killarney,' 1804; 'A Sailor's Friendship and a Soldier's Love,' 1805; 'The Hungarian Brothers,' 1807; 'Don Sebastian, or the House of Braganza,' 1809; 'The Recluse of Norway,' 1814; 'The Fast of St. Magdalen,' 1818; 'Walsh Colville,' 1819; 'The Knight of St. John,' 1821; 'The Village of Mariendorpt,' 1821; 'Roche Blanche,' 1822; 'Honor O'Hara,' 1826; and 'Barony,' 1830. Miss Anna Maria Porter also wrote 'Artless Tales,' 1793; and 'Ballads, Romances, and other Poems,' 1811.

PORTER, FRANCIS, a native of the county of Meath, in Ireland, who was educated in France, and became a Recollect friar. Afterwards he was appointed professor of divinity in the convent of St. Isidore at Rome, where James II. gave him the title of his historiographer. Father Porter died at Rome 7 April, 1702. His works are, 'Securis Evangelica ad Hæresis hujus temporis radices posita,' second edition, Rome, 1687; 'Compendium Annalium Ecclesiasticorum Hiberniæ,' Rome, 1690; and, 'Systema Decretorum Dogmaticorum ab initio nascentis Ecclesiæ per Summos Pontifices, Concilia generalia, &c.,' Avignon, folio, 1693.

PORTER, JANE, a novelist, sister of Sir Robert Ker Porter and Anna Maria Porter, was born at Durham 1776. She had the misfortune in childhood to lose her father, who was surgeon to the Enniskillen Dragoons. She received her early education in Edinburgh, where her mother spent the first year of her widowhood. After some years Mrs. Porter removed to London, but subsequently retired, with her daughters, to Ditton-on-the-Thames, and next to Esher. In 1803 Miss Jane Porter published her first, and perhaps most popular novel, 'Thaddæus of Warsaw,' which was translated into several languages, and obtained for her the honour of being elected a lady canoness of the Teutonic order of St. Joachim. In 1809 appeared 'The Scottish Chiefs,' founded on the adventures of Bruce and Wallace, which was no less successful than its predecessor. Among her other works may be mentioned 'The Pastor's Fireside;' Duke Christian of Luneburgh; 'The Field of Forty Footsteps,' a tale of Cromwell's days; and 'Sir Edward Seaward's Diary,' a fiction which seemed real enough to be thought worthy of an elaborate disproval in a leading review. In connection with her sister she published 'Tales round a Winter's Hearth.' In 1842 she accompanied her favourite brother, Sir R. K. Porter, to St. Petersburg, returning to England after his decease. Her death occurred at Bristol 24 May, 1850.

PORTER, JEROME, an English Benedictine monk, who died 17 Nov., 1632, wrote 'The Flowers of the Most Renowned Saints of the Three Kingdoms, England, Scotland, and Ireland,' 4to., Douay, 1632. Another monk of the same name published 'The Life of St. Edward, King and Confessor,' 1710.

PORTER, Sir ROBERT KER, K.C.H., painter and traveller, born at Durham 1780, was descended from an Irish family, and was brother to the novelists Miss Jane and Miss Anna Maria Porter. In early life he manifested considerable ability in drawing, and although he had a strong preference for military life, it was deemed proper to cultivate his talents as an artist. About 1790 he became a student in the Royal Academy, under the auspices of Mr. West. At the age of twenty-two he commenced his large picture of the Storming of Seringapatam, which was succeeded by two other pictures of the same magnitude, the Siege of Acre and the Battle of Agincourt, which latter was presented to the City of London. He also painted the Battle of Alexandria and the Death of Sir Ralph Abercromby. In 1803 he was appointed a captain in the Westminster Militia. He was invited to Russia, and appointed historical painter to the emperor 1804. One of his largest works in that country was the decoration of the Admiralty Hall at St. Petersburg. During his stay in Russia he gained the affections of the Princess Mary, daughter of Prince Theodore von Scherbathoff, which lady afterwards (1811) became his wife. He accompanied Sir John Moore to Spain, and shared in the hardships and perils of the campaign which ended in the battle of Corunna. In 1807 he was created a knight of St. Joachim of Würtemberg, and on his return to England he received the honour of knighthood from the Prince Regent 1813. From 1817 to 1820 he was engaged in travelling throughout the East. In 1819 he was created a knight of the Lion and Sun of Persia, and in 1832 a knight commander of the Hanoverian order. In 1826 he was appointed consul at Caracas, Venezuela, where he painted three of his best pictures, viz., Christ at the Last Supper blessing the Cup, Our Saviour blessing the little Child, and an Ecce Homo. In 1841 he left his mission on leave of absence, and in company with his sister Jane visited St. Petersburg, where he died 4 May, 1842. Sir Robert was a man of letters as well as a painter and a soldier. His works are 'Travelling Sketches in Russia and Sweden,' 2 vols., 1808; 'Letters from Portugal and Spain, written during the march of the troops under Sir John Moore,' 1809; 'Narrative of the late Campaign in Russia,' 1813; 'Travels in Georgia, Persia, Armenia, ancient Babylonia, &c.' 2 vols., 1821-22.

PORTEUS, BEILBY, D.D., was born at York 8 May, 1731. He was educated at Ripon, and next as a sizar at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship, and in 1759 gained the Seatonian prize for a poem on 'Death.' In 1762 he became chaplain to Archbishop Secker. His first preferments were two small livings in Kent, which he exchanged for Hunton, in the same county, and a prebend of Peterborough. In 1767 he obtained the rectory of Lambeth. In 1769 he was made chaplain to the king, and master of the hospital of St. Cross, near Winchester. Being a favourite with the queen, he was, at her majesty's desire, made bishop of Chester in 1776, whence, in 1787, he was translated to London. Died 14 May, 1808. His works, consisting of sermons, charges, tracts, speeches, and the Life of Secker, have been published, with his memoirs prefixed.

PORTLAND, WILLIAM BENTINCK, first EARL OF, was born in Holland 1649, of a noble family, and came to England with the prince of Orange, to whom he had endeared himself by a singular act of affection. When the prince was ill with the small-pox it was deemed necessary by the physicians that he should receive the natural warmth of a young person in the same bed. Though Bentinck had never had the disorder, he immediately undertook this hazardous service, by which he caught the disease very dangerously, but recovered, and his master had an affectionate esteem for him ever after. On the prince's accession to the English crown he was created earl of Portland, and obtained several high offices, military and civil. He died 23 Nov., 1709, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His son Henry, the second earl, who was created duke of Portland 1716, went to Jamaica as governor, and died there 1726. William, his son, the second duke, who died 1762, married Lady Margaret Cavendish Harley, only child of the second earl of Oxford, and heiress to the Cavendish estate. She died 1785. This is the lady who gave the Harleian MSS. to the British Museum.

PORTLAND, WILLIAM HENRY CAVENDISH-BENTINCK, third DUKE OF, was born 1738, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he was created M.A. 1757. After sitting for some time in the Lower House as member for Weobly, he was called to the Upper House on the death of his father 1762. From that time he usually voted with the marquis of Rockingham; and during that nobleman's administration in 1765 he was lord chamberlain. Two years afterwards he was involved in a very remarkable law-suit respecting the grant of Inglewood Forest to Sir James Lowther, which his grace resisted, and gained his cause in 1771. During the American war he acted with the Opposition; but in 1782 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, where he remained only three months. In 1792 he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford, and in 1794 he accepted the office of secretary of state for the home department, which he resigned in 1801, and was then appointed president of the council. In 1807 he became first lord of the Treasury, but soon relinquished that office, and was succeeded by Mr. Perceval. Died 30 Oct., 1809. To this nobleman the authorship of the Letters of Junius has been ascribed, but without the slightest probability.

PORTSMOUTH, LOUISE DE QUEROUAILLE, DUCHESS OF, a native of France, who was sent to this country by Louis XIV. in the train of Orleans, to bind Charles II. to the French interest. This she did effectually, as she obtained the first place in the affections of the merry monarch, who continued to love her to the day of his death. She bore him a son, Charles Lennox, duke of Richmond. She was created duchess of Portsmouth 1673, and died Nov., 1734, aged 88.

POSSEVINO, ANTONIO, a Jesuit, born at Mantua 1534. Pope Gregory XIII. employed him in several embassies; but, having given offence to the court of Spain, he was banished the city of Rome, and died at Ferrara 26 Feb., 1611. His principal works are, 'Bibliotheca selecta de ratione studiorum;' 'Apparatus Sacer;' and 'Moscovia, seu de rebus moscoviticis.'

POSTEL, GUILLAUME, a learned enthusiast, born in Normandy 25 March, 1510. In his youth he supported himself at the college of St. Barbe, by waiting upon the other students. Francis I. afterwards sent him to the East to collect manuscripts, which commission he discharged so well as to be appointed professor of mathematics and languages. After this he fell into disgrace, was deprived of his preferments, and obliged to leave France. Having wandered about from place to place, he was recalled, but lost his appointments again, and died in a monastery 6 Sept., 1581. He pretended to have died and risen again with the soul of Adam, whence he called himself 'Postellus restitutus;' he also maintained that women shall have the dominion over men, and that his writings were revealed to him by Jesus Christ. His notion of female sovereignty arose from his intimacy with an old woman of Venice; and yet he affirmed that the extraordinary age which he said he had attained was occasioned by his abstinence from sexual intercourse. His works are only valuable on account of their rarity.

POSTLETHWAYT, MALACHI, a commercial writer, born about 1707; died 13 Sept., 1767. He was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries; but nothing more is known of his life. His works are, 'The Dictionary of Trade and Commerce,' 2 vols.; 'Great Britain's True System;' 'The Merchant's Public Counting-House;' 'State of the French Trade and Navigation;' 'Britain's Commercial Interest,' 2 vols., and 'Importance of the African Expedition considered.'

POTE, JOSEPH, a bookseller and printer, settled at Eton, where he died 1787. He published 'The History and Antiquities of Windsor Castle, and the Royal College and Chapel of St. George,' with appendix, 4to., Eton, 1749-62.

POTEMKIN, GREGORY ALEXANDROVITCH, a Russian prince, descended from a Polish family, and born 1736. He was an ensign in the horse guards when his person first attracted the notice of Catharine, and he rapidly rose to the situation of favourite and of war minister. By his advice Cherson was founded in 1778, on the Dnieper, important for its maritime situation, and well protected by a population of above 40,000 inhabitants. To obtain the riband of St. George, bestowed only on victorious generals, he persuaded his mistress to declare war against the Turks 1787, and at the head of 150,000 men he laid siege to Oczackow, which he took by assault, after slaughtering 25,000 men. He was received by Catharine with unusual pomp; the most splendid presents were lavished upon him; and he was better enabled to indulge that fondness for debauched intemperance which covered his table with the choicest dainties. He attended afterwards the congress of Yassi; but his intemperance brought on indisposition, and as he wished to remove to the more salubrious air of Nicolaeff, his distemper grew so violent that he alighted from his carriage by the way, and expired suddenly under a tree 15 Oct., 1791. His remains were conveyed to Cherson, and buried by the empress under a magnificent mausoleum. Potemkin in his character was violent and haughty. Not only the courtiers of Catharine felt the overbearing power of this guilty favourite, but even foreign ambassadors were treated with studied disdain. Not satisfied with the title of chief of the Cossacks, he aspired to the dignity of duke of Courland, and to the throne of Poland; and there were not some wanting who expected that, at the head of the Russian armies, he would presume to dethrone his benefactress.

POTENGER, or POTTINGER, JOHN, was born at Winchester 21 July, 1647, and educated at the collegiate school there, of which his father was master. From thence he removed to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, after which he became a student of the Temple, and was called to the bar. He purchased the office of comptroller of the pipe, which he held to his death, on 18 Dec., 1733. He wrote 'A Reflection on Death,' a poem; and translated the 'Life of Agricola from Tacitus,' published with other pieces in prose and verse.

POTHIER, ROBERT JOSEPH, a celebrated jurist, born at Orleans 9 Jan., 1699, became professor of law in the university of his native city, where he died 2 March, 1772. His writings have been published in 17 vols. 8vo.; but this collection does not include his chief work, the 'Pandectæ Justinianeæ in novum ordinem digestæ,' 3 vols. folio. His 'Treatise on the Law of Obligations or Contracts' has been translated into English.

POTT, PERCIVAL, F.R.S., a surgeon, born in London Dec., 1713. He served his apprenticeship at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, of which establishment he became assistant-surgeon in 1745, and one of the principals in 1749. He was the first who substituted a mild mode of practice, which he had the satisfaction to see universally adopted. He resigned his situation in the hospital in 1787, and died in Dec., 1788. His works were published in 3 vols., 1790, with his Life prefixed, by Sir James Earle, who married his daughter.

POTTER, CIPRIANI, a musician and composer, born in London 1792, was principal of the Royal Academy of Music 1848-68, and died 26 Sept., 1871.

POTTER, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Wakefield about 1674. He was educated at the free school of his native town, and next at University College, Oxford, where, in 1693, he compiled 'Variantes lectiones et notæ ad Plutarchi librum de audiendis poetis, &c.' The year following he was chosen fellow of Lincoln College. In 1697 he published an edition of Lycophron's Alexandra, which was followed by his 'Archæologia Græca,' or Antiquities of Greece, in 2 vols. In 1704 he took his degree of B.D., and about the same time was appointed chaplain to Archbishop Tenison. He proceeded to his doctor's degree in 1706, and the same year was made chaplain to Queen Anne. In 1707 he published his 'Discourse of Church Government,' and soon after became regius professor of divinity at Oxford, of which diocese he was made bishop in 1715, having just before printed his edition of Clemens Alexandrinus. He was translated to the archbishopric of Canterbury on the death of Dr. Wake in 1737; and died 10 Oct., 1747. His 'Theological Works' were printed in 3 vols., 1753.

POTTER, PAUL, a Dutch painter, born at Enkhuysen 1625. He studied under his father, but soon excelled him, as he also did all the artists of his time, in landscapes and cattle pieces. His pictures are exceedingly rare, for he died in the prime of life 15 Jan., 1654.

POTTER, ROBERT, was born 1721, and educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge (B.A. 1741; M.A. 1748). His first preferment was the vicarage of Harning, Norfolk, where he wrote several poems in imitation of Pope, published 1774. In 1777 appeared his translation of Æschylus, reprinted 1779. In 1781 came out the first volume of his translation of Euripides, and the second volume in the following year. In 1788 he printed his Sophocles, for which his old schoolfellow, Lord Thurlow, gave him a prebend in the church of Norwich; and Bishop Bagot presented him to the vicarages of Lowestoft and Kessingland. Besides the above works, Mr. Potter wrote 'Observations on the Poor Laws;' an 'Answer to Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets;' 'A Translation of the Oracle concerning Babylon,' &c. Died 9 Aug., 1804.

POTTINGER, Sir HENRY, Bart., G.C.B., lieutenant-general, a diplomatist, born 1789. He was sent as envoy-extraordinary and minister-plenipotentiary to China 1841; subsequently became governor of Hong Kong (1843); governor of the Cape of Good Hope (1846–7); governor and commander-in-chief of the presidency of Madras (1847–54); died at Malta 18 March, 1856.

POUSSIN, GASPAR, a painter, whose proper name was Dughet, was born at Rome 1613. His sister married Nicolas Poussin, which circumstance led him to study painting under that great master, whose name he adopted. He excelled in landscapes; and no artist ever equalled him in the representation of land-storms. His scenes are beautiful, and his buildings elegant; but he failed in his figures. Died 1675.

POUSSIN, NICOLAS, a painter, was born at Andely, in Normandy, 1594. He studied at Paris, and at the age of thirty visited Rome, where he at first copied some of Titian's pictures, but afterwards paid close attention to the works of Raphael and Domenichino. After a considerable residence there he was recalled by Louis XIII., who gave him a pension and apartments in the Tuileries. Being, however, much attached to Rome, he returned thither privately, and died there 1665. His pictures are mostly of a small size, but very valuable.

POWELL, BADEN, M.A., F.R.S., an Anglican divine and scientific writer, was born 1796, and educated at Oxford, where in 1827 he was elected Savilian professor of geometry, an appointment which he held till his decease. The greater part of his life was spent in studious retirement in the university; but about 1854 he removed to London, where he died 11 June, 1860. Professor Powell wrote 'History of Natural Philosophy,' 1834; 'The Connection of Natural and Divine Truth,' 1838; 'View of the Undulatory Theory of Light,' 1841; 'Essays on the Spirit of the Inductive Philosophy, the Unity of Worlds, and the Philosophy of Creation,' 1855; 'Christianity without Judaism,' 1857; 'The Order of Nature considered with reference to the Claims of Revelation,' 1859; 'On the Study of the Claims of Christianity,' in 'Essays and Reviews,' 1860; and papers in the 'Transactions' of various scientific societies.

POWELL, DAVID, a Welsh divine, editor of several works relating to the history of the Principality, was born in Denbighshire about 1552, and died 1598. His son, Gabriel Powell (b. 1575; d. 1611), who became vicar of Northall, Middlesex, was a 'stiff Puritan,' and the author of several polemical works.

POWELL, Sir JOHN, was born at Gloucester, which city he represented in parliament in 1685. In 1687 he was made one of the justices of the Common Pleas, from which court he was removed to the King's Bench the following year, when he distinguished himself so much on the trial of the seven bishops, that James II. deprived him of his office; but he was restored to it at the Revolution, and sat there till his death 14 June, 1713.

POWELL, WILLIAM SAMUEL, D.D., was born at Colchester 27 Sept., 1717, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1741 he was presented to the rectory of Coikirk, in Norfolk, and to that of Stibbard in 1753. In 1765 he was elected master of his college. The year following he was collated to the archdeaconry of Colchester, and in 1768 instituted to the rectory of Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight. Died 19 Jan., 1775. A sermon of his, on Subscription to Articles of Faith, occasioned some controversy; in which, however, he took no part himself. His discourses were printed after his death in 1 vol. 8vo. Dr. Powell was also the author of 'Observations on the Miscellanea Analytica' of Waring.

POWNALL, THOMAS, F.R.S., F.S.A., was born at Lincoln, 1722. He became secretary to the commissioners for trade and plantations in 1745, and in 1753 went to America, where he prevented the formation of a congress of the colonies in the Seven Years' War, foreseeing that it would lead to their independence. For this he was made governor of Massachusetts 1757, whence he removed to New Jersey, and next to South Carolina, where he continued till 1761, when he was recalled and nominated director-general of the Office of Control, with the rank of colonel in the army. He died at Bath 25 Feb., 1805. His principal works are, On the Administration of the Colonies; Description of part of North America; Treatise on the Study of Antiquities; Memorials addressed to the Sovereigns of Europe and the Atlantic; On the Antiquities of the Provincia Romana of Gaul; Descriptions of Roman Antiquities dug up at Bath; and Intellectual Physics.

POYNET, or PONET, JOHN, D.D., an Anglican prelate, born in Kent about 1514, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow and dean. Archbishop Cranmer made him one of his chaplains, and he was likewise appointed a canon of Canterbury. Being attached to the new religion, he was appointed bishop of Rochester in March, 1549-50, and translated from that see to Winchester in March, 1550-1. In 1553 he drew up the Catechism called King Edward's, printed in Latin and English. On the accession of Queen Mary he fled to Strasburg, where he died 11 April, 1556. Among his other works are, 'A Tragoedie or Dialoge of the unjuste usurped primacie of the Bishop of Rome,' translated from Ochinus; 'A Shorte Treatise of Politique Power, and of the true Obedience which subjectes owe to kynges and other civile Governours, with an Exhortation to all true naturall Englishe men,' 1556; again 1639. —Athen. Cantab.

POYNTER, WILLIAM, D.D., an English Catholic prelate, born at Petersfield, Hampshire, 10 May, 1762. His studies were completed at Douay, where he received the priesthood, and filled successively the professorships of literature, philosophy, and theology. During the height of the fearful Revolution in France, Mr. Poynter, with the superiors and students of the college, was imprisoned in the castle of Doullens. On his delivery from the perils of those times he came to England, and became vice-president of St. Edmund's College, under Dr. Stapleton, whom he succeeded as president on the appointment of the latter to the vicariate apostolic of the Midland District. In 1803 he was nominated coadjutor to Bishop Douglas, being consecrated bishop of Halia in partibus, 29 May, 1803, and on the death of Dr. Douglas, in 1812, succeeded him as Vicar Apostolic of the London district. After the too sedulous discharge of his episcopal duties during a quarter of a century, Dr. Poynter's health gave way, and for several months previous to his decease his sufferings were severe and unremitted. He died 26 Nov., 1827, and was interred in a vault under the high altar of St. Mary's, Moorfields, of which edifice he had himself laid the first stone. In compliance with his last request, his heart was conveyed to St. Edmund's College, and deposited beneath the foot of the altar where the priest begins to say Mass.

POZZO, MODESTA. See FONTE MODERATA.

POZZO DI BORGO, CARLO ANDREA, Count, a diplomatist, born at Alala, in Corsica, 8 March, 1768. He studied law under his uncle, a notary of Ajaccio, and was admitted an advocate at Pisa. Subsequently he became private secretary to Paoli, and a member of the Corsican Directory 1790. Elected a deputy in the Legislative Assembly 1791, he declared himself an enemy of the Bonaparte family, and acted in concert with Paoli to deliver up the island to the English. He became a ready instrument in the hands of Lord Elliott, and procured the recall of Paoli to London, but was himself afterwards obliged to leave the island. He served by turns England, Prussia, Austria, and Russia in the capacity of secret diplomatic agent. At the Treaty of Tilsit, Napoleon having demanded his expulsion, he retired to Constantinople. In 1813 the emperor Alexander I. summoned him to his court, and after the restoration of Louis XVIII., nominated him Russian ambassador at Paris. Pozzo di Borgo was present at all the meetings of the Holy Alliance. In 1823 he was sent into Spain to watch the French army. He became ambassador at London 1835; retired from public life 1839; and died at Paris 15 Feb., 1842.

PRADIER, JEAN JACQUES, a French sculptor, born at Geneva 1792, died at Paris 5 June, 1852.

PRADT, DOMINIQUE DUFOUR DE, a French prelate, born at Allanches, in Auvergne, 23 April, 1759. He was grand vicar, at the Revolution, to the Cardinal de Rochefoucauld, and was elected deputy for the Norman clergy to the States-General 1789. Afterwards he fled to Hamburg, where he published the first of his voluminous series of political pamphlets, entitled 'Antidote to the Congress of Radstadt.' In another, termed 'Prussia and her Neutrality,' he urged a coalition of Europe against the French Republic. But after Bonaparte became first consul De Pradt was appointed his grand almoner. On the coronation of the emperor (1804), at which he assisted, he was invested with the title of baron, received a gratuity of 40,000 francs, and was made bishop of Poitiers. He afterwards officiated at Napoleon's coronation as king of Italy. In 1808 he accompanied him to the Bayonne conference, and for this service Napoleon gave him another gratuity of 50,000 francs, and made him, in 1809, archbishop of Mechlin and member of the Legion of Honour. On the war against Russia occurring in 1812, he was sent ambassador to the duchy of Warsaw. During the retreat from Moscow Napoleon had an interview with him at a lone cottage, reproached him with treachery, and divested him of his embassy. On his return to Paris he was ordered to retire to his diocese, and did not return till the fall of Napoleon in 1814. He wrote his Vindicatory History then, but did not publish it till after the battle of Waterloo. He was made by the Bourbons chancellor of the Legion of Honour; and he subsequently ceded all the rights of his archbishop's see to the king of the Netherlands. Died 18 March, 1837.

PRAED, WINTHROP MACKWORTH, a poet, born in London 26 July, 1802. His father, of the same names, was a serjeant-at-law, and sometime chairman of the audit office. He passed his early childhood at his father's seat at Teignmouth, Devon, and was in due course sent to Eton, where he was joint editor of the 'Etonian,' a school magazine (1820-21). Thence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow. His fame while at the university was perhaps greater than that of any other man, for, besides carrying off an unprecedented number of prizes for Greek odes and epigrams and for English poems, he was among the most brilliant orators at the Union Debating Society, of which Mr. (afterwards Lord) Macaulay was then a leading member. In 1829 Mr. Praed was called to the bar, and the following year was returned by the borough of St. Germains to the House of Commons, where, by his skill in debate, he soon rendered himself extremely useful to the Tory party. In 1834-5 he was secretary to the Board of Control, and in 1835 he was returned for Great Yarmouth. At the time of his death, which occurred 15 July, 1839, he was M.P. for Aylesbury, deputy high steward of the university of Cambridge, and recorder of Barnstaple. His 'Poems, with a memoir by the Rev. Derwent Coleridge,' were published at London, in 2 vols., 1864.

PRATT. See CAMDEN, Earl and Marquis.

PRATT, SAMUEL JACKSON, was born at St. Ives, Huntingdonshire, 25 Dec., 1749. He went on the stage early in life; but failing in that line he became an itinerant lecturer, and next a bookseller at Bath, where he published several poems and novels under the name of Courtney Melmoth. His principal poems were, 'The Tears of Genius, on the Death of Goldsmith;' a sentimental piece, entitled 'Sympathy;' and 'Landscapes in verse.' His best novels were, 'Liberal Opinions,' 'Emma Corbett,' 'The Pupil of Pleasure,' and 'Family Secrets.' Besides these works he published 'Gleanings, or Travels Abroad and in England,' 3 vols. He also wrote 'The Fair Circassian,' a tragedy, and some other works. He died at Birmingham, 4 Oct., 1814.

PRAXITELES, a Grecian sculptor, who lived about 350 years B.C. He was so attached to the courtesan Phryne that he promised her any of his works that she should select. Being at a loss which to choose, she came in a pretended alarm and told Praxiteles that his workshop was on fire, upon which he exclaimed, 'If my Satyr and Cupid are not saved I shall be ruined.' By this artifice Phryne was enabled to make her selection. His statue of Phryne was placed in the Temple of Delphi.

PRENTIS, STEPHEN, an English poet, born in or about 1801, was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1824; M.A. 1830). His death occurred at Dinan, in France, 12 June, 1862. His works, most, if not all, of which were privately printed at Dinan, are, 'Poems,' 8vo., 1836; 'Tintern Abbey,' a poem, in or about 1843; 'Translations from the French,' 4to., 1848; 'Le Grand Bey,' 1849; 'Winter Flowers,' 1849; 'The Flight of the Swallow,' 1851; 'The Revel of the Missel-Thrush,' 1851; 'Reflections in a Cemetery Abroad,' 1852; 'The Debtor's Dodge, or the Miller and the Bailiff,' 1852; 'The Common Home, or the Grave again,' 1852; 'Shadows for Music,' 1853; Jeux d'esprit on the Russian War, 1854-5; 'Lines on a Heap of Stones,' 1857. He was also the editor of a little quarterly periodical, printed at Dinan in 1850, and entitled 'The Dinan Magazine.' This did not, however, live beyond its third or fourth number.

PRESCOTT, WILLIAM HICKLING, an American historian, son of Judge Prescott, a celebrated jurist, was born at Salem, Mass., 4 May, 1796, and resided there till his father's removal to Boston, when he was twelve years old. He entered Harvard College 1811, and graduated 1814. While in college he was deprived by an accident of the use of one eye, and the sight of the other was so impaired as to prevent him from ever engaging in any occupation in which the constant use of that organ was necessary. He early determined to devote himself to a life of literature. Soon after leaving college, being advised to travel, he came to Europe, and spent two years in an extended journey through England, France, and Italy, and at the end of it returned home in excellent general health, but with no great improvement in the state of his eyes. Soon afterwards his marriage took place; and from this period his days flowed on in diligent and uneventful devotion to literary pursuits. He was never enabled to use his own eyes except for a short time in the day, but was constantly obliged to use the eyes of others for his studies and researches as well as to record the results of them. His quiet perseverance and continuous industry enabled him to triumph over this difficulty and to achieve an amount of literary production which is not merely most honourable to his intellectual powers, but conveys a noble moral lesson to all who may be burdened by similar trials. His earliest literary efforts were contributions to the 'North American Review,' upon subjects drawn from Spanish, English, American, and especially Italian literature. In 1838 appeared in 3 vols., his 'History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic,' which was received with the utmost enthusiasm both in Europe and America. It was translated into French, Spanish, and German, and its author was immediately elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. This was followed by his 'History of the Conquest of Mexico, with a preliminary view of the ancient Mexican Civilisation, and the Life of the Conqueror Hernando Cortez,' 3 vols., 1843; 'History of the Conquest of Peru, with a preliminary view of the Civilisation of the Incas,' 2 vols., 1847; 'History of the Reign of Philip II., King of Spain,' vols. i. and ii. 1855, vol. iii. 1858, an unfinished work; and an edition of Robertson's 'History of the Reign of Charles V.,' 1856, with notes and a Supplement containing an account of the Emperor's life after his abdication. Mr. Prescott died at Boston 28 Jan., 1859. He was a member of most of the learned societies of Europe, and received from the university of Oxford the honorary degree of D.C.L.

PRESTON, JOHN, D.D., was born at Heyford, Northamptonshire, Oct., 1587. He became fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, where he obtained great celebrity as a subtle disputant, of which he gave a specimen before King James on his visit to the university, for which Lord Brook gave him a pension of £50 a year. His Puritanism, however, brought him into trouble at court, and he was obliged to make a public recantation of his opinions.

After this he became chaplain to Prince Charles, preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and master of Emanuel College, Cambridge. Died July, 1628. The principal of his works is a 'Treatise on the Covenant.'

PRESTON, THOMAS, LL.D., was fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and afterwards master of Trinity Hall, where he died 1 June, 1598. He acted a part in the tragedy of Dido, played before Queen Elizabeth, who settled a pension of £20 a year on him. He wrote a tragedy called 'The Life of Cambyses, king of Persia,' which Shakspere has ridiculed.

PRETI, MATTHIAS, a painter, called Il Calabrese, born at Taverna, in the kingdom of Naples, 1613; died in Malta 1699.

PRÉVOST D'EXILES, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, a French writer, born at Hesdin, in Artois, 1697. He was alternately a Jesuit and a military officer, after which he entered into the monastery of St. Germain des Près, but quitted that society also and withdrew to Holland. His next removal was to London; but in 1734 he obtained leave to return to France, where he became secretary to the Prince de Conti. His end was no less remarkable than his life. On 23 Nov., 1763, he was found senseless in the Forest of Chantilly; and a surgeon being sent for, made an incision in the body, upon which the poor abbé uttered a shriek and opened his eyes, but closed them again for ever. His principal works are, 'Memoires d'un Homme de Qualité;' 'Histoire de M. Cleveland, fils naturel de Cromwell;' Pour et Contre,' a literary journal, 20 vols.; 'Le Doyen de Killerine, or the Dean of Coleraine, a novel;' 'History of Margaret of Anjou;' 'Histoire generale des Voyages,' 16 vols.

PRICE, Sir JOHN, LL.D., a learned Welsh antiquary, son of Rhys ap Gwilym Gwyn, was born in Breconshire, and educated at Broadgate Hall, Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of civil law 1534, being subsequently created doctor. On 2 March, 1546-7, he received the honour of knighthood; and he died in the reign of Queen Mary, but it is not known in what year. His works are, 'Of the Restitution of the Coyn,' 1553, MS.; 'The Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the ten Commandments, in the British or Welsh Tongue,' 1555; 'Fides Historiæ Britannicæ,' MS. Cott. Tit. F. iii 17; Defensio Regis Arthuri;' 'Historiæ Britannicæ Defensio,' 1573, in answer to Polydore Vergil; A Description of Cambria, now called Wales;' and 'Tractatus de Eucharistia.'

PRICE, JOHN, LL.D., was born in London 1600. He was educated at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford; but on becoming a Catholic he went to Italy, where he obtained the degree of doctor of laws. He afterwards became secretary to the earl of Strafford, in whose misfortunes he participated, and was thrown into prison. On regaining his liberty he went abroad, and became professor of Greek at Pisa. He died at Rome in 1676. He wrote 'Notes on Apuleius;' an Index to Hesychius; and Commentaries on the New Testament.

PRICE, RICHARD, D.D., F.R.S., a dissenting minister and political writer, born at Langeinor, Glamorganshire, 23 Feb., 1723. He received his education first at Talgarth, in his native county, and next at an academy in London. After residing some years with a gentleman at Stoke Newington he became morning preacher at the Gravel-Pit Meeting, Hackney. In 1769 the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of doctor in divinity, and the same year he published his 'Treatise on Reversionary Payments,' which was followed, in 1772, by 'Observations on the National Debt.' During the American war he printed two pamphlets against that measure, one entitled 'Observations on Civil Liberty;' and the other, 'Observations on Civil Government;' for which the corporation of London voted him thanks and a gold box. In 1778 he had a friendly controversy with Dr. Priestley on materialism and necessity. On the termination of the war, Mr. Pitt consulted Dr. Price respecting the best mode of liquidating the national debt, the result of which, it is said, was the adoption of the sinking fund. When the French Revolution broke out the doctor distinguished himself by a sermon, in which he hailed that event as the commencement of a glorious era. This drew upon the preacher some strong animadversions from Mr. Burke in his celebrated Reflections. Dr. Price died 19 March, 1791. As a calculator he was pre-eminent; and the Society for Equitable Assurances was greatly indebted to him for his services. He was also an active member of the Royal Society. His other works are, 'Review of the Questions and Difficulties in Morals;' 'Dissertations on Prayer, Providence, Miracles, and a future State;' 'Essay on the Population of England;' 'State of the Public Debts and Finances;' 'On the Importance of the American Revolution;' and a volume of Sermons.

PRICE, THOMAS, a Welsh writer, born in the county of Brecon 1787, became curate of Llangenny, near Crickhowell, at which town and in the neighbourhood, he passed the remainder of his life. In 1825 he was presented to the vicarage of Cwmdu, in addition to which he obtained the perpetual curacy of Tretower, the income of both benefices being about £200 a year. Died 7 Nov., 1848. His principal work, 'Hanes Cymru,' which appeared in 1842, is a history of Wales in the Welsh language, giving an account of the country and its inhabitants to the death of Prince Llywelyn ab Gruffydd, with a few particulars of the times subsequent. In English he wrote 'An Essay on the Physiognomy and Physiology of the present Inhabitants of Britain, with reference to their origin as Goths and Celts,' 1829; and 'The Geographical Progress of Empire and Civilisation,' 1846.

PRICE, Sir UVEDALE, was born 1747, and educated at Oxford. His earliest literary attempt was a translation of Pausanias, published in 1780, under the title of 'An Account of the Statues, Pictures, and Temples in Greece.' His fame as a writer, however, is based upon his 'Essay on the Picturesque, as compared with the Sublime and Beautiful, and on the use of studying Pictures for the purpose of improving real Landscapes' (1794), which brought him into collision with Repton, then a prominent landscape gardener, to whose criticism Price replied in 1795, in 'A Letter to H. Repton, Esq., on the application of the practice as well as the principles of Landscape Painting to Landscape Gardening.' He was also the author of an 'Essay on the modern Pronunciation of Greek and Latin,' privately printed at Oxford 1827. He was created a baronet shortly before his death, which happened at Foxley, Herefordshire, 11 Sept., 1829.

PRICHARD, JAMES COWLES, M.D., an ethnologist, born at Ross, Herefordshire, 11 Feb., 1786, studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and after graduating M.D. at Edinburgh settled as a physician in Bristol 1810, and was connected with the principal medical charities of that city. In 1845, on being appointed a commissioner in lunacy, he removed to London, where he died 22 Dec., 1848. His 'Researches into the Physical History of Mankind' first appeared in 1813; 2nd edit. 1826; 3rd edit., 5 vols., 1847. In this, his greatest work, Dr. Prichard developed, for the first time to its full extent, the philological element in ethnology. Baron Bunsen, speaking of it, says, 'Up to this time there exists no book which treats all subjects bearing on the great question of the unity of the human species with equal depth and candour, good sense, and sound judgment.' Among Dr. Prichard's other works are, 'Analysis of the Egyptian Mythology,' 1819; 'The Eastern Origin of the Celtic Nations,' 1831; and 'The Natural History of Man,' 1843.

PRIDEAUX, Humphrey, D.D., was born at Padstow, Cornwall, 3 May, 1648. He received his education at Westminster School, whence he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, where he published, in 1676, the 'Marmora Oxoniensia;' which procured him the patronage of the Lord Chancellor Finch, who gave him first a living near Oxford, and afterwards a prebend in the cathedral of Norwich. To these preferments the Lord-Keeper North added the rectory of Bladen, with the chapelry of Woodstock, Oxfordshire. On taking his doctor's degree he exchanged Bladen for Soham, Norfolk. In 1688 he was made archdeacon of Suffolk, and in 1702 dean of Norwich. He afterwards resigned his livings, and confined himself to his studies, the result of which was his great work, 'The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament,' 2 vols., 1715-18. His other works are, a Latin translation of Maimonides, 'De Jure pauperis et peregrini apud Judæos;' 'The Validity of the Orders of the Church of England;' 'Directions to Churchwardens;' 'Life of Mahomet;' and 'The original Right of Tythes.' Died 1 Nov., 1724.

PRIDEAUX, John, D.D., was born at Stowford, in the parish of Harford, Devonshire, 17 Sept., 1578. A neighbouring lady, observing his talents, sent him to a grammar school, after which he travelled to Oxford, where he became a servitor in Exeter College. In 1602 he obtained a fellowship, and in 1612 was elected rector of his college. In 1615 he was appointed regius professor of divinity, and distinguished himself as an opponent of Arminianism. In 1641 he was made bishop of Worcester; but the Rebellion breaking out, he suffered great hardships, and was reduced to poverty. Died 8 July, 1650. His principal works are, Orationes Lauguales; Lectiones decem de totidem Religionis Capitibus; Fasciculus Controversiarum; Theologiæ Scholasticæ Syntagma Mnemonicum; Sermons; and a Synopsis of the Councils.

PRIESSNITZ, Vincent, the founder of hydropathy, born at Gräfenburg, in Austrian Silesia, Oct., 1799; died there 28 Nov., 1851.

PRIESTLEY, Joseph, LL.D., F.R.S., was born at Fieldhead, Yorkshire, 18 March, 1733. He was educated in an academy at Daventry, after which he became minister to a congregation at Needham Market, Suffolk, whence he removed to Nantwich, Cheshire, and next to Warrington, where the dissenters had formed a seminary, on a plan of liberal sentiment. While tutor in this institution, he published the 'History of Electricity,' which procured his election into the Royal Society, and the degree of doctor of laws from Edinburgh. Soon after this he went to Leeds, where he made those important discoveries with regard to the properties of fixed air for which he obtained the Copley medal from the Royal Society, 1772. In 1776 he communicated to the same learned body his observations on respiration, he being the first who experimentally ascertained that the common inspired air becomes both lessened and injured by the action of the blood as it passes through the lungs. After this he made some curious observations on the food of plants, and the production of the various gases. These pursuits procured him the appointment of companion to the earl of Shelburne, with whom he resided seven years, and then retired on a pension to Birmingham, where he devoted more attention to polemics than philosophy. He had, indeed, previously published some works in defence of materialism and necessity; but now he made more direct attacks upon the common faith of Christians. In 1783 came out his 'History of the Corruptions of Christianity,' which, though a compilation from modern books, had an imposing appearance of learned research. On this account Dr. Horsley thought it necessary to expose the sources from whence the work was drawn, and to show the fallacy of its positions. This produced a controversy in which, if Dr. Priestley had not the advantage, he had the last word. He next engaged warmly in the proceedings for a repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts; but it was the French Revolution that afforded him the widest field, and he did not fail to display his zeal on that occasion. This, however, gave much offence to the people of Birmingham, among whom party spirit ran very high, and was excited, beyond doubt, by the writings of Dr. Priestley. At length, an entertainment, on the 14th of July, 1791, to celebrate the destruction of the Bastile, furnished the pretext for a riot, in which many houses were destroyed, and that of the doctor among the rest. After this he removed to Hackney, where he succeeded Dr. Price; but in 1794 he went to America, and died there 6 Feb., 1804. His publications were too numerous to admit of either list or selection in this place.

PRIMATICCIO, Francesco, a painter, born at Bologna 1490; died 1570. He was the disciple of Giulio Romano, on leaving whom he visited France, and was employed in adorning Fontainebleau and other palaces. Francis I. sent him to Italy to purchase antiques, and on his return made him superintendent of the royal buildings, and director of the public festivals.

PRINCE, John, a biographer, born 1643, at Axminster, Devonshire, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford (B.A. 1664). He became curate of Bideford; and afterwards was chosen minister of St. Martin's Church, Exeter, upon which he took his degree of M.A. at Caius College, Cambridge. From Exeter he removed to the vicarage of Totnes, and next to that of Berry Pomeroy, where he died 1723. He is known by a valuable work, entitled 'Danmonii Orientales Illustres; or the Worthies of Devon,' 1701; 2nd edit. 1810.

PRINGLE, Sir John, Bart, F.R.S., was born in the county of Roxburgh 10 April, 1707. He was the youngest son of Sir John Pringle, Baronet, and was educated first at St. Andrew's and next at Edinburgh, where he studied physic, but graduated at Leyden. On his return home he was appointed professor of pneumatics and moral philosophy at Edinburgh. In 1742 he was constituted physician to the military hospital in Flanders, and soon after physician-general to the British forces beyond seas. In 1745 he attended the army, then acting against the rebels in Scotland; but after the battle of Culloden he returned to Flanders, and remained there till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, when he settled in London. In 1750 he communicated to the Royal Society his 'Experiments on Septic and Antiseptic Substances,' for which he received the Copley medal. In 1752 he published 'Observations on the Diseases of the Army,' which has been translated into several languages. In 1761 he was appointed physician to the queen's household. In 1766 he was created a baronet, and in 1772 elected president of the Royal Society, which situation he held till 1778. Died 18 Jan., 1782. His six anniversary discourses at the Royal Society on delivering the Copleyan medal were printed with his life, by Dr. Kippis.

PRINGLE, THOMAS, a Scotch poet, journalist, and miscellaneous writer, born on the farm of Blaiklaw, Teviotdale, 5 Jan., 1789; died 5 Dec., 1834. He spent several years at the Cape; and his most interesting prose work is his 'Narrative of a Residence in South Africa.' His Poetical Works were edited by Leitch Ritchie 1839.

PRINSEP, CHARLES ROBERT, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1811; M.A. 1814; LL.D. 1824). He went to the bar, and was appointed advocate-general of Bengal. Died at Chiswick 8 June, 1864. He wrote 'An Essay on Money,' 8vo., London, 1818, and translated Say's 'Political Economy, with Notes,' 2 vols. 8vo., London, 1821.

PRINSEP, JAMES, F.R.S., an orientalist, born in England 1800, went at an early age to India, and was assay-master in the mint, first at Benares and next at Calcutta. He became secretary to the Asiatic Society, and editor of its 'Journal;' published 'Sketches of Benares;' made numerous discoveries which enabled him to fill up the blank left in the history of the successors of Alexander the Great in Bactria; and constructed a nearly-unbroken series of numismatic records, which extended from Alexander the Great to modern times. Died 22 April, 1840.

PRIOR, MATTHEW, a poet, born 21 July, 1664. He lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by his uncle, a tavern-keeper at Charing Cross, who sent him to Westminster School, but after some time took him home to assist in the business. Here his classical knowledge becoming known to the earl of Dorset, he sent him to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1688 Prior wrote, in conjunction with Mr. Montague, the burlesque poem of 'The City Mouse and Country Mouse.' In 1691 he was appointed secretary to the English Embassy at the Hague, and soon after King William made him one of his gentlemen of the bed-chamber. In 1697 he was present, as secretary to the Embassy, at the treaty of Ryswick, and the following year he went in the same capacity to France. On his return home he was appointed under-secretary of state, which office he soon after quitted for that of a commissioner of trade. After the accession of Queen Anne he joined the Tories, by whom he was employed to negotiate the treaty of Utrecht, and was sent ambassador to the French court; whence, at the commencement of the next reign, he was recalled, committed to custody, and threatened with an impeachment, which, however, did not take place. He died 18 Sept., 1721, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. His poems are light and harmonious; but his tales are licentious. He left 'Memoirs of his own Time,' which have been published.

PRISCIANUS, a grammarian, was a native of Cæsarea, and an eminent teacher at Constantinople, about A.D. 525. Several of his treatises are extant.

PRISCILLIAN, a heretic of the fourth century, was a native of Spain, where his opinions were condemned in 380 by a council held at Saragossa. Priscillian was ordained bishop of Avila by his own party, but put to death, with some of his adherents, in 387. His followers united the errors of the Gnostics and Manichees.

PRITCHARD, MATTHEW, an English Catholic prelate, was born 1670, being a member of the family of the Pritchards of Craig, between Monmouth and Abergavenny. At the age of eighteen he was received as a novice in St. Bonaventure's convent, Douay, where he assumed the habit of St. Francis. After being employed there as lector of philosophy for four years, and of theology for several years, he was sent to the Perthyre mission, in Monmouthshire, his native county. By Bulls dated Rome, 20 Sept., 1713, Pope Clement XI. promoted him to the see of Myra, and three days later he was constituted Vicar Apostolic of the Western District, comprising the counties of Wilts, Devon, Cornwall, Somerset, Dorset, Gloucester, Hereford, and the principality of Wales. His consecration took place at Cologne, at Whitsuntide, 1715. Bishop Pritchard died at Perthyre, 22 May, 1750.

PROBY, earl of Carysfort. See CARYSFORT.

PROCACCINI, JULIUS CÆSAR, a painter, born at Bologna 1548; died 1626. He was bred a sculptor, but quitted that profession to study in the academy of the Caracci, whose style he relinquished for that of Correggio, which no one ever imitated more effectually. He had two brothers and a nephew, who were all good painters.

PROCLUS, a Platonic philosopher, born at Constantinople 8 Feb., 412. He studied at Alexandria, and next at Athens, where he succeeded Syrianus in the Platonic school, and died in 485. His works consist principally of commentaries on older writers.

PROCOPIUS, an historian of the sixth century, was born at Cæsarea, in Palestine. He was a pleader of causes at Constantinople in the reign of Anastasius, who held him in great estimation, as also did the emperors Justin and Justinian. He next became secretary to Belisarius, whom he attended in his wars, after which he was admitted into the Senate, and appointed prefect of Constantinople, where he died about 560. He wrote the History of his Times, particularly of the Persian war, and the wars with the Vandals and Goths; also a work on the public edifices built or restored by Justinian, and a book of anecdotes.

PROCTER, ADELAIDE ANNE, an English poetess, the eldest daughter of Bryan Waller Procter, better known under his literary pseudonym of Barry Cornwall, was born 1835, and first attracted notice by the publication of two volumes of poems, entitled 'Lyrics and Legends,' 1858 and 1861; new edition, with preface by Charles Dickens, 1866. This work was followed by 'A Chaplet of Verses,' 1862. Miss Procter, who had become a convert to the Catholic religion, died in London 2 Feb., 1864.

PRONY, Gaspard Clair François Marie Riche de, a French mathematician and civil engineer, born at Chamelet (Rhône) 22 July, 1755; died at Asinières, near Paris, 29 July, 1839.

PROPERTIUS, Sextus Aurelius, a Roman poet, born at Mevania, in Umbria, probably about 56 B.C. His father, who was a knight, suffered death for his attachment to Antony; but Propertius found a patron in Mæcenas, and lived on terms of friendship with Ovid and Tibullus. He died after B.C. 16. His poems are commonly printed with those of Tibullus and Catullus.

PROTAGORAS, a Greek philosopher of Abdera. He was originally a porter; but by hearing Democritus he attained such eminence as to become a teacher at Athens, from which city he was banished on the charge of atheism. He then went to Epirus, where he resided several years; and died on his voyage to Sicily about 620 B.C. He was a complete sophist, and delighted in perplexing his hearers by subtleties.

PROTOGENES, a painter, was a native of Caunus, in Caria. He at first painted ships at Rhodes, but rose to such eminence in the art that Apelles went thither on purpose to visit him, and gave him fifty talents, equal to ten thousand pounds, for one of his pictures, which liberality had the effect of making the Rhodians more sensible of the merits of their countryman. He lived about 308 B.C.

PROUDHON, Pierre Joseph, a French publicist, born at Besançon 15 July, 1809; died 19 Jan., 1865. An interesting work by Charles Clement, on 'Proudhon, sa Vie, ses Œuvres, et sa Correspondance,' was published 1872.

PROUT, Samuel, F.S.A., a water-colour painter, born at Plymouth 17 Sept., 1783. In early life he was a companion of Haydon. Some sketches of Cornish scenery, which he executed for Britton the antiquary, first brought him into notice, and in 1805 he removed to London. In 1816 Mr. Ackermann published a work in parts, called 'Studies,' after Mr. Prout's designs, executed in lithography, which was then a new art in England though invented some years before. This was followed by a similar production, 'Progressive Fragments,' in 1818; by 'Rudiments of Landscape;' 'Views in the North and West of England,' &c. About this period Mr. Prout's foreign tours commenced, and the Rhine, France and Italy, Flanders and Germany, the two latter containing twenty-four plates each, were the result of his labours, and may be considered the finest of his collective works. It was here that he acquired that broad and conventional mode of representing distant architectural features which, though bold, was felt to be true, and was at once so new and gratifying to the general eye that his powers of production were often unequal to the demands made upon them by the publishers. Several engravings were also published after his works in line—the City of Venice, a large mezzotinto of Chartres Cathedral, and coloured prints of the Hôtel de Ville, Louvain, and views of Rouen and Ulm. In 1848 appeared his 'Hints on Light and Shade,' which was followed by some drawing exercises. Mr. Prout, who was one of the most distinguished members of the Old Society of Painters in Water-colours, died at Camberwell 10 Feb., 1852.

PROUT, William, M.D., F.R.S., a physician and chemist, born 1786, took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, but afterwards settled in London, where he died 9 April, 1850. Dr. Prout, who is regarded as the pioneer of the movement which has so intimately connected chemistry with the treatment of disease, was the author of 'An Enquiry into the nature and treatment of Gravel, Calculus, and other Diseases connected with a deranged operation of the Urinary Organs,' 1821; 'On the Nature and Treatment of Stomach and Renal Diseases; being an Inquiry into the connexion of Diabetes, Calculus, and other affections of the Kidney and Bladder, with Indigestion,' 5th edit., 1848; a Bridgewater Treatise on 'Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion considered with reference to Natural Theology;' besides papers in the Philosophical Transactions and scientific periodicals.

PRUDENTIUS, Aurelius Prudentius Clemens, a celebrated Christian poet, born, it is supposed, at Saragosa 348. He was at first an advocate, then a judge, went afterwards into the army, and was at length appointed to some honourable office at Court, though he was never consul, as some have supposed. He died about 412, leaving behind him a great number of poems. Only two of his works have been translated into English, viz., 'Psychomachia; the War of the Soul: or the Battle of the Virtues and Vices,' 8vo., London, 1743; and 'The Cathemerinon, and other Poems,' 12mo., London, 1845. In the Cottonian collection is a very ancient MS. copy of the 'Psychomachia,' illustrated with drawings of historical figures, accompanied by explanatory legends in Latin and Saxon characters. Several of his hymns have been inserted in the liturgy of the Catholic Church.

PRUDHON, Pierre Paul, a French painter, born at Cluny (Bourgogne) 6 April, 1760; died 16 Feb., 1823.

PRUTZ, Robert Ernest, a German novelist, dramatist, and lyric poet, born at Stettin 30 May, 1816; died June, 1872.

PRYNNE, William, a political writer, born at Swanswick, Somersetshire, 1600. He was educated at Bath, and next at Oriel College, Oxford, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. In 1633 he was prosecuted in the Star Chamber for a libel entitled 'Histriomastix,' when he was sentenced to pay a fine of £5000, to be expelled the university of Oxford and the society of Lincoln's Inn, and, after losing his ears in the pillory, to be imprisoned for life. In 1637 Prynne fell again under the censure of the same court for another libel, when he was doomed to lose the remainder of his ears, to have his cheeks branded, to pay another fine of £5000, and to be perpetually confined in Caernarvon Castle; but afterwards he was removed to Jersey, where he remained till the meeting of the Long Parliament, when he entered London in triumph. He was soon after elected a member of the House of Commons, where he distinguished himself as the leading manager in the prosecution of Archbishop Laud. Prynne, however, opposed Cromwell as vehemently as he had done the king, for which he was sent to Dunster Castle; but in 1659 he was restored to his seat. He was instrumental in the recall of Charles II., for which he was appointed keeper of the Records. In 1661 he fell under the censure of the House for publishing an address to the peers against a Bill then in progress respecting corporations. Prynne was a most voluminous writer, but his principal work is a collection of records. Died 24 Oct., 1669.

PSALMANAZAR, GEORGE, an impostor, is supposed to have been a native of France, but his real name is unknown. He was educated under the Jesuits, after which he led a vagrant life, and subsisted by begging in the garb of a pilgrim. At length he formed the project of passing for a Formosan, and, to carry on the delusion, he invented a new alphabet and grammar. While in Flanders he entered into the army, but still pretended to be a heathen, which incited the zeal of an English clergyman to attempt his conversion, which he accomplished without difficulty. The proselyte, being baptized, was brought to London, where Bishop Compton received him very graciously, and set him upon translating the Catechism into the Formosan tongue. Soon afterwards he wrote and published the History of Formosa, which ran through two editions. He was now sent to Oxford; but, the cheat being discovered, he returned to London, where he subsisted by writing for the booksellers. He had a considerable share in the Universal History, and was much respected in his after years. He died 3 May, 1763, aged about 84.

PTOLEMY, CLAUDIUS, a geographer and astronomer of antiquity, born at Pelusium, in Egypt, about A.D. 70. He resided at Alexandria, where he had an observatory; but it is evident from his cosmography that he was also a voyager, and had visited many of the countries which he has described. He corrected Hipparchus's catalogue of fixed stars, and formed tables of the planetary motions. He also digested the observations of the earlier astronomers into a system which he called the 'Magna Constructio,' which work, on being translated into Arabic, obtained the name of the 'Almagest.' It has been published with a Latin version. Ptolemy adhered to the hypothesis that the earth is the centre round which the sun revolves, whence that system is called after him. His geography is a valuable work, and was printed at Basle in 1553, and again at Amsterdam in 1618. There are other works of his extant, particularly one on Harmonics, edited by Wallis, at Oxford, 1682.

PUFENDORF, SAMUEL, a civilian, born 1631 at Flaeh, near Chemnitz, in Saxony. After studying at Leipsic and Jena, he became tutor to the son of the Swedish resident at Copenhagen; but when hostilities broke out between the two states he was thrown into prison with the rest of the ambassador's suite. While in confinement he wrote his 'Elementa Jurisprudentiæ,' which, in 1660, he dedicated to the elector Palatine, who appointed him professor of the law of nature and nations at Heidelberg, whence he removed, in 1670, to a similar situation at Lunden, which university was then just founded by Charles XI. of Sweden, who also made Pufendorf his historiographer and counsellor. In 1688 he went to Berlin, at the desire of the elector of Brandenburg, for whom he wrote the life of his ancestor William the Great. In 1694 he was made a baron of Sweden, but died in Oct., the same year. His other works are, 'De Statu Germanici Imperii;' 'De Jure Naturæ et Gentium;' 'De officio Hominis et Civis juxta legem naturalem;' Introduction to the History of Europe; 'Commentaria de rebus Suecicis;' 'De habitu Religionis Christianæ ad vitam civilem;' 'Jus Feciale Divinum;' 'De rebus a Carolo Gustavo Sueciæ Rege gestis Commentarii.'

PUGET, PIERRE, a French painter, sculptor, and architect, born at Marseilles 1622; died 2 Dec., 1694. His Milo of Crotona, and Perseus and Andromeda, in the Park at Versailles, are pleasing proofs of the power of his chisel.

PUGHE, WILLIAM OWEN, D.C.L., F.S.A., a Welsh lexicographer and antiquary, was born in Merionethshire 7 Aug., 1759, and at the age of seventeen settled in London, where he became acquainted with several Welshmen who were ardent lovers of their native language. His great work is a Welsh and English Dictionary, published in 2 vols. 4to. and 8vo., London, 1803; 2nd edition, 2 vols. 8vo., Denbigh, 1832. He also published 'Cambrian Biography,' translated Milton's 'Paradise Lost' into Welsh, and edited several works on the ancient history of Wales. The university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L. 1826. He died at Dolydd-y-cae, Talyllyn, near Dolgelly, 4 June, 1835.

PUGIN, AUGUSTUS, born in France 1762, came to London after the French Revolution, obtained employment as a draughtsman in the office of John Nash, the celebrated architect, and became known by a series of elaborate works on the Gothic architecture of the Middle Ages, the principal being 'Specimens of Gothic Architecture,' 2 vols., 1821–23, the literary portion of which was contributed by Mr. Willson, of Lincoln; 'Architectural Illustrations of the Public Buildings of London,' 2 vols., 1827, with descriptions by John Britton; 'Specimens of the Architectural Antiquities of Normandy,' 1825-28, also in collaboration with Britton; and 'Gothic Ornaments selected from various Buildings in England and France,' in conjunction with his son. Mr. Pugin died 19 Dec., 1832.

PUGIN, AUGUSTUS WELBY NORTHMORE, whose name is so intimately associated with the revival of Gothic architecture, was the son of Augustus Pugin, and was born in Store Street, Bedford Square, London, 1 March, 1812. He received his education at Christ's Hospital. Having acquired marvellous skill in drawing, he travelled with his father in England and Normandy, when in search of materials for his publications. On the death of his father and mother he left town for Ramsgate (1833), where he commenced designing those works which first brought his talents before the public, and were the foundation of his after fame. His treatise 'On Gothic Furniture' appeared in 1835, and that on 'Iron Work' in the same year. In 1836 he commenced that contest with the prevailing architecture of the times, which led to such marked results, in a volume entitled, 'Contrasts: or, a Parallel between the Noble Edifices of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries, and similar Buildings of the Present Day, showing the present decay of Taste; with appropriate text.' This publication took his own profession and the public by surprise by its originality and earnestness. Just at this period the Roman Catholic communion, to which Mr. Pugin had allied himself in 1834, evinced considerable energy in church-building, and his constructive abilities soon found extensive employment. He began with the graceful little chapel which is so conspicuous from the railway at Reading; then came his first great work, the church at Derby. Among the other Catholic churches and buildings designed by him are St. Chad's Cathedral, Birmingham; St. Edward's, St. Mary's, and two other churches at Liverpool; the church and convent at Edge Hill; St. Wilfred's, Manchester; churches at Kenilworth, Oxford, Cambridge, Stockton-on-Tees, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Preston, Ushaw, Keighley, in Yorkshire, Sheepshead, in Leicestershire, Rugby, Northampton, Stoke-upon-Trent, Brewood, Woolwich, Hammersmith, Pontefract, and Fulham; St. Edmund's, near Ware; St. Martin's, Buckingham; St. Wilfred, near Alton; St. Barnabas, Nottingham, with a convent and chapel in the same town; St. Bernard's Church and Monastery, Leicester; the convents of the Sisters of Mercy at Birmingham, Liverpool, and London; St. Gregory's Priory, Downside, near Bath; colleges at Radcliffe and Rugby, and improvements at Maynooth, Ireland; and the Catholic Cathedrals of Killarney, Enniscorthy, and St. George's, Southwark. His works for the earl of Shrewsbury, who was much attached to him, were the extensive additions and alterations to Alton Towers; the chapel, monastery, school-house, St. John's Hospital, Alton; and the church at Cheadle. So great was his devotion to the Catholic faith that he invariably declined to design for Protestant places of worship, and seldom accepted commissions from Protestants for buildings for secular purposes. The chief exceptions to this rule were the gateway to Magdalen College, Oxford, and the elaborate mediæval ornamentation of the new Houses of Parliament at Westminster. Mr. Pugin's pen was also constantly engaged, and he had always some new work or pamphlet in hand. This, no doubt, caused too much excitement for his already overworked mind. The most noticeable of his works are, 'The True Principles of Pointed or Christian Architecture,' 1841; 'An Apology for the Revival of Christian Architecture,' 1843, originally published in the Dublin Review,' 1841–42; and 'The Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament,' 1844. In 1851 a sad darkness of intellect fell upon him, from which he never recovered but to pass into the shadow of death. He died at Ramsgate 14 Sept., 1852. Mr. Benjamin Ferrey has published 'Recollections of A. W. N. Pugin and his father Augustus Pugin; with Notices of their works,' 8vo., London, 1861.

PULCI, Luigi, an Italian poet, born at Florence 1431. His principal performance, entitled 'Morgante Maggiore,' is a poetical romance, and was printed at Florence 1481. Pulci also wrote sonnets, published with those of Matteo Franco, in which the two authors satirized each other for their amusement. Died 1487.

PULLEN, or PULLUS, Robert, an English cardinal, is said to have been a native of Oxfordshire. He was the principal restorer of the university of Oxford; and, after reading lectures there some years, was made archdeacon of Rochester. He then became professor of divinity at Paris, for which the archbishop of Canterbury put his benefice under sequestration. The Pope, however, decided in favour of the archdeacon, who, in 1144, was made a cardinal, and afterwards chancellor of the Roman church. He died 1150. His Book of Sentences was printed at Paris 1655.

PULTENEY, Richard, M.D., F.R.S., was born at Loughborough 17 Feb., 1730. He became a surgeon and apothecary at Leicester, where he devoted much attention to natural history, and communicated some papers on the sleep of plants, and the rare productions of Leicestershire, to the Royal Society, of which he was elected a fellow 1762. Two years after this he took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, and went to settle at Blandford, Dorsetshire, where he died 13 Oct., 1801. Dr. Pulteney published 'A General View of the Writings of Linnæus;' and 'Sketches of the Progress of Botany in England,' 2 vols. 1790. He left his museum to the Linnæan Society.

PULTENEY, William, earl of Bath. See Bath.

PULTON, Andrew, an English Jesuit, who taught a school in the Savoy, London, in the reign of James II., and made himself remarkable by a conference he had in 1687 with Dr. Thomas Tenison, incumbent of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. He left England at the Revolution, and followed the court of James II. to St. Germain, where he died 5 Aug., 1710, aged 56. His works are, The Total Defeat of the Protestant Rule of Faith; Account of his Conference with Dr. Tenison; Remarks on Dr. Tenison's account of the Conference.

PURBACH, George, a mathematician, born at Purbach, in Germany, 1423. He became professor of mathematics at Vienna, and, in conjunction with his pupil Regiomontanus, undertook an edition of Ptolemy's Almagest, but left the work unfinished at his death on 8 April, 1461. He wrote some mathematical treatises, and invented a gnomon, or geometrical square, with canons and tables. He also made improvements in trigonometry by the construction of the table of sines, and a decimal division of the radius. His principal work is 'A Theory of the Planets.'

PURCELL, Henry, a musician, born 1658. As his father and uncle were gentlemen of the royal chapel, it is supposed that he was brought up under Dr. Blow. He was first organist of Westminster Abbey, and afterwards of the Chapel Royal. He was not only an eminent church composer, but also for the theatre; and his songs were once extremely popular. He died 21 Nov., 1695. His works are, Sonatas, 1683; the Opera of Diocletian, 1691; and 'Orpheus Britannicus.'

PURCHAS, Samuel, B.D., a noted compiler of travels, was born at Thaxted, Essex, about 1577, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he proceeded M.A. 1600, and afterwards B.D., in which degree he was incorporated at Oxford 11 July, 1615. On 24 Aug., 1604, he was presented by King James I. to the vicarage of Eastwood, Essex; but, in order that he might have more ample opportunities for collecting and writing voyages and travels, he gave up his incumbency to his brother, and repaired to London, where, by the favour of the bishop of that see, he was collated to the rectory of St. Martin's, Ludgate, where he was buried 30 Sept., 1626. His works are, 'Pilgrimage: or, Relations of the World, and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places discovered from the Creation to this present,' folio, London, 1613, 1614, 1626; 'Purchas his Pilgrimes,' 4 vols. folio, 1625, the work by which he is best known; 'Purchas his Pilgrim, Microcosmus, or the History of Man, &c.,' 8vo., London, 1619; and 'The King's Tower and triumphant Arch of London, 8vo.,' 1623. The publication of these works, according to Wood, brought their author into debt. It may be mentioned that Purchas has a copy of verses prefixed to Captain John Smith's History of Virginia, 1624.

PURCHAS, Samuel, M.A., son of the preceding, became rector of Sutton, Essex, and published 'A Theatre of Political flying Insects,' &c., 4to., London, 1657.

PUSHKIN, Alexander Sergeivitch, a Russian poet, born at St. Petersburg 26 May (7 June), 1799; died 29 Jan. (10 Feb.), 1837.

PUTSCHIUS, Elias, a critic, was born at Antwerp 1580; died at Stade 9 March, 1606. He published Sallust with notes; and the collection of ancient Latin Grammarians, 1605.

PUTTENHAM, George, an English writer, was born about 1530, and educated at Oxford. He lived in the court of Edward VI., and became one of the gentlemen pensioners to Queen Elizabeth. He died about 1600. His works are, an Eclogue entitled 'Elpine;' 'Partheniades,' 1579; 'The Art of Poesie,' 1589, reprinted 1811.

PYE, Henry James, a poet, was descended from an ancient family in Berkshire, but born in London 1745. After receiving a private education he went to Magdalen College, Oxford, where he obtained the honorary degree of master of arts in 1766, and that of doctor of laws in 1772. He was for some time in the Berkshire militia, and ruined his circumstances by standing a contest for the representation of the county. In 1790 he became poet laureate, and in 1792 one of the police-magistrates for Westminster. He died 11 Aug., 1813. His principal works are, 'Farringdon-Hill, a poem;' Six Odes of Pindar, translated into English verse; 'The Progress of Refinement, a poem;' 'Poems on various Subjects,' 2 vols.; a translation of the Poetics of Aristotle; 'Lenore,' a tale from the German of Burger; The Democrat, 2 vols.; The Aristocrat, 2 vols.; 'Alfred,' an epic poem; another collection of poems, 2 vols.; Comments on the Commentators on Shakspere; and a translation of the Hymns and Epigrams of Homer.

PYM, John, a lawyer, born in Somersetshire 1584. He was educated at Broadgate's Hall, now Pembroke College, Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court, and was called to the bar. He became a member of Parliament in the reign of James I., and distinguished himself as a zealous opponent of the court, being a rigid Puritan. In the next reign he acted with greater violence, and was one of the five members who were demanded by the king to be delivered to him as traitors. In 1643 he was appointed by his party lieutenant of the ordnance, but died, very rich, on 8 Dec., the same year, and was interred in Westminster Abbey.

PYNE, James Baker, a landscape painter, born at Bristol 5 Dec., 1800; died in London 29 July, 1870. Mr. Pyne, who was for many years vice-president of the Society of British Artists, published a series of lithographs under the title of 'Lake Scenery of England,' and contributed numerous papers to the Art Journal.

PYNE, William Henry, artist and author, died at Paddington 29 May, 1843, aged 74. He was a member of the Society of Painters in Water Colours; and his principal works are, 'Microcosm: or a picturesque Delineation of the Arts, &c., of Great Britain, in a Series of 600 groups of small figures for the embellishment of Landscapes,' 2 vols., 1803-6; 'History of the Royal Residences of Windsor Castle, St. James's Palace, &c.,' 3 vols., 1819; 'Wine and Walnuts, by Ephraim Hardcastle,' 2 vols., 1823.

PYNSON, Richard, a printer, was born in Normandy, but was naturalized in England by letters patent. He was also appointed king's printer, and was the first that introduced the Roman letter into this country. He chiefly printed law books, which were at that time in Norman French. He died about 1529.

PYRRHO, the founder of a philosophic sect called Sceptics, and sometimes Pyrrhonists, was born at Elea, in the Peloponnesus, B.C. 340. He was at first a painter, and several of his pictures were long preserved at Elea; but afterwards he became a disciple of Anaxarchus, whom he accompanied to India, where they conversed with the Brachmans and Gymnosophists. On the return of Pyrrho to Greece the inhabitants of Elea appointed him sovereign pontiff of their religion, though his principles tended to overthow all faith. He died B.C. 288, and the Athenians, who had made him one of their citizens, erected a statue to his honour.

PYTHAGORAS, a great philosopher of antiquity, was the son of a jeweller of Samos, but born at Sidon B.C. 586. At the age of eighteen his thirst of knowledge carried him to Egypt, where he resided twenty-five years. From thence he went to Babylon, next to Sparta, and then returned to Samos, but that place being oppressed by Polycrates he proceeded to Phlius, where the sovereign received him graciously. On one occasion the king asked Pythagoras what was his profession; to which he answered that he was a philosopher, for that, in opposition to those who called themselves sages, he considered himself only 'a lover of wisdom.' He next removed to Croton, in Italy, where he established a school, and effected a great reformation in the inhabitants. He subjected his disciples to a strict course of discipline, obliging them to make a common stock of their property, to observe a probationary silence of seven years, and to abstain from particular kinds of food. The moral system of Pythagoras was excellent, and his doctrines were in general pure. In science he was a great inventor. He contrived the multiplication table, and discovered those propositions in geometry which are the basis of practical mathematics. On the discovery of one of these he is said to have offered a hecatomb to the gods as a thanksgiving. Pythagoras taught that the sun occupies the centre of the planetary system, and he also asserted the obliquity of the zodiac. Phalaris, of Agrigentum, was at first inclined to follow the advice of the philosopher, but afterwards became so enraged against him that he would have put him to death had not the people risen and despatched the tyrant. Pythagoras, however, at last fell a victim of persecution. One Cylon, a vicious young man of powerful connections, being refused admittance into his school, compelled the philosopher to leave Croton and fly to Locris, from whence he went to Tarentum, and lastly to Metapontum, where he was slain or starved to death in the temple of the Muses, at the age of 80. Pythagoras was a great lover of music and poetry; and the 'Golden Verses,' which pass under his name, have been often published, with the commentary of Hierocles. The philosopher was married, and had two sons and a daughter, who were all famous for their learning.

PYTHEAS, an ancient traveller, was born at Massilia, now Marseilles, then a colony of the Phoceans. He was a good mathematician, and is said not only to have explored the coast as far as Cadiz, but to have sailed from thence to the Ultima Thule, or Iceland, where he observed the sun to rise almost as soon as he set. After his return he travelled by land in the northern parts of Europe.

He lived about the time of Alexander the Great; but his works are lost, though some of them were extant in the fourth century.

Q.

QUADRATUS, a disciple of the Apostles, and bishop of Athens about 126. He presented an 'Apology' in favour of the Christians to the Emperor Adrian 131, which induced that prince to stop the persecution. Only some fragments of this Apology remain.

QUADRIO, Francesco Saverio, an Italian ecclesiastic, born in the Valteline 1 Dec., 1695; died at Milan 21 Nov., 1756. He wrote a general History of Poetry, 7 vols., 1741-52; and Historical Observations on the Valteline.

QUAIN, Jones, M.D., an English medical writer, professor of anatomy and physiology in the university of London, died 31 Jan., 1865, aged 70.

QUARLES, Francis, a poet, born near Romford, Essex, 1592, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn. He afterwards became cup-bearer to Elizabeth, daughter of James I., till her husband was chosen king of Bohemia. Quarles then went to Ireland, was secretary to Archbishop Usher; but when the rebellion broke out he returned to England, and suffered much for his loyalty. Died 8 Sept., 1644. His principal works are, 'Emblems and Hieroglyphics' in the manner of Hugo, and with the same plates, which book went through many editions; 'Argalus and Parthenia,' a romance; 'Enchiridion of Meditations;' 'Divine Fancies;' and 'The Shepherd's Oracles.'

QUATREMÈRE DE QUINCY, Antoine Chrysostome, a French archæologist and writer on æsthetics, born in Paris 1755; died 28 Dec., 1849.

QUEKETT, John Thomas, F.R.S., a histologist, born 1815, was the fourth son of the head master of Langport Grammar School, at which institution he received his education. Having determined upon entering the medical profession, he was sent up to his brother, Mr. Edwin Quekett, lecturer on botany to the London Hospital. He competed for the studentship in anatomy, just then established by the Royal College of Surgeons, which he obtained and held for three years, at the close of which his superior attainments as an anatomist, especially in minute dissections and microscopical investigations, led to his permanent appointment in the Hunterian Museum as professor of histology. He was there principally occupied in extending and arranging the series of microscopical preparations commenced by himself, and which ultimately numbered upwards of 50,000 specimens. The work on which his great reputation is chiefly based is the 'Illustrated Catalogue' of the specimens. His other published works are, 'Lectures on Histology,' and a 'Practical Treatise on the Use of the Microscope,' with numerous papers contributed to scientific journals. Professor Quekett was secretary, and subsequently president of the Microscopical Society of London. He died at Pangbourne, Berks, 20 Aug., 1861.

QUELLYN, Erasmus, Quellinus, a painter, born at Antwerp 1607. He was a pupil of Rubens, and executed several grand pictures at his native place. He died 11 Nov., 1678, and left a son, John Erasmus Quellyn, whose works are held in estimation. He had also a nephew, Arthur Quellyn, who was an excellent sculptor. His son, Hubert, was an engraver, and died 1715.

QUERCETANUS. See Duchesne.

QUERENGHI, Antonio, an Italian poet, born at Padua in 1546, was secretary of the Sacred College under five Popes, and died at Rome 1633.

QUEROUAILLE, Louise de, duchess of Portsmouth. See Portsmouth.

QUESNAY, François, a French physician, the leader of the sect of 'Economists,' was born at Mérei, near Monfort-l'Amaury, 1694; died 16 Dec., 1774.

QUESNEL, Pasquier, a French ecclesiastic of the congregation of the Oratory, born at Paris 1634. He published a celebrated work entitled 'Reflections on the New Testament,' which received the approbation of the Cardinal de Noailles, and even had the royal privilege. At length a cabal was raised against the author as a Jansenist, and he was obliged to retire, first to Brussels, and next to Amsterdam, where he died 2 Dec., 1719. His book was formally condemned at Rome 1713, by the bull 'Unigenitus.'

QUESNOY, François du, an eminent sculptor, born at Brussels 1594. His works, chiefly basreliefs in bronze, ivory, marble, or wax, possess great elegance, representing children, bacchanals, &c. He died at Leghorn 1646.

QUEVEDO Y VILLEGAS, Francisco Gomez de, a Spanish satirist, born at Madrid Sept., 1580. He was a knight of the order of St. James, and was thrown into prison for some satires on the Count d'Olivares, prime minister to Philip IV. but when that statesman was disgraced he recovered his liberty. He died at Villanueva de los Infantes 8 Sept., 1645. All his works have been published in 3 vols. 4to. The 'Visions of Hell,' and Comic Tales, have been translated into English.

QUICK, John, a dissenting divine, born at Plymouth 1636. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and deprived of the living of Brixton, in Devonshire, for nonconformity, in 1662. After this, he resided some time at Middleburg, and lastly settled in London, where he died in 1706. He wrote 'Synodicon in Gallia Reformata,' 2 vols.; 'An answer to that case of conscience, Whether it be lawful for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister,' &c.

QUICK, John, a celebrated comedian, died at Islington 4 April, 1831, aged 83.

QUIEN, Michel le, a French Dominican, born at Boulogne 8 Oct., 1661. He opposed Father Pezron's attempt to establish the Septuagint chronology against that of the Hebrew text. He also wrote an answer to Courayer on the English Ordinations, and published an edition of the works of Johannes Damascenus. His other publications are, 'Panoplia contra Schisma Græcorum;' and 'Oriens Christianus in Africa.' Died 12 March, 1733.

QUILLET, Claude, a French writer, born at Chinon (Touraine) 1602. He practised physic for some years; but his career was changed by his interference with the affair of the nuns of Loudun, who were said to be possessed of the devil. He ridiculed the measures pursued there by the intrigues of Richelieu, and in consequence fled to Rome, where he took holy orders and became secretary to Marshal d'Estrées, the French ambassador. He returned to France with that minister after the death of Richelieu, and in 1655 published at Leyden, under the name of Calvidius Lætus, his well-known poem 'Callipædia,' on the art of having fine children, which has been translated into English by Rowe. Cardinal Mazarin nominated the author to the abbey of Doudeauville, in the diocese of Boulogne. Died at Paris 1661.

QUIN, JAMES, a celebrated actor, born in Covent Garden, 24 Feb., 1693. He received his education at Dublin, where his father, who was a barrister, died in 1710. Being thus deprived of support, Quin went upon the stage, and after performing one season in Dublin repaired to London, where he performed inferior parts at Drury Lane, and next at Lincoln's Inn Fields, till, by a casual appearance in Tamerlane, his merit was appreciated, and he became the first tragedian of his day. His prospects, however, had like to have been cut off by the misfortune of killing another performer in a duel. In 1741 he removed to Dublin, and on his return found the public wholly occupied by the merits of Garrick. In 1746 these two great actors performed together at Covent Garden in the 'Fair Penitent,' soon after which Quin retired on a competency to Bath; but in 1749 he performed the part of Coriolanus, in Thomson's posthumous tragedy, on which occasion he spoke an affecting prologue. Quin and Thomson had lived on terms of friendship, the beginning of which was highly honourable to the player, who, without knowing Thomson except as a poet, released him from a spunging-house. About this time he was employed in the instruction of George III.; and when he heard how well the king delivered his first speech to Parliament, he exclaimed, 'I taught the boy!' Quin died at Bath 21 Jan., 1766.

QUINAULT, PHILIPPE, a dramatic poet, born at Paris 3 June, 1635. He wrote operas, which, being popular, excited the envy of Boileau, who attacked Quinault with unceasing asperity. He, however, enjoyed a pension, and was much esteemed for his virtues. Died 26 Nov., 1688. His works were printed 1739, in 5 vols.

QUINAULT DUFRESNE, ABRAHAM ALEXIS, a French tragic actor, born 1693; died 12 Feb., 1741.

QUINTANA, MANUEL JOSÉ, a Spanish poet and patriot, born at Madrid 1772; died there 11 March, 1857.

QUINCTILIANUS, MARCUS FABIUS, a celebrated rhetorician, was born at Rome A.D. 42, though some have supposed that he was a native of Spain, from the circumstance that he taught rhetoric in the city of Calagurra during the governorship of Galba. On the death of Nero he returned to Rome, where he professed eloquence many years. In the reign of Domitian, whom he flattered, he obtained leave to retire into private life, when he employed his leisure in composing his 'Institutio Oratoria.' Two other works, of dubious authority, pass under his name—'Declamationes,' and a dialogue 'De Oratoribus.' This last is also ascribed to Tacitus. Quinctilian, by his first wife, had two sons, one of whom died at the age of five, and the other, who was a child of extraordinary talents, at ten. His second wife brought him a daughter, who was portioned in marriage by the younger Pliny, out of respect to her father under whom he had studied. Quinctilian lived to the age of fourscore.

QUINTUS CALABER. See CALABER.

QUIRINI, ANGELO MARIA, a cardinal, born at Venice 16 March, 1680. He became a Benedictine at Florence, where Magliabecchi took great delight in his company. In 1710 Quirini visited England, and while here formed an acquaintance with Newton, Bentley, and other eminent men. Benedict XIII. raised him to the purple, which he adorned by his talents and virtues. Died 9 Jan., 1755. His works are, Primordia Corcyræ; Lives of the Bishops of Brescia; 'Specimen variæ Literaturæ, quæ in urbe Brixiæ, ejusque ditione, paulo post incunabula Typographiæ florebat;' Account of his Travels; The Letters of Cardinal Pole; and an edition of Ephrem Syrus.

QUITA, DOMINGOS DOS REIS, a Portuguese poet, born 6 Jan., 1728; died 1770.

R.

RABAUD DE SAINTE ÉTIENNE, JEAN PAUL, a Protestant minister, born at Nîmes April, 1743. In the Constituent Assembly he showed eloquence and address, and though deluded by the factious spirit of the times, he resumed his moderation in the Convention, and spoke with boldness against the punishment of Louis XVI. These sentiments marked him for death; and though he escaped to Bordeaux, he was seized and taken back to Paris, where he was guillotined 5 Dec., 1793. He wrote 'Letters on the Primitive History of Greece,' &c.

RABELAIS, FRANÇOIS, a celebrated wit, born at Chinon, in Touraine, about 1483. He was at first a monk, but quitted the order to study physic at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree, and practised with such reputation that the university deputed him to go to Paris to obtain a restitution of their privileges, in which he succeeded. While at Montpellier he read lectures upon Hippocrates and Galen; but about 1532 he removed to Lyons, where he became physician to the hospital. In 1534 he accompanied John du Bellay to Rome, and there received the papal permission to hold ecclesiastical preferment; in consequence of which he was made a secular canon of the Abbey of St. Maur. He also held the cure of Meudon, where he died 1553. He wrote several books; but the only one by which he is known is the romance called 'The Lives, Heroic Deeds, and Sayings of Gargantua and Pantagruel,' an extravagant satire upon monks, priest, popes, and pedants.

RACAN, HONORAT DE RUEIL, Marquis DE, a French poet, and one of the first members of the Academy, born at Roche-Racan, in Touraine, 1589; died Feb., 1670.

RACHEL (ELIZA RACHEL FÉLIX), a French actress, born at Munf, Switzerland, 28 Feb., 1820. She was the daughter of a poor Jewish pedler, and passed a miserable childhood. After singing in the cafés of Lyons she was taken to Paris, where she entered the Conservatoire, and made her début at the Gymnase in 1837. At first she attracted no particular notice; but she studied assiduously under Samson, an actor and author of great experience, and on 7 Sept., 1838, startled the Parisian public by a personation of Camille in 'Les Horaces,' at the Théâtre Français, so full of originality and tragic intensity as almost to obliterate the traditions of former actresses in the same part.

Thenceforth she stood alone on the French stage, confessedly the first actress of the day, and never probably, rivalled in her peculiar walk of tragedy. She played with marvellous perfection the principal parts in the tragedies of Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, which were revived for the special purpose of displaying her abilities as a tragédienne. Madlle. Rachel excelled in the delineation of the fiercer passions; but jealousy and hatred were so subtly interpreted that the mind was even less affected by what she expressed than by what she left to the imagination. In 1855 she visited the United States, where she achieved fresh triumphs, in the midst of which she was stricken down by consumption. After a brief sojourn in Egypt she returned to France, and died at Cannet, near Toulon, 3 Jan., 1858.

RACINE, JEAN, a French dramatic poet, born at La Ferté-Milon 21 Dec., 1639. He was educated at Port Royal, on leaving which seminary he went to Paris, and in 1660 wrote an ode on the marriage of the king, for which he received a pension. He now commenced dramatic writer, and in 1666 published his tragedy of 'Alexandra.' The same year he engaged in a controversy with Nicole on the subject of theatrical representations, which that author condemned as injurious to religion. Racine had also to encounter the attacks of envy, and one Pradon was set up as his rival. These attempts, however, failed, and he produced several tragedies, which placed him on a level with Corneille. In 1673 he was admitted into the Academy, and in 1677 nominated with Boileau to write the history of Louis XIV.; but the work was never executed. From scruples of conscience he quitted the theatre, till Madame de Maintenon prevailed upon him to write the sacred drama of 'Esther,' which was performed by the young ladies of St. Cyr, and also at Versailles. This was followed by the tragedy of 'Athaliah,' which, though the better piece, met with a cold reception. Racine now renounced poetry entirely, and spent the latter part of his life in writing the history of the house of Port Royal. His death was remarkable; for, having drawn up a memorial on the distresses of the people, Madame de Maintenon showed it to the king, who was so displeased, that the poet took to his bed, and died 22 April, 1699. His son, Louis, was an abbé, and obtained a place in the finances. He died 29 Jan., 1763, aged 71. He wrote Reflections on Poetry; the Life of his Father; Odes;' 'Epistles;' and a translation of Milton's Paradise Lost; also Dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions, of which he was a member.

RADCLIFFE, ANN, a novelist, born in London 9 July, 1764. Her maiden name was Ward, and at the age of 23 she married Mr. William Radcliffe, a graduate of Oxford and a student in one of the Inns of court. Her first performance was a romantic tale entitled 'The Castles of Athlin and Dunblaine,' which was succeeded by 'The Sicilian Romance,' and 'The Romance of the Forest.' These were followed by her 'Mysteries of Udolpho.' Her last work in this department of literature was her romance of 'The Italians.' She also published 'Travels through Holland and along the Rhine,' &c. Mrs. Radcliffe had great skill in describing scenes of terror and the force of the passions. Died 9 Jan., 1823.

RADCLIFFE, JOHN, M.D., was born at Wakefield, Yorkshire, 1650. He was educated at the school of his native town, and next at University College, Oxford, whence he removed to a fellowship in Lincoln College, where he took his degree of M.B. 1675. He now commenced practice at Oxford; but in 1677 he resigned his fellowship, and in 1682, on proceeding to his doctor's degree, came to London, where he became the first physician of his time, and acquired an immense fortune. He attended King William, Queen Mary, and Queen Anne, but gave great offence to them all by the roughness of his manners. In 1713 he was elected into Parliament for Buckingham; but, on the death of the queen the next year, his life was threatened for not attending her when called to do so by an order of council. This hastened his death on 1 Nov., 1714. His remains were interred in St. Mary's church, Oxford, to which university he was a liberal benefactor, being the founder of the Library and Infirmary which bear his name.

RADEMACKER, GERARD, a Dutch painter, born 1673 at Amsterdam, where he died 1711. His brother, Gerard Rademacker (b. 1675; d. 1735), attained a high rank as a landscape painter and engraver.

RADETZKY, JOSEPH WENTZEL, COUNT, an Austrian general, born at Trzebnitz, Bohemia, 2 Nov., 1766. He distinguished himself in the wars against France; became commander-in-chief of the Austrian army in Italy 1831; and received the bâton of field-marshal 1836. Surprised in 1848 by the Lombard insurrection, he was first driven out of Milan and defeated at Goito; but, in spite of his great age, he lost no time in taking his revenge, for on 23 March, 1849, he gained a decisive victory over Charles Albert at Novara, thus placing Lombardy once more under the domination of Austria. Soon afterwards Radetzky bombarded and recaptured Venice. Died at Milan 5 Jan., 1858.

RADOWITZ, JOSEPH JOHN, a Prussian general and statesman, born at Blankenburg 6 Feb., 1796; died at Berlin 25 Dec., 1853.

RAEBURN, Sir HENRY, a painter, born at Stockbridge, near Edinburgh, 4 March, 1756. He lost his parents at an early age, but was carefully brought up by his elder brother, who placed him as an apprentice to a goldsmith. In this situation he began to paint miniatures, which were much admired. He next, with the consent of his master, applied himself to oil-painting on a large scale, which he continued to follow for the rest of his life. Ambitious of improvement, soon after the expiration of his apprenticeship he repaired to London, and waited on Sir Joshua Reynolds, who gave him every encouragement, and advised him to visit Italy. He did so, and spent two years in that country, assiduously employed in studying the works of the great masters. On his return (1787) he fixed his residence in Edinburgh, where he soon came into full employment as a portrait painter, nor did he ever attempt any other branch of art. He became a member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, of the Imperial Academy of Florence, and of the Royal Academy of London. He also received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed the king's portrait painter for Scotland just before his death, which occurred at Edinburgh 8 July, 1823.

RAFFLES, THOMAS, D.D., LL.D., was born 17 May, 1788, in London, where his father was a solicitor. At an early age he entered the old College at Homerton, near London, and on the completion of his studies in 1809 was appointed minister of the Independent chapel at Hammersmith. This position he occupied for three years, at the end of which he removed to Liverpool, and officiated in Great George Street Chapel from that time until 1861, when he resigned his pastoral office. Dr. Raffles enjoyed a high reputation as a pulpit orator. Among his works is a volume of Poems, published in connection with his brother-in-law, the late Dr. J. H. Brown, barrister-at-law, and J. H. Wiffen, the translator of Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered.' This was followed by a 'Memoir' of the life and ministry of his predecessor, the Rev. Thomas Spencer. In 1817 appeared his 'Letters during a Tour through some part of France, Savoy, Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands,' in a volume dedicated to his distinguished cousin, Sir Stamford Raffles, in whose company the tour was made. He also published two volumes of lectures on religious subjects, and a great variety of sermons. Dr. Raffles was LL.D. of the University of Aberdeen, and D.D. of Union College, Schenectady, U.S. Died 18 Aug., 1863.

RAFFLES, Sir THOMAS STAMFORD, was born at sea, off Jamaica, 6 July, 1781. He became a clerk in the India House, whence in 1805 he was sent out as assistant-secretary to the new government of Pulo Penang, now Prince of Wales's Island. Having acquired a knowledge of Malay, he was appointed translator to the Government, to which, in 1807, were added the offices of principal secretary to the colony, and registrar of the new court of judicature; but illness compelled him in the following year to retire to Malacca. Returning to Penang as agent to the governor-general, he was sent for by Lord Minto to Calcutta; and his lordship, by the advice of Mr. Raffles, having captured the island of Java, appointed him lieutenant-governor of the place. He resigned this post 1816; and in the following year appeared his 'History of Java,' in 2 vols. Soon afterwards he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed to the residency of Bencoolen, in Sumatra, and to the lieutenant-governorship of Fort Marlborough (1818). He contributed greatly towards carrying into effect the abolition of slavery in that settlement, and also distinguished himself by his political arrangements with the Dutch commissioners in the interest of the Sultan of Palembang, and by the occupation of the island of Singapore. On his last visit to the island, in 1823, he laid the foundation of a literary institution, consisting of a college for the encouragement of Anglo-Chinese literature, with a library, museum, branch schools, &c., and a grant of 500 acres of uncleared ground for its support; but in 1824 the impaired state of his constitution induced him to return to England, where he founded the Zoological Society, of which he was the first president. Died 5 July, 1826.

RAGLAN, FITZROY JAMES HENRY SOMERSET, LORD, an English general, born 30 Sept., 1788, was the eighth son of Henry, the fifth duke of Beaufort, by Elizabeth, daughter of Admiral Boscawen. He was educated at Westminster School, and at the age of sixteen, being then known as Lord Fitzroy Somerset, he entered the 4th Regiment of Dragoons as ensign. In 1807 he was attached to Sir Arthur Paget's embassy to Turkey; and in the same year he was first associated with the duke of Wellington, who selected him to serve on his staff on the expedition to Copenhagen. This connection was continued in the Peninsula, where Sir Arthur Wellesley appointed him one of his aides-de-camp and military secretary. At the siege of Badajoz his personal gallantry was particularly distinguished, for he was among the first to mount the breech at the storming of that fortress, and it was to him that the governor delivered up his sword. He was slightly wounded at the battle of Busaco. At Waterloo he lost his right arm. For these services he was made aide-de-camp to the Prince Regent (giving the rank of colonel in the army) and knight-commander of the Bath. He was secretary to the embassy at Paris for a short period in 1814, and was minister-plenipotentiary there Jan.–March, 1815. His lordship was again secretary of embassy at Paris 1816–19. He accompanied Wellington to Verona, when the duke went as plenipotentiary to the congress at those places, and in 1826 proceeded with him to St. Petersburg, when he was sent to congratulate the Emperor Nicholas on his accession to the throne. In 1823 Lord Fitzroy Somerset went on a special mission to Madrid, without, however, any diplomatic character. He was appointed, in 1819, secretary to the duke of Wellington as master-general of the ordnance, which situation he held till 1827, and in August of that year he was made military secretary to the commander-in-chief, the functions of which office he performed till 1852. During two Parliaments, those of 1818 and 1826, he represented Truro in the House of Commons, where he acted with the moderate Tories. After the death of the duke of Wellington he was made master-general of the ordnance, and elevated to the House of Peers under the title of Baron Raglan (1852). On the breaking-out of the war with Russia, Lord Raglan was appointed to command in chief the British army, and promoted to the rank of field-marshal. In March, 1854, he left England, reached the Crimea in September, and on the 20th of that month fought, in conjunction with Marshal St. Arnaud, the battle of the Alma. During the following winter the allied troops perished in large numbers in the trenches before Sebastopol; and Lord Raglan's anxiety in regard to the condition of the men and the attacks of the English newspapers upon his military movements weighed heavily upon his spirits. In this state of mind he was seized with the cholera, which carried him off 28 June, 1855.

RAIKES, ROBERT, was born at Gloucester 1735. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards succeeded his father in the printing business, which he carried on with credit and advantage. In 1781 he planned the institution of Sunday-schools, in conjunction with the Rev. Mr. Stock. Died 5 April, 1811.

RAIMBACH, ABRAHAM, an English engraver, of Swiss extraction, born in London 1776; died 17 Jan., 1843. He was the friend of Wilkie, most of whose works he engraved in a masterly manner.

RAIMONDI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an orientalist, born at Cremona about 1540, spent several years in Asia, where he acquired a thorough knowledge of Arabic, Armenian, Syriac, and Hebrew. On returning to Italy he was employed by Cardinal Ferdinand de' Medici to superintend an extensive establishment for printing oriental works, which

r may be regarded as the cradle of the celebrated press of the Propaganda. He was engaged for some time in the preparation of a Polyglot Bible, and was the author of an Arabic Grammar (1610).
The date of his decease is not recorded.

RAIMONDI, MARC ANTONIO, a celebrated engraver of Bologna, who, after having distinguished himself in goldsmith's work, went to Venice, and seeing Albert Durer's prints there, was so charmed with them that he determined to devote himself wholly to engraving. He began by imitating some of the above-mentioned prints so exactly as to deceive the eye; but Albert Durer, seeing one of the counterfeited engravings in Brabant, went to Venice, and, complaining to the Republic, obtained an order that Raimondi's plates should no longer bear the name of Albert. Raimondi afterwards engraved from Raffaelle, Giulio Romano, and Baccio Bandinelli, and had many celebrated pupils, but was reduced almost to beggary when Rome was taken in 1527. Pope Clement VII., whose displeasure he had incurred by engraving the infamous figures in Aretine's book, was afterwards very kind to him. He died about 1534.

RAINBOW, EDWARD, an English prelate, born at Bliton, Lincolnshire, 20 April, 1608, and educated at Westminster School and at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1642 he was elected president of that society, but was deprived in 1650. At the Restoration he recovered his place, and was made dean of Peterborough. In 1664 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle, where he died 26 March, 1684.

RAINE, MATTHEW, D.D., an eminent teacher, born 20 May, 1760, was educated first under his father, a clergyman, at Hackforth, Yorkshire, and next at the Charterhouse, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1791 he was appointed master of the Charterhouse School, and in 1809 elected preacher of Gray's Inn. Died 17 Sept., 1810.

RAINOLDS, or REYNOLDS, JOHN, D.D., was born at Pinho, Devonshire, 1549. He became a scholar and fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he read lectures on Aristotle. In 1586 he was appointed reader of the theological lecture founded by Sir Francis Walsingham. In 1593 he was made dean of Lincoln, which preferment he resigned on being chosen president of his college. He was regarded as the leader of the Puritan party, and distinguished himself greatly at the Hampton Court conference in 1603, where he suggested the necessity of a new translation of the Bible, in which work he was afterwards engaged. Died 21 May, 1607.

RAINOLDS, or REYNOLDS, WILLIAM, brother of John Rainolds, mentioned above, was a native of Pinho, near Exeter, and after being instructed in the classics at Winchester School was sent to New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. The study of the writings of Bishop Jewell led him to doubt the truth of Protestantism, and leaving England, he went on to Rome (1575), where he made a public recantation of the Reformed religion. Soon afterwards returning to Douay and Rheims, he was made professor of divinity and of the Hebrew language; and, besides publishing several controversial works, was a great assistant to Gregory Martin in the translation of the Rheims Testament. Having spent some years in these employments, he left Rheims and was made pastor of the Beguin nuns at Antwerp, where he died 24 Aug., 1594.

RALEGH, or RALEIGH, Sir WALTER, was born at Budley, Devonshire, 1552. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, after which he engaged in an enterprise for the assistance of the French Protestants. He next served in the Netherlands, and in 1579 accompanied his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, on a voyage to America. On his return he distinguished himself against the Irish rebels, and was joined in a commission for the government of Munster. His introduction at court was by an act of gallantry. Queen Elizabeth, walking out one day, stopped at a miry place, upon which Ralegh took off his cloak, and spread it on the ground, so that her majesty passed on clean and dry. In 1584 he obtained letters patent for discovering unknown countries, by virtue of which he took possession of that part of America which was afterwards called, in honour of Elizabeth, Virginia. Soon after this he received the honour of knighthood, was elected into Parliament for Devonshire, made warden of the Stannaries, and also rewarded with several grants of land in England and Ireland. In 1588 he bore an active part in the destruction of the Spanish Armada; and the year following he accompanied the king of Portugal to his dominions, for which the queen gave him a gold chain. On his return he landed in Ireland, where he visited Spenser, the poet, whom he brought to England and introduced to her majesty. In 1592 he commanded an expedition against Panama. Soon after this he fell under the royal displeasure on account of an illicit amour with the daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, though Ralegh acted honourably in marrying the lady. In 1595 he engaged in an enterprise for the conquest of Guiana, where he took the city of San Joseph. The year following he displayed great valour in the expedition against Cadiz; and he was also appointed to a command in the armament sent out to intercept the Spanish plate fleet, which he would have captured had he not been thwarted by the earl of Essex. The ruin of that unfortunate nobleman was hastened by Ralegh, who little thought that he was thereby preparing the way for his own destruction. On the accession of James he was deprived of his preferments, and brought to trial at Winchester for conspiring with Lord Cobham and others to place Arabella Stuart on the throne. Ralegh was condemned; but the sentence was respited, and he lay twelve years in the Tower, where he wrote 'The History of the World,' published in folio in 1614. Two years after this he was released and entrusted with a squadron destined against Guiana; but the enterprise failed after an attack on the town of St. Thome, where Sir Walter's eldest son was killed. When Ralegh landed in England he was arrested and sent to the Tower, whence he endeavoured to make his escape, but was taken, and received sentence of death, which was carried into execution in Old Palace Yard 29 Oct., 1618. The works of this great man are numerous, and on a variety of subjects. His poems have been reprinted, and Dr. Birch published a collection of his tracts, in 2 vols. 8vo., 1748. The best edition of his 'History' is that of Oldys, 1736, 2 vols. folio. To Ralegh we are indebted for tobacco and the potato, which last he planted in Ireland on his return from America.

RALPH, JAMES, is supposed to have been a native of Philadelphia, where he abandoned his wife and family in 1725, and came to England. In 1728 he published a poem called 'Night,' which procured him a place in Pope's 'Dunciad.' He afterwards produced some dramatic pieces with little success. At length he turned political writer, and in 1742 printed an answer to the duchess of Marlborough's Memoirs, which brought him into notice, and he was much employed by the party connected with the prince of Wales. His principal works were the 'Use and Abuse of Parliaments,' and a 'History of England during the Reigns of Charles II., James II., and William III.' His last publication was entitled 'The Case of Authors by profession.' On the accession of George III. he obtained a pension. He died at Chiswick 24 Jan., 1762.

RAMBOUILLET, CARDINAL DE. See ANGENNES.

RAMEAU, JEAN PHILIPPE, a French musical composer, born at Dijon 1683; died 12 Sept., 1764.

RAMLER, KARL WILHELM, a German poet, born at Kolberg 1725; died 1798.

RAMMOHUN ROY (Rajah), a Hindoo of the Brahmin caste, was born 1774 in the district of Burdwan, in the province of Bengal, and educated at Patna, where he studied Arabic, and at Benares, where he made considerable progress in Sanscrit. He afterwards obtained a knowledge of English; and in 1830 he was sent to this country by the king of Delhi, as his ambassador, for the purpose of obtaining from the East India Company an augmentation of the annual stipend which they had assigned to that prince. In this mission he was successful, and he was received at court with great distinction by William IV. Previous to his departure from India he was honoured by the Great Mogul with the title of rajah. Though he professed the Christian faith, and, while in England, attended the service of the Established Church, he is known to have entertained Unitarian principles. He acquired a knowledge of Hebrew to enable him to read the Old Testament in the original; and he published some religious and political tracts in English, as well as some English translations of Indian works, and especially of the principal books of the Vedas. He died at Stapleton Park, near Bristol, 27 Sept., 1833.

RAMSAY. See DALHOUSIE, marquis of.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, a Scotch poet, born at Leadhills 13 Oct., 1685. He served his apprenticeship to a wig-maker; but on the expiration of his time he became a bookseller at Edinburgh, where, in 1721, he published a quarto volume of his poems, which being well received, encouraged him to print another in 1728. The principal piece in the last collection is the pastoral comedy called 'The Gentle Shepherd.' In 1724 he published a miscellaneous selection of Scotch poetry, under the title of 'The Evergreen,' in which were inserted two pieces of his own, written after the ancient manner. Died 7 Jan., 1758.

RAMSAY, ALLAN, a portrait painter, son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh 1709. He studied at Rome, and on his return settled at Edinburgh, where he established a literary society; but after residing there some years he removed to London, and was appointed painter to the king. At the close of life he went to Italy, and died, on landing at Dover, 10 Aug., 1784. Mr. Ramsay wrote 'The Present State of the Arts in England,' and a volume of essays called 'The Investigator.'

RAMSAY, ANDREW MICHAEL, commonly called Chevalier Ramsay, was born at Ayr, in Scotland, 9 June, 1686. He was educated at Edinburgh, after which he went to Leyden, where he became acquainted with Poiret, who introduced him to Fénélon. At this time Ramsay was a sceptic; but the good prelate made a convert of him to the Catholic religion, and procured him the appointment of tutor to the duke de Château Thierry and the prince de Turenne. He was also made a knight of the order of St. Lazarus. After this he went to Rome, to educate the children of the Chevalier St. George, commonly called the Pretender, but soon quitted that situation, and returned to Scotland, where he resided in the family of the duke of Argyle. In 1730 the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of laws. He died in France 6 May, 1743. His principal works are, 'Discours sur le Poëme Epique,' prefixed to Telemachus; 'La vie de M. Fénélon;' 'Essai sur le Gouvernement Civil;' 'Les Voyages de Cyrus;' 'L'Histoire de M. de Turenne;' 'Philosophical Principles of Religion.'

RAMSAY, CHARLES ALOYSIUS, a Scotch writer, lived at the close of the seventeenth century. He studied chemistry and medicine, and translated into Latin a treatise of Kunckel 'De principiis chymicis,' 8vo., London, 1678; but is chiefly known by a treatise on Shorthand, first published 1678, and reprinted several times. The edition of 1683 was printed at Paris in 8vo., and is in Latin and French. The French title is as follows: 'Tacheographie, ou l'art d'écrire aussi vîte qu'on parle. Renfermé sous tres-peu de preceptes; le tout enseigné par une méthode briéve & fort intelligible, expliquée par plusieurs exemples.' Prefixed is a very long dedication to Louis XIV. The system of Ramsay is almost identical with that invented by Jeremiah Rich.

RAMSAY, WILLIAM, an English scholar, was born 1806, being the youngest son of Sir William Ramsay, bart. He was educated first at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow, at which latter place he was a professor of mathematics from 1829 to 1831. He became a member of Trinity College, Cambridge, about 1828, and graduated B.A. 1831. Immediately afterwards he was promoted from the mathematical professorship at Glasgow to the chair of Literæ Humaniores in the same university. Died 12 Feb., 1865. He contributed extensively to the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography,' and the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities,' edited by Dr. William Smith; published 'Selections from Ovid and Tibullus;' 'Manual of Roman Antiquities;' 'Speech of Cicero for Aulus Cluentius;' 'Manual of Latin Prosody.'

RAMSBOTHAM, FRANCIS HENRY, M.D., a physician, born in or about 1801, graduated M.D. at Edinburgh 1822. He became a member of the Royal College of Physicians, London, 1826, and a fellow in 1844. Dr. Ramsbotham was for many years consulting obstetric physician and lecturer on midwifery at the London Hospital. He also held the appointment of physician to the Royal Maternity Charity, and the Tower Hamlets Dispensary. At one time he resided in New Broad Street, City, where he enjoyed a considerable practice; but a few years before his death failing health compelled him to relinquish it. Thereupon he retired to Woodend, a small village near Perth, where he died 7 July, 1868, aged 67. Dr. Rams-

Botham was author of 'Principles of Obstetric Medicine and Surgery,' and 'Lectures on Midwifery'—works of standard authority and acknowledged merit.

RAMSDEN, JESSE, F.R.S., an optician, born at Halifax, Yorkshire, 1735, became a mathematical instrument maker in Piccadilly, and married the daughter of Mr. Dollond the optician. Among other discoveries made by him was one for an accurate division of instruments, which procured him a premium from the Board of Longitude. He died at Brighton, 5 Nov., 1800.

RAMUS, PETER, in French, Pierre de la Ramée, philosopher, born in Vermandois, in Picardy, 1515. He obtained the place of servant in the College of Navarre, where he devoted his leisure hours to study, and made such progress as to be admitted to his master's degree. Having ventured to attack the doctrine of Aristotle, he was interdicted from teaching philosophy; but this judgment was reversed by Henry II., and in 1551 he was made professor of eloquence. He now distinguished himself by his zeal for a reform in the pronunciation of Latin; and though opposed by the Sorbonnists, he gained the victory. Having asserted his liberty in these points, he next turned Protestant: but as this change could not be long concealed, he was obliged to leave Paris; to which city he returned in 1571, and lost his life in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the following year. He published some works on mathematics, philosophy, and logic.

RAMUSIO, GIAMBATTISTA, an Italian writer, born at Treviso (Venice), 1485. He became secretary to the Council of Ten, and was often employed in public embassies. He died at Padua 10 July, 1557. He compiled a valuable work, entitled 'Raccoltà delle Navigazioni e de' Viaggi,' 3 vols.

RANCÉ, DOM ARMAND JEAN LE BOUTHILLIER, the reformer of La Trappe, was born 9 Jan., 1626, at Paris. At the age of thirteen he published an edition of Anacreon, which he dedicated to his godfather, Cardinal Richelieu. He obtained several benefices before he was in orders, and might have been to the most elevated stations in the church had he not taken the resolution of retiring from the world. Two reasons are assigned for this; one, that on paying a visit to a favourite lady, he found her a corpse; but the other, and the more probable, is, that having a narrow escape from being killed by a musket-ball, he determined to devote his whole life to religious exercises. Accordingly, he assumed the monastic habit 1664, and afterwards took possession of the abbey of La Trappe, reformed it, and introduced that regularity which has made it the admiration of the whole civilized world. Here he died 26 Oct., 1700, leaving several ascetical works, and 'Accounts of the Lives and Deaths of some Monks of La Trappe.'

RANDOLPH, SIR THOMAS, was born in Kent 1523, educated at Christ Church, Oxford, and terminated principal of Broadgate Hall in that University 1549. After the accession of Elizabeth he was sent ambassador to Scotland, France, and Russia; and made chamberlain of the exchequer and master of the posts. Died 8 June, 1590. Some of his letters are in print.

RANDOLPH, THOMAS, a poet, born at Badby, Northamptonshire, 1605, and educated at Westminster School, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge. He became one of the adopted sons of Ben Jonson; but shortened his life by the irregularity of his conduct, and died 17 March, 1634–5. He wrote five plays, which were published with his poems 1638. 'The Muse's Looking Glass' is the best of his dramatic works.

RANDOLPH, THOMAS, D.D., was born 30 Aug., 1701, at Canterbury, of which city his father was recorder. He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. Archbishop Potter presented him to the vicarages of Perham and Waltham, in Kent, to which was afterwards added the rectory of Saltwood. In 1748 he was elected president of Corpus Christi College; in 1768 he was made archdeacon of Oxford; and the next year appointed Margaret professor of divinity. Died 24 March, 1783. Dr. Randolph composed several works in defence of the Christian religion. The most valuable were published under the title of 'A View of our Blessed Saviour's Ministry,' 2 vols., 1784. His son, John Randolph, D.D., born 1749, became in succession bishop of Oxford (1799), Bangor (1807), and London (1809), and died 28 July, 1813.

RANTZAU, JOSIAS, Comte DE, marshal of France, was born of a noble family in Holstein. He served first in the Swedish army, but on visiting France with Chancellor Oxenstiern, he was made field-marshal by Louis XIII. At the siege of Dole (1636) he lost an eye; he afterwards lost an arm and a leg, and one of his ears. In 1645, having abjured the Protestant religion, he was made marshal of France. He served in Flanders, but becoming suspected by Cardinal Mazarin, he was sent to the Bastille for eleven months. Died 1650.

RAPHAEL, or RAFFAELLO SANZIO, was born at Urbino 28 March, 1483. He was the only son of Giovanni Sanzio, a painter, who placed him, at the age of thirteen, under Peter Perugino. Three years afterwards, he went with Pinturicchio to Siena, to assist him in painting the history of Pius II., for the cathedral there; but Raphael soon left that work to visit Florence, where he improved his style by studying the designs of da Vinci and Michael Angelo. His favourite artist, however, was Fra Bartolomeo, from whom he received instructions. In 1508 Raphael was invited to Rome by Julius II., who employed him to paint the 'School of Athens,' in the Vatican. In performing this commission, he gave such satisfaction that the Pope ordered all the pictures already painted in the various rooms to be obliterated, and the walls prepared for the productions of Raphael alone, who, with difficulty, succeeded in saving from destruction a ceiling painted by his old master, Perugino. The first of these rooms is dedicated to the history of Constantine; the second exhibits four miracles; the third is filled with allegorical representations of Science; and the fourth is devoted to the histories of Leo III. and IV. Raphael also enjoyed the favour of Leo X., for whom he made a series of cartoons from the sacred history; seven of which are in the possession of the queen of England. To his other talents he added that of being an able architect; the principles of which science he studied under Bramante, who recommended him for his successor in conducting the great work of St. Peter's; the general plan of which, as it now stands, was designed by Raphael. He likewise constructed a number of magnificent buildings, particularly the Caffarelli palace at Rome. This great artist was, besides, ambitious of being a sculptor, and a statue of Jonah still exists in the church of St. Maria del Popolo, as a specimen of his extraordinary powers. His death, which happened 7 April, 1520, was occasioned by excessive bleeding, when his frame was already weakened by a violent fever.

RAPHELENGIUS, Francis, was born 27 Feb., 1539, at Lanoy, in French Flanders. He studied at Paris; after which he came to England, and taught Greek at Cambridge. On his return to the Netherlands, he married a daughter of Plantin, the printer, at Antwerp, whom he assisted as corrector of the press; but in 1585 he became professor of the oriental languages, at Leyden. Died 20 July, 1597. His works are, Remarks on the Chaldee Paraphrase; a Hebrew Grammar; a Chaldee Dictionary; and an Arabic Lexicon. His son published, Notes on the Tragedies of Seneca, and 'Elogia carmine elegiaco in imagines doctorum virorum.'—Athen. Cantab.

RAPIN, René or Renatus, a Jesuit, was born at Tours, 1621. He taught polite literature, with great reputation, in the colleges of his order; and died at Paris, 1687. He wrote, Latin Poems, published at Paris 1681, in 2 vols. The finest piece in this collection is that on Gardens, of which there are two English versions. His 'Critical Dissertations on Ancient Authors; poetry, philosophy, and history,' have also been translated into English.

RAPIN DE THOYRAS, Paul, an historian, was born, of Protestant parents, at Castres, in Languedoc, in 1661. His father, James, lord of Thoyras, was an advocate, to which profession Paul likewise was bred, but quitted it for that of arms. On the commencement of the persecution against the Protestants, he left France, and went to Holland, where he continued till the Revolution, when he followed William III. to England, and obtained a commission in his service. He was at the battle of the Boyne; and received a wound at the siege of Limerick, for which he was made a captain. In 1693 he was appointed tutor to the son of the earl of Portland. After travelling with his pupil through Germany and Italy, he fixed his residence at Wesel, and died there 16 May, 1725. He printed eight volumes of his History of England, down to the reign of Charles I.; and left the remainder in a state for publication, in two volumes more. Besides this work, of which there is a translation and continuation by Tyndal, he published a 'Dissertation on Whigs and Tories;' and an abridgment of 'Rymer's Fœdera.'

RAPP, le Comte Jean, a French general, born at Colmar 26 April, 1772, entered the army at the age of sixteen, and became aide-de-camp to General Desaix, whom he attended in the German and Egyptian campaigns. After the battle of Austerlitz, he was made general of division. In 1813 he long and ably defended Dantzic, which at last surrendered to the Russians, after two-thirds of the garrison had perished. He was made prisoner of war, and did not return to France till after the first restoration of the Bourbons, to whom he gave in his adhesion. During the Hundred Days he sided with Bonaparte, and held Strasburg after the battle of Waterloo. He returned to France 1817, and in the following year took his seat in the Chamber of Peers. Died 8 Nov., 1821.

RASK, Rasmus Christian, a comparative philologist, born 2 Nov., 1787, of poor parents, at Brendekilde, near Odense, in the island of Fünen, in the kingdom of Denmark. He studied at Copenhagen, passed several years in Iceland, and paid several visits to Sweden, Finland, and Russia, with a view to increasing his knowledge of languages. Aided by the rich MS. treasures in the library of Copenhagen, he acquired a profound knowledge of ancient Scandinavian literature. His 'Introduction to the Knowledge of the Icelandic, or ancient Norse Language,' 1811; his 'Anglo-Saxon Grammar, 1817; his 'Researches on the Origin of the Icelandic Language,' 1818; and the valuable materials he furnished to the works of others, especially Bjorn Haldorsen's 'Icelandic Dictionary,' attest his remarkable proficiency in this class of studies. He also turned his attention to the languages of the East, and in 1819 published a 'Sanscrit Grammar.' Soon afterwards he visited Persia, Bombay, and Ceylon, bringing back with him 113 rare manuscripts. Shortly after his return he was appointed professor of history at Copenhagen; and in 1829 professor of oriental languages and principal librarian of the university. Died 14 Nov., 1832.

RASORI, Giovanni, an Italian physician, born at Parma 1767; died 13 April, 1837.

RASTALL, John, a printer, was born in London, and educated at Oxford. He married the sister of Sir Thomas More; and has been called a lawyer, merely from the circumstance of his compiling law books. His principal work, however, is a chronicle, which was reprinted in 1811. Rastall, by engaging in a controversy with Frith, on the doctrine of Purgatory, became a convert to the Protestant religion. He died 1536; leaving two sons, William and John. The first became a justice of the Common Pleas, in the reign of Mary; but when Elizabeth came to the throne, he went to Louvain, and died there in 1565. His brother, John, remained in England, and was a justice of the peace. The book called Rastall's Entries belongs to the father, though it passes under the name of William.

RASTALL, John, an English Jesuit, known as the antagonist of Bishop Jewel, was educated at Winchester School, and at New College, Oxford; but leaving his country for conscience' sake, he was admitted into the Society of Jesus, together with his brother Edward, at Rome, in 1568. He became rector of the college of his order at Ingoldstadt, and died 1600. His works are 'A Confutation of a Sermon pronounced by Mr. Jewel at St. Paul's Cross,' Antwerp 1564; 'Copy of a Challenge taken out of the said Confutation,' Antwerp 1565; 'Reply against an answer falsely entitled "Defence of the Truth,"' Antwerp 1565; a treatise entitled 'Beware of Mr. Jewell,' Antwerp 1566; 'Brief View of the false Wares packed up in the nameless Apology of the Church of England,' Louvain 1567.

RATRAMNUS, or BERTRAM, a monk of Corby, in the ninth century, who wrote a treatise 'On the Body and Blood of Christ,' which at first appeared to favour the Protestant notions respecting the Real Presence. An English translation was published at Dublin 1753.

RAU, Karl Heinrich, a German writer, was professor of political economy at Heidelberg from 1822 till his death, which took place in that town 19 March, 1870, at the age of 78. His principal work was a 'Compendium of Political Economy.'

RAUCH, CHRISTIAN, a German sculptor, born at Arolsen, in the territory of Waldeck 2 Jan., 1777; died at Berlin 3 Dec., 1857. His greatest work is the colossal monument of Frederick the Great, erected between the university and the palace of the prince of Prussia.

RAVAILLAC, FRANÇOIS, was born at Angoulême 1578 or 1579, and took the habit of the Feuillants, a society from which, six weeks later, he was expelled for irregularity. The fanatical discourses of the advocates of the League so deranged his understanding, that he formed a most inveterate hatred against Henry IV. and determined to cut him off. Full of melancholy fury he went to Paris, and for some days followed the monarch to commit his horrid purpose. On 14 May, 1610, when the royal carriage was stopped in the street by some waggons, the murderer raised himself upon the wheels, and with two blows stabbed the monarch to the heart. He was seized by the duke of Epernon, and condemned to be torn to pieces by four horses. The dreadful sentence was executed the following 27th May, and he declared to the last that he had no accomplices.

RAVENET, SIMON FRANÇOIS, a French engraver, came to England about 1750, and was much employed by the booksellers. He also executed many large prints of historical subjects and portraits in an excellent style. Died 1774.

RAVENSCROFT, THOMAS, an English musician, who died about 1640. He was a bachelor of music, and published 'A brief Discourse of the true but neglected Use of characterizing the Degrees by their Perfection, Imperfection, and Diminution, in measurable Music,' 1614. He was also the composer of a collection of psalms, and of another of songs.

RAVIS, or RAVIUS, CHRISTIAN, an orientalist, born at Berlin 1613. After studying at Rostock, he came to England, and was patronized by Archbishop Usher, who sent him into the East to collect manuscripts. In 1643 he was appointed professor of the oriental languages at Utrecht; but afterwards he removed to Upsal, and next to Kiel, where he died 21 June, 1677. He left some learned works in Latin, on oriental and biblical literature.

RAWDON, FRANCIS, LORD. See HASTINGS, MARQUIS OF.

RAWLEY, WILLIAM, D.D., born at Norwich about 1588, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; after which he became chaplain and amanuensis to Lord Bacon, who procured for him the living of Landbeach, Cambridgeshire, and left him a legacy. Died 18 June, 1667. Dr. Rawley printed some of his patron's tracts, under the title of 'Resuscitatio;' and from his papers, Archbishop Tenison collected the 'Remains' of that great man, which he published with the title of 'Baconiana.'

RAWLINSON, CHRISTOPHER, was born at Clark Hall, the seat of his family, in Lancashire, 1677. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was distinguished by his knowledge of the Saxon language; and while there, published an edition of King Alfred's translation of 'Boethius de Consolatione Philosophiæ.' Died 8 Jan., 1733.

RAWLINSON, RICHARD, LL.D., F.S.A., the fourth son of Sir Thomas Rawlinson, was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, (LL.D. 1719). Dr. Rawlinson was so strongly attached to the family of Stuart, that he ordered the head of Layer, who had been executed for treason, to be buried with him. He published a translation of 'Fresnoy's Method of studying History,' 2 vols.; but his principal work is 'The English Topographer, or an Historical Account of all the Pieces that have been written relative to the Natural History or Topographical Description of England,' 8vo. He founded an Anglo-Saxon lecture at Oxford, to which university he was, in other respects, also a considerable benefactor. He died at Islington 6 April, 1755. The sale of his books, manuscripts, prints, and drawings, occupied sixty-eight days.

RAWLINSON, THOMAS, the eldest son of Sir Thomas Rawlinson, knt., lord-mayor of London, was bred to the law, and became so great a collector of books, that Addison characterised him in the Tatler under the name of 'Tom Folio.' While he lived in Gray's Inn, his library occupied four chambers, and he was obliged to sleep in the passage. He afterwards took London House, in Aldersgate Street, where he died 6 Aug., 1725, aged 44. His library was dispersed by auction, and the sale of the manuscripts alone took up sixteen days.

RAWSON, SIR WILLIAM, a celebrated oculist, who resided in Albemarle Street, London. He was knighted 1814, and died 4 Feb., 1827. His original name was Adams.

RAY, JOHN, F.R.S., a celebrated naturalist, was the son of a blacksmith, at Block Notley, in Essex, and born there 29 Nov., 1628. He was educated at the school of Braintree, and next at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, but removed from thence to Trinity College; and in 1649 obtained a fellowship. At the Restoration he was episcopally ordained; but lost his fellowship for refusing to sign the declaration against the solemn league and covenant. After this he devoted himself to the study of nature; and in 1663 accompanied Mr. Willoughby on a tour through Europe, of which journey he published an account in 1673. Mr. Ray was elected a fellow of the Royal Society in 1667; and the Transactions of that body afford ample proofs of his attention to science. In 1672 came out his 'Collection of English Proverbs;' previous to which he published his 'Catalogue of English Plants.' The death of Mr. Willoughby was much felt by Mr. Ray, who was appointed one of his executors, and entrusted with the education of his sons. Soon after this he married, and settled at his native place, where he completed his 'Methodus Plantarum Nova,' 1682; the 'Historia Plantarum,' 3 vols.; and the 'Synopsis Methodica Stirpium.' He also printed Mr. Willoughby's History of Birds; and that of Fishes. His next publication was entitled 'The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation,' which passed through several editions. This was followed by 'Three Discourses concerning the Chaos, Deluge, and Dissolution of the World.' To these pieces succeeded his 'Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum;' and in 1693 his 'Sylloge Stirpium Europearum extra Britanniam.' His last undertaking was a History of the British Insects, which he did not live to complete; but his notes, as also his letters, were published after his death, which event happened at Black Notley 17 Jan., 1705.

RAYMOND, ROBERT, LORD, an eminent judge, was the son of Sir Thomas Raymond, one of the justices of the King's Bench, and author of 'Reports.' The subject of this article became solicitor-general in the reign of Queen Anne, and attorney-general in that of George I.; who appointed him one of the commissioners of the great seal, and afterwards chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1730 he was created Baron Raymond. Died 1732. His Reports have been published in 2 vols. folio, and 3 vols. 8vo.; and his 'Rubrics' in 1 vol., folio.

RAYNAL, Guillaume Thomas François, a French philosopher, born at Saint-Geniez (Aveyron) 11 March, 1713. He became a Jesuit, but was expelled the society for his irreligious sentiments, 1748. He then associated himself with Voltaire, D'Alembert, and Diderot, who employed him in the theological department of the Encyclopédie. Raynal, however, committed the execution of those articles to an abbé, to whom he paid only twenty-five louis d'ors for writing them, while he received himself six times the sum. The cheat being discovered, Raynal was compelled to refund what he had fraudulently withheld. He now published several works at Paris, the principal of which was his 'Political and Philosophical History of the European Settlements in the East and West Indies.' This was followed by an essay on the 'Revolution of America,' written in a style of declamation, and full of enmity to the English. In 1791 the Abbé Raynal addressed a letter to the constituent assembly, which greatly irritated the revolutionists; but he escaped the general massacre in the reign of terror; and died poor, 6 March, 1796.

RÉAUMUR, René Antoine Ferchault de, a French naturalist, born at Rochelle 1683. After studying at Poictiers and Bourges he went to Paris, where he made such progress in mathematics and natural philosophy as to be admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences at the age of 24. He discovered the art of manufacturing porcelain; of converting iron into steel; of tinning iron plates; and of making artificial pearls. He ascertained also the existence of mines of turquoises in France equal to those of Persia; and he invented a method of hatching eggs by artificial heat. He was the first who reduced thermometers to a common standard, and the instruments constructed upon his principles still go by his name. In dissecting a number of birds he found that the digestion of the carnivorous kind is performed by solution, while that of the granivorous is produced by trituration. This great experimentalist died 18 Oct., 1757. His principal works are, Memoirs of his Discoveries; History of Insects, 6 vols; and a History of the auriferous rivers of France.

RECORD, Robert, M.D., a physician and mathematician, was a native of Tenby, Pembrokeshire, became a student of Oxford, about 1525, and in 1531 was elected a fellow of All Souls' College; but he took his doctor's degree at Cambridge 1545. In 1549 he was comptroller of the Mint at Bristol, and in 1551 was appointed surveyor-general of mines and money in Ireland. He was the first in this country who adopted the Copernican system, the first writer on arithmetic and geometry in English, the first introducer of the knowledge of algebra into England, and the inventor of the present method of extracting the square root. He died in the King's Bench prison about 1558. His chief works are, 'The Urinal of Physike;' 'The Ground of Artes; teaching the worke and practise of Arithmetike;' 'The Pathway to knowledge, containing the first principles of Geometrie;' 'The Whetstone of Witte, whiche is the second part of Arithmetike, containing the Extraction of Rootes;' and an edition of Fabian's Chronicle, 1559.—Athen. Cantab.

REDDING, Cyrus, born at Penryn, Cornwall, 1785, came in early life to London, and devoted himself to journalism. He afterwards (1815-18) resided in France, and edited 'Galignani's Messenger.' Subsequently he edited some English provincial journals, and died in London 28 May, 1870. He published a volume of poems; several novels; 'History of Wines,' 1833; 'Fifty Years' Recollections, Literary and Personal,' 1858; 'Literary Reminiscences and Memoirs of T. Campbell, 1860; 'Memoirs of remarkable Misers;' and 'Past Celebrities whom I have known,' 1865.

REDESDALE, John Freeman Mitford, Lord, was born 18 Aug., 1748, being a younger brother of William Mitford, the historian of Greece. After passing through Winchester School and New College, Oxford, he was called to the bar, became a distinguished Chancery pleader, and published, in 1787, a valuable work 'On the Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery, by English Bill,' and edition, 1804. He was first returned to Parliament, 1788, through the interest of his cousin, the duke of Northumberland, on a vacancy for Beeralston. He was appointed solicitor-general and knighted 1793, and became attorney-general 1799. Soon afterwards he was returned for East Looe, in Cornwall, and while representing that borough was chosen speaker of the House of Commons 1801. In Feb.. 1802, he was appointed lord-chancellor of Ireland and raised to the peerage of Great Britain. He rendered himself very obnoxous to the Catholic party, for which reason he was removed from the Chancery bench by the Whig administration of 1806. From this period Lord Redesdale was regarded as a very high legal authority in appeals and committees of the House of Lords. Died 16 Jan., 1830.

REDFORD, Sebastian, an English Jesuit, born 27 April, 1701; died at Wealside, Essex, 2 Jan., 1763, leaving a work entitled 'An Important Enquiry, or the nature of a Church Reformation fully considered, wherein is shown from Scripture, Reason, and Antiquity, that the late pretended Reformation was groundless in the Attempt, and defective in the Execution,' 8vo., London, 1751 and 1758.

REDI, Francesco, a physician, born at Arezzo 18 Feb., 1626. He graduated at Padua, and became first physician to the grand duke of Tuscany. He distinguished himself by his experiments on the poison of the viper and the generation of insects. Redi was also a good poet; and the Accademia della Crusca, when compiling their dictionary, regarded his style as of the first authority. Died 1 March, 1698.

REDING, Aloys, Baron de, a Swiss general and statesman, born 1755; died Feb., 1818.

REDMAN, John, D.D., was a member of a Yorkshire family, and nearly related to Cuthbert Tunstal, bishop of Durham, by whose advice and encouragement he applied himself to learning from his childhood. He studied at Oxford, Paris, and Cambridge, being elected to a fellowship at St. John's College in the latter university. He was Lady Margaret professor of divinity there 1538-44; one of the king's chaplains; and master of King's Hall, Cambridge, 1542. On the dissolution of King's Hall he was appointed the first master of Trinity College, 1546. He was, besides, archdeacon of Taunton, and prebendary of Wells and Westminster. Died 4 Nov., 1551. Dr Redman was one of the compilers of the Anglican liturgy, and the author of 'Opus de Justificatione,' and a treatise 'De Gratiâ,' translated into English by Dr. John Young, under the title of 'The Complaint of Grace.'—Athen. Cantab.

REED, ANDREW, D.D., an Independent minister, born in London, 27 Nov., 1787. He was educated at Hackney College, and in 1811 was elected minister of New Road Chapel, St. George's in the East, the congregation of which subsequently removed to Wycliffe Chapel, a larger structure in the Commercial Road, where Dr. Reed continued his ministrations. He was deputed by the Congregational Union of England and Wales to visit America, and to report on the state of religion and education in that country; and he subsequently published the narrative of his visit. He was also the author of 'No Fiction' (1819), a novel which passed through eighteen editions; and of a volume of lectures on the revival of religion entitled 'The Advancement of Religion the Claim of the Times.' Dr. Reed was the founder of the following charities: the London Orphan Asylum, Clapton; Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead; Asylum for Fatherless Children, near Croydon; Asylum for Idiots, at Earlswood; the Royal Hospital for Patients discharged as Incurable from the General Hospitals; the Eastern Counties Asylum for Idiots, at Colchester; and the East London Savings' Bank, Stepney. Died 25 Feb., 1862.

REED, ISAAC, was born in London, 1 Jan., 1742. He was brought up to the conveyancing business, but relinquished it for literary pursuits, though he retained his chambers in Staple's Inn, where he collected a large and curious library. In 1768 he published the poems of Lady Mary Wortley Montague; in 1773 he edited the Seatonian prize poems; in 1780 he revised and enlarged Dodsley's Old Plays; in 1782 he published the 'Biographia Dramatica,' 2 vols.; in 1783, four volumes of humorous pieces, under the title of the 'Repository;' and in 1785 an edition of Shakspere, 10 vols., which he extended afterwards to 21 vols. Mr. Reed was, for many years, editor and one of the proprietors of the European Magazine. He died 5 Jan., 1807, and was buried at Amwell. The sale of his library took up thirty-nine days, and produced £4000.

REED, (JOSEPH), a dramatic writer, born at Stockton-upon-Tees, in March, 1723. He was a rope-maker, which business he carried on at Stepney till his death in 1787. He wrote 'Madrigal and Trulletta, a mock tragedy;' 'The Register Office,' a farce; 'Tom Jones,' a comic opera; 'Dido,' a tragedy; 'The Impostors, or a Cure for Credulity,' a farce; and some other pieces.

REES, ABRAHAM, D.D., F.R.S., an encyclopedist, born in Montgomeryshire 1743. His father was an eminent dissenting minister, who, intending his son for the same profession, sent him to Cowell's Academy, at Hoxton. When only nineteen years of age he was appointed mathematical tutor in that institution, which office he filled till the academy was dissolved in 1784. Soon after this he became theological and philosophical tutor in the new college founded at Hackney, which place he held till 1795, when that establishment also terminated. At the age of twenty-four he was ordained pastor of a Presbyterian congregation in Southwark, whence he afterwards moved to the Old Jewry, and subsequently to a new chapel in Jewin Street. About 1776—previous to which date he had obtained his doctor's degree from Edinburgh—he was employed as editor of 'Chambers's Cyclopædia,' and completed that great work in 1786, in 4 vols. folio. After the lapse of fourteen years the proprietors projected a more extended Cyclopædia, which Dr. Rees also brought to a conclusion in 45 vols. 4to., 1803–19, and which bears his name. Besides these great literary performances, he published two volumes of Practical Discourses, &c.; and for some years he was a coadjutor with Dr. Kippis in the 'Monthly Review.' Died 9 June, 1825.

REEVE, CLARA, was born at Ipswich 1738. She had a learned education, and gave a proof of it in a translation of Barclay's Latin romance of Argenis, published 1772, under the title of 'The Phenix, or the History of Polyarchus and Argenis.' Her next work was called 'The Champion of Virtue, a Gothic Story,' published in 1777, but afterwards reprinted with the title of 'The Old English Baron,' a romantic tale, much in the style of Walpole's 'Castle of Otranto.' This was followed by 'The Two Mentors, a Modern Story;' and the next piece of hers was 'The Progress of Romance,' a performance of great research. She afterwards printed 'The Exile;' 'The School for Widows;' 'A Plan of Education;' and 'Memoirs of Sir Roger de Clarendon.' She died at Ipswich 3 Dec., 1803.

REEVE, JOHN, 24 celebrated comic actor, born 1799 in London, where he died 24 Jan., 1838.

REEVE, JOSEPH, a Jesuit, born at Stoodley, Worcestershire, 11 May, 1733, was sent to the Jesuit College at St. Omer in his fourteenth year, and afterwards taught humanities there and at Bruges. Being ordained priest, he defended the whole course of theology, at Liège, in the Lent of 1767, with universal applause. On 5 Aug., the same year, he reached Ugbrooke, where he continued till his death on 2 May, 1820, having for several years previously been afflicted with blindness. His works, all printed at Exeter, are, 'History of the Bible,' 1780, which has gone through several editions; 'Practical Discourses on the Perfections and Wonderful Works of God,' 1788, and again 1793, with a second volume entitled 'Practical Discourses on the Divinity and Wonderful Works of Jesus Christ;' a volume of poetry, 1794; and 'A Short View of the History of the Church,' 3 vols., 1802-3.—Oliver.

REEVES, JOHN, F.R.S., F.S.A., born 1752, was educated at Eton and Oxford, and was afterwards called to the bar, being in 1780 appointed a commissioner of bankrupts. He was made chief-justice of Newfoundland 1791, but returned to England the following year, and founded the 'Association for preserving Liberty and Property against Levellers and Republicans.' In 1800 he was appointed one of the king's printers; and for several years he was a superintendent of aliens. Died 7 Aug., 1829. His political publications were very numerous; but he is now only remembered as the author of a 'History of the Common Law,' 5 vols., 1783-1828.

REEVES, RICHARD, an English monk, born at Gloucester 22 June, 1642, was educated at Oxford, but turned Catholic 1667, and became a Benedictine monk at Douay, eight years later, though he never took holy orders because of his lameness. He wrote a good deal of Latin poetry, and assisted Dr. Fell in translating Wood's 'History and Antiquities of the University of Oxford' into Latin. Died in London, 31 Oct., 1693.

REEVES, WILLIAM, born 1668, was educated at King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. Through the interest of the pious Mr. Nelson, he obtained the rectory of Cranford, Middlesex, and the vicarage of St. Mary, Reading. He was also chaplain to Queen Anne, and died 26 March, 1726. He published a translation of the Apologies of the Fathers, 2 vols.; and, after his death, a volume of his sermons was printed.

REGA, HENRY JOSEPH, a physician, and first professor of that faculty at Louvain, was born there 1690, and died 1754.

REGIOMONTANUS, a celebrated astronomer, whose real name was John Müller. He was born at Königsberg, in Franconia, 6 June, 1436, and made so great a progress in learning, that, when a boy, he was admitted into the academy at Leipsic. From thence he removed to Vienna, where he studied the mathematics under Purbach, whom he assisted in his observations. At the desire of Cardinal Bessarion, Regiomontanus and his master went to Rome, to complete the Latin version of Ptolemy's Almagest; but, while there, Purbach died, and the whole task devolved upon his associate. After a long stay in Italy, he went to Buda; but on the breaking out of a war with the Turks he removed to Nuremberg, where he constructed an observatory, and founded a printing-office. He died 6 July, 1476, at Rome, whither he had been called by Sixtus IV. to assist in reforming the calendar. He published several works; and it is said that he formed an automaton in perpetual motion; a fly, which, after escaping from his hand, flew round the room, and returned again; also an eagle, which went to meet the emperor on his entrance into Nuremberg.

REGIS, PIERRE SILVAIN, a French philosopher, born in the Agenois 1632. After studying in the Sorbonne, he read lectures upon the doctrine of Descartes, till interdicted from doing so by the royal mandate. He, however, published an elaborate view of that system, in 3 vols.; and wrote several defences of it, in answer to Huet, Du Hamel, and others. Died 11 Jan., 1707.

REGIUS, URBAN, or Le Roy, one of the Reformers, was born at Langenargen in Germany. He studied at Ingoldstadt under Eckius; and when the Emperor Maximilian visited that university, he made Regius his poet-laureate and orator. He afterwards obtained a professorship; but when the controversy arose between Luther and Eckius, he took part with the former, and went to Augsburg. In 1530 he accepted an invitation from the duke of Brunswick to settle as the pastor of the church of Lunenberg. He married a lady of Augsburg, who understood Hebrew well, and brought him thirteen children. Died 23 May, 1541.

REGNARD, JEAN FRANÇOIS, one of the best French comic poets, was born at Paris 8 Feb., 1647. He early travelled, and in passing from Italy to Marseilles, the ship in which he was was taker by pirates and carried to Algiers. Now doomed to slavery, he gained the good graces of his master in making ragouts; but an amour brought on new difficulties. Discovered, he had no choice, but either to turn Mahometan or to be burnt alive. The French consul extricated him from his situation by ransom, and sent him back to his country. In 1681 he resumed his travels, and visited Flanders, Holland, Sweden, and Lapland, as far as the Icy Sea. He returned through Poland and Vienna, and after three years' absence, settled in Paris. He was made treasurer of France, and lieutenant of waters and forests, and led the life of a voluptuary. Died 5 Sept., 1710. As a dramatic writer, the reputation of Regnard stands deservedly high; in comedy he is generally considered second only to Molière. There are numerous editions of his works.

REGNAULT, JEAN BAPTISTE, baron, a French painter, born 17 Oct., 1754, at Paris, where he died 12 Nov., 1829.

REGNAULT, NOEL, a Jesuit, born at Arras in 1683; died at Paris 14 May, 1762. The study of philosophy occupied most of his time, though not to the exclusion of religious and moral duties. His 'Entretiens Physiques' were translated into English by Dr. Dale.

REGNIER, MATHURIN, a French poet, born at Chartres 21 Dec., 1573. He was brought up to the Church, which he disgraced by his debaucheries; and yet obtained a canonry in the cathedral of his native place, with other benefices, and a pension. He died 22 Oct., 1613. He was the first French writer who succeeded in satire.

REICHARDT, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a German musical composer and miscellaneous writer, born at Königsberg 1752; died 1814. He was for a long time director of the Italian Opera at Berlin, and afterwards of the French and German theatres at Cassel.

REICHENBACH, GEORG VON, a German mechanist and optician, born at Durlach, Baden, 24 Aug., 1772; died at Munich 21 May, 1826.

REID, THOMAS, a Scotch metaphysician, born 26 April, 1710, at Strachan, in the shire of Kincardine, of which parish his father was minister fifty years. He received his education at Aberdeen, where he was chosen librarian of Marischal College, which situation he resigned in 1736; and soon after was presented to the living of New Machar. In 1752 he was elected professor of philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen, whence he removed, in 1763, to the same chair in the university of Glasgow, where he died 7 Oct., 1796. His works are, 'An Essay on Quantity,' in the Philosophical Transactions; Enquiry into the Human Mind; Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man; Essays on the Active Powers of Man; An Analysis of Aristotle's Logic.

REID, Sir WILLIAM, K.C.B., son of the minister of Kinglassie, Fifeshire, was born there 1791. Having obtained a commission in the royal engineers, he was engaged during the last four years of the war in the peninsula, under the duke of Wellington. He was in America in the war of 1812, and again served under the duke in Belgium in 1815. The following year he served in the expedition under Lord Exmouth against Algiers. For some years he was adjutant of the corps of sappers. In 1838, being then lieutenant-colonel, he was appointed to the governorship of the Bermudas, where he introduced many important and beneficial improvements. In 1846 he was nominated governor of the Windward West India Islands, where also he gained the confidence of the entire population. In 1848 he returned to England, and in the following year was appointed commanding engineer at Woolwich. In Sept., 1851 he was made governor of Malta, and created K.C.B.; and in 1856 he became major-general. He again returned to England in 1857, and died in London 31 Oct., 1858. His name will be enduringly known for his valuable labours in aiding the investigation of the law of storms by a careful analysis of the various hurricanes of the Atlantic and Indian Oceans. He published 'An Attempt to develope the Law of Storms, by means of facts arranged according to place and time,' 1838; and 'The Progress of the Development of the Law of Storms, and of the variable Winds, with the practical application of the subject to Navigation,' 1849.

REIMES, PHILIPPE DE, a trouvère, or bard, of the thirteenth century, wrote the 'Roman de la Manekine,' printed by the Bannatyne Club 1840, under the editorship of M. Francisque Michel; and 'The Romance of Blonde of Oxford and Jehan of Dammartin,' which was edited by M. Le Roux de Lincy and printed for the Camden Society 1858.

REINHOLD, ERASMUS, an astronomer, born at Saifeldt, in Thuringia, 11 Oct., 1511. He was professor of mathematics at Wittemberg, and died there 19 Feb., 1553.

REISKE, JOHANN JACOB, an eminent scholar, was born at Zorbig, near Leipsic, 1716. He was educated at the school of his native place, and afterwards at Leipsic, where he applied himself chiefly to the oriental languages. In 1738 he went to Leyden, and became acquainted with Schultens, at whose desire he published the 'Moallakat,' in 1740. He also assisted Burman in his edition of Petronius, but soon quarrelled both with him and Schultens. Having taken his doctor's degree in medicine, he returned to Leipsic, where he obtained the Arabic professorship; but the salary being small, he lived in indigent circumstances several years, so that most of his works were published to supply his necessities. The principal of these were articles of criticism, in the Acta Eruditorum; the Greek Anthology; and 'Animadversiones ad Autores Græcos.' He also translated Demosthenes and Thucydides into German; but his greatest undertaking was an edition of the 'Oratores Græci.' He died 14 Aug., 1774. Reiske wrote his own memoirs, which were completed by his widow.

RELAND, ADRIAN, a divine and orientalist, born at Ryp, in North Holland, 17 July, 1676. In 1699 he was chosen professor of philosophy at Harderwick, whence he removed in 1701 to the chair of oriental languages, and that of ecclesiastical history at Utrecht, where he died 11 Feb., 1718-19. Of his numerous works, all of which are written in elegant Latin, the best known and the most useful is 'Palæstina ex monumentis veteribus illustrata et Chartis Geographicis accuratioribus adornata,' 3 vols., 1714.

RELHAN, RICHARD, F.R.S., a naturalist, was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, in which university he took the degree of B.A. 1776, and that of M.A. 1779, at which time he was a fellow of King's College. In 1791 he was presented by his society to the rectory of Hunningsby, Lincolnshire. His classical attainments were high; but he chiefly excelled in botany, which he studied under Professor Martyn. Like Ray, he devoted much time to researches round the country in the vicinity of the university, the result being the discovery of a new species of Lichen, and of the Athamanta Libanotis, both accurately described in his 'Flora Cantabrigiensis,' published 1785, and again, with improvements, 1802. He also edited 'Tacitus de Moribus Germanorum et de Vita Agricola.' Died 28 March, 1823, aged 68.

REMBRANDT VAN RYN, PAUL, a celebrated painter, born near Leyden 1606, was the son of a miller. His real name was Gerretz; but from the circumstance of his residing at a village on the banks of the Rhine he obtained that of Van Ryn. He studied first under Vanzwanenburg, and next under Peter Lastman, at Amsterdam. He came into notice by taking a picture to the Hague, where a dealer gave him one hundred florins for it, which circumstance procured him employment and pupils. Rembrandt resided constantly at Amsterdam, and died rich in Oct. 1669. He was also an excellent engraver, and some of his prints fetch very high prices. As a painter he excelled in expression and the force of light and shade. Several of his masterpieces are in the National Gallery.

REMIGIUS (ST.), archbishop of Lyons in the ninth century. He defended St. Augustine's doctrine of grace and predestination against Godeschalc, and presided at the council of Valence in 855. He died 28 Oct., 875. There was another St. Remigius, or Remi, who was archbishop of Rheims, and converted King Clovis to Christianity. He died 23 Jan., 533.

RÉMUSAT, JEAN PIERRE ABEL, an orientalist, born 5 Sept., 1788, at Paris, where he died 5 June, 1832. He was appointed professor of the Chinese language in the College of France—that chair having been expressly founded for him—and published numerous works of great merit illustrative of the history, languages, religions, and customs of the Asiatic nations. Among these his 'Chinese Grammar' deserves special mention, as it contains brief, yet lucid rules for the acquirement of that difficult tongue.

RENAU D'ÉLIÇAGARAY, BERNARD, a naval architect, born in Béarn 1652. He was employed at Brest in the construction of large ships; and in 1680 he invented gunboats for the bombardment of Algiers, the success of which procured him to be appointed to conduct several sieges under Vauban. For these services he was made a captain in the navy, honoured with the cross of St. Louis, and rewarded with a pension. Renau wrote 'Théorie de la Manœuvre des Vaisseaux.' Died 30 Sept., 1719.

RENAUDOT, EUSÈBE, an orientalist, born at Paris 20 July, 1646. He was for some time a member of the congregation of the Oratory; but in 1700 he accompanied Cardinal Noailles to Rome, where Clement V. gave him the priory of Frossey in Bretagne. While in Italy he was admitted a member of the Academia della Crusca, as he also was of the French Academy, and of that of Inscriptions. His principal works are, 'Historia Patriarcharum Alexandrinorum Jacobitarum;' a collection of Greek and Oriental Liturgies; two Ancient Accounts of the Indies and China; A Defence of the Perpetuity of the Catholic Faith concerning the Holy Eucharist. Died 1 Sept., 1720.

RENAUDOT, THÉOPHRASTE, a physician, born at Loudon 1583; died at Paris 1653. He was the first writer of gazettes in France, which were published under the title of 'Mercure Françoise,' from 1635 to 1643. His other works are, 'Abrégé de la Vie de Henri de Bourbon, prince de Condé;' 'La Vie du Maréchal de Gassion;' and 'La Vie du Cardinal Mich. de Mazarin.'

RENNELL, JAMES, F.R.S., an English geographer, born at Chudleigh, Devonshire, 1742. At the age of fifteen he entered the navy; but when twenty-four years old he quitted the sea service for the army, and was sent as an officer of engineers to India, where he greatly distinguished himself and attained the rank of major. His first publication, a Chart of the Bank and Current of Cape Lagullas, gave him the reputation of being one of the first geographers of the age; and soon afterwards he was appointed surveyor-general of Bengal. On his return to England he was elected a F.R.S.; and from this period he maintained an extensive correspondence with many of the most learned men of Europe. He died 29 March, 1830, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His best-known works are, 'The Geographical System of Herodotus examined and explained,' 1800; and 'Observations on the Topography of the Plain of Troy,' 1814.

RENNELL, THOMAS, D.D., born 1753, proceeded from Eton to King's College, Cambridge; became master of the Temple 1797; dean of Winchester 1805; and died 31 March, 1840. He had the reputation of being an accomplished theologian, but published nothing except one volume of sermons. His wife was the eldest daughter of Sir William Blackstone.

RENNELL, THOMAS, F.R.S., son of Dr. Rennell, dean of Winchester, born at Winchester 1787, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. Soon after taking his first degree he was appointed assistant preacher at the Temple. In 1811 he published anonymously 'Animadversions on the Unitarian Version of the New Testament;' and about the same time he became editor of the British Critic. In 1818 he was presented to the vicarage of Kensington, and the same year was elected Christian Advocate in the University of Cambridge, in which capacity he published 'Remarks on Scepticism, especially as connected with the Subjects of Organization and Life;' and 'Proofs of Inspiration on the Grounds of Distinction between the New Testament and the Apocryphal Volume.' In 1823 Mr. Rennell was presented to the mastership of St. Nicholas's Hospital and a prebend in the church of Salisbury. Died at Winchester 30 June, 1824.

RENNIE, GEORGE, son of John Rennie, was born in the parish of Christ Church, Surrey, 1791, and educated at St. Paul's School. He became assistant to his father, whom he greatly aided in his engineering works. After his father's death he entered into partnership with his brother, Sir John Rennie, and still later he formed a new partnership with his two sons. For eight years he was inspector of machinery and clerk of the irons at the Mint. He constructed several railways, and executed other important public works, both in this country and Belgium. Died in London 30 March, 1866.

RENNIE, JOHN, F.R.S., a celebrated engineer, born on the farm of Phantassie, East Lothian, 7 June, 1761. His father was a respectable farmer, who gave him a good education, and afterwards placed him under Andrew Meikle, an eminent millwright. After leaving his master he commenced business on his own account, but in 1783 removed to London, and obtained employment in the construction of the Albion Mill. His next concern was in superintending the new machinery of Whitbread's brewery, the execution of which increased his fame. He now set up for himself, and in 1794 stood at the head of the civil engineers of this country. Among his public works may be mentioned Ramsgate Harbour, Waterloo and Southwark Bridges, and the Breakwater at Plymouth; but the Bell Rock Lighthouse, constructed on the same principle as that of the Eddystone, will, perhaps, be deemed the greatest effort of his genius. Though not a man of letters his merit procured his election into the Royal Society. He died at his house in Stamford Street, Blackfriars, 4 Oct., 1821, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

REPTON, HUMPHRY, was born at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, 1752. He accompanied Mr. Wyndham to Ireland in 1783, and for a short time held a lucrative situation in the castle of Dublin; but when his friend quitted that kingdom Mr. Repton also returned to England. He now directed his attention to drawing, architecture, and particularly ornamental gardening, in which last line he obtained considerable employment. He died 24 March, 1818, leaving several sons, one of whom married a daughter of Lord Eldon. Mr. Repton published some books on miscellaneous subjects; but his principal works are on landscape gardening.

REQUENO Y VIVES, VINCENTE, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Calatraho, in Aragon, 1745. On the expulsion of his order he went to Italy, and died at Tivoli 17 Feb., 1811. He gained prizes from the academies of Madrid and Seville for dissertations relative to the fine arts; but he is best known by an elaborate work entitled 'Saggio sul ristabilimento dell' antica arte de' Greci, e de' Romani Pittori.' He proposed in this treatise to restore the Grecian and Roman art of painting, his manner of explaining which is very different from that of Count de Caylus.

RESTOUT, JEAN, a French painter, born at Rouen 1692, became director of the Academy of Painting, and died 1768. His son, Jean Bernard Restout, who was also a good painter and a member of the Academy, died at Paris 1797.

RETZ, JEAN FRANÇOIS PAUL DE GONDI, a French cardinal, born at Montmirail Oct., 1614. He was a doctor of the Sorbonne, and became coadjutor to his uncle, the archbishop of Paris. After many intrigues, and fighting several duels, he was made archbishop of Corinth and a cardinal; but his character remained the same. Having entered into a conspiracy against Richelieu, he was obliged to quit France, and did not return till 1661. At the close of his life he wrote his memoirs, which are full of anecdote, but must be read with those of Claude Joli, his secretary. Died 24 Aug., 1679.

RETZSCH, MORITZ, a German artist, born at Dresden 9 Dec., 1779; became professor in the Academy of Arts there 1824, and died 11 June, 1859. His reputation was founded upon his outline illustrations to the works of the great poets, especially those to Goethe's 'Faust.'

REUCHLIN, JOHANN, a learned German, born at Pforzheim 1455. He studied at Paris, but took his degree of doctor of philosophy at Bâle, and that of law at Orleans, where he taught Greek, of which language he composed a lexicon and grammar. After this he accompanied the count of Würtemberg to Italy, and while at Rome changed his name to Capnio, a Greek word, of the same import as Reuchlin in German, signifying smoke. His patron held him in such estimation as to appoint him ambassador at the imperial court. On the death of his master he removed to Worms, but was called from his studies to plead the cause of the elector palatine at Rome, where he made himself master of the Hebrew language. In his old age he was reduced to poverty, and was persecuted by the ecclesiastics for opposing Pfefferkorn's design of burning all the Jewish books except the Bible. Reuchlin was the preceptor of Melancthon, and died at Stuttgardt 30 June, 1522. He wrote a Latin comedy against the Monks; a History of the four Empires; the Life of Constantine, from Eusebius; a Treatise 'De Arte Cabalistica;' another, 'De Verbo Mirifico;' and Letters. The 'Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum' have also been attributed to him, but erroneously.

REUVENS, JOHN EVERARD, a celebrated Dutch jurist, born at Haarlem 1763; died at Brussels 1816. His son, Gaspard James Christian Reuvens, who became a famous Egyptologist, was born at the Hague 1793, and died in London 22 June, 1835.

REVELEY, WILLEY, an English architect, was a pupil of Sir William Chambers, and accompanied Mr. Stuart to Greece. Mr. Reveley built the church of All Saints, at Southampton, and other structures. Died 1799.

REVETT, NICHOLAS, an architect and artist, born at Framlingham, Suffolk, 1721. He was the fellow-traveller of James Stuart, and joint editor of 'The Antiquities and Ruins of Athens,' where they resided for many years. Mr. Revett also travelled through Asia Minor with Dr. Chandler, and published the 'Ionian Antiquities.' After his return to England he continued to exercise his profession as an architect, and was employed on many important buildings, one of the most remarkable of his works being the church at Ayott St. Laurence, Hertfordshire, designed by him for Sir Lionel Lyde. Died 3 June, 1804.—MS. Addit. 6109, 167.

RÉVIAL, ALPHONSE, a French musician and composer, born at Toulouse 29 May, 1810; became professor of singing in the Paris Conservatoire 1849; died Oct., 1871.

REY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French musical composer, born 18 Dec., 1734; died at Paris 15 July, 1810.

REYHER, SAMUEL, a German writer, born 1635, at Schleusingen. After completing his studies at Leyden, he became preceptor to the prince of Gotha, next professor of mathematics at Kiel, and lastly professor of law at the same place, where he died 22 Nov., 1714. He translated Euclid into German; but he is best known by his 'Mathesis Biblica;' and a Dissertation on the Inscriptions upon the Cross, and the Hour of the Crucifixion.

REYNEAU, CHARLES RENÉ, a French mathematician, born at Brissac, in Anjou, 1656; died 1728. He was a priest of the Oratory, and occupied for 22 years the chair of mathematics at Angers.

REYNER, CLEMENT, D.D., a member of an ancient Yorkshire family, became a Benedictine monk at Dieulwart, was elected abbat of Lamspring, or Lansperg, in Germany, 1643, and died at Hildesheim 27 March, 1651. He was the editor of Father Baker's valuable work, 'Apostolatus Benedictinorum in Angliâ.' See BAKER, DAVID AUGUSTINE.

REYNER, EDWARD, a Puritan divine, born at Marley, in Yorkshire, 1600, and educated at Cambridge, where he took his master's degree, entered into orders, and became schoolmaster at Market Rasen, in Lincolnshire. He was afterwards chosen lecturer of a church in Lincoln, and minister of St. Peter's in that city. He also officiated in the cathedral during the usurpation, but was ejected at the Restoration, and died about 1670. He wrote 'Precepts for Christian Practice;' Considerations concerning Marriage; A Vindication of Human Learning and Universities; The Being and Well-Being of a Christian. He is to be distinguished from Kirby Reyner, a nonconformist, who was born near Wakefield, in Yorkshire, and died at Bristol 1744. His sermons were published by Dr. Lardner 1745.

REYNER, WILLIAM, D.D., a Catholic controversialist, was a near relation of Dr. Richard Smith, bishop of Chalcedon, by whose care he was educated while he studied in Paris, where he took his degrees. He resided chiefly in Arras College in Paris, a small community established for the writers of controversy. He was concerned in translating into Latin the following works: Brereley's 'Protestant Apology,' Paris, 1615; Dr. Stapleton's 'Fortress of Faith,' 1619; and Dr. Stapleton's 'Protestancy and its Authors.'

REYNOLDS. See RAINOLDS.

REYNOLDS, EDWARD, D.D., was born at Southampton 1599, and educated at Merton College, Oxford. On taking orders he became preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and rector of Braynton, in Northamptonshire. By complying with the Presbyterians he was chosen one of the assembly of divines, and made dean of Christ Church, Oxford; which preferment, however, he lost in 1651 for refusing the engagement. He then settled in London, as vicar of St. Laurence Jewry, but was restored to the deanery in 1659. The year following he was made warden of Merton College, and consecrated bishop of Norwich, where he died 16 Jan., 1676. His works have been published in 1 vol. folio.

REYNOLDS, Sir JOSHUA, was born 16 July, 1723, at Plympton, Devonshire, where his father was a clergyman and master of the grammar-school. At the age of seventeen he was placed under Hudson the painter, with whom he continued three years. In 1746 he went to Italy with Captain, afterwards Lord Keppel, and on his return to England in 1752 settled in London, where he soon rose to the height of his profession. About this time he contracted that friendship with Dr. Johnson which became permanent, and on which he always reflected with pleasure. On the establishment of the Royal Academy, he was appointed president, and knighted. To this situation the world is indebted for those valuable discourses in which he laid down the principles of his art with perspicuity and elegance. He had long before given a proof of his taste in literary composition, in three papers of the Idler, on false criticism in painting. In 1773 the university of Oxford conferred on Sir Joshua the honorary degree of doctor of laws, and in 1783 he was appointed principal painter to the king. This great artist died unmarried, at his house in Leicester Square, 23 Feb., 1792, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. His literary works were published, with his life, by Mr. Malone.

RHAZES, or ALBUBECAR MOHAMMED, an Arabian physician, born in Chorasan about A.D. 852.

He resided at Bagdad, where he was superintendent of the public hospital. He was the first who gave a distinct account of the smallpox, his treatise on which subject has been translated into English. Died 932.

RHEEDE, Henry Adrian Draakenstein Van, Dutch governor of the Malabar Coast, was an accomplished botanist, and published 'Hortus Malabaricus,' 12 vols. folio, 1678-1703.

RHEGAS, Constantinos, a Greek patriot and poet, born at Velestini, in Thessaly, about 1753. He organised at Bucharest and Vienna a secret society with the object of procuring the independence of Greece; but being delivered by the Austrian government to Turkey, he was drowned in the Danube, with eight of his companions, 1798.

RHESE, John David, M.D., or John Rhese Davis, a physician, born in the isle of Anglesea 1534. He became a student of Christ Church, Oxford, and went thence to Sienna, where he took his doctor's degree. On his return he settled at Brecknock, and died there, a zealous member of the Catholic Church, soon after 1609. He published, 'Rules for obtaining the Latin tongue,' printed in Italian at Venice; 'De Italicæ linguæ pronunciatione,' printed at Padua; 'Cambro-Britannicæ, Cymeræcæve linguæ Institutiones et Rudimenta,' &c.

RHETICUS. See Joachim.

RIBADENEIRA, Peter, a Spanish Jesuit, born at Toledo 1 Nov., 1527. He was the favourite disciple of Loyola as early as his thirteenth year. After professing rhetoric at Palermo, he visited many countries, particularly England, with the duke of Feria, and finally settled at Madrid, where he died 1 Oct., 1611. He wrote the life of St. Ignatius Loyola; and also a general collection of the Lives of the Saints, both which works have been translated into English. Ribadeneira was likewise the author of 'A Treatise on the English Schism.'

RIBALTA, Francisco, a Spanish painter, born at Castellon de la Plana 1551; died at Valencia 1628. His son, Juan Ribalta (b. 1597; d. 1628), painted a Crucifixion, which is regarded as one of the masterpieces of the Spanish school.

RIBERA, José. See Spagnoletto.

RICARDO, David, an English political economist, of Jewish parentage, born in London 19 April, 1772. His father was a Dutch merchant, and the son being designed for the same profession, received a suitable education in Holland. At an early age he was brought into active life on the Stock Exchange, and, though very young, conducted business with great satisfaction to his father. In 1810 he began a series of letters in the 'Morning Chronicle,' on the subject of the depreciation of the currency; and the substance of these soon afterwards appeared in a separate publication, which produced a controversy; but the author had the satisfaction of seeing his ideas and illustrations confirmed by the Bullion Report. His next performance was 'An Essay on Rent,' in which he followed up the suggestions of Mr. Malthus. After this he engaged in an examination of the affairs of the Bank of England; the result of which inquiry was his proposal for an economical currency; but, though he addressed a letter to Mr. Perceval on the subject, that minister dissented from his opinions. His next undertaking was a work on the 'Principles of Political Economy and Taxation.' In 1819 he was elected into Parliament for Portarlington, in Ireland, but he never spoke except on subjects of finance and commerce, on which occasions he was always listened to with great deference. He died at Gatcomb Park, Gloucestershire, 11 Sept., 1823.

RICAUT, Sir Paul. See Rycaut.

RICCATI, Vincente, a Jesuit, born 1707 at Castel Franco, in the territory of Treviso. He taught mathematics at Bologna till the suppression of his order in 1773, when he returned to his native place, and died there 17 Jan., 1775. He was employed in hydraulics by the republic of Venice, the senate of which caused a gold medal to be struck in honour of his services. He was the author of a treatise on the 'Integral Calculus.'

RICCI, Lorenzo, a Jesuit, born at Florence of a noble and ancient family 1703. He was elected general of his order 1758, and held that post when the illustrious society was temporarily suppressed by Clement XIV. With several of his brethren he was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, at Rome, where he died 24 Nov., 1775. Father Ricci wrote a memoir, published after his death, in which he protested against the violence offered to the Society of Jesus.

RICCI, Matteo, a Jesuit, born at Macerata 1552. He became a missionary in China, where he was much esteemed by the emperor, and had liberty to build a church. He drew a map of that empire, and wrote some curious memoirs respecting China, where he died 11 May, 1610.

RICCI, Michael Angelo, a cardinal, born at Rome 1619. He was raised to the purple in 1681, and died 21 May, 1682. His knowledge of the mathematics appeared in his 'Exercitatio Geometrica,' which was reprinted in London.

RICCI, Scipione, bishop of the united sees of Pistoia and Prato, born at Florence 1741, was nephew of Lorenzo Ricci, the general of the Jesuits. An advocate of the reforms introduced into Tuscany by the Emperor Joseph II., he was for a long time in opposition to the Holy See; but in 1805 he declared his acceptance of the apostolic constitutions against Baius, Jansenius, and Quesnel, and especially of the bull Auctorem fidei, which condemned his culpable attempts. Died 27 Jan., 1810.

RICCI, Sebastian, a painter, born at Belluno in 1659; died at Venice 13 May, 1734. He lived several years in London, where he was employed in painting historical subjects and landscapes, at Chelsea, Montague House, Bulstrode, and other buildings. He was, however, but an indifferent artist.

RICCIARELLI. See Volterra.

RICCIOLI, Giovanni Battista, a Jesuit, born at Ferrara 1598. He taught rhetoric, philosophy, and divinity, at Parma and Bologna, but afterwards obtained leave to pursue the study of the mathematics, the result of which appeared in some valuable works, as, 'Almagestum novum, astronomiam veterem novamque complectens, observationibus aliorum, et propriis, novisque theorematibus, problematibus ac tabulis, promotam,' 2 vols.; 'Astronomia Reformata,' and 'Chronologia Reformata.' Died 25 June, 1671.

RICH, Barnaby, a prolific pamphleteer in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. He appears to have been a captain in the army. His first known production is dated in 1574, and his last in 1624. His tracts, some twenty-six in number, are all of them curious pictures of the age, and are all scarce. A list of them, drawn up by Mr. Peter Cunningham, will be found in the 11th volume of the publications of the Percy Society.

RICH, CLAUDIUS JAMES, was born at Dijon, in Burgundy, 28 March, 1787. He received his education at Bristol, and made rapid progress in every branch of learning to which he applied himself, particularly the study of languages. On meeting with some Arabic and Persian books, he directed his attention to oriental literature with such success, that his friends procured for him a cadetship in the service of the East India Company. On making his appearance before the board of directors, his qualifications were found so extraordinary that they nominated him to a writership, although he was only seventeen years of age. He was afterwards appointed resident for the company at Bagdad; but died at Shiraz, in Persia, 5 Oct., 1821. His two memoirs on the 'Ruins of Babylon,' and his 'Narrative of a Residence in Koordistan,' afford sufficient proof of his rare talents. His valuable collection of oriental MSS. was purchased by Parliament for the British Museum. Mr. Rich, not long before his death, married the daughter of Sir James Mackintosh, at Bombay.

RICHARD I., king of England, surnamed Cœur de Lion, third son of Henry II., was born 1157; succeeded his father 1189; died 6 April, 1199.

RICHARD II., only surviving son of Edward the Black Prince, eldest son of Edward III., was born 1366; succeeded to the throne on the death of his grandfather 1377; and was dethroned shortly before his death in 1400.

RICHARD III., duke of Gloucester, brother of Edward IV., was born 1452. He caused his nephews, Edward V. and Richard, duke of York, to be murdered, and then procured his own nomination to the crown 1483. He was slain at the battle of Bosworth Field 22 Aug., 1485.

RICHARD OF BURY. See AUNGERVILLE.

RICHARD OF CIRENCESTER, Ricardus Corinensis, an historian, was so called from the place of his birth, in the fourteenth century. He belonged to the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, Westminster, where he devoted himself to the study of British and Anglo-Saxon history. He died in 1401. His works are, Historia ab Hengista ad 1348; Britonum, Anglorum et Saxonum Historia; De Situ Britanniæ. This last was discovered by Bertram, of Copenhagen, and sent by him to Dr. Stukeley, who published an analysis of it 1757. The original was printed with the remains of Gildas and Nonnius the same year at Copenhagen; and in 1809 a new edition, with a translation and map, appeared in London.

RICHARD, LOUIS CLAUDE MARIE, a French botanist, born at Versailles 4 Sept., 1754; died at Paris 7 June, 1821.

RICHARDSON, CHARLES, LL.D., an English lexicographer, born July, 1775. He was intended for the law, but early abandoned it for Philology. In 1805 appeared his first work, entitled 'Illustrations of English Philology,' in which he strenuously advocated the principles of language set forth by Horne Tooke, and advanced some criticisms on Johnson's Dictionary, and some observations on Dugald Stewart's essay 'On the tendency of some late Philological Speculations.' Not long afterwards he undertook the lexicographical portion of the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana,' of which the first part appeared in Jan., 1818; but after the issue of the fourth part the work was suspended for some years. In 1835 the publication of the Dictionary as a separate work commenced, and finished at the end of 1837 (2 vols. 4to.). Dr. Richardson also published a volume 'On the Study of Language,' which professes to be an exposition of the principles laid down in the 'Diversions of Purley.' Died at Feltham 6 Oct., 1865.

RICHARDSON, Major DAVID LESTER, editor first of the 'Bengal Hurkaru,' and afterwards of the 'Court Circular,' wrote many scientific and literary works. He died at Clapham 17 Nov., 1865, aged 80.

RICHARDSON, EDWARD, an English sculptor, died at Brighton 17 May, 1869, aged 57. He will, perhaps, be chiefly remembered from having been employed (1842) in 'restoring' the well-known effigies of the so-called Knights Templars that lie in the Round Church of the Temple. He published a work on this subject. Among his original works are recumbent effigies of the earl of Powis (ob. 1848) at Welshpool, and of the late marquis of Ormonde, in Kilkenny Cathedral.—The Register.

RICHARDSON, JOHN, D.D., was born at Chester, and educated at Dublin. In 1633 he was consecrated bishop of Ardagh; but on the breaking out of the Rebellion he retired to London, and died there 11 Aug., 1654. He had a share in the 'Assembly's Annotations;' and after his death were published his 'Choice Observations upon the Old Testament.'

RICHARDSON, JOHN, the well-known itinerant dramatic showman, died at his cottage, Horsemonger Lane, Southwark, 14 Nov., 1837, aged 70. It is said that he amassed a fortune of upwards of £20,000.

RICHARDSON, Sir JOHN, M.D., F.R.S., a naturalist and arctic explorer, born at Dumfries 1787, studied medicine at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1816 took his degree of M.D. He had entered the navy in 1801 as an assistant-surgeon, and subsequently became acting-surgeon in the 'Hercules,' 74; and in 1819 accompanied Sir John Franklin in his arctic expedition as surgeon and naturalist. He also accompanied the same commander in a second expedition in 1825, and with one detachment of the party explored the coast east of the Mackenzie to the mouth of the Coppermine river. In 1838 he was appointed physician of the fleet, in 1840 an inspector of hospitals, and in 1846 was created a knight. In 1848 he commanded one of the three expeditions which went out in search of Sir John Franklin, and returned in Nov., 1849. In 1855 he retired from the naval service, and passed his remaining days at Lancrigg, Grasmere, where he died 5 June, 1865. He wrote a number of works embodying much information respecting the geology, geography, and natural history of arctic North America. One of the most important of these is the 'Fauna Boreali-Americana,' 4 vols., 1829-37, in which he was assisted by Swainson and Kirby. He also contributed to the natural history of the voyages of Capt. F. W. Beechey, of Sir James Ross, of Sir E. Belcher, and of Capt. Kellett, besides publishing an account of 'The Arctic Searching Expedition, a Journal of a Boat Voyage through Rupert's Land and the Arctic Sea,' &c., 2 vols. 1851; and 'The Polar Regions,' 1861.

RICHARDSON, JONATHAN, a painter, born about 1665. He quitted the profession of a scrivener to become a pupil of Riley, whose niece he married. After the death of Kneller he was considered as the principal portrait-painter in this country. He died 28 May, 1745. He had a son, with whose assistance he wrote, 'Essay on the Art of Criticism in Painting;' 'An Argument in behalf of the Science of a Connoisseur;' 'Account of Statues, Basreliefs, Drawings, and Pictures, in Italy;' 'Notes and Remarks on Paradise Lost, with the life of the author.' The son died in 1771, and five years afterwards was published a volume entitled 'Richardsoniana,' followed by another of Poems. Hudson, the painter, married the daughter of the elder Richardson.

RICHARDSON, JOSEPH, a poet, born at Hexham, Northumberland, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. He was the principal writer of the satires entitled 'The Rolliad,' and 'Probationary Odes;' besides which he produced 'The Fugitive,' a comedy. The duke of Northumberland brought him into Parliament, and advanced him money to purchase a share in the Drury Lane Theatre, which proved the ruin of Richardson and his family. Died 8 June, 1803.

RICHARDSON, SAMUEL, a novelist, born in Derbyshire, 1689. He served his apprenticeship to a printer in London, after which he worked as a journeyman some years, and then set up for himself in a court in Fleet Street. He published a newspaper for some time, and by the interest of the Speaker, Onslow, was employed in printing the Journals of the House of Commons. In 1741 he brought out his novel of 'Pamela,' which obtained great popularity. The author afterwards added to it two more volumes; but they were very inferior to the former. His next work was 'Clarissa,' which may be pronounced his masterpiece. This was followed by 'Sir Charles Grandison,' in which the madness of love is finely exhibited in the character of Clementina. Besides these publications, Richardson wrote a paper in the Rambler, and some other fugitive pieces. Died 4 July, 1761. His correspondence was printed in 6 vols. 8vo., 1804, with his life, written by Mrs. Barbauld.

RICHARDSON, WILLIAM, LL.D., was born at Wilshamstead, Bedfordshire, 1698. He was educated at Westminster School, and next at Emanuel College, Cambridge. On entering into orders he became curate and lecturer of St. Olave, Southwark, where he preached and published 'Four Sermons on Revelation,' and another, on the Consecration of St. John's Church, Horselydown. On undertaking a new edition of Godwin 'De Presulibus,' he returned to Cambridge, where he was chosen master of his college. His edition of Godwin came out in 1743. Archbishop Potter named him in his will to the precentorship of Lincoln, which, however, was contested with him by Dr. Chapman, whose claim was set aside on an appeal to the Lords. Dr. Richardson died 15 March, 1775.

RICHARDSON, WILLIAM, was born in Perthshire 1743, and became a student of the university of Glasgow 1758. On completing his education and taking his master's degree he was appointed tutor to a nobleman, whom he accompanied to Russia. After his return he was elected professor of humanity, or classical literature, at Glasgow, which chair he filled with reputation above forty years. Mr. Richardson published 'Essays on the Dramatic Characters of Shakspere,' &c. Died 1814.

RICHELET, CÉSAR PIERRE, a French grammarian, born at Cheminon, in the diocese of Château-sur-Marne, 1631; died at Paris 23 Nov., 1698. He was the author of a useful Dictionary of the French Language, full of satirical reflections and obscenities. It was originally published at Geneva 1680 in one volume, but was afterwards enlarged to three volumes. Richelet also wrote a Dictionary of Rhymes, and translated Vega's Conquest of Florida.

RICHER, EDMOND, a French divine, born at Chaource, in the diocese of Langres, 1560. He became grand master of the College of Le Moine, and next syndic of the Faculty of Divinity at Paris. He opposed the papal authority in a treatise 'On the Civil and Ecclesiastical Power,' which made so great a noise that the author was deposed and sent to prison, whence he did not obtain a release till he had made his submission. He also wrote 'A History of General Councils.' Died 28 Nov., 1631.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND EMMANUEL SOPHIE SEPTIMANIE DU PLESSIS, DUC DE, grandson of the Marshal de Richelieu, was born 25 Sept., 1766. He distinguished himself both as a statesman and warrior, and became a member of the French Academy. Having emigrated (1789) he served against the Turks under General Suwarrow, and was afterwards nominated governor of New Russia. On returning to France he was appointed (1815) minister of foreign affairs and president of the council. Though poor he refused a national recompense from the Chambers, and when a pension of 50,000 francs was conferred on him, he gave it to found a hospital at Bordeaux. Recalled to the presidency of the council (1820) after the assassination of the Duke de Berri, he lost some of his popularity, and was compelled to retire from public life in the following year. Died 24 April, 1816.

RICHELIEU, ARMAND JEAN DU PLESSIS, DUC DE, a cardinal and statesman, born of a noble family at Paris 5 Sept., 1585. He studied in the Sorbonne, and in 1607 obtained the bishopric of Luçon. He was also appointed grand almoner, and in 1616 made secretary of state. When Marie de' Medici fell into disgrace Richelieu was banished to Avignon, where he wrote his 'Method of Controversy.' Being soon after recalled to court, he brought about a reconciliation between the king and queen, for which he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat, and appointed prime minister, in which situation he displayed extraordinary talents. He subdued the Protestants, reduced Savoy, humbled Spain, struck terror into Germany, and commanded the admiration of all Europe. In the midst of this splendour he died 4 Dec., 1642, and was buried at the Sorbonne, where Girardon constructed a magnificent mausoleum to his memory. He wrote some theological works; and he had also the ambition to be thought a great dramatic poet. The authenticity of the 'Political Testament,' which passes under his name, is doubted by some writers.

RICHELIEU, LOUIS FRANÇOIS ARMAND DUPLESSIS DE, a marshal of France, born 13 March, 1696; succeeded to the dukedom of his great-uncle the cardinal; commanded in the Seven Years' War; and was one of the most notorious roués and worthless characters in French history. Died 8 Aug., 1788.

RICHMOND, LEGH, was born at Liverpool

29 Jan., 1772. He received an injury during his childhood by leaping from a wall, which lamed him for the remainder of his life. After having laid the foundation of a classical education he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where a severe illness, produced by intense application, materially retarded his academical progress. He took an ægrotat degree 1794, and proceeded M.A. 1797, during which year he married, took deacon's orders, and commenced his pastoral duties as a curate in the Isle of Wight. He subsequently officiated for some time at the Lock Chapel, in the metropolis, and in 1805 obtained the rectory of Turvey, Beds, where he died 8 May, 1827. Besides a work entitled 'The Fathers of the Church,' he wrote a number of narrative pieces in support of religion, several of which (including 'The Dairyman's Daughter,' 'The Young Cottager,' and 'The Negro Servant'), after having been printed separately, were collected and published in one volume, entitled 'Annals of the Poor.'

RICHTER, JOHN PAUL FREDERICK, commonly called Jean Paul, an eminently clever German novelist, was born in 1763 at Wunseidel, near Baireuth, where his father held the office of underschoolmaster and organist, and educated at the gymnasium at Hof, and at the university of Leipsic. He had to struggle for some time with poverty until, in 1793, several families of Schwarzenbach united to invite him to come and undertake the education of their children. Here he tried and developed the principles of education which he afterwards published in his Levana. His circumstances now began to improve, and in 1793 he published Die Unsichtbare Loge. This work attracted the attention of the public, and brought the author into notice. In 1798 he became acquainted with the duke of Saxe-Hildburghausen, who afterwards honoured him with the title of councillor of legation. In 1801 he married Charlotte Maier, the daughter of a distinguished physician of Berlin, and he finally settled at Baireuth. In 1809 the prince primate, Carl von Dalberg, granted him a pension of 1000 florins per annum, which was afterwards continued by Maximilian, king of Bavaria. In 1817 the university of Heidelberg honoured him with the diploma of doctor of philosophy, and three years afterwards he was elected an ordinary member of the Academy of Sciences of Munich. In 1825 he became totally blind, and he died on the 14th of Nov. in that year. His works were edited by his friend, Dr. Otto, in 60 small 8vo. vols., Berlin, 1826-28. His writings, which are all in prose, and most of which may be called humorous novels, evince a profound knowledge of human nature and an intimate acquaintance with almost every department of science. Some of his publications are philosophical discussions, full of profound thought; but even here his humour sometimes gushes forth and enlivens the abstruseness of philosophical inquiry. English translations of some of his works have given in German Romance, by T. Carlyle, who has also written some essays on the life and writings of Jean Paul.

RICKMAN, THOMAS, F.S.A., an architect, born at Maidenhead 8 June, 1776. He abandoned the practice of medicine for commercial pursuits, and afterwards settled as an architect at Birmingham, where he died in Jan., 1841. Buildings erected from his designs are to be found in almost every English county. Among those which are most admired may be enumerated the new buildings of St. John's College, Cambridge, and the churches of Oulton, near Leeds, and Hampton Lucy, in Warwickshire. He was the first to point out the chronological succession of modern styles, in his 'Attempt to discriminate the Styles of Gothic Architecture in England from the Conquest to the Reformation,' 1817. Mr. Rickman also wrote the letterpress to Cotman's 'Architectural Antiquities of Norfolk.'

RIDER, JOHN, D.D., was born at Carrington, Cheshire, about 1562. He took his degrees at Jesus College, Oxford, and obtained several preferments, the chief of which was the rectory of Winwick, in Lancashire. He afterwards became dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, and in 1612 was consecrated bishop of Killaloe, where he died 1632. His works are, A Letter concerning the News out of Ireland, and of the Spaniards landing; Claim of Antiquity in behalf of the Protestant Religion; A Dictionary English and Latin, and Latin and English.

RIDER, WILLIAM, a clergyman, was for several years under-master of St. Paul's School, and lecturer of St. Vedast, Foster Lane. He published a 'History of England,' 50 vols., 1762-9; a Commentary on the Bible; and 'Lives and Writings of the Living Authors of Great Britain,' 1764. Died 1785.

RIDGLEY, THOMAS, D.D., an Independent minister, was born in London about 1667. He became assistant to Mr. Thomas Gouge, and in 1712 established an academy, the object of which was to bring up candidates for the ministry. In this situation he delivered a course of lectures on the Assembly's Catechism, which was published, with the title of 'A Body of Divinity.' For this he received the honorary degree of doctor from the university of Aberdeen. Died 27 March, 1734.

RIDLEY, GLO'STER, D.D., was born 1702, at sea, on board the 'Gloucester' Indiaman, to which circumstance he was indebted for his name. He was educated at Winchester School, and next at New College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. Soon after his ordination he was presented to the living of Weston, Norfolk, and the donative of Poplar, Middlesex, to which was added that of Romford, Essex. In 1763 he published the life of Bishop Ridley, and in 1768, at the desire of Archbishop Secker, he printed three letters to the author of the 'Confessional,' for which he was rewarded with a golden prebend in the church of Salisbury. He died at Poplar 3 Nov., 1774. Besides the above works, he published 'Eight Sermons preached at Lady Moyer's Lecture;' 'De Syriacarum novi fœderis atque usu dissertatio;' A Review of Phillip's Life of Pole; and some poems. His son, James Ridley, was educated at Winchester School, and New College, Oxford. He became chaplain to a marching regiment, and died in the prime of life 1765. He is known by the 'History of James Lovegrove,' a novel; but more so by the 'Tales of the Genii.'

RIDLEY, NICHOLAS, D.D., one of the Reformers, was the son of Nicholas Ridley, Esq., of Unthank, near Willimoteswick, Northumberland. He received an excellent grammatical education at the school of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, whence he removed to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship 1524. To complete his knowledge of divinity he studied at Paris, and subsequently at Louvain. On his return he was chosen one of the proctors of the university (1534), and was instrumental in procuring the decree of the university against the spiritual power of the Pope. Archbishop Cranmer made him one of his chaplains, and soon after this he became master of Pembroke Hall, together with which office he held considerable church preferment at Canterbury and Westminster. On the accession of Edward VI. he was consecrated bishop of Winchester, and in 1550 was translated to London. At this period he contracted a bitter dislike for the Princess Mary, and therefore more readily concurred in the steps subsequently taken for her exclusion from the throne. He was employed in all the ecclesiastical measures of King Edward's reign, particularly the compiling of the Liturgy and the framing of the Articles of Religion. It was owing to his representations that Christ's, St. Thomas's, and Bethlehem hospitals were founded. The duke of Northumberland prevailed upon him to concur in the proclamation of Lady Jane Grey. For this he was committed to the Tower, and after a confinement of eight months sent to Oxford to hold a disputation with the triumphant party. Refusing to recant his opinions he was pronounced an excommunicated heretic, degraded from his episcopal and all other ecclesiastical orders, and delivered over to the secular power for punishment according to law. He suffered death at the same stake with Latimer in front of Balliol College, Oxford, 16 Oct., 1555. His works were edited for the Parker Society by the Rev. Henry Christmas, 1841. —Athen. Cantab.

RIDLEY, Sir THOMAS, a civilian, was a native of Ely. He became master of Eton school; afterwards a master in Chancery, chancellor of Winchester, and vicar-general to the archbishop of Canterbury. James I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood for the satisfaction afforded by his 'View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical Law.' Died 22 Jan., 1629.

RIDOLFI, CARLO, a painter of the Venetian school, born at Lonigo, near Vincenza, 1594; died at Venice 1658. He owes his fame chiefly to his 'Lives of Illustrious Venetian Painters,' 1648.

RIDOLFI, CLAUDIO, a painter, whose historical pieces and portraits are much admired, was born at Verona 1574, and died at Corinaldo 1644.

RIEGO Y NUNEZ, RAFAEL DEL, a Spanish revolutionist, born at Tuña, in the Asturias, 1785. He was the first to proclaim the Spanish constitution of 1820. At the head of a small battalion, which gradually increased, he succeeded in defeating the opposition which was made to him. Ultimately the provinces declared their independence, and for a time Riego was hailed and rewarded as the liberator of his country. Being elected a deputy to the Cortes of 1822, he was chosen president of that body, in which post he displayed great firmness and moderation. At length Ferdinand beginning to violate the constitution which he had sworn to observe, Riego again took the field; but the king's party being assisted by the French under the Duc d'Angoulême, Riego was taken prisoner, and being sent to Madrid, was there executed as a traitor 7 Oct., 1823.

RIENZI, NICHOLAS GABRINI DE, a native of Rome, who, in the fourteenth century, made himself famous by an attempt to restore the republic. He was of low origin, but had received a liberal education, and possessed great eloquence, which induced his fellow-citizens to send him as one of their deputies to Pope Clement VI., then at Avignon. Rienzi, on this occasion, drew so affecting a picture of the distressed state of the city, that the Pope appointed him apostolic notary, which office he discharged with great credit. But while he appeared actuated by the purest principles, he was secretly forming a conspiracy for the alteration of the government. To his partizans he represented the advantages they would derive from possessing the revenues of the apostolic chamber; and he had the address to persuade the Pope's vicar-general that it was for the interest of his holiness to allow the seizure of these treasures, in order to curb the pride of the Roman nobility. By these means he became the idol of the people, who declared him sovereign of Rome; and, what was more extraordinary, the Pope confirmed the title. Rienzi, however, governed the city with judgment and moderation for some time; but the pomp of power spoiled him, and he became a tyrant. A confederacy was then formed against him, and he fled for refuge to Prague, where he was seized and sent to the Pope, who confined him in a dungeon three years. Innocent II., however, the successor of Clement, not only gave him his liberty, but even appointed him governor of Rome, thinking that he would prove a useful instrument to correct the disturbances which then raged in the ecclesiastical states. Rienzi, however, was now an altered man, and his cruelties raised him new enemies, by whom he was put to death 8 Oct., 1354.

RIES, FERDINAND, a pianist and composer, who resided for several years in this country, was born at Bonn 1784, and died at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 13 Jan., 1838.

RIGAUD, HYACINTHE, a painter, born at Perpignan 1659. He excelled in portrait, and has been called the Vandyke of France. In the course of his long career he painted five monarchs, besides a number of princes. Louis XV. conferred on him the order of St. Michael and a patent of nobility. Died 19 Dec., 1743.

RIGAUT, STEPHEN PETER, F.R.S., was born at Richmond, Surrey, 1774, of a family long connected with science, both his father and his maternal grandfather having been Observer to the king at Kew, which office was conferred upon himself on his father's death in 1814. He became a fellow of Exeter College, Oxford; Savilian professor of astronomy in that university 1810; and died 16 March, 1839. Mr. Rigaut in 1831 printed the Miscellaneous Works and Correspondence of Dr. Bradley, to which in 1833 he added a Supplement, including an account of Harriott's Astronomical Papers. In 1838 he published some valuable notices on the first publication of Newton's Principia. He was a frequent contributor to the scientific journals. His son, S. Jordan Rigaut, D.D., became bishop of Antigua 1857, and died 16 May, 1859.

RILEY, JOHN, a portrait-painter, born in London 1646; died 1691. He was the scholar of Fuller and Zoust, and after the death of Lely was appointed state-painter.

RINALDI, ODERIC, an ecclesiastical historian, was a native of Treviso, and a member of the congregation of the Oratory. He continued the Annals of Baronius, in 10 vols. folio; besides which e published an abridgment of the whole work in talian. Born 1595; died 1671.

RING, JOHN, a surgeon, born near Salisbury 751, received his education at Winchester School, fter which he became a pupil of the two Hunters t St. George's Hospital. In 1772 he began to ractise for himself in Swallow Street, where, and n the neighbourhood, he continued in great and eserved reputation till his death on 7 Dec., 1821. Ir. Ring was a zealous defender of vaccination, support which he established an institution at considerable expense, and he also liberally gave is assistance to other charities. Besides his medi- al works he occasionally composed Latin and nglish verse with fluency, spirit, and elegance. is chief publication is 'A Translation of the Works of Virgil, partly original and partly altered om Dryden and Pitt,' 2 vols., 1820.

RINTOUL, ROBERT STEPHEN, a journalist, the rojector and first editor of the 'Spectator' news- aper, was born in Scotland 1787; and died 2 April, 1858.

RINUCCINI, OTTAVIO, a poet, was a native of orence. He went to France with Mary de' Me- ci, and is said to have been the first who in- ented the opera, or musical drama, in the year 600. He wrote three pieces, 'Daphne,' 'Euri- ce,' and 'Ariadne.' Died at Florence 1621.

RIOLAN, JEAN, a physician, born at Amiens 539, took his degree at Paris, where he became an of the faculty, and died in 1606. He was lefender of the doctrines of Hippocrates, and the ncients, against the chemists. His 'Discourse n Hermaphrodites' is still sought after by the urious.

RIOLAN, JEAN, son of the above, was born at ris in 1577. He became royal professor of ana- my and botany, and physician to Mary de' Me- ci. The university of Paris was indebted to m for the botanic garden. He died 19 Feb., 657. He made discoveries in anatomy and pub- hed several works, in one of which he attacked arvey's doctrine of the circulation of the blood.

RIPON, FREDERIC JOHN ROBINSON, first EARL OF, econd son of Lord Grantham, was born in Lon- n 1 Nov., 1782, and from Harrow School was nt to St. John's College, Cambridge. On leaving e university he became private secretary to his ative, Lord Hardwicke, who was then lord-lieu- nant of Ireland. He first obtained a seat in Par- ment for Carlow, but in 1807 he was elected for e family borough of Ripon. In 1809 he became nder-secretary of state for the colonies in the rceval administration. From the Colonial Office, nich was then also the War Office, Mr. Robinson ired with Lord Castlereagh, when that states- an withdrew from the Government on his arrel and duel with Mr. Canning, but in the llowing year his near relation becoming first d of the Admiralty, offered him a seat at the ard, and he remained a lord until, in 1812, the rmiership devolved on Lord Liverpool, in con- quence of the assassination of Mr. Perceval. der the auspices of the new chief he entered the vice-presidency of the Board of Trade, loying along with this office the emoluments first of a lord of the Treasury, and subsequently paymaster of the forces. He was then made rivy councillor. At the end of a few years he came president of the Board of Trade, and m the Board of Trade rose to the ministry finance. He was for four years chancellor of the Exchequer, and then returned once more to the Colonial Office, but now as secretary of state. In 1827, having previously been raised to the peerage as Viscount Goderich, he became first lord of the Treasury and prime minister. Through internal dissensions, however, the cabinet over which he presided gave way before it had an opportunity of meeting Parliament, and when he had been at the head of it three months. Lord Goderich was colonial secretary in Earl Grey's ministry of 1830, and became lord privy seal in 1833, receiving at the same time an earldom, taking his title from Ripon, the borough which had faithfully returned him to Parliament for twenty years. In 1834 he withdrew from the cabinet, alarmed at the ultra-Liberal propositions of the Reform administration in regard to the Irish Church. In Sir Robert Peel's government of 1841 the earl was president, first of the Board of Trade, and next of the Board of Control. On the break-up of Sir R. Peel's government in 1846 the earl retired from official life. Died 28 Jan., 1859. The earl of Ripon was the last of that race of cabinet ministers who ruled England in the dreary period between the conclusion of the war and the first Reform Bill, and whom Mr. Disraeli has satirised as a cluster of mediocrities, headed by an arch-mediocrity.

RIPPERDA, JOHN WILLIAM, BARON DE, was born of a noble family in Groningen. He rose to the rank of colonel of infantry in the Dutch service, and in 1715 was sent on a mission to Spain, where he insinuated himself into the favour of Philip V., who gave him the title of duke, and made him prime minister. His fall, however, was as rapid as his rise, and he was thrown into the castle of Segovia, where he remained till 1728, when he escaped to Portugal, from whence he passed to England, and next to Holland. He then offered his services to the Morocco ambassador, who accepted them, and Ripperda became as powerful in Africa as he had been in Spain. He now turned Mussulman, and assumed the name of Osman; but after some time he fell into disgrace, and was committed to prison. However, he regained his liberty, and went to Tetuan, where he died, in Nov., 1737.

RISHANGER, WILLIAM DE, an English chronicler, born 1250, became a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's, and was appointed historiographer to Henry III. He was living in 1322. His Chronicle was printed for the Camden Society 1840, under the editorship of J. O. Halliwell.

RITCHIE, LEITCH, novelist, was a native of Greenock, and commenced his literary career in early youth, whilst clerk in a mercantile firm, by starting a periodical called 'The Wanderer.' He afterwards removed to London, where he edited in succession 'The 'Englishman's Magazine,' 'The Era,' and 'The Indian News.' He also wrote the letterpress for such illustrated works as 'Turner's Annual Tour,' and 'Heath's Picturesque Annual,' besides superintending the issue of 'The Library of Romance,' to which he contributed the story of Schinderhannes, the Robber of the Rhine. He is principally known, however, by his tale of 'Wearyfoot Common,' originally published in Chambers' Journal, of which periodical he was editor for several years. Died 15 Jan., 1865.

RITSON, JOSEPH, a lawyer and antiquary, was born at Stockton, in Durham, 2 Oct., 1752. He settled in London as a conveyancer, and purchased the office of high-bailiff of the Savoy, which he held to his death on 3 Sept., 1803. As an antiquary, particularly in old poetry, he possessed merit, which was counterbalanced by pride and impiety. His principal publications are, A Collection of English Songs, 3 vols.; The English Anthology, 3 vols.; Robin Hood, a collection of Ballads, &c., 2 vols.; A Collection of Scotch Songs, 2 vols.; Biographia Poetica, a Catalogue of English Poets; On Abstinence from Animal Food.

RITTENHOUSE, DAVID, a mathematician, born in Pennsylvania 1732. He was a watchmaker; and in 1769 the American Philosophical Society employed him to observe the transit of Venus. He afterwards constructed an observatory, where he made some important discoveries. After the revolutionary war he was appointed director of the Mint, and treasurer of his native province. He also had the degree of doctor of laws conferred on him, and succeeded Franklin as president of the Philosophical Society. Many of his papers are in the Transactions of the Institution to which he belonged. Died 10 July, 1796.

RITTER, HENRY, a German philosopher, born at Zerbst 1791, was educated at the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Berlin. He devoted himself at an early age to the study of the chief ancient and modern systems of philosophy, and wrote 'History of Ancient Philosophy,' 1829-53; 'Essay on German Philosophy, down to Kant,' 1853; 'A History of Christian Philosophy;' and other works. Died at Göttingen 3 Feb., 1869.

RITTER, KARL, an eminent geographer, born in Prussia 1779, was educated at the university of Halle, and studied ancient history at Göttingen. He was subsequently appointed professor of geography at Frankfort. He wrote several learned works, including 'Geography considered in its relation to Nature and the History of Men,' 2 vols., 1817-18; 'History of the Nations of Europe before Herodotus,' 1820; 'On the Sources of the Nile,' 1844; 'On the Jordan and the Red Sea,' 1850; 'On Palestine and its Christian Population,' 1852; 'Introduction to the Study of Geography, with Remarks on a more scientific method of Geographical Studies,' 1853; besides Memoirs and Reports published in the Transactions of several learned societies. Died at Quedlinburg 29 Sept., 1859.

RITTERSHUSIUS, CONRADUS, a civilian, born at Brunswick 25 Sept., 1560. After taking his doctor's degree at Basil, he became professor of law at Altorf, where he died 25 May, 1613. He wrote some works on civil law, and notes upon Greek and Latin authors. His edition of Oppian was printed 1657.

RITTERSHUSIUS, NICHOLAS, son of the above, born at Altorf 1597, became professor of feudal law there; and died 1670. He published some of his father's works; also an oration on the 'Periplus of Hanno;' and a collection entitled 'Genealogia Imperatorum, Regum, Ducum, Comitum,' &c.

RITWYSE, JOHN, a grammarian, born at Salle, Norfolk, and educated at Eton, whence he removed to King's College, Cambridge, 1508. He became usher to William Lilly of St. Paul's School, and succeeded him in the mastership 1522. Ritwyse wrote a Latin tragedy, entitled 'Dido,' and published an improved edition of Lilly's Grammar. Died 1532.—Athen. Cantab.

RITZ, VALENTINE, a painter, resided above fifty years at Cambridge, and was buried at Little St. Mary's in that town 3 Jan., 1744-5. He was a native of Germany.

RIVE, JEAN JOSEPH, was born 19 May, 1730, at Apt, in Provence. He was brought up to the Church, but on the breaking out of the Revolution he became a furious anarchist, and ended a turbulent life at Marseilles 1792. His works are chiefly on subjects of bibliography and literary history.

RIVERS, ANTHONY WOODVILLE, EARL, was the son of Sir Richard Woodville, Lord Rivers, by Jacqueline of Luxemburg, duchess of Bedford. He was born about 1442; and, in his seventeenth year, accompanied his father on an expedition to deprive the earl of Warwick of the government of Calais, where they were made prisoners. When Edward IV. came to the throne, and married the daughter of Lord Rivers, Anthony Woodville was honoured with the Garter, and appointed captain-general of the king's forces. He was also made governor of Prince Edward, and chief butler of England. On the death of the king, the earl assembled a body of troops, with the intention of crowning his nephew; but his design was defeated by the duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III., who caused the gallant nobleman to be beheaded in the castle of Pontefract 13 June, 1483. Earl Rivers was the patron of Caxton, who printed 'The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers,' translated by him from the French, 1477; 'The Moral Proverbs of Christine of Pyse;' 'The Boke namd Cordyale or Memorare Novissima.' According to Caxton, Lord Rivers also 'made divers balades agenst the seven dedely synnes.' One of these ballads is in Percy's Reliques.

RIVET DE LA GRANGE, ANTOINE, a French Benedictine, was born in 1683, at Confolens, in Poictiers; and died in 1749. His works are, Le Necrologe de Port Royal des Champs; The Literary History of France, 9 vols. 4to. This last was extended by Clemencet to 13 vols.

RIVIÈRE, ROCH LE BAILLIF, SIEUR DE LA, a French physician and astrologer, was a native of Falaise. He followed the principles of Paracelsus, which subjected him to so much criticism, that he was obliged to make an apology for his doctrine. He published 'Demonsterion, sive 300 Aphorismi continentes summam Doctrinæ Paracelsicæ,' 1578, and in 1580 a 'Treatise on the Plague.' De la Rivière was also author of some other works, and died 5 Nov., 1605, at Paris. He had been first physician to Henry IV.

RIVINUS, AUGUSTUS QUIRINUS, a botanist, born at Leipsic 1652. He became professor of physiology and botany at his native place, where he died 1723. He published a 'Systema Plantarum,' and some works on medicine. His son and successor, John Augustus Rivinus, died in 1725.

RIZZIO, or RICCI, DAVID, a musician, born at Turin 1540, and brought up in France, where his father was a dancing-master. David visited Scotland about 1564, in the suite of the ambassador of Savoy; and there, by his vocal powers, attracted the notice of the unfortunate Queen Mary. Having once obtained a footing at court, Rizzio behaved in such a manner as to excite the envy and hatred of the courtiers; but there is every reason to believe that his religion contributed as much as anything to exasperate the Scots. On 9 March, 1566, Lord Darnley and some of the nobles murdered Rizzio in the queen's presence. As a performer ne excelled on the lute; but it is not true that he improved the music of Scotland.

ROBERT BRUCE, a Scotch gentleman, born about 1274. He opposed John Balliol for the crown of Scotland, which was awarded to the latter by Edward I. of England. When Balliol was deposed, Bruce was elected king, and in 1314 defeated the English at the battle of Bannockburn. He afterwards made peace with Edward III., who renounced all claim to Scotland, for himself and his heirs. Bruce died 7 June, 1329; and on his death-bed desired that his heart might be carried to the Holy Land, and deposited in the Holy Sepulchre.

ROBERT OF GENEVA. See CLEMENT VII.

ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER, the oldest of our English poets, lived in the time of Henry II. Camden quotes many of his old English rhymes, and speaks highly of him. He died about the beginning of the reign of King John, at an advanced age.

ROBERT, HUBERT, a French painter of architecture and landscape, born 1733 at Paris, where he died 15 April, 1808.

ROBERT, LOUIS LEOPOLD, a painter and engraver, born at La Chaux-de-Fonds, in the canton of Neufchâtel, Switzerland, 13 May, 1794; committed suicide at Venice 20 March, 1835. In 1810 he went to Paris to study engraving under Girardet, but he afterwards abandoned engraving altogether, and proceeding to Italy, devoted himself entirely to his pencil. His picture of 'The Reapers,' exhibited at the Louvre 1832, is his masterpiece. Among his other paintings are 'The Neapolitan improvisatore,' the 'Madonna del Arco,' and 'The Venetian Fisherman.'

ROBERTS, DAVID, an English painter, was born 1796, in Stockbridge, Edinburgh, where his father, John Roberts, was a shoemaker. At an early age he was apprenticed to a house-painter. Even while following this humble calling he showed that he possessed artistic talent of no ordinary kind, and he succeeded in procuring admission to the Academy of the Board of Trustees. In 1822 he was engaged as a scene-painter at Drury Lane, and in 1826 first appeared as an exhibitor in the Gallery of the Royal Academy of London. Subsequently he visited Spain, where he spent several years in the search for subjects for his pencil. In 1839 he was elected A.R.A., and in 1841 admitted to the full honours of an Academician. During a protracted visit to Syria and Egypt he made a marvellous collection of sketches, which were afterwards lithographed. They form the magnificent work entitled 'The Holy Land, Syria, Idumea, Arabia, Egypt, and Nubia' (4 vols. fol., 1842, &c.). The number of Mr. Roberts's paintings, and many of which were exhibited at the Royal Academy, is very great. He was certainly the best architectural painter that our country has produced. Nothing can be more effective than his views of cathedral interiors lit up with gorgeous pageants of the Roman Catholic religion. He gave a grand, broad effect; a truthful general result, and did not much trouble himself with minuteness of workmanship. He who began as a humble house-painter, and ended a Royal Academician, had not a little to boast of. He, too, belonged to that proud phalanx of men whose biographies touch most keenly all young ambition—the self-made men who, from small beginnings, have fought their way upwards to fame, wealth, and station. Mr. Roberts died in London 25 Nov., 1864.

ROBERTSON, FREDERICK WILLIAM, a popular preacher, eldest son of Capt. Frederick Robinson, R.A., was born in London 3 Feb., 1816. At the age of sixteen he was placed at the New Academy in Edinburgh, and he afterwards matriculated at Brasenose College, Oxford (B.A. 1841; M.A. 1844). Having held several curacies, he became in 1847 incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton. He then became one of the most popular preachers in the town, being gifted with a ready eloquence, for the support of which he usually carried only a few notes into the pulpit. His theological opinions were free from the trammels of any particular section of the Anglican Church; and his discourses were distinguished by the liberality of his sentiments, as well as by the poetical beauty of his thoughts. Mr. Robertson was also a favourite lecturer. Several volumes of his lectures and sermons have been published, and his 'Life and Letters,' edited by S. A. Brooke, appeared at London in 2 vols. 8vo., 1865; 3rd edition 1868.

ROBERTSON, JOSEPH, LL.D., a Scotch antiquary, was born at Aberdeen, and took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh. He was one of the chief founders of the Spalding Club, instituted in 1839, and he also rendered material assistance to the Maitland Club. In 1853 he was appointed curator of the Historical Department of Her Majesty's Register House, Edinburgh. Dr. Robertson's publications are, 'The Book of Bon-Accord;' 'The Diary of General Patrick Gordon;' 'Collections for the History of the Shires of Aberdeen and Banff;' 'Illustrations of the Topography of the Shires of Aberdeen and Banff,' which, like the two preceding, was edited for the Spalding Club; 'An Inventory of the Jewels and Personal Property of Queen Mary,' edited for the Bannatyne Club; 'Statuta Ecclesiæ Scoticanæ,' edited for the same club; and 'Memoir of the Episcopal Church.' Died 13 Dec., 1866.

ROBERTSON, THOMAS WILLIAM, a dramatist, born 9 Jan., 1829, and educated at Spalding, Lincolnshire, and in Holland, wrote some dramas for the minor theatres, which met with moderate success, and 'The Cantab,' a farce, produced at the Strand Theatre 1862. His reputation was established by the comedy 'Society,' brought out at the Prince of Wales's Theatre in Nov. 1865. It was followed by 'Ours,' produced at the same establishment 12 Sept., 1866; by 'Shadow Tree Shaft,' which proved a failure, produced at the Princess's Theatre 6 Feb., 1867; by 'Caste,' another success, first played at the Prince of Wales's Theatre April 6; and by 'For Love,' at the New Holborn Theatre 5 Oct., 1867. Died 3 Feb., 1871.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM, D.D., was born at Dublin 16 Oct., 1705. He studied at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A., 1725; but was expelled the university for the part he took in asserting the right of the students to choose a rector. Afterwards the proceedings were reversed, and he was restored. On taking orders he obtained some preferment in Ireland, which he vacated by turning Arian. In 1768 he was chosen master of the grammar-school at Wolverhampton, where he died 20 May, 1783. He published 'An Attempt to explain the words Reason, Substance, Person, Creeds, Orthodoxy, Catholic Church, Subscription, &c.' On sending a copy of this heretical publication to the university of Glasgow he was complimented with the degree of D.D.

ROBERTSON, WILLIAM, D.D., was born 1721, at Borthwick, in Mid Lothian, of which place his father was minister. He received his education first at Dalkeith, and next at the university of Edinburgh. In 1743 he was presented to the living of Gladsmuir; and when the Rebellion broke out, in 1745, he took up arms, as a volunteer, for the defence of the government. On the restoration of tranquillity he returned to his parochial duties; and while at Gladsmuir published a 'Sermon, preached before the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge in Scotland,' of which he lived to see fourteen editions. About this time he removed to Edinburgh, on being presented to one of the churches of that city. He was also appointed chaplain of Stirling Castle; in 1761 one of his majesty's chaplains in ordinary for Scotland; and the next year chosen principal of the university of Edinburgh. In 1764 the office of historiographer of Scotland, with a salary of £200 a-year, was revived in his favour; and he might have obtained high preferment in the Church of England if he had chosen to take episcopal orders, which he declined. His next work was the 'History of Charles V.,' which subject he adopted in preference to the History of England, though this last was expressly recommended to him by King George III. In 1777 he published the 'History of America,' for which he was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. Since his death two additional chapters to this work have been printed. The last publication of Dr. Robertson was 'An Historical Disquisition concerning the Knowledge which the Ancients had of India,' 1791. Died 11 June, 1793.

ROBERVAL, GILES-PERSONNE DE, a mathematician, born 8 Aug., 1602, at Roberval, in the diocese of Beauvais. He became professor of mathematics in the college of Maitre Gervais, and also in the Royal College at Paris. He was likewise a member of the Academy of Sciences, and died 27 Oct., 1675. His principal works are, A Treatise on Mechanics; another entitled 'Aristarchus Samos;' papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

ROBESPIERRE, FRANÇOIS MAXIMILIEN JOSEPH ISIDORE, a revolutionary monster, born at Arras 1758. Having lost his father in his childhood he was taken under the protection of the bishop of Arras, who sent him to the college of Louis le Grand, after which he studied the law, and was admitted an advocate in the council of Artois. About this time he published a treatise on Electricity, and another on Crimes and Punishments, in which he denied the right of society to put offenders to death. At the beginning of the Revolution he was elected a member of the States-General, where he obtained the name of 'Incorruptible,' by his constant declaration against political corruption. The Jacobin Club raised him to power, when a scene of blood followed, to which no parallel can be found in history. Robespierre and his creatures established the terrible tribunal called the Committee of Public Safety, which spread dismay and death throughout France. At length a confederacy was formed against the tyrant, who was arrested 27 July, 1794, but not till his lower jaw was broken by a pistol-shot; and the next day he suffered under the guillotine amidst the execrations of the multitude.

ROBIN HOOD. See HOOD.

ROBIN, JEAN, a distinguished botanist, keeper of the Jardin des Plantes at Paris, was born 1550; died 25 April, 1629. His son and successor, Vespasien Robin (b. 22 July, 1579; d. 5 Aug., 1662), was also a celebrated botanist.

ROBINS, BENJAMIN, a mathematician, born at Bath in 1707. He became a teacher of mathematics, and in 1742 published an excellent treatise on Gunnery, for which he received the gold medal from the Royal Society. On the return of Lord Anson from his voyage round the world, Mr. Robins was employed to prepare the narrative of that expedition for the press. The book came out, however, in the name of the chaplain of the 'Centurion.' In 1750 Mr. Robins went to India as engineer-general to the Company, but died at Madras 29 July, 1751. His mathematical tracts were printed in two vols., 1761.

ROBINSON, ANASTASIA. See PETERBOROUGH.

ROBINSON, EDWARD, an American philologist and Biblical scholar, born at Southington, Conn., 10 April, 1794; died 24 Jan., 1863.

ROBINSON, JOHN, pastor of the Pilgrim Fathers, was born 1575, probably in Lincolnshire, and educated at Cambridge, either in Emmanuel or Corpus Christi College. After holding for some time a benefice near Great Yarmouth, when a society of Dissenters was formed in the North of England, about 1602, he was chosen their pastor with Clifton. Persecution drove his congregation into Holland in 1608, and he soon followed them. At Amsterdam, where they found emigrants of the same religious sentiments, they remained about a year; but as the minister, J. Smith, was unsteady in his opinions, Robinson proposed a removal to Leyden. Here they continued eleven years, and their numbers so increased that they had in the church three hundred communicants. Robinson, when he first went to Holland, was a most rigid separatist from the Church of England; but by conversation with Dr. Ames and R. Parker he became more moderate, though he condemned the use of the liturgy, and the indiscriminate admission to the sacraments. In 1613 Episcopius, one of the professors of the university of Leyden, the successor of Arminius, and of the same doctrine with him, published some theses, which he engaged to defend against all opposers. Robinson, being earnestly requested to accept the challenge by Polyander, the other professor, who was a Calvinist, held a disputation in the presence of a numerous assembly, and completely foiled Episcopius his antagonist. In 1617, when another removal was contemplated, Robinson entered zealously into the plan of making a settlement in America. Having succeeded in the negotiations, a minority of the congregation, under the lead of Brewster, the ruling elder, set out, 1620, in two ships, the 'Speedwell' and the 'Mayflower,' which could hold only a small number. It was the intention of Robinson to follow with the rest of the congregation; but he died 1 March, 1625, before the consent of the association of English merchants who controlled the enterprise could be obtained. Mr. Robinson, who was an acute controversialist, and highly versed in classical learning, published 'A Justification of Separation from the Church of England,' 1610; 'Of Religious Communion,' 1614; 'Apologia Justa et Necessaria,' 1619, translated into English 1644; 'Defence of the Doctrine propounded by the Synod of Dort,' 1624; 'A Treatise of the Lawfulness of Learning of the Ministers of the Church in England,' 1634; and 'Essays or Observations, Divine and Moral,' 1628, 2nd edition 1638. His collected Works, with a memoir by Robert Ashton, were published in 3 vols. at London, 1851.

ROBINSON, JOHN, a prelate and statesman, born at Cleasby, Yorkshire, 7 Nov., 1650. He took his degrees at Oriel College, Oxford, after which he went as chaplain to the embassy at Stockholm, where he also became the resident minister, and while there wrote an 'Account of Sweden.' On his return to England he was made dean of Windsor and prebendary of Canterbury. In 1710 he was consecrated bishop of Bristol; and soon after appointed lord privy seal, next a lord of trade and plantations, and subsequently one of the plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht. In 1714 he was translated to London. Died 11 April, 1723.

ROBINSON, MARY, was the daughter of Captain Darby, of Bristol, and born there 1758. She married at the early age of sixteen; but her husband being a profligate, and her own disposition gay, she soon fell into trouble, to relieve herself from which she had recourse to the stage. In this situation, while acting 'Perdita,' in the Winter's Tale, she attracted the particular notice of the prince of Wales; but this connection did not last long. She next lived with a general officer, but being deprived of the use of her limbs by a rheumatic fever, she retired on a pension to Englefield Green, and died there 28 Dec., 1800. Her writings consist of novels, poems, and 'Memoirs of her own Life.' Mrs. Robinson left a daughter, who published some poems, and died 1818.

ROBINSON, RICHARD, archbishop of Armagh, and Baron Rokeby, was born in Yorkshire in 1709. He was educated at Westminster School, and next at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1751 he accompanied the duke of Dorset to Ireland, and the same year was advanced to the bishopric of Killaloe; from whence he was translated in 1759 to Leighlin and Ferns, in 1761 to Kildare, and in 1765 to the primacy. In 1777 he was elevated to the temporal peerage, and in 1783 appointed prelate of the order of St. Patrick. In 1785 he succeeded his brother in the baronetcy, and was the last survivor of the Robinsons of Rokeby in the male line. He died at Clifton in Oct., 1794. The archbishop, besides building a palace at Armagh, with an observatory, founded a school and a public library there, which last he furnished with a large collection of books, and left a liberal endowment for its support.

ROBINSON, ROBERT, a Baptist minister, was born at Swaffham, Norfolk, Oct., 1735. He was apprenticed to a banker in London; but at the age of twenty he became a preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists. Afterwards he turned Baptist, and in 1759 was chosen minister by a congregation of that persuasion at Cambridge. His stipend being small, he helped it out by turning dealer in corn and coals. Amidst these occupations he acquired a knowledge of the languages, and published some works which obtained celebrity. The principal of these were a translation of Saurin's sermons, and a tract against Lindsey entitled 'A Plea for the Divinity of Christ.' His principles, however, were far from being settled, and at length he became an avowed Socinian. He died suddenly at Birmingham 8 June, 1790. His last work was a 'History of Baptism,' published after his death, with another volume entitled 'Ecclesiastical Researches.'

ROBINSON, TANCRED, M.D., was born in Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge (M.D. 1685). He became a member of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he was a frequent contributor on subjects of natural history. Many of his letters are also in Ray's Correspondence. Died 29 March, 1748.

ROBINSON, THOMAS, born at Wakefield 29 Aug., 1749, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; and held the living of St. Mary's, Leicester, from 1788 till his death on 24 March, 1813. Mr. Robinson, who entertained Calvinistic opinions, wrote 'Scripture Characters;' 'The Christian System unfolded;' sermons and tracts.

ROBISON, JOHN, was born 1739, at Boghall, Stirlingshire. He received his education at the college of Glasgow; on leaving which he became mathematical tutor to a son of Admiral Knowles. In 1762 the lords of the Admiralty appointed him to go out to Jamaica for the purpose of ascertaining the accuracy of Harrison's timekeeper. On his return he renewed his studies at Glasgow, and in 1769 succeeded Dr. Black as reader in chemistry. The year following he went with Sir Charles Knowles to St. Petersburg, and while there was made inspector of the corps of marine cadets. On receiving an invitation to the chair of natural philosophy at Edinburgh he quitted Russia, accompanied by some pupils, who wished to profit by his instructions. When the Royal Society of Scotland was instituted in 1783, Mr. Robison was chosen secretary, and several of his papers are in the Transactions of that learned body. In 1798 he published an extraordinary book entitled 'Proofs of a Conspiracy against the Religions and Governments of Europe,' for which he obtained the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Glasgow. He next edited the lectures of Dr. Black, which he illustrated with notes. His last publication was the 'Elements of Mechanical Philosophy.' Died 30 Jan., 1805.

ROBSON, FREDERIC, a comedian, whose real name was Brounbill, born at Margate 1821; died 12 Aug., 1864.

ROBSON, GEORGE FENNEL, an eminent painter in water-colours, was the son of a wine-merchant of Durham, where he was born 1790. From his earliest infancy he manifested a decided taste for drawing, and he was accordingly put under Mr. Harle, the only drawing-master his native city furnished. At the age of sixteen he came to London. His first publication was a view of his native city, the profits of which enabled him to visit the Highlands of Scotland. In the habit of a shepherd, with a wallet at his back and Scott's Poems in his pocket, he wandered over the mountains, winter and summer, until he became familiar with the various aspects they presented under the different changes of season, and laid up a stock of materials which lasted him his life. On his return he published 'Outlines of the Grampian Mountains' (1819). In 1813 he first appeared as an exhibitor in the ninth annual exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, and he was elected a member the following year; but it was not till the exhibition of 1815 that his works commanded that public attention which gained for him extensive and abundant patronage. Among his numerous works we may mention a 'View of London from the Bridge before Sunrise,' and 'The City of Durham from the North East.' He also drew 'Picturesque Views of the English Cities,' published with letterpress descriptions by Mr. Britton in 1826. Many of his drawings were made conjointly with Mr. Hills, whose admirable mode of treating animals accorded perfectly with Mr. Robson's magnificent and characteristic backgrounds. Died 8 Sept., 1833.

ROCCA, Angelo, an ecclesiastic, born at Rocca Contrata, in the march of Ancona, 1545. He took his doctor's degree in divinity at Padua, and in 1579 obtained a place in the Vatican, where also he had the superintendence of the Apostolic press. He died 8 April, 1620, and left his library to the public. He wrote several bibliographical and antiquarian works in Latin.

ROCHAMBEAU, Donatien Marie Joseph de Vimeur, Comte de, son of Marshal Rochambeau, mentioned below, was born 1750. He accompanied his father to America; was sent to St. Domingo 1792, and to Martinique 1793. He drove the English from the latter colony, and caused the French republican government to be recognised; but soon afterwards, being besieged in Port Royal by superior forces, he was compelled to capitulate 1794. He accompanied General Leclerc to St. Domingo, defeated Toussaint-Louverture in 1802, and on Leclerc's death he became commander-in-chief. In 1803, his troops having been decimated by sickness, he was obliged to surrender to the insurgents, who delivered him over to the English, and he did not regain his freedom till 1811. Afterwards he was employed in the German army, and fell at the battle of Leipsic 18 Oct., 1813.

ROCHAMBEAU, Jean Baptiste Donatien de Vimeur, Comte de, marshal of France, born at Vendôme 1 July, 1725. He entered the military service 1742, and became a brigadier of infantry after having distinguished himself at the capture of Minorca 1756. In 1780, being then lieutenant-general, he was sent to America with six thousand men; and in the following year he acted in concert with Washington in the operations which brought about the capitulation of Cornwallis at Yorktown. On his return to France, after the peace of 1783, he was appointed governor of Picardy and Artois. In 1791 he received a marshal's bâton. The same year he was invested with the command of the Army of the North; but after an unsuccessful attempt to restore discipline in it, he resigned 1792. In 1793 he was sentenced to death by the Revolutionary tribunal; but on his name being called for execution, it was found that the cart which conveyed the prisoners to the place of execution was already full, and the superintending officer pushed him back, saying, 'Stand back, old fellow; your turn will come later.' However, Robespierre fell before his turn came, and he was liberated. Died 10 May, 1807. His 'Memoires' were published in 2 vols., 1809.

ROCHEFOUCAULD, François, Duc de la, prince of Marsillac, a French author and moralist, born 15 Dec., 1613. He distinguished himself as one of the most brilliant young noblemen about the court, and formed a connection with the famous duchess of Longueville, which involved him in the civil war of the Fronde. At the battle of St. Antoine, in Paris, he signalized his courage, and received a musket-shot, which for some time deprived him of sight. When these troubles were terminated, and he had made his peace with the government, he devoted himself to the pleasures of society and literature. His house was the resort of the best company at Paris in point of talents and understanding, and his conversation was relished by such persons as Boileau, Racine, Sévigné, and La Fayette. He died at Paris 17 March, 1680. He made himself famous by a work entitled 'Reflexions et Maximes,' many times printed, and abundantly both praised and criticized. The fundamental principle of this work is that self-love is the motive of all our actions. The duke also wrote 'Mémoires de la Régence d'Anne d'Autriche,' 2 vols. 1713.

ROCHESTER, John Wilmot, earl of, was the son of Henry, earl of Rochester, and born 1647. He was educated at the grammar-school of Burford, and at the age of twelve became a student of Wadham College, Oxford. On leaving the university he travelled, and at his return was made one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, and comptroller of Woodstock Park. In 1665 he went to sea with the earl of Sandwich, and behaved gallantly, but afterwards declined in reputation, and led a very dissipated life, though he was much admired for his wit and good-nature. At length, worn out with debauchery, he fell into a decline, and died penitent 26 July, 1680. His poems are highly indecent.

ROCHESTER, Laurence Hyde, earl of, K.G., second son of Edward, earl of Clarendon, the lord chancellor, was early engaged about the court. He was made, in 1661, master of the robes to the king, and in 1676 he was sent as ambassador to Poland, and was present as plenipotentiary at the congress of Nimeguen. He was appointed first lord of the Treasury 1679, and warmly opposed the bill which was brought into Parliament to exclude the duke of York from the succession; and for his services he was raised to the peerage 1681 by the title of viscount Hyde, and afterwards earl of Rochester. In 1684 he was appointed president of the Council, lord treasurer, and in 1685 made Knight of the Garter. At the Revolution he was one of the ecclesiastical commissioners, and was sent in 1700 to Ireland as lord-lieutenant. His abilities recommended him equally in the next reign, as under Anne he was made president of the Council. Died 1711.

ROCHFORD, Lord. See Boleyn.

ROCHFORD, George Boleyn, viscount, brother of Anne Boleyn, the second queen of Henry VIII., was educated at Oxford, where he applied himself to poetry. In 1529 he became Viscount Rochfort, and after the marriage of Henry VIII. to his sister he was employed in several embassies, and appointed constable of Dover Castle, and warden of the Cinque Ports; but when that tyrant became jealous of his consort, the charge of incest was brought against his lordship, who was beheaded on Tower Hill 17 May, 1536. He wrote poems, songs, and sonnets.

ROCK, Daniel, D.D., Catholic archæologist, a native of Liverpool, born in 1799, was educated at Old Hall, Herts, and at the English College, Rome. Having entered into holy orders and served the mission in London for two years, he became in 1827 domestic chaplain to the late earl of Shrewsbury, till, leaving Alton Towers, Staffordshire, he was appointed, in 1840, to the care of the Catholic congregation at Buckland, near Farringdon. On the reintroduction into England of the Catholic hierarchy in 1852 he was one of the first canons of Southwark, and resigned his pastoral charge in Berks, in order to live near London, in 1854. He wrote 'Hierurgia, or the Sacrifice of the Mass expounded,' London, 1833, in 2 vols. 8vo., and in a second edition, 8vo., somewhat enlarged, in 1 vol., 1851, in which he illustrates most of the doctrines and ceremonies of the Church among the Latins, Greeks, and Orientals, not only by written evidences, but from paintings, sculptures, and inscriptions, found in the catacombs or elsewhere, belonging to the earliest ages of faith; 'The Church of our Fathers, as seen in St. Osmond's Rite for the Cathedral of Salisbury, with Dissertations on the Belief and Ritual in England before and after the Coming of the Normans;' and 'Did the Early Church in Ireland acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy?' published in 1844—the two last-mentioned works treat principally of our national ecclesiastical antiquities; 'Transubstantiation Vindicated;' 'The Mystic Crown of Mary, the Holy Maiden-Mother of God, born free from the stain of Original Sin,' in verse, 8vo., London, 1857; and other smaller productions. In 1862 he took an active part, as one of the committee, in carrying out the object of the 'Special Exhibition of Works of Art on Loan, chiefly of the Mediæval Period,' at the South Kensington Museum; and contributed the article in the official catalogue on 'Ecclesiastical Vestments, Tissues, and Embroideries,' there exhibited. In 1870 he wrote 'Textile Fabrics; a Descriptive Catalogue of the Collection of Church Vestments, Dresses, Silk Stuffs, Needle-work, and Tapestries forming that section of the South Kensington Museum.' He died at Kensington 28 Nov., 1871.

ROCKINGHAM, CHARLES WATSON WENTWORTH, MARQUIS OF, K.G., born 13 May, 1730, succeeded his father in the marquisate at the age of 20. Though his natural abilities were not great, his amiability, generosity, and integrity, along with his vast wealth, combined to make him a prominent political leader. In 1765 he succeeded George Grenville in the premiership, with the position of first lord of the Treasury, and from that time till his death was the acknowledged leader of the liberal branch of the aristocracy. The ministry of which he was the head had not in it one man of commanding ability, and was ill-fitted to cope with a powerful opposition and with the distracted condition of the American colonies. Although it contained members who had voted against the passage of the Stamp Act, it did not undertake to repeal it, but made preparations to execute it in all the colonies. The general resistance which the attempt met with throughout America, and the impossibility of enforcing its provisions except at the point of the bayonet, led to a repeal of the Act in March, 1766; but at the same time an Act was passed declaring the supreme power of Parliament over America in all cases whatsoever. On July 12 Rockingham retired from power, and during the administration of Lord North was at the head of the aristocratic portion of the Opposition. On the resignation of North, Rockingham formed a ministry in March, 1782, which ended at his death on 1 July the same year.

RODNEY, GEORGE BRYDGES, LORD, was the son of Captain Henry Rodney, a naval officer. He was born at Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, 19 Feb., 1718, entered early into the navy, and in 1742 obtained the command of a ship. In 1749 he was appointed Governor of Newfoundland, and on his return, in 1753, married the sister of the earl of Northampton. In 1759 he was made admiral of the Blue, and the same year destroyed the stores prepared at Havre de Grace for an invasion of England. In 1761 he served on the West India station with such activity that at the conclusion of the war he was made a baronet. In 1768 he was elected into Parliament for Northampton; but the contest ruined his estate. In 1771 he went to Jamaica as commander-in-chief, and at the expiration of the term of service retired to France, where overtures were made to him on the part of that government, which he refused with indignation. In 1779 he was again called into employment; and the year following, by defeating the Spanish fleet, under Langara, off Cape St. Vincent, he saved Gibraltar. After this he went to the West Indies, where, on the 12th of April, 1782, he gained a great victory over Count de Grasse, for which he was made a peer. He died in London 24 May, 1792.

ROE, Sir THOMAS, was born about 1580, at Low Layton, Essex, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford; after which he became a student of one of the inns of court. In 1604 he was knighted, and soon after went to make discoveries in America. In 1614 he was sent on an embassy to the Mogul, at whose court he remained three years. In 1621 he went in the same capacity to Constantinople, and during his residence there collected a number of manuscripts, which he presented to the Bodleian Library. He also brought over the Alexandrian copy of the Greek Bible, which is in the British Museum. In 1629 Sir Thomas negotiated a peace between Poland and Sweden; and it was by his advice that Gustavus Adolphus entered Germany, where he gained the battle of Leipsic. In 1640 he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford in Parliament. The next year he was sent ambassador to the diet of Ratisbon, and on his return was made chancellor of the Garter. He died in Nov., 1644. In 1622 was published his 'True and faithful Relation of what hath lately happened in Constantinople;' and in 1740 appeared 'The Negotiations of Sir Thomas Roe in his Embassy to the Ottoman Porte, from 1621 to 1628.'

ROEBUCK, JOHN, M.D., was born at Sheffield 1718. He was educated at Northampton, and next at Edinburgh; but took his doctor's degree at Leyden in 1743; after which he settled at Birmingham, where he began to apply chemistry to practical uses. In these pursuits he was joined by Mr. Garbett; and they established, together, a manufacture of the oil of vitriol at Prestonpans. The doctor now gave up the medical profession, and soon after fixed his residence at Carron, where he instituted an extensive iron foundry, by which he would have realized an immense fortune, had he not unfortunately taken a lease of the duke of Hamilton's coal and salt works at Borrowstounness, whereby he ruined himself, and was obliged to dispose of all his other concerns, among which was his share in the steam-engine patent. He died 17 July, 1794. Some of his papers are in the Transactions of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh.

ROELAS, JUAN DE LAS, a Spanish painter and ecclesiastic, was born at Seville about 1560, and died 23 April, 1625, at Olivares, where he held a canonry.

ROEMER, OLAUS, a Danish astronomer, born 1644; became professor of astronomy at Copenhagen 1681, and died there 19 Sept., 1710. He discovered, by the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites, the velocity of night.

ROGERS, JOHN, born at Birmingham about 1509, was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B.A. 1526), and subsequently became chaplain to the English merchants at Antwerp, where he embraced Protestant opinions, and became intimate with Tyndal and Coverdale. In 1537 he set forth, abroad—but at what particular place is uncertain, and under the assumed name of Thomas Matthews—a translation into English of the Bible. At the accession of Edward VI. Rogers returned to England, and was made prebendary of St. Paul's; but when Mary came to the throne he was burnt in Smithfield 4 Feb., 1554-5, being the first of many who suffered death in that reign for their adherence to the Protestant religion.—Athen. Cantab.

ROGERS, JOHN, D.D., was born at Ensham, Oxfordshire, 1679, and educated at Oxford, being elected to a fellowship at Corpus Christi College. After completing his degrees in arts, he was presented to the vicarage of Buckland, in Berkshire, whence he removed to London, and became lecturer of St. Clement Danes; and also of Christ Church, Newgate Street. In 1716 he was instituted to the rectory of Wrington, Somersetshire; and some time after elected canon residentiary of Wells, of which church he became sub-dean. In 1719 he published 'A Discourse of the visible and invisible Church of Christ;' which he afterwards defended against Sykes, in 'A Review of the Discourse.' In 1726 he was appointed chaplain to the prince of Wales; and about the same time he published 'Eight Sermons on the Necessity of Divine Revelation,' against Collins, who retorted in a 'Letter to Dr. Rogers;' which drew from the latter 'A Vindication of the Civil Establishment of Religion.' In 1728 he was presented to the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He died 1 May, 1729; and after his decease two volumes of his sermons were published.

ROGERS, SAMUEL, F.R.S., F.S.A., a poet, wit, and patron of art, born 30 July, 1763, at Stoke Newington, Middlesex. His father was a London banker, and an eminent man among the dissenters. At a very early period of life young Rogers applied himself to the study of art and letters, which he perfected by extensive foreign travels. His first published essay in poetry was an 'Ode to Superstition, with some other Poems,' 1786. In 1792 appeared 'The Pleasures of Memory,' a poem in two parts, written in English heroics, with rhyme and with great elegance of language and correctness of thought. This work was the means of introducing him to Mr. Fox, an introduction that coloured the whole career of the poet, for no one could be ten minutes in Rogers's company without hearing some friendly reference to the name of Fox. The death of his father in 1793 left him in the possession of an ample fortune, and shortly afterwards he retired from active participation in business. His third publication, and his masterpiece, in the opinion of many, was his 'Epistle to a Friend, and other Poems,' 1798. In 1812 he published another poem, the 'Voyage of Columbus,' which met with indifferent success. This was followed by 'Jacqueline, a Tale,' 1814; and 'Human Life,' 1819. His last and largest publication was his descriptive poem of 'Italy,' 1822, which passed through several editions. He dedicated the remainder of his literary life to the publication of exquisitely illustrated editions of his 'Italy,' and his 'Poems.' For more than half a century he figured in the foremost rank of London literary society. It may indeed be doubted whether any English poet ever lived so much in the eyes of men and women as the Banker Bard of St. James's Place, where he pitched his tent in 1803. Rogers's 'Table Talk' was published shortly after his death, which occurred 18 Dec., 1855.

ROGET, PETER MARK, M.D., F.R.S., an English physician, born in London 1779; died at Malvern 13 Sept., 1869. As a scientific writer he is best known by his work on 'Animal and Vegetable Physiology,' published in 1834 as one of the Bridgewater Treatises. His 'Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases' has passed through many editions.

ROHAN, HENRI, DUC DE, was born 1579, at the castle of Blein, in Brittany. After the death of Henry IV. he was considered as the head of the Protestants, and he carried on three wars in their favour against Louis XIII., who, however, was reconciled to him in 1629. The duke then went into the Venetian service; but in 1631 he became generalissimo of the Grisons. He was mortally wounded in an action with the Imperialists 1638. He wrote, Memoirs; 'Les interests des Princes;' 'Le parfait Capitaine, ou l'Abrégé des Guerres des Commentaires de César;' and Memoirs relative to the War of the Valteline. His widow, Marguerite de Bethune, daughter of the great Sully, was a courageous woman, and defended Castres against the maréchal de Themines. She died in 1660. Benjamin de Rohan, brother of Henry, took the Isle of Rhé in 1625; but lost it again soon after, and came to England, where he died in 1630. Anne Rohan, sister of the duke, was distinguished by her spirit, learning, and piety. At the taking of Rochelle, she and her mother refused to be included in the capitulation, and were made prisoners of war. She wrote a poem on the death of Henry IV.; and studied the Scriptures in their original tongues. She died in 1646.

ROHAN, LOUIS RENÉ EDOUARD, Prince DE, French ambassador at Vienna, bishop of Strasburg, cardinal, and grand almoner of France, was born 1734. He is known by his gallantries, his dilapidations, and especially by his acting the part of dupe in the famous affair of the Diamond Necklace. For this he was tried before the Parliament and acquitted 1786. On the convocation of the States-General (1789) he was elected deputy by the clergy of Haguenau. He resigned his bishopric on the conclusion of the concordat (1801), and died at Ettenheim 16 Feb., 1803.

ROLAND, MANON JEANNE PHILEPON, wife of M. Roland, one of the agents in the French Revolution, was born at Paris 1754, and married 1780. Her husband then resided at Lyons, as a manufacturer; but being chosen a member of the constituent assembly, he removed, with his wife, to Paris, where this extraordinary woman made her house the rendezvous of the Brissotine faction. At the beginning of 1792 Roland was appointed minister of the interior; but his wife was said to have transacted all the business; and complaints were alleged against her, of which she endeavoured to clear herself in an eloquent speech at the bar of the convention. At length Roland, finding it impossible to escape the vengeance of his enemies, destroyed himself; and his widow lost her head on the scaffold in November, 1793. She wrote 'Opuscules,' on moral subjects; 'Voyage en

Angleterre et en Suisse;' and left a manuscript memoir of herself, entitled 'Appel à l'impartiale Posterité.'

ROLAND, PHILIPPE LAURENT, a French sculptor, professor in the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, was born at Marcq, near Lille, 13 Aug., 1746, and died at Paris 11 July, 1816.

ROLLE, Sir HENRY, was born at Heanton, Devonshire, 1589. He was educated at Exeter College, Oxford; after which he became a student of the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar. He was also chosen a member of Parliament, and in 1640 made a serjeant-at-law. In 1648 he accepted the office of chief justice of the court of the Upper Bench; but resigned his seat some time before his death, which happened 30 July, 1656. His 'Reports,' in French, were printed in 2 vols. folio, 1675. He also wrote 'An Abridgement of Cases and Resolutions of the Law,' which was published by Sir Matthew Hale.

ROLLI, PAOLO ANTONIO, a native of Rome, who came to England, and was employed in teaching some of the children of George II. He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He died at Rome 1767, aged 80. He published, in London, a collection of poems; also editions of several Italian authors, particularly the Decameron of Boccaccio. He was likewise the editor of Marchetti's 'Lucretius;' and he translated Milton's Paradise Lost into Italian verse.

ROLLIN, CHARLES, a French writer, born at Paris 30 Jan. 1661. He was educated in the college of Du Plessis, where he became assistant to his tutor, M. Hersan, professor of rhetoric, who afterwards declined the chair of eloquence in his favour. In 1694 he was chosen rector of the university, in which office he continued two years; and then Cardinal Noailles engaged him to superintend the education of his nephews, at the college of Laon. After this he was made coadjutor to the principal of the college of Beauvais; which seminary was then in a desolate state, but Rollin soon made it a flourishing society. In 1712 he was deprived of his situation by the intrigues of the Jesuits, who had also interest enough to displace him when elected, the third time, rector of the university of Paris. Rollin now composed his work 'On the Manner of studying and teaching the Belles Lettres,' 4 vols. This was followed by his 'Ancient History,' and nine volumes of the 'Roman History.' He also published a valuable edition of Quintilian, with notes. He died 14 Sept., 1741.

ROMAGNOSI, GIAN DOMENICO, an Italian jurist, born at Salso, near Piacenza, 13 Dec., 1761. Sent to Parma to study law, he was created a doctor 1785. At this period the false theories of Beccaria and Filangieri were in fashion, and Romagnosi published in 1787 his great work, 'Genesi del Diritto Penale' (3 vols.), the fourth edition of which work appeared at Florence 1832. He was appointed chief civil magistrate of Trent 1791, and afterwards aulic councillor. Romagnosi was opposed to the French Revolution, but he was appointed professor of jurisprudence first at Parma (1802), next at Pisa (1807), and finally at Milan (1808). Meanwhile he published his most important work, 'Introduzione allo studio del Diritto Publico Universale' 1805; and was employed with other publicists in framing a new code for the kingdom of Italy. After being deprived of all his offices on the fall of Napoleon, he published upwards of twenty works; the principal of which were reprinted collectively at Florence, 5 vols. 1834. Died at Milan 8 June, 1835.

ROMAINE, WILLIAM, was born of a French family, at Hartlepool, co. Durham, 25 Sept., 1714. After receiving his education at the school of Houghton-le-Spring he went to Hertford College, Oxford; but migrated thence to Christ Church, where, in 1737, he took his degree of M.A. One of his first sermons, before the university, was directed against Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses, which produced a bitter reply from that powerful writer. After this Mr. Romaine engaged in an edition of Calasio's Hebrew Concordance, into which he foisted some alterations, to serve the Hutchinsonian system. In 1748 he obtained the lectureship of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; the year following he was chosen lecturer of St. Dunstan's in the West; and in 1750 he was appointed assistant morning preacher at St. George's, Hanover Square. Soon after this he was elected Gresham professor of astronomy, which situation he soon resigned. He obtained such popularity by his opposition to the bill for the naturalization of the Jews, that his publications on that subject were printed by the Corporation of London. In 1764 he was elected to the living of St. Anne, Blackfriars, where, as well as at St. Dunstan's, he continued to officiate till his death, 26 July, 1795. Mr. Romaine was a zealous Calvinist, but firmly attached to the Established Church. His works are, Comment on the 107th Psalm; Twelve Sermons on Solomon's Song; Twelve Discourses on the Law and Gospel; The Life of Faith; The Walk of Faith, 2 vols.; The Triumph of Faith; occasional Sermons and Tracts.

ROMANELLI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, born 1617, at Viterbo, where he died 1662.

ROMANI, FELIX, one of the most famous librettists of Italy, died in 1864, or the beginning of 1865. The operas 'Norma' and 'L'Elisir' were his most successful productions.

ROMANO, GIULIO. See GIULIO.

ROMANOFF, VICE-ADMIRAL, an illustrious ornament of the Russian navy, died in 1864.

ROMANUS, Pope, succeeded Stephen VI. 897, and died 8 Feb., 898.

ROMBOUTS, THEODORE, a painter, was born at Antwerp in 1597, and died in that city in 1637, or 1640. He affected to be the rival of Rubens; but though he stood no chance of success in such a competition, he possessed merit as an artist, particularly in representing mountebanks, musicians, &c.

ROMILLY, JOHN, a celebrated clock-maker of Geneva, born 1714. He invented many improvements in the construction of time-keepers, particularly in the beating of seconds. He died at Paris 16 Feb., 1796. All the articles on clockwork in the Encyclopédie were written by him; and he also established the 'Journal de Paris' in 1777. He published, separately, a letter on the perpetual motion. His son, John Edm. Romilly, became a minister of the Calvinistic communion, at Geneva and London, and died in 1779. He wrote, Religious Discourses; and the articles on 'Toleration' and 'Vertu,' in the Encyclopédie.

ROMILLY, Rev. JOSEPH, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge (B.A. 1813; Fellow 1815; M.A. 1816). In 1832 he was elected registrary of the university, and retained that office until his death, on 7 Aug., 1864. He put the numerous and important records committed to his care into most admirable order, and compiled useful indexes to facilitate reference, to the lasting benefit of the university. Mr. Romilly compiled, with great care and remarkable accuracy, two editions of 'Graduati Cantabrigienses,' the last of which appeared in 1856.

ROMILLY, Sir SAMUEL, was the son of a jeweller in Frith Street, Westminster, and born there 1 March, 1757. His education was private and contracted; after which he became a clerk in an attorney's office, but left that situation to study in one of the inns of court. In 1783 he was called to the bar; and for several years confined his practice to draughts in equity. At length he rose to distinction in the court of chancery; and in the last administration of Mr. Fox was made solicitor-general, when he received the honour of knighthood. When the party to whom he was attached went out of office, he also retired; but still continued in Parliament, where he displayed great powers in debate. He exerted himself in endeavouring to effect a revision of the criminal code, with a view to the limitation of capital punishments to a few heinous offences; on which subject he published an able pamphlet; as he also did another against the erection of the office of vice-chancellor. The death of this eminent man was melancholy. Shocked at the loss of his wife, who died of a dropsy, in the Isle of Wight, he became delirious, and destroyed himself, 2 Nov., 1818.

ROMNEY, GEORGE, a painter, was born at Dalton, in Lancashire, in 1734. He was intended for his father's business, which was that of a builder; but discovering a turn for drawing, he was placed with a country artist. He then became an itinerant portrait painter, and married; but in 1762 he left his wife, and set out for London. In 1765 he gained a prize from the Society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce; and in 1773 he went to Italy. On his return to England he rose very high in reputation, not only in portrait, but in history, of which he gave several specimens in the pictures he painted for Boydell's Shakspere. Died 15 Nov., 1802.

RONSARD, PIERRE DE, a French poet, born in Vendômois 1524. He became page to the duke of Orleans, who resigned him to James V. of Scotland, with whom he lived two years, and then returned to the service of his former master, who employed him in several negotiations. After this he learnt Greek under Dorat; but devoted himself chiefly to poetry, in which he gained a great reputation. He also distinguished himself as a soldier, and fought against the Protestants; for which he was rewarded with the priory of St. Cosmes, near Tours, where he died 27 Dec., 1585. His works were published by Richelet, in 2 vols. folio, 1623.

ROOKE, Sir GEORGE, an admiral, was born in Kent 1650. He entered early into the naval service, and had the command of several expeditions in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne, all of which he conducted with equal skill and courage. In 1702 he at acked the French fleet in the harbour of Vigo, and took several galleons and men of war, besides destroying a number of others. In 1704 he made himself master of Gibraltar; notwithstanding which, such was the violence of party, Sir George was soon afterwards superseded by the Whigs, who endeavoured to lessen his services by representing them as the effects of mere chance and good fortune. Died 24 Jan., 1708-9.

ROOKE, LAURENCE, a mathematician, born at Deptford 1623. He was educated at Eton, and next at King's College, Cambridge; but after taking his master's degree, he went to Oxford and entered himself at Wadham College. In 1652 he obtained the Gresham professorship of astronomy, which he afterwards exchanged for that of geometry. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society, and died 27 June, 1662. Several of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions.

ROOKER, MICHAEL, an engraver, born 1743. He studied under his father, who excelled in architectural subjects. Afterwards he was placed with Paul Sandby, who gave him the name of Michael Angelo. Rooker was not only a good engraver, but an excellent scene painter. Some of his principal plates are those which he executed for the Oxford Almanacks. Died 3 March, 1801.

ROOTHAAN, JOHN PHILIP, was born at Amsterdam 23 Nov., 1785; elected general of the Society of Jesus 9 July, 1829; and died at Rome 8 May, 1853.

ROSA, SALVATOR, a celebrated painter, was born at Renella, a village near Naples, 20 June, 1615. After studying under Francanzani, he became a disciple of Ribera, with whom he went to Rome. Prince John Charles de' Medici took him to Florence, where he stayed nine years, dividing his time between painting, poetry, and music. He wrote plays and performed parts in them, besides which he composed many cantatas. While at Florence he painted a number of pictures for the grand duke and his son, who rewarded him liberally. The Maffei family also proved great friends to Salvator; and it was at their seat that he wrote his satires, which have been often printed. On his return to Rome he executed many pictures for churches; but his principal merit lay in the representation of the wild scenery of nature, storms, and subjects of the most terrific description. Died 15 March, 1673.

ROSAMOND, FAIR. See CLIFFORD.

ROSCIUS, QUINTUS, a Roman actor, was born at Lanuvium. He was so celebrated for his powers of representation that his name has ever since been the characteristic distinction of performers of pre-eminent merit. When falsely accused of some offence, Cicero, who had been his pupil, undertook his defence in an oration which is still extant. Roscius wrote a treatise on his profession, which is lost. He was raised to the senatorial rank, and died B.C. 61.

ROSCOE, HENRY, youngest son of William Roscoe, the historian, born 1800, was called to the bar 1826, and obtained a considerable practice on the northern circuit. His legal works, particularly a treatise on Real Property, proved him to be a sound and acute lawyer. In addition to these he edited, in 1826, North's Lives of the Lord-keeper Guilford, the Hon. Sir Dudley North, and Dr. John North; wrote the 'Lives of Eminent British Lawyers,' forming a volume of Lardner's Cyclopædia; and published a life of his father, 2 vols., 1833. He died at Gateacre, near Liverpool, 25 March, 1836.

ROSCOE, THOMAS, fifth son of the eminent writer, William Roscoe of Liverpool, was born in June, 1791, and began to write as early as 1817 in local reviews and journals. His editions of the 'Life of Cellini,' of 'Sismondi's Literature of the South of Europe,' and of 'Lanzi's History of Italian Painting,' are well known. He translated specimens from the Italian, German, and Spanish novelists, and edited a series of the English novelists, with illustrations by Cruikshank. Among his literary labours may be mentioned 'The Memoirs of Scipio di Ricci;' 'The Imprisonment of Silvio Pellico,' and his 'Duties of Men;' 'The Landscape Annual;' 'The Juvenile Keepsake;' 'The Remembrance;' portions of the Histories of Italy, Spain, and Portugal; and the 'Life and Campaigns of Wellington.' He died at Acacia Road, St John's Wood, London, 24 Sept., 1871.

ROSCOE, WILLIAM, an English historian, was the son of a respectable tavern-keeper, and was born at Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, 8 March, 1753. His mother was a woman of superior understanding, and much of his future conduct in life was influenced by her teaching and example. After having received the rudiments of education he quitted school to assist his father (who kept a market-garden as well as a public-house) in his agricultural pursuits, devoting all his hours of relaxation to reading. In his fifteenth year he was articled to an attorney, and in 1774 he commenced practice in his native town. He afterwards entered into partnership with Mr. Aspinall, and married. Literature, however, continued to occupy his attention, and numerous poetic effusions, chiefly on public occasions, came from his pen; but the works on which his fame as an author rests are 'The Life of Lorenzo de' Medici, called the Magnificent,' 2 vols., 1796, and 'The History of the Life and Pontificate of Leo X.,' 1805. Mr. Roscoe was for a short time M.P. for Liverpool, and carried on the business of a banker till 1820, when the firm was declared bankrupt. Died 27 June, 1831.

ROSCOMMON, WENTWORTH DILLON, EARL OF, born in Ireland about 1633, was educated at Caen, under Bochart, and at the Restoration obtained the place of captain of the band of pensioners, which he afterwards resigned and went to Ireland, where he was appointed a captain in the Guards. Having squandered his estate by gaming, he returned to England, and was made master of the horse to the duchess of York. He now altered his conduct, married a daughter of the earl of Burlington, and cultivated literature. Having become acquainted with Dryden, they formed, in conjunction, a plan for refining and fixing the standard of the English language, which noble design failed owing to the unquiet state of the times. Roscommon died 17 Jan., 1684, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. The best of his works is his 'Essay on Translated Verse.' Several new facts relating to his biography are given in an article by Mr. Thompson Cooper, printed in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for Dec., 1855.

ROSE, GEORGE, a statesman, was the son of an Episcopal clergyman at Brechin, in the shire of Angus, and born there 11 June, 1744. He was brought up under an uncle, who kept a school near London, after which he went into the navy and became a purser; but, by the interest of the earl of Marchmont, he was taken from thence and made keeper of the records in the Exchequer. Here his talents for business were soon discovered, and he was appointed to superintend the publication of the Domesday Book, after which he was employed to complete the journals of the Lords.

From this period his advancement was rapid, and his services were duly appreciated and engaged by almost every administration. Mr. Pitt, in particular, placed unbounded confidence in his judgment on subjects of trade and finance; and when that great man returned to power after the short peace Mr. Rose was made president of the Board of Trade, and treasurer of the Navy. On the death of Mr. Pitt another change occurred; but when the administration formed by Lord Grenville retired Mr. Rose resumed his former station, and continued in it till his death, which happened at Cuffnels, his seat in Hampshire, 13 Jan., 1818. He published, 'A Report on the Records; A brief Examination into the Increase of the Revenues, Commerce, and Navigation, of Great Britain; Considerations on the Debt due by the Civil List; Observations on the Poor Laws; Observations on the Historical Work of the late Right Hon. Charles James Fox, with a narrative of the Events which occurred in the Enterprize of the Earl of Argyle, in 1685, by Sir Patrick Hume; and other works.

ROSE, Sir GEORGE HENRY, an English diplomatist, was born 1771, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1807 he was sent on an extraordinary mission to the United States. From 1813 to 1815 he held the post of ambassador at Munich, and at Berlin from the latter date till 1823. He was made a knight of the order of the Guelphs in Hanover 1819. From 1818 he succeeded his father as clerk of the Parliament, and held that lucrative office till 1844. Died 17 June, 1855. He wrote, 'A Letter on the means and importance of converting the Slaves in the West Indies to Christianity,' 8vo., 1823; 'Scriptural Researches,' 12mo., 1832; and edited 'A Selection from the Papers of the Earls of Marchmont, illustrative of events from 1685 to 1750,' 8vo., 3 vols.

ROSE, HUGH JAMES, B.D., was born 1795 at Uckfield, of which parish his father was minister, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Taking orders, he became vicar of Horsham 1822-30; prebendary of Chichester 1827-33; Christian Advocate in the University of Cambridge 1829-33; rector of Hadleigh, Suffolk, 1830; incumbent of Fairstead, Essex, and of St. Thomas's, in the borough of Southwark, 1834; and principal of King's College, London, 1836. He died at Florence 22 Dec., 1838. Mr. Rose, who belonged to the 'High' section of the Anglican communion, was regarded as one of the most redoubtable champions of that church, and a formidable opponent of German rationalism, his publications, as Christian Advocate, being superior, in the opinion of Bishop Jebb, to anything in modern divinity. From the long list of his works we select the following: 'Inscriptiones Vetustissimæ,' 1825; 'The State of the Protestant Religion in Germany,' 1825, with an Appendix, 1828; 'The Commission and Consequent Duties of the Clergy,' 1828; 'Christianity always Progressive,' 1829; 'Letter to the Bishop of London, in reply to Mr. Pusey's works on the causes of Rationalism in Germany,' 1829; 'Remarks on the dispositions towards Christianity generated by prevailing opinions and pursuits,' 1830; 'Notices of the Mosaic Law, with some account of the opinions of recent French writers concerning it,' 1831; 'The Gospel an abiding System; with some remarks on the new Christianity of the St. Simonians,' 1832. In 1832 Mr. Rose projected the 'British Magazine;' and upon the death of Mr. Smedley he became editor of the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana.' He also prepared new editions of Parkhurst's Greek Lexicon, and of Middleton on the Greek Article; and his name is to be found on the title-page of a Biographical Dictionary.

ROSE, SAMUEL, a barrister, born at Chiswick 20 June, 1767; died in London 20 Dec., 1804. He edited Comyn's Reports and Digest.

ROSELLINI, IPPOLITO, an Egyptologist, born at Pisa 13 Aug., 1800, studied the oriental languages at Bologna, under the renowned Mezzofanti, and was subsequently nominated professor of those languages in the university of Pisa. He became a disciple of Champollion, who inspired him with a taste for hieroglyphical studies; and in 1828 he was placed by the grand duke of Tuscany at the head of a scientific expedition, which visited Egypt at the same time as the French expedition directed by Champollion. The results of the expedition Rosellini gave to the world in his great work entitled 'I Monumenti dell' Egitto e della Nubia,' Florence, 1832-45. He died 4 June, 1843.

ROSEN, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, an orientalist, born at Hanover 2 Sept., 1805. He studied the elements of Sanscrit with his father, and afterwards pursued the study of that language with Professor Bopp at Berlin. In 1826 he published his 'Corporis Radicum Sanscritarum Prolusiones,' which was the forerunner of his larger work, 'Radices Sanscritæ,' 1827. He also studied Arabic and Persian, and in 1836 became professor of oriental languages in the university of London (now University College), which chair he afterwards exchanged for the professorship of Sanscrit. He was also honorary foreign secretary to the Royal Asiatic Society, and secretary to the Oriental Translation Committee. He published his 'Rig Vedae Specimen,' 1830; the Arabic text of the 'Algebra of Mohammed ben Musa,' with an English translation and notes, 1831; and prepared for publication the great Biographical Dictionary of Ibn Khallikan; but this, as well as another work, in which he intended to give a comprehensive view of the system of Indian jurisprudence, was never completed. Among his other literary labours was a revision of the 'Dictionary, Bengali, Sanscrit, and English,' published by Sir Graves Houghton. Died in London 12 Sept., 1837.

ROSENMÜLLER, ERNST FRIEDRICH KARL, son of Johann Georg Rosenmüller, was born at Hessberg 10 Dec., 1768, and became professor of oriental languages in the university of Leipsic, where he died 27 Nov., 1835. Of his numerous works the principal are 'Scholia in Vetus Testamentum,' 8 vols., 1788-1827; and 'Handbuch der Biblischen Alterthumskunde,' 4 vols., 1823-31.

ROSENMÜLLER, JOHANN CHRISTIAN, son of Johann Georg Rosenmüller, was born at Hessberg, near Hildburghausen, 1771, and died 1820, at Leipsic, where he had been professor of anatomy and surgery. His works on anatomy are highly esteemed.

ROSENMÜLLER, JOHANN GEORG, born at Ummerstadt, a small town in the principality of Hildburghausen, 18 Dec., 1736, became professor of divinity at Leipsic, and superintendent in the Lutheran church at the same place, and died 14 March, 1815. He was one of the most industrious of German writers, and left nearly a hundred works, most of them designed for the instruction of youth.

ROSIER, JAMES, who is supposed to have been a son of a person of the same name who was the Puritanical minister of Winston, Norfolk, was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B.A. 1592-3; M.A. 1596). He was engaged by Thomas, Lord Arundel, of Wardour, to accompany Captain George Waymouth on his voyage to Virginia. The captain sailed from Ratcliffe 5 March, 1604-5, landed in Virginia on Whitsunday, 19 May, at a spot which was named Pentecost Harbour, and afterwards ascended the Penobscot river. He set out for England on 16 June, and on 18 July came into the haven of Dartmouth. Mr. Rosier was author of 'A True Relation of the most prosperous voyage made this present year, 1605, by captain George Waymouth, in the discovery of the land of Virginia, where he discovered sixty miles up, a most excellent river; together with a most fertile land,' 4to., London, 1605; reprinted in the Collections of the Massachusetts Hist. Soc., 3rd ser. viii. 125 seq. Extracts from this work are given in Purchas his Pilgrimes iv. 1659 seq. Purchas erroneously attributes to Rosier, John Brereton's Brief and True Discovery of the North Part of Virginia, and this mistake has misled Anderson, the historian of the Colonial Church.—Athen. Cantab. iii. 18.

ROSMINI, CARLO DE', an Italian biographer, born at Roveredo, in the Italian Tyrol, 1758; died 1827, at Milan, of which city he wrote a history.

ROSS, ALEXANDER, a voluminous compiler, born 1590, in Scotland. He was an Episcopal divine, and master of the free school at Southampton, where he died 1654. His principal works are, 'The new Planet no Planet; or, the Earth no wandering Star,' written against the Copernican system; 'Virgilius Evangelizans,' a cento on the Life of Christ, collected from Virgil; 'Medicus Medicatus,' against Sir Thomas Browne's 'Religio Medici;' 'The Muse's Interpreter, a key to Mythology;' 'A Continuation of Ralegh's History of the World;' and 'A View of all Religions.'

ROSS, ALEXANDER, a Scotch poet, born in the parish of Kincardine-O'Neil, Aberdeenshire, 13 April, 1699, and educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen (M.A. 1718). In 1732 he was appointed schoolmaster of Lochler, Forfarshire, where he spent the remainder of his simple and unvaried life in the discharge of the duties of his humble office. Died 20 May, 1784. Besides some highly popular ballads in the Scotch dialect, he wrote the beautiful pastoral poem entitled 'Helenore, or the Fortunate Shepherdess, a poem in the broad Scotch dialect.' The best edition is that published by John Longmuir, LL.D., 1866, containing a life of the author and a sketch of his inedited works.

ROSS, Sir JAMES CLARK, an Arctic navigator, born in London 15 April, 1800. He entered the navy in 1812, on board the 'Briseis,' commanded by his uncle, Captain, afterwards Sir John Ross, under whom he continued to serve in the Baltic, the White Sea, and on the coast of Scotland. He accompanied his uncle, as a midshipman, in his first voyage in search of a North-west passage. Subsequently, from 1819 to 1825, he was engaged with Captain Parry in his three voyages, being promoted during his absence in 1822 to the rank of lieutenant. He again accompanied Captain Parry in 1827, and on his return to England he was appointed commander. He also joined his uncle, Captain John Ross, from 1829 to 1833, on his second voyage in search of a North-west passsage, and in 1834 was elevated to the rank of post-captain in recognition of his valuable services, among which were included the discovery of the magnetic pole. He was afterwards employed by the Admiralty in a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1839 he was appointed to the command of an expedition, in the 'Erebus' and 'Terror,' to the Antarctic Seas, the chief purpose in view being magnetic investigation. This voyage, which occupied a period of four years, was rich in additions made to the previous knowledge of the Antarctic regions in geography, geology, zoology, and botany. Captain Ross married after his return in 1843, and received the honour of knighthood in 1844. In 1847 he published the results of his discoveries and researches in the Southern and Antarctic regions, in 2 vols. In Jan., 1848, he made a voyage in the 'Enterprise' to Baffin's Bay, in search of Sir John Franklin, but was unsuccessful. Died at Aylesbury 3 April, 1862.

ROSS, JOHN. See ROUSE.

ROSS, JOHN, D.D., a native of Herefordshire, became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his doctor's degree in 1756. Previous to this, his classical and critical powers had been made known to the world, in a defence of the epistles said to have been written by Cicero to Brutus; and an edition of the 'Epistolæ Familiares.' He became vicar of Frome, Somersetshire, and in 1778 bishop of Exeter, where he died 24 Aug., 1792.

ROSS, Rear-Admiral Sir JOHN, K.C.B., an Arctic navigator, born at Balsarroch, Wigtonshire, 24 June, 1777. He was fourth son of the Rev. Andrew Ross, minister of Inch, and proprietor of Balsarroch. Entering the navy 1786, he served actively and valiantly throughout the whole of the French war, and was wounded thirteen times. His undaunted conduct was acknowledged in various ways. He had many increases of pension. He received from the Patriotic Society a sword worth £100; he got, with a knighthood, another sword, worth £200, from the king of Sweden; and he also obtained many other foreign knighthoods and honours. After the peace he, in 1818, went in command of the hired sloop 'Isabella,' a company with the 'Alexander' brig, commanded by Sir Wm. Edward Parry, for the purpose of exploring Baffin's Bay, and inquiring into the probability of a North-west passage. Shortly after his return to England he was advanced (7 Dec., 1818) to post rank. The results of his investigations are detailed in his 'Voyage of Discovery,' published in 1819. He was, from May, 1829, until Oct., 1833, employed in the 'Victory' steamer, on a fresh expedition to the Arctic regions, equipped at the expense of Sir Felix Booth. He received the honour of knighthood 1834. In March, 1839, he was appointed consul at Stockholm, where he remained several years. He was appointed a rear-admiral on the retired list 1851, and died at 5, Gillingham Street, Pimlico, 31 Aug., 1856. Besides his 'Voyage of Discovery,' Sir John Ross wrote many other works of merit. The best known are his 'Letters to Young Sea Officers,' and his 'Memoirs of Lord de Saumarez,' under whom he had so long and so gallantly laboured for his country's glory.

ROSSE, WILLIAM PARSONS, EARL OF, eldest son of Lawrence, the second earl, was born at York 17 June, 1800. He entered the university of Dublin 1818, whence he passed, in 1819, into residence at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. 1822, as a first-class in mathematical honours. As Lord Oxmantown, he represented the King's County in the House of Commons from 1821 till the end of the first reformed Parliament, when he retired from political life for the purpose of devoting himself to philosophical pursuits. In 1841, on his father's death, he succeeded to the title, and in 1845 was elected one of the representative peers for Ireland. Lord Rosse resided chiefly at Birr Castle, in Ireland, where he set up his first telescope in 1831. It had a concave speculum of 3 feet diameter, a focal distance of 27 feet, and was so nicely balanced, by means of weights over pulleys, that it could be raised or lowered to any angle with the greatest ease. The success of this instrument, the construction of which he had himself superintended, and a considerable part of which he had worked upon with his own hand, encouraged him to further effort. With a newer and more gigantic instrument, 52 feet in length and 7 feet in diameter, having a 6-feet speculum, many of the nebulæ previously seen merely as luminous patches were resolved into stars, and in others a spiral form and arrangement was detected. New nebulæ were discovered in considerable numbers, and wherever the instrument was directed new stars were seen in immense profusion. Sketches of some of the more remarkable nebulæ were published in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1850. Lord Rosse was elected, in 1849, president of the Royal Society; and in 1842 the university of Cambridge conferred on him the honorary degree of LL.D. Died 31 Oct., 1867.

ROSSETTI, GABRIELE, professor of Italian at King's College, London, well known as an Italian poet and commentator on Dante, died 26 April, 1854, aged 71.

ROSSI, JOHN CHARLES FELIX, R.A., an English sculptor, born at Nottingham 1762: died in London 21 Feb., 1839.

ROSSI, PELLEGRINO, Count, an Italian statesman, born at Carrara, in the duchy of Modena, 13 July, 1787. He became an advocate and professor of laws in the University of Bologna as early as 1809. In 1815 he acted as civil commissioner during the occupation of the Legations by Murat, and was in consequence proscribed. He escaped to Geneva, where the rights of a citizen were conferred upon him in time to rescue him from the persecution of the Austrian Government. He occupied for nearly twenty years the chair of criminal law in the Academy of Geneva. He was also elected a member of the council, and deputy to the Diet, in which he zealously advocated the centralisation of the federal power. Wearied, however, with the minute and untractable elements of Swiss politics, he was induced by M. Guizot to remove to Paris 1833. The next year he was appointed professor of political economy in the College of France, and of public law to the Parisian faculty of law. Eventually he was summoned to the Chamber of Peers (1840). Although he never held a ministerial office in France, he lived in the closest intimacy with the Government, and enjoyed the unreserved confidence of King Louis Philippe. This circumstance caused him to be selected (1845) for the important post of French ambassador at Rome; and, after an absence of thirty years, he returned to his native country as the plenipotentiary of a foreign sovereign. Deprived of his employments by the Revolution of 1848, Rossi retired for a short time to Carrara; but upon the entrance of the Austrians into the Papal territories, he repaired to Rome, and having offered to reorganize the States of the Church without violence or foreign assistance, he was appointed by Pope Pius IX. minister of the interior, with charge of the finances and the police. Count Rossi was assassinated on 15 Nov., 1848, at one o'clock, as he was alighting from his carriage to enter the Chamber of Deputies. He was stabbed in the neck, and died instantly. In 1854 a man named Constantini was found guilty of the murder, and executed. Count Rossi's works were collected by his son, and published in 8 vols. 8vo., Paris 1857-1863.

ROSSI, Rosso De', or Il Rosso, a painter, called in France Maître Roux, was born at Florence 1496. He closely imitated Michael Angelo and Parmasan; and though he never had any instructor, he acquired considerable skill in his profession. Francis I. appointed him superintendent of the works of Fontainebleau, where he died 1541.

ROSSINI, Gioacchino Antonio, a celebrated composer, born 29 Feb., 1792, at Pesaro, in the State of the Church. His parents were in poor circumstances, the father being an indifferent performer on the French horn in a strolling company of musicians. Young Rossini became one of the party when only ten or twelve years old, and picked up in a desultory and crude manner the elements of the art in which he was destined to become a master of world-wide and lasting celebrity. When about fifteen years of age he entered the Lyceum of Bologna, where he studied counterpoint and composition under Stanislas Mattei. His earlier operas have been consigned to oblivion. The first which made him famous was 'Tancredi,' brought out at Venice 1813, and this was followed some months later by 'L'Italiana in Algieri,' which met with a success in no degree inferior. His fame was increased by 'Il Turco in Italia' (1814), and 'Elisabetta Regina d'Inghilterra' (1815). 'Il Barbiere di Siviglia,' an opera buffa, produced at Rome 1816, was condemned on the first night, though it is now perhaps the most popular of all operas, except Mozart's 'Don Giovanni.' 'Il Barbiere' was followed by 'Otello,' 'Cenerentola,' 'La Gazza Ladra,' 'Mose in Egitto, 'Zelmira,' 'Semiramide,' and other operas. After going to Vienna he visited London, where he received the most lavish sums for his vocal performances and tuition, and was courted as a guest in the highest circles. From Oct., 1824, the date of his departure from England, Rossini belonged personally and artistically to Paris. The crowning glory of his career, and one of the few masterpieces of grand opera, 'Guillaume Tell,' was produced at the Académie Royale 1829. With this grand effort Rossini's career may be said to have terminated. As a church composer, he is chiefly known by his beautiful 'Stabat Mater,' which is, in its way, a masterpiece. Died at Paris 13 Nov., 1868.

ROSSLYN, Alexander Wedderburn, earl of, was born at Chester Hall, in Scotland, 13 Feb., 1733. He first appeared at the Scotch bar, but in 1753 he entered himself a student of the Inner Temple, where he was called to the bar 1757. In 1763 he was made a king's counsel; in 1771 solicitor-general; and in 1778 attorney-general, in which situation he did eminent service by his advice to call out the military during the riots in 1780. The same year he was appointed chief-justice of the Common Pleas, and called to the upper house by the title of Baron Loughborough. After this he was, for a short time, first-commissioner of the great seal; but when Mr. Pitt came into power, his lordship adhered to the party of Mr. Fox, and continued to do so till 1793, when he succeeded Lord Thurlow in the chancellorship, which office he held till 1801. He was then created earl of Rosslyn. He died without issue 3 Jan., 1805, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

ROSTOPTCHIN, Fedor, Count, a Russian general, born at Livna, in the province of Orel, 12 (23) March, 1765; died at Moscow 18 (30) Jan., 1826. He was governor of Moscow in 1812, and is believed to have caused the burning of that city upon its capture by the French. This, however, he denied in a pamphlet, 'La Vérité sur l'Incendie de Moscou,' Paris, 1823.

ROSWEIDE, Heribert, a Jesuit, born at Utrecht 1569. He became professor of philosophy and divinity, first at Douay, and next at Antwerp, where he died 1629. His works are, Fasti Sanctorum quorum Vitæ in Belgicis Bibliothecis Manuscriptæ asservantur; Account of the Hermits of Egypt and Palestine; An Ecclesiastical History; and History of the Belgic Church.

ROTGANS, Luke, a Dutch poet, born in 1645 at Amsterdam; died 1710. He wrote the Life of William III., King of England, an epic poem in eight books, and several other pieces, printed together 1715.

ROTHERHAM, Thomas, sometimes called Scot, a munificent prelate, born at Rotherham, Yorkshire, 1423. He became fellow of King's College, Cambridge, master of Pembroke Hall, and chancellor of that university. He was secretary to four kings, and was successively bishop of Rochester (1468), and Lincoln (1471), and archbishop of York (1480). He also held the office of lord chancellor. Died 29 May, 1500. He was a liberal benefactor to Lincoln College, Oxford, of which he is deemed a second founder.—Athen. Cantab.

ROTHSCHILD, the name of a Jewish family of European bankers. Mayer Anselm Rothschild, the founder of the great commercial house, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine 1743. He was intended for the Jewish ministry, but being placed by his father in a counting-house at Hanover, he showed so great an aptitude for commercial pursuits that, having experienced his honesty and integrity in lesser matters, the landgrave of Hesse appointed him (1801) banker to himself and his court. Nor was this confidence misplaced; for during the sway of the great Napoleon in Germany, the landgrave's private fortune was saved by the devotedness of the bankers, whose name, in the course of years, had grown to be a tower of commercial strength over Central Europe. At his death in Sept., 1812, he left to his five sons not only the inheritance of an immense fortune and boundless credit, but the still more precious legacy of wise and prudent and united counsels. He especially recommended them, if they would preserve the position he had gained for them, always to act together; and it is well known that his sons and his grandchildren have, for more than half a century, strictly followed that advice. Taking part in most of the great financial affairs of ustria, France, and England, they formed in the st generation an invincible phalanx; for, while ne third son, Nathan Meyer (b. 1777; d. 1836), ettled in London, Anselm took up his residence

: Frankfort, Solomon at Vienna, Charles at Naples, nd James (b. 1792; d. 15 Nov., 1868) at Paris.

ROTROU, JEAN DE, a French poet, was born at reux 12 Aug., 1609. Richelieu was so well easèd with his tragedies and comedies that he ave him a pension; yet Rotrou would not flatter is eminence by joining in the combination gainst Corneille, whose merit excited the jealousy the cardinal. Rotrou obtained an office at reux, where he remained when the place was esolated by a pestilential disorder, of which he ed 27 July, 1650. He wrote thirty-seven dra-natic pieces.

ROTTECK, KARL VON, a German publicist and storian, born 18 July, 1775, at Freiburg, Baden, here he died 26 Nov., 1840. As an historian, he widely known by his 'Universal History,' an bridgment of which has been translated into nglish by T. Jones.

ROUBILIAC, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, a sculptor, was rnative of Lyons. He came to England in the ign of George I., and was employed on several eat works, particularly the monument of the ake of Argyle, in Westminster Abbey; the statue Shakspere, in the British Museum; that of andel, in Westminster Abbey; and that of Sir aac Newton, at Cambridge. He was a very ssent man, but pleasant in his manners. Died
London 11 Jan., 1762.

ROUS, FRANCIS, a republican writer, born at alton, Cornwall, 1579, and educated at Broadgate all, Oxford. He was brought up to the law, and came a member of Parliament in the reign of harles I., when he was distinguished by his zeal the establishment of a commonwealth, on the nn of the Hebrew republic. He was afterwards e tool of Cromwell, whom he compared to oses, and, in consequence, was made one of his ds. He was also appointed provost of Eton, and d at Acton, near London, 7 Jan., 1659. His rks were published, in folio, 1657.

ROUS, JOHN, incumbent of Santon Downham, ffolk, kept a curious diary, a portion of which,
ending from 1625 to 1642, was printed in 1859 the Camden Society, under the editorship of
s. Mary Anne Everett Green. Born 1584; died ril, 1644.

ROUSE, or ROSS, JOHN, called the Antiquary
Warwick, was born in that town. He studied Balliol College, Oxford, and afterwards became on of Osney. He travelled over the greater rt of the kingdom to collect information respecthistorical events, and then settled at Guy's ffe, Warwickshire, where he died 14 Jan., 1491.
work on the Antiquities of Warwick, and the story of our Kings, was printed by Hearne 1719.
ere is also a manuscript of his on the history of Earls of Warwick, in the Bodleian Library.

ROUSSEAU, JACQUES, a painter, born at Paris
e. He studied under Swanefelt, and afterwards
Italy, where he acquired great skill in landscape, hitecture, and perspective. On his return to nce, he was employed by Louis XIV.; but, ng a Protestant, he went to Holland, whence he ne to England, and painted many fine pictures, ticularly at Montague House, now the British seum. Died 1694.

OUSSEAU, JEAN BAPTISTE, a poet, born at Paris 6 April, 1670. His father was a shoemaker, who gave him a liberal education. In 1688 he became page to the French minister at the court of Denmark, and afterwards secretary to Marshal Tallard, in his embassy to England. In 1701 he was admitted into the Academy of Inscriptions; but in 1712 he was banished from France on the charge of writing some satirical couplets, which he declared were forgeries, devised for his ruin. He then went to Switzerland, and afterwards to Vienna, under the patronage of Prince Eugene. In 1721 he published in London an edition of his poems, in 2 vols. He next lived with the duke of Aremberg, whose favour he lost, and died suddenly at Brussels 17 March, 1741. An edition of his works was printed in 1743, in 3 vols. 4to., and 4 vols. 12mo.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN JACQUES, the son of a watchmaker at Geneva, was born there 28 June, 1712. His mother died soon after his birth, and his education was much neglected. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to an engraver, from whom he ran away, and escaped into Savoy, where a priest recommended him to one Madame de Warens, who, having abandoned her husband and the Protestant religion, affected a mighty zeal for her new faith. She accordingly took the young fugitive under her protection, and placed him in a seminary at Turin, where he was baptized in the cathedral. After living in one or two families as a servant he returned to Madame de Warens, who became his mistress till Jean Jacques was superseded by another gallant. Having acquired some knowledge of music, Rousseau now earned his living by writing pieces for the dealers, and giving instruction to young persons. In 1750 he gained the prize given by the academy of Dijon on this subject: 'Whether the revival of the arts and sciences has contributed to the refinement of manners?' Rousseau supported the negative side of the question with considerable ingenuity. In 1752 he produced a musical entertainment, entitled 'Le Devin du Village,' which was very successful. But his next performance, 'A Letter on French music,' gave such offence that he found it expedient to retire to Geneva, where he abjured the Catholic religion, and was admitted to the rights of citizenship. In 1760 he published 'Julie, ou la Nouvelle Heloïse,' a romance of the most seductive description. His next work, entitled 'Du Contrat Social,' struck at the foundation of all governments, and therefore was prohibited, both in France and Switzerland. This treatise was followed in 1762 by 'Émile, ou de l'Éducation;' the principles of which are of the worst tendency, and the book was consequently condemned by the Parliament of Paris, as also at Geneva, where the gates were shut against the author, who, in revenge, published his 'Letters from the Mountain.' Rousseau, having now created a host of enemies on the Continent, gladly accepted an offer to visit England, accompanied by David Hume, who procured for him a pension. But he soon quarrelled with his benefactor, threw up his pension, and returned to France, where he published his 'Dictionary of Music,' which received the approbation of Dr. Burney. His 'Letters on Botany' have also been praised by good judges, and were translated into English by Professor Martyn. Rousseau married a woman after she had borne him five children, all of whom were sent to the foundling hospital by their unnatural father. He died suddenly, or rather, as was supposed, poisoned himself, 3 July, 1778, at Ermenonville, the estate of the Marquis de Girardon. He wrote an account of his own life, under the title of 'Confessions.' A uniform edition of his works was printed by Didot, in 25 vols. 12mo., 1801.

ROUTH, MARTIN JOSEPH, D.D., a native of South Elmham, Suffolk, born 15 Sept., 1755, received his education at Oxford, was elected president of Magdalen College in that university 1791, and died at the age of 100, on 22 Dec., 1854. He published an edition of the Euthydemus and Gorgias of Plato 1784; and a valuable work entitled 'Reliquiæ Sacræ: sive Auctorum fere jam perditorum secundi tertiique Sæculi Fragmenta, quæ supersunt: accedunt Epistolæ Synodicæ et Canonicæ Nicæno Concilio antiquiores,' 4 vols., 1814-18, second edition, 1846. A fifth volume, supplementary to both editions, appeared in 1848. Dr. Routh likewise published 'Scriptorum Ecclesticorum Opuscula,' and an improved edition of Burnet's Own Times.

ROUX, MAÎTRE. See ROSSI.

ROWE, ELIZABETH, was the daughter of Mr. Walter Singer, a Dissenting minister, of Ilchester, Somersetshire, where she was born 11 Sept., 1674. At the age of twenty-two she published a volume of poems, under the signature of 'Philomela.' In 1709 she married Mr. Thomas Rowe, who wrote some poetical pieces and a supplement to Plutarch's Lives. He died in 1715, and Mrs. Rowe continued a widow the remainder of her life. She published, without her name, in 1728, a popular work entitled 'Friendship in Death, in twenty Letters from the Dead to the Living;' which was followed soon afterwards by 'Letters Moral and Entertaining.' In 1736 appeared 'The History of Joseph,' a poem. Mrs. Rowe died suddenly at Frome 20 Feb., 1736-7. Dr. Watts published her 'Devout Exercises of the Heart;' and in 1739 her 'Miscellaneous Works' appeared in 2 vols.

ROWE, NICHOLAS, a dramatic poet, was the son of John Rowe, Esq., serjeant at law, and born at Little Berkford, Bedfordshire, 1673. On leaving Westminster School, he became a student of the Middle Temple, but was never called to the bar. At the age of twenty-five he produced his tragedy of 'The Ambitious Stepmother;' which was followed by 'Tamerlane;' 'The Fair Penitent;' 'Ulysses;' 'The Royal Convert;' 'Jane Shore;' 'Lady Jane Grey;' and a comedy called 'The Biter.' Three of these plays still retain their place on the stage, and possess considerable merit, particularly 'Jane Shore' and the 'Fair Penitent.' Rowe also wrote miscellaneous poems, and the Life of Shakspere; but his principal performance is a translation of Lucan's Pharsalia. He died 6 Dec., 1718, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

ROWLANDS, HENRY, a Welsh divine and antiquary, was a native of Anglesey. He wrote a valuable book entitled 'Mona Restaurata; or the History of the Isle of Anglesey.' Died 1722.

ROWLANDSON THOMAS, a celebrated caricaturist, born July, 1756, in London, where he died 22 April, 1827.

ROWNING, JOHN, a mathematician, who was fellow of Magdalen College, Cambridge, and rector of Anderby, Lincolnshire, died 1771, at the age of 72. He wrote some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, but is best known by a 'Compendious System of Natural Philosophy.'

ROXBURGH, WILLIAM, M.D., an eminent physician and botanist, born at Underwood, in the parish of Craigie, Ayrshire, 29 June, 1759. He received his education at Edinburgh, where he served his time as a surgeon, after which he went to India, and settled at Madras. Having communicated several papers on natural history to the Royal Society, he was appointed keeper of the botanical garden at Calcutta, where he formed an intimacy with Sir William Jones, and became a member of the Asiatic Society, whose volumes exhibit abundant proofs of his talents. Dr. Roxburgh made several important discoveries, particularly in the colouring matter of the lacca insect, and the cultivation of hemp in Bengal, for which he received three gold medals from the Society of Arts. He died at Edinburgh 10 April, 1815. His other works are, 'Plants of the Coast of Coromandel,' 3 vols. folio, 1795-1819; Botanical Description of Swieteniæ; and an Essay on the Natural Order of the Scitamineæ.

ROXBURGHE, JOHN KER, DUKE OF, a celebrated collector of books, was born in London 1740; succeeded to his father's title 1755; and died 19 March, 1804. The sale of his magnificent library, in 1812, created extraordinary excitement among book-collectors, and in commemoration of the event the Roxburghe Club was established, its principal object being the reprinting of scarce and curious books.

ROY, JULIEN DAVID LE, an architect, born at Paris 1728. His father, Julien le Roy, was one of the most celebrated horologists of his age, and died at Paris in 1759, leaving four sons, of whom Julien David was the most eminent. He wrote, 'Ruines des plus rares monumens de la Grèce,' for which he was elected a member of the Academy of Inscriptions; 'Histoire de la disposition et des formes differentes des Temples des Chretiens;' 'Observations sur les Edifices des anciens Peuples;' 'De la Marines des anciens Peuples;' 'Les Navires des Anciens.' He died 1803. His brother, Pierre le Roy, was watchmaker to Louis XVI., and died 1785. He published 'Etrennes Chronometriques,' and a 'Treatise on the Labours of Harrison and Le Roy, for the Discovery of the Longitude.'

ROYER-COLLARD, ANTOINE ATHANASE, a French physician, born at Sompuis, near Vitry-le-Français, 7 Feb., 1768; died at Paris 27 Nov., 1825. He started, in 1803, the 'Bibliothèque Médicale,' which was for many years the best medical periodical in France.

ROYER-COLLARD, PIERRE PAUL, a French philosopher and statesman, born at Sompuis, near Vitry-le-Français (Marne), 21 June, 1763, was admitted an advocate at the Paris bar at the age of twenty. At first he was an enthusiastic supporter of the Revolution of 1789, and became secretary of the first commune of Paris; but, in 1792, being disgusted with the excesses of his political associates, he abandoned the revolutionary cause. On being sent by the department of the Marne as deputy to the Council of the Five Hundred (1797), he displayed great courage by defending in the tribune proscribed persons and the clergy, the result being that he was expelled from the Assembly on the 18th Fructidor. He now associated himself with the members of the Secret Council which Louis XVIII. had established in Paris. After the proclamation of the Empire Royer-Collard abandoned politics, and applied himself exclusively to philosophical tudies, being appointed in 1811 professor of history and modern philosophy in the Faculty of Letters and the Normal School. After the first Restoration he was appointed director of the royal printing establishment; and under the second Restoration he was councillor of state and president of the royal council of the university, in addition to which he was sent to the Chamber of Deputies by the department of the Marne. He was a Liberal Royalist, and the leader of the Doctrinaires, a small but influential party, who insisted that the State ought to be administered in accordance with the abstract doctrine of right, rather than with the mere expediency and passion of the hour. For a time he gave his support to the ministry of Decazes; but the excesses of the Ultra-Royalists induced him to place himself at the head of the Opposition. By assailing the law of primogeniture, the law of sacrilege, and various reactionary measures, he acquired a popularity so great that in 1827 he was re-elected in seven electoral districts simultaneously. The same year he succeeded Laplace in the Academy. Appointed by the king president of the Chamber in 1828, he finally withdrew into private life after the resignation of the Molé administration in 1839. Died 4 Sept., 1845. The master of Cousin, of Jouffroy, and of Damiron in speculative philosophy, and of Guizot and De Tocqueville in political science, he has left no permanent record of himself at all corresponding to his personal reputation and authority. His philosophical writings, chiefly fragmentary, in an original and picturesque style, are published with Jouffroy's translation of the works of Thomas Reid.

ROZIER, FRANÇOIS, an agricultural writer, born at Lyons 23 Jan., 1734. He was an ecclesiastic, and obtained a priory, but devoted himself almost wholly to botany and natural history. He was a member of the Academy at Lyons, where he had the direction of the public nursery ground. He conducted the 'Journal de Physique et d'Histoire Naturelle;' and published besides a 'Course of Agriculture,' with other works. He was killed during the siege of Lyons, 29 Sept., 1793.

RUBENS, Sir PETER PAUL, was born at Antwerp, though some accounts say at Cologne, 29 June, 1577. His masters were Tobias Verhaect, Adam Van Oort, and Otho Venius, with the last of whom he lived about four years, and then went to Italy, where he met with a patron in the grand duke of Mantua, who not only employed him as an artist, but sent him on an embassy to Spain. While at that court he painted the picture of Philip III., who honoured him with many marks of distinction. Rubens was prevented from settling in Italy by the invitation of the Archduke Albert and the Infanta Isabella, in compliance with which he returned to Antwerp, where he rose to the height of his profession. In 1620 he was employed by the Princess Mary de' Medici to adorn the gallery of the Luxembourg with a series of paintings illustrative of the principal scenes of her life. While thus engaged, he became known to the Duke of Buckingham, who purchased his museum for ten thousand pounds. In 1628 Rubens was sent by the Infanta Isabella to Madrid, where he painted several pictures in the royal palace, for which he received the order of knighthood and the key of chamberlain. He was next employed in a political mission to England, and continued there about a year, during which he painted the Apotheosis of James I., in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, and also the picture of Charles I. as St. George, and his queen as Cleodelinde, for which he was knighted, and received a chain of gold. He was appointed secretary to the Council at Antwerp, and died there, full of honours, 30 May, 1640. His son, Albert Rubens, born 1614, succeeded his father as secretary to the Council, and died 1657. He wrote 'Regum et Imperatorum Romanorum Numismata;' 'De Re Vestiaria Veterum,' &c.

RUCCELLAI, BERNARD, Oricellarius, was born at Florence 1449. He was related to the Medici family, and succeeded Lorenzo as head of the Platonic Academy, for whom he built a magnificent house, with gardens and groves. He was also eminent as a diplomatist, and filled important offices in the State. He died in 1514. His works are, 'De Urbe Romana;' 'De Bello Pisano;' 'De Bello Italico;' 'De Magistratibus Romanis;' and 'Trionfo della Calunnia,' a poem.

RUCCELLAI, GIOVANNI, son of the preceding, was born at Florence 1475. He became an ecclesiastic, and was sent by Leo X. as his legate to the court of France. Pope Clement VII. appointed him keeper of the Castle of St. Angelo, whence he obtained the name of Il Castellano. He wrote two tragedies, called 'Rosmunda,' and 'Orestes;' but his principal performance is a poem, entitled 'Api, or the Bees.' Died 1526.

RÜCKERT, FRIEDRICH, a German poet and orientalist, born at Schweinfurth, in Bavaria, 16 May, 1789. He completed his studies at the university of Jena, and after a tour through Italy, where he made a special study of the national songs, he fixed his residence in Coburg. In 1826, however, he was appointed professor of the Persian language at Erlangen, whence he was summoned to Berlin by King Frederick William in 1830. In 1849 he retired to his charming estate near Coburg, where he spent the remainder of his life. Rückert is one of the most elegant and most harmonious poets of Germany. His first collection of poems, 'Deutsche Gedichte,' appeared as early as 1814, under the pseudonym of Freimund Reimar; and it was followed by numerous other poetical works, some original, and some translated from oriental languages. Died 31 Jan., 1866.

RUDBECK, OLAUS, a Swedish physician, born 1630. While a student at Upsal, he discovered the lymphatics in the liver, and other parts of the body; though his claim of priority was contested by Bartholine. He also cultivated botany, and founded a garden for the university of Upsal, where he held the chair of medicine till his death, in 1702, having resigned the professorships of botany and anatomy, some years before, to his son. His principal works are, 'Catalogus plantarum horti Upsaliensis;' 'Deliciæ Vallis Jacobææ;' 'Campi Elysii,' which was intended as part of a complete vegetable system, in 12 vols. folio, but the remainder of the work was destroyed by a fire. Rudbeck also wrote 'Atlantica, sive Manheim vera Japheti posterorum sedes ac Patria,' in which he maintains that Sweden was the garden of Eden, and the Atlantis of Plato. Olaus Rudbeck, son and successor of the preceding, was born at Upsal 1660. He took his doctor's degree at Utrecht, and in 1720 joined Benzelius in founding the Swedish Academy of Sciences, the memoirs of which learned body contain a number of his dissertations on subjects of natural history. He also published some works on the plants and animals mentioned in Scripture. Died 23 March, 1740.

RUDDIMAN, THOMAS, a grammarian and critic, born at Boyndie, in the county of Banff, in Oct. 1674. He was educated at the parish school, whence he removed to King's College, Aberdeen, where he obtained an exhibition, and took the degree of M.A. On leaving Aberdeen, he became master of the school at Laurencekirk; but his talents being discovered by Dr. Pitcairne, that gentleman procured for him the place of assistant-keeper of the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh, where he was also employed as corrector of the press. In 1714 he printed his 'Rudiments of the Latin Tongue,' which superseded all the other grammars in Scotland. His next publication was the Works of Buchanan, 2 vols., 1715. The same year he became a printer, in partnership with his brother. The first part of his 'Grammaticæ Latinæ Institutiones' came out in 1725, and the second in 1732; but that on Prosody was never published. Ruddiman also established a newspaper called 'The Caledonian Mercury.' In 1739 he published 'Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ,' with a preface. In his latter years he was afflicted with blindness, notwithstanding which he printed an excellent edition of Livy. He now resigned his place as keeper of the Advocates' Library, and was succeeded by David Hume. He died at Edinburgh 19 Jan., 1757.

RUDING, ROGERS, F.S.A., born at Leicester 9 Aug., 1751, became a fellow of Merton College, Oxford (B.D. 1782). In 1773 he was presented to the college living of Morden, Surrey, and soon afterwards he was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, to whose 'Archæologia' he was a contributor. He published 'Annals of the Coinage of Britain and its Dependencies,' 4 vols., 1817. Died 16 Feb., 1820.

RUFFHEAD, OWEN, a miscellaneous writer, born in Piccadilly about 1723. He entered the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar; but the only figure he made in that profession was in publishing an edition of the Statutes. He applied himself with more success to politics, and conducted a periodical paper called the 'Contest.' He was also the author of the 'Life of Pope,' and several pamphlets. Died 25 Oct., 1769.

RUFINUS, by some called Toranius, was born about the middle of the fourth century, at Concordia, in Italy. He became a priest in the monastery of Aquileia, where he contracted a friendship with St. Jerome, whom he followed to the East; but while in Egypt he suffered much persecution from the Arians. On his arrival in Palestine, he founded a monastery on Mount Olivet, where he employed himself in translating Greek authors into Latin. His version of Origen gave such offence to his old acquaintance Jerome, that he wrote bitterly against him, and Rufinus was cited to Rome by Pope Anastasius, who condemned his translation. Rufinus then retired to Sicily, where he died about 410. He wrote a defence of Origen, which, with his other works, was printed at Paris in 1580, folio.

RUGENDAS, GEORGE PHILIP, a German painter of battle pieces, born 27 Nov., 1666, at Augsburg, where he died 9 May, 1742.

RUGGLE, GEORGE, a dramatic writer, was born at Lavenham, in Suffolk, in 1575. He entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, but removed to Trinity College, and next to Clare Hall, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1614 his Latin play of 'Ignoramus' was performed at Cambridge, before James I. This comedy, which is a severe satire on the lawyers, was reprinted with a biographical preface by Mr. Hawkins, in 1787. Ruggle was in orders, and died about 1622.
